HELPS: (1) (ἀντίλημψις): As used in I Co 12 28 this word (in plural form) has a descriptive rather than a technical significance. It refers to those who, having the ability or means and the opportunity, were moved to aid or succor those in need of help. It is not a term for a distinct church-office. See Church, § 7. (2) (βοήθεια): A term used in plural form in Ac 27 17. See Ships and Navigation, § 3. E. E. N.

HEM. See Dress and Ornaments, § 3.

HEMAM, hî'mam (הֵימָם, hēmām): The ancestral head of a Seirite family (Gn 36 22; Homam in I Ch 1 39). E. E. N.

HEMAN, hî'man (הֵימָן, hēmān), 'right hand,' 'trustworthy': 1. A son of Zerah, one of the three wisest men with whom Solomon was compared (I K 4 31). 2. A Kohathite Levite and head of a division of the musicians (I Ch 25 1, etc.). A. C. Z.

HEMATH, hî'math. See Hamath.

HEMDAN, hem'dan (הֶמְדָּן, ḥemdān): The eldest son of a Horite family (Gn 36 26; Hamran [Amram AV] in I Ch 1 41). E. E. N.

HEMLOCK: The rendering of the Heb. rō'sh in Hos 10 4. The same Heb. word is elsewhere rendered "gall" or "poison" (Dt 29 17 [cf. RVmg.]; Ps 69 21; La 3 5; Jer 9 14, etc.). In Hos 10 4 it is evident that some troublesome, quick-growing, and probably noxious weed is meant, a fit symbol of the corruption of justice then prevalent in Israel. Its frequent collocation with wormwood (Am 6 12, etc.) shows that it was bitter, and other references indicate that it was considered poisonous. See Gall. In Am 6 12 "hemlock" AV is the rendering of la'ănāh, 'wormwood' (q.v.). See also Palestine, § 21. E. E. N.

HEN (חֵן, ḥēn), 'grace': This word (in Zec 6 14) may not be a proper noun (cf. RVmg.), or it may be a mistake for 'Josiah'; cf. ver. 10. E. E. N.

HEN. See Palestine, § 25.

HENA, hî'na (הֵנַע, hēna'): A city named with Sepharvaim and others as conquered by the Assyrians (II K 18 34, 19 13; Is 37 13). Site unknown. E. E. N.

HENADAD, hen'a-dad (חֵנָדָד, ḥēnādhādh): The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Levites (Ezr 3 9; Neh 3 18, 24, 10 9). E. E. N.

HENNA. See Camphire.

HENOCH. See Hanoch.

HEPHER, hî'fer (חֵפֶר, ḥēpher): I. 1. The ancestral head of a Manassite clan of Gilead, the Hepherites (Nu 26 32, 27 1; Jos 17 2 f.). 2. One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 36). II. 1. A district of Judah in the neighborhood of Socoh, i.e., in S. Judah (I K 4 10). It is this district, probably, that is called in I Ch 4 6 a 'son' of Ashhur. 2. A Canaanite city (Jos 12 17). Site unknown, perhaps identical with the preceding. E. E. N.

HEPHZI-BAH, hef'zi-bā (חֶפְצִי־בָה, ḥephtsī-bāh), 'my delight is in her': 1. The wife of Hezekiah and mother of Manasseh (II K 21 1). 2. An ideal name for the New Jerusalem of prophecy (Is 62 4). E. E. N.

HERALD: Found only once in the Bible (Dn 3 4). The Aramaic original, kārōz, was probably derived from the Gr. κήρυξ (from κηρύσσειν, 'to proclaim'), 'crier' or 'proclaimer' (N T "preacher"). E. E. N.

HERB: This word renders several Heb. and Gr. terms. (1) The most common is 'ēsebh, which includes both grains and grasses (e.g., Gn 1 11; Ps 106 20), and is often rendered "grass." (2) deshe', the 'fresh,' 'young grass' (II K 19 26, etc.). (3) yārāq, 'green plants,' including vegetables (Dt 11 10; I K 21 2; Pr 15 17). (4) 'ōr, 'ōrāh, apparently, the 'bright,' 'shining grass,' though used in a broader sense (II K 4 39; Is 18 4, 26 19). (5) In Job 8 12 ḥātsīr evidently refers to tall grass. (6) The two N T terms, βοράνη (only Heb 6 7) and λάχανον, are both of general significance, the former indicating a plant fit for food, the latter a cultivated (vs. a wild) plant. E. E. N.

HERD. See NOMADIC AND PASTORAL LIFE.

HERES, hî'rîz (חֶרֶס, ḥereṣ), 'sun': 1. Mt. Heres (Jg 1 35), a locality in the territory of Dan, probably the same as Ir Shemesh (q.v.), or Beth Shemesh (q.v.); cf. Jos 19 41; I K 4 9; II Ch 28 18 (so Moore, on Judges in Int. Crit. Com.). Map II, D 1. 2. The Ascent of Heres (Jg 8 13, "when the sun was up" AV) was a pass near Succoth, E. of the Jordan, but its exact location is unknown. See also CITY OF DESTRUCTION and TIMNATH-SERAH. E. E. N.

HERESH, hî'resh (חֶרֶשׁ, ḥeresh): A Levite (I Ch 9 15). E. E. N.

HERESY, 'division,' 'sect': The Gr. αἵρεσις is applied to parties or types of religious thought in N T times. Both the Sadducees and the Pharisees were called 'heresies' (EV "sect," Ac 5 17, 15 5, 26 5). The term was early used in designating the Christians ("the sect [Gr. 'heresy'] of the Nazarenes," EVV "sect," Ac 24 5, 14, 28 22). In this sense it is the approximate equivalent of the modern 'denomination.' It is used, however, in the Epistles also of pernicious (but not necessarily doctrinal) divisions or strifes (I Co 11 19; Gal 5 20; cf. Tit 3 10; II P 2 1). The conception of heresy as a departure from a doctrinal standard of orthodoxy is not found in the Bible. A. C. Z.

HERETH, hî'reth (חֶרֶת, ḥereth, Hareth AV): A forest in Judah which was one of the hiding-places of David (I S 22 5). Hareth, Map II, E 2, indicates a village, not a forest. E. E. N.

HERITAGE. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 8.

HERMAS, hẹr'mas (Ἑρμᾶς): One of the persons saluted in Ro 16 14. From the last clause of the verse, "the brethren that are with them," we infer that his house was used as a meeting-place for the Christians (cf. Ro 16 4, 15). By Origen (Com. ad Rom., in loc.) H. is identified with the author of "The Shepherd," but inasmuch as this is a work of the 2d cent., and since Ro ch. 16 was apparently contained in very early MSS. of the Ep. to the Romans, the identification is hardly possible. J. M. T.

HERMES, hẹr'mîz (Ἑρμῆς): A person saluted by Paul in Ro 16 14. Confusion between this name and that of Hermas, mentioned in the same verse, led to interchange of the names in some MSS. (D^{e} E L with some forms of the Syriac). J. M. T.

HERMOGENES, hẹr-mọj'ẹ-nîz (Ἑρμογένης, Ἑρμογ., W H.): A person mentioned in II Ti 1 15, where he is said by Paul to have been among those ("all") in Asia who "turned away from me." The special mention of H. and Phygelus would seem to indicate that they were leaders in the movement. Later apocryphal stories concerning H. are found in the Acts of Paul and Thecla, 1 and 4, 11–14. J. M. T.

HERMON, hẹr'mọn (חֶרְמוֹן, ḥermōn), 'sacred [mountain]': The large mountain that forms the S. portion of the Antilebanon range. As its name indicates, it was probably from ancient times viewed as a sacred locality and, in fact, numerous shrines existed on its slopes, and one even on its summit. In Dt 3 9 we learn that the Phœnicians called H. Sirion (cf. also Ps 29 6), while the Amorites called it Senir, which, however, designated probably some adjacent part of the same range (cf. also I Ch 5 23; Song 4 8; Ezk 27 5). This same name (as Sanīru) is given to the mountain in the Assyr. inscriptions, and (as Sanīr) to the portion of the range N. of Damascus by the Arabs. A fourth name, Sion, is found in Dt 4 18. H. is a lofty mountain (9,166 ft. high), whose summit, consisting of three peaks ("the Hermons," Ps 42 6, Hermonites AV), is rarely free from snow. The cool heights of H. condense the moisture of the atmosphere so rapidly that mists frequently obstruct the view from its summit, and at night the dew is so heavy as to be almost equal to rain (cf. Ps 42 6, 7, 133 3). The upper part of the mountain is bare, but the slopes are well covered with vegetation. In ancient times it furnished cypress, or fir, for the boat-builders of Phœnicia (Ezk 27 5). It was the haunt of wild beasts (Song 4 8), and to-day is the only haunt of the Syrian bear. At present it is the home of the Druses, who have extensive orchards and vineyards on its N. and W slopes. Its modern name, Jebel esh-Sheikh, 'mount of the chief,' is due to the fact that the founder of the sect made his headquarters here (10th cent. A.D.). E. E. N.

Herod (Ἡρώδης) is the name of the founder of an Idumæan family which furnished a number of kings and other rulers for Palestine and the adjacent countries during the latter half of the century before Christ and throughout the first century of the Christian era. The father of Herod was Antipater, a man of remarkable ability, whose father was governor of Idumæa under Alexander Jannæus and Queen Alexandra. The origin of the family is not known. Possibly it came from Ascalon. Antipater had probably succeeded his father when the civil war broke out between Hyrcanus II and his brother Aristobulus (69 B.C.), and the opportunity was given for him to employ his abilities as the former's champion and master.

I. Herod I [The Great] (37–4 B.C.), the son of Antipater, was early given office by his father, who had been made procurator of Judæa by Cæsar, Hyrcanus II, the high priest and ethnarch, being little more than a puppet in the hands of the energetic Idumæan. The first office which Herod held was that of governor of Galilee. He was then a young man of about twenty-five, energetic and athletic. Immediately he set about the eradication of the robber bands that infested his district, and soon was able to execute the robber chief Hezekiah and several of his followers. For this he was summoned to Jerusalem by the Sanhedrin, tried and condemned, but with the connivance of Hyrcanus II he escaped by night.

2. Herod the Great as Governor of Galilee.

During the disorders following the assassination of Cæsar, Herod and Antipater were loyal to Cassius, and assisted him in raising money from the towns of Palestine. In 42 B.C. Antipater was assassinated by one Malchus, who in turn was killed by assassins sent by Herod. After the death of Brutus and Cassius at Philippi, Herod and his brother Phasael were accused by the Jewish aristocracy at least twice before Antony; but in each case Antony showed favor to the brothers and finally appointed them tetrarchs. In 40 B.C. Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus II, attempted to recover the throne by using the Parthians as allies. He succeeded in getting hold of Phasael, who committed suicide in prison, but Herod I escaped to the fortress of Massada, whence he was forced to flee with his entire family to Petra. Being refused refuge there, he went to Alexandria and thence to Rome, via Rhodes.

Herod's purpose in going to Rome seems to have been to obtain the kingship for Aristobulus, the grandson of Hyrcanus II, whose sister Mariamne he was to marry. But on his arrival at Rome, Antony and Octavius appointed him king rather than Aristobulus, and within a few days after his arrival at the capital he returned to Palestine to get possession of his kingdom (39 B.C.). For the next two years he was engaged in fighting the forces of Antigonus, whom he finally defeated, and in 37 B.C. gained possession of Jerusalem. Antigonus was beheaded by Antony at the request of Herod.

3. As King of Judæa.

As king, Herod confronted serious difficulties. The Jews objected to him because of his birth and reputation. The Hasmonean family regarded him as a usurper, notwithstanding the fact that he had married Mariamne. The Pharisees were shocked at his Hellenistic sympathies, as well as at his severe methods of government. On the other hand, the Romans held him responsible for the order of his kingdom, and the protection of the eastern frontier of the Republic. Herod met these various difficulties with characteristic energy and even cruelty, and generally with cold sagacity. Although he taxed the people severely, in times of famine he remitted their dues, and even sold his plate to get means to buy them food. While he never became actually friendly with the Pharisees, they profited by his hostility to the party of the Hasmoneans, which led at the beginning of his reign to the execution of a number of Sadducees who were members of the Sanhedrin.

3a. Problems of His Reign.

The fact that Herod's kingdom included many Greeks as well as Jews led him to adopt a self-contradictory policy. He favored both parties of his subjects. For the Greeks he built temples in the cities where they lived, as well as in towns outside of his own kingdom. It was this general policy, as well as the example of Augustus, that led Herod to rebuild a number of cities. The most important work of this sort was the refounding of the city of Strato's Tower, which he named Cæsarea (q.v.), and beautified with a temple to Augustus, colonnades, a mole, and many public buildings, making it the chief city of his kingdom. Throughout the Roman period it remained the seat of the Roman governor of Judæa. He also rebuilt the city of Samaria (q.v.), renaming it Sebaste in honor of the wife of Augustus. Here also he erected a great pagan temple and other public buildings, the ruins of some of which remain to-day. He built many amphitheaters and theaters at Jerusalem and in other cities, and established games at Cæsarea and at Jerusalem. He surrounded himself with Greek scholars, the most prominent among whom was Nicolas of Damascus. For the Jews he rebuilt the Temple at Jerusalem in great magnificence, making it, with its courts and colonnades, one of the noblest buildings of antiquity. This rebuilding apparently began about 20 B.C., and was not finally completed until in the time of the procurator Albinus, 62–64 A.D. (cf. Jn 2 20, and see TEMPLE). Although he removed the high priests at will, Herod was careful to respect the prejudices of the Jews, and did not attempt to introduce statues into the public buildings of Jerusalem, and even omitted images on his coins.

3b. Building Activity.

By way of maintaining order, he established citadels throughout the territory, and maintained a strong band of mercenaries. In addition, he established strict police regulations, and maintained a system of spies. Notwithstanding the fact that there were popular disturbances—doubtless to some extent associated with the Messianic movement—Judæa was at peace throughout his reign. During his last years, it is true, the people became increasingly uneasy, and there was a threatened revolt under Pharisaic leadership; but the old king crushed this with characteristic severity.

3c. Maintenance of Order.

As an allied king with Rome, Herod was expected to maintain order on the frontier (see above, 3a). In pursuit of this policy he fought, and was given suzerainty over, the Arabians. He annexed and colonized Trachonitis, which had been held by a body of robbers; and he seems to have been able to keep back the wandering tribes of the desert. In fact, it was because of this energetic policing of the frontier, as well as maintenance of peace within his own dominion, that he kept the friendship of Augustus. At least twice during his reign this friendship was threatened, but he was able to adjust matters. The conjecture (Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? [1898]) that during the latter half of his reign Judæa was more completely under the control of the empire, even to the point of being subject to the census, can hardly be said to be as yet thoroughly established. Throughout his reign, however, he was never given complete independence, but was subject to the general limitations set allied kings, among them being the restriction of the coinage to copper coins, liability to a certain degree of control from the nearest propretor—in Herod's case that of Syria—inability to carry on war, except with the consent of the emperor; or to appoint his own successor, except with the imperial approval.

3e. Intrigues of His Reign.

It is probably because of the animus of Josephus, as well as the perspective of his account of Herod, that his success as an administrator has been considerably obscured by the tragedies within his own family circle. In estimating the prejudice which led to the successive execution of the surviving members of the Hasmonean house, including his wife Mariamne and their two sons Alexander and Aristobulus, it is to be borne in mind that, like all Oriental kings, Herod was subject to constant plots on the part of his family, and the sympathizers of the Hasmonean house. A study of his reign will show that his executions were the outcome of the efforts of his rivals to displace him. The only exception to this was his execution of his wife Mariamne, because of jealousy born of intrigues, instigated to a large extent by his sister, who was jealous of the influence of Mariamne and her mother. The execution of his two sons (by Mariamne) was due to a series of plots on their part, and an antiplot on the part of his eldest son, Antipater, to secure the succession. It can hardly be doubted, further, that during the later years of the old king's life he was suffering from a disease which made him easily susceptible to suspicion (cf. Mt 2 3-12, 16-19).

3f. Disposition of His Kingdom.

At his death (4 B.C.) Herod left a will, according to which his kingdom was to be divided among his three sons. Archelaus was to have Judæa, Idumæa, and Samaria, with the title of king (Mt 2 22); Herod Antipas was to receive Galilee and Peræa, with the title of tetrarch; Philip was to come into possession of the trans-Jordan territory, with the title of tetrarch (Lk 3 1). This will was ratified by Augustus, with the exception of the title given Archelaus.

4. Archelaus.

II. Archelaus (4 B.C.–6 A.D.), after the ratification of Herod's will by Augustus, succeeded to the rule of Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa, having the title of ethnarch, with the understanding that, if he ruled well, he was to become king. He was, however, highly unpopular with his people, and his reign was marked by disturbances and acts of oppression. The situation finally became so intolerable that the Jews appealed to Augustus, and Archelaus was removed and sent into exile. This accounts for the statement in Mt 2 22, and possibly also suggested the point of the parable (Lk 19 12 ff.). His territory became a procuratorial province subject to the census. Archelaus, like all his family, was a builder, among his public works being the establishment of the city Archelais.

5. Herod Antipas.

III. Herod Antipas (4 B.C.–37 A.D.) was the son of Herod I and Malthace, and was a full brother of Archelaus. By the will of his father he was appointed tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa in 4 B.C. His long reign was marked by no serious outbreak or disturbance, and Galilee seems to have become exceedingly prosperous. Peræa also enjoyed prosperity, although this must have been due in considerable measure to the development of the Greek cities within Peræan territory belonging to the Decapolis. Herod Antipas was a builder of cities, his most important undertaking being the erection of Tiberias, on the Sea of Galilee (q.v.). The city was built and organized in the Greek style, and was controlled by a castle built above it. It was built in part over a graveyard, and for some time was regarded as unclean by the Jews. Antipas also rebuilt Sepphoris, and walled the city of Betharampha, naming it Livias (or Julias). He also helped the Greek islands, as tablets found in Cos and Delos indicate. His general policy was that of friendship with the Romans, but he was also careful to attend feasts at Jerusalem, and to stamp no image on his coins. He joined in a protest against Pilate for having set up a votive shield in the Temple. He married his niece Herodias (Mk 6 17; Mt 14 3), the wife of his half-brother Herod Philip (not the tetrarch Philip), of Rome. This necessitated the divorcing of his wife, who was the daughter of Aretas, King of Arabia, and involved him in war with that monarch, in which he was defeated. At the time of the Gospel history, however, Galilee was at peace.

In 37 A.D. Agrippa, the brother of Herodias, was made king of the former tetrarchy of Philip, and Herod was induced by his wife to seek royal honors for himself. Agrippa, however, who had quarreled with his brother-in-law while superintendent of the markets in Tiberias, poisoned the mind of Caligula by charging that Antipas was gathering an army preparatory to revolt. Antipas was in consequence banished (39 A.D.) to Lyons, whither Herodias accompanied him, and where probably he died. This is the 'Herod' most frequently mentioned in the N T (Mt 6 17 ff., 8 15; Lk 3 1, 9 7, 13 31 f.; Ac 4 27, 13 1, etc.). He was the one who imprisoned the Baptist (Mk 6 14-29, and ||s) and the one to whom Pilate sent Jesus (Lk 23 7-15).

6. Herod Philip.

IV. Herod Philip, son of Herod I and Cleopatra of Jerusalem (4 B.C.–34 A.D.). By the will of his father he was made tetrarch of that section of the Herodian kingdom lying E. and N. of the Sea of Galilee. The region was not strictly Jewish, and was composed of a number of small districts which had been conquered by, or given to, Herod I—Batanæa, Trachonitis, Gaulanitis, Ituræa, and Auranitis. He was, on the whole, the most respectable of Herod's sons. He was fond of building. Banias he rebuilt as a Greek city, with the right of asylum, and named it Cæsarea. In order to distinguish it from various other towns of the same name, it was known as Cæsarea Philippi (q.v.). He also rebuilt Bethsaida (q.v.), a town a few miles from the entrance of the Jordan into the Sea of Galilee, and named it Julias, in honor of the daughter of Augustus. Furthermore, he built various temples to the heathen gods. He stamped an image on his coins. In general, he seems to have been a good ruler, traveling over his territories, rendering justice to his subjects. He was married to Salome, the daughter of Herodias, and died in 34 A.D. without issue.

7. Herod Agrippa I.

V. Herod Agrippa I, son of Aristobulus, the son of Herod I and Mariamne (37–44 A.D.). He was one of the most interesting characters of the period. After the execution of his father he seems to have gone to Rome and to have acquired the habits of the wealthy young men of the early empire. At forty he found himself bankrupt, in disfavor with Tiberius, and compelled to leave Rome to escape his creditors. He went to Palestine, and was about to commit suicide when his wife Cypros induced his sister Herodias, at that time the wife of Herod Antipas, to obtain for him the position of superintendent of markets in Tiberias. In a short time he quarreled with Herod Antipas, and became a friend of Flaccus, proconsul of Syria. He lost favor with that official by taking bribes from the citizens of Damascus. Reduced to extremities, he went to Italy, where he was imprisoned by Tiberius, because he had been overheard to tell Caius that he desired the death of the emperor. Upon the death of Tiberius he was released from prison by his friend Caius, and made king over the territory which had belonged to his uncle Philip (37 A.D.). He does not seem to have lived much in his kingdom until after the deposition of Herod Antipas. In 39 A.D. he was given the latter's tetrarchy. During the antisemitic outbreak under Caius (Caligula) he was able to obtain some favors from the emperor, and so won popularity with the Jews. He seems to have had some share in the elevation of Claudius to the empire after the assassination of Caius, and, in consequence, was given the province of Judæa (41 A.D.). His kingdom thus became practically coextensive with that of Herod I. Herod Agrippa was popular with the Jews, because he was careful to regard Pharisaic observances. He had power to appoint the high priest, but he was careful in no way to outrage the feelings of the Jews, and further added to his popularity by using his influence with Claudius for the good of the Jews throughout the empire. According to Ac 12 1 ff. he persecuted Christians to increase his popularity. He strengthened the fortifications of Jerusalem and apparently began the formation of a confederacy of neighboring kings. This project, however, was nipped in the bud by the legate of Syria. Notwithstanding his regard for Jewish customs, outside of Palestine he was a thoroughgoing Hellenist. In Beirût he built baths and a sumptuous theater. He also erected an amphitheater for gladiatorial games. He was in the midst of games in Cæsarea when he was seized with a fatal disease after being saluted by the people as a god (44 A.D.; cf. Ac 12 20-23).

8. Herod Agrippa II.

VI. Herod Agrippa II (49–c. 100 A.D.), son of the preceding, was a boy at the death of his father and was not allowed to succeed him. He was, if possible, more friendly to the Jews than his father had been, and maintained also friendship with Claudius. In 49 A.D. he was appointed the successor of his uncle Herod, as king of the little kingdom of Chalcis, with which position went also the right to appoint the high priest. In 53 A.D. he exchanged Chalcis for territory that had been a part of the tetrarchy of Philip, to which Nero added portions of Peræa and Galilee, including the city of Tiberias. At the outbreak of the revolt of 66 A.D. he did all that he could to restore peace, and to persuade the Jews to give up their mad undertaking. In this, however, he was unsuccessful, and took the side of the Romans against the Jews. He seems to have reigned until his death, which was probably about 100 A.D. It was before this Agrippa and his sister Bernice that Paul was brought by Festus (Ac 25 13–26 32).

9. The Herodian Women Mentioned in the N T.

Herod Agrippa I had three daughters. The eldest, Bernice, married her uncle Herod of Chalcis, and subsequently Polemon II, King of Cilicia, and lived as wife on the Palatine with Titus. She is mentioned in the N T as being present at the trial of Paul (Ac 25 13, 23, 26 30). The youngest of the three was Drusilla. After various adventures she became the wife of Philip, procurator of Judæa. She was present at the trial of Paul (Ac 24 24). Like her sister Bernice, her reputation was not above reproach. Herodias was the daughter of Aristobulus, son of Herod the Great. It was her unholy relationship with Herod Antipas (see § 5, above) that brought her and Antipas under the denunciation of the Baptist, and it was her resentment that led finally to John's death (Mk 6 17-28).

HERODIANS, hę-rō′di-ąnz: The adherents, or partizans, of the Herod dynasty and, as such, well content with Roman overlordship, but desirous of seeing one of this family over Judæa in the place of the Roman procurator (Mk 3 6, 12 13 and ‖s). The principles of Jesus' teaching were no more favorable to the Herodian policy and ideals than they were to Pharisaism; consequently, the otherwise strange union of Herodian and Pharisee against Him. HESHBON, hesh′bon (חֶשְׁבּוֹן, ḥeshbōn): A city of Moab, advantageously situated on two hills commanding an extensive view of the lower Jordan Valley. Map II, J 1. Sihon made H. the capital of his Amorite kingdom (Nu 21 25-34; Dt 1 4; etc.). Taken from Sihon by Israel, it was occupied by the Reubenites and Gadites (Nu 32 3, 37; Jos 13 26 f.; I Ch 6 81; and cf. MESHA, Moabite Stone, line 10). Later, we find it again in possession of Moab and its overthrow predicted by Isaiah and Jeremiah (Is 15 4, 16 8 f.; Jer 48 2 ff., 49 3). The site is one of great fertility, well supplied with water (cf. Song 7 4). The extensive ruins show that it was a flourishing city in Roman times. E. E. N.

HETH, heth (חֵת, ḥēth): The people of Hebron, in Gn ch. 23, are called "children of Heth," also in ver. 10 Hittites (חִתִּי, ḥittī). The same usage meets us in Gn 27 46 and 26 34 regarding Esau's wives (cf. also 49 29 ff.). These "Hittites," as an element of the pre-Israelitic population of S. Palestine, are referred to a number of times (Gn 15 20; Ex 3 8, 17, 13 5, 23 23, 28; Jos 12 8, etc.). All such terms as Canaanite, Amorite, Hittite are used quite loosely in the O T and in different senses by different writers. The question here is: were the Hebron "Hittites" simply Canaanites who were considered as being connected genealogically with a certain Heth, or were they an offshoot of the great Hittite people who had separated themselves from the main body and settled in S. Palestine near Hebron? This does not seem likely, and the first view is more probable. Ahimelech (I S 26 6) and Uriah (II S 11 3 ff.) probably belonged to these S. Palestine Hittites, and Ezk 16 3, 45 is to be explained in the same way. On Gn 10 15 and other references, see HITTITES. (Cf. also Driver, Com. on Genesis, 1904.) E. E. N.

HETHLON, heth'lon (חֶתְלֹן, ḥethlōn): A place on the ideal N. boundary of Israel (Ezk 47 15, 48 1), not mentioned elsewhere. Perhaps the modern Heitela (Furrer, ZDPV, VIII, 27), N. of Tripoli. Others make the ideal N. boundary S. of the foot of Hermon, and identify H. with 'Adlūn, N. of the mouth of the Ḳasimiyeh (Litany) river. C. S. T.

The term 'Hexateuch' (ἕξ and τεῦχος, 'the six-book treatise') is used to designate the first six books of the O T. This term is preferable to the older, Pentateuch, i.e., the first five books, or the Law, since modern study has shown that Joshua is a part of the same literary production and must be included in any comprehensive study of the Pentateuch.

1. The Term.

The H. presents a general historical account extending from the Creation to Israel's occupation of Canaan, disposed as follows: (1) The Ancient World, the starting-point of all history (Gn chs. 1–11). (2) The origin of the Covenant-People Israel and its history during the patriarchal age (Gn chs. 12–50). (3) The organization of Israel and the origin of its laws and institutions (Ex 1 1–Nu 10 10). (4) The discipline in the desert, ending in the conquest of the East-Jordan region (Nu 10 11–Dt 34 12). (5) Israel's conquest and occupation of Canaan (Jos).

2. General Outline.

Not until the Persian period did the Jews think of Moses as the author of the entire Pentateuch. The references in Kings, Joshua, and the Pentateuch itself to a "book," or books, by Moses can not be shown to refer to the Pentateuch in its present form. But from the Greek period it was the general opinion that Moses wrote the Law (i.e., the Pentateuch). Christianity took over this opinion from Judaism, and, until critical methods of study showed it to be untenable, it was the prevalent opinion.

3. Mosaic Authorship a Late Idea.

I. THE STRUCTURE OF THE HEXATEUCH IS COMPOSITE—PROOF.

That the H. is of composite structure is the conclusion to which many facts in the work itself inevitably lead.

(1) A comparison of Gn 1 1–2 4a with 2 4b–3 24 discloses two distinct narratives. In 1 1–2 4a the word for the deity is God (Heb. 'ĕlōhīm), and a cosmic process is described, the order being: the universe, earth, plant and animal life, man. The conceptions are somewhat abstract, and the idea of God is monotheistic and free from anthropomorphism. This section has also a noticeable literary style. In 2 4b–3 24 the word for deity is Jehovah (LORD AV) God. Interest is centered, not on the cosmos, but on the earth, especially as the abode of man. The animals are made after man, and for his sake. The conception of God is more anthropomorphic, while the literary style is altogether unlike that of 1 1–2 4a. (2) The Flood narrative, 6 5–9 17, presents the same features. Sections using God alternate with others using Jehovah. The passages 6 5-8, 7 1-5, 8 20-22 are clearly "Jehovah" paragraphs, and on the basis of similarity of style and conception 7 7-10 (in the main), 12, 16 (last clause), 17b, 22, 23, 8 2b, 6-12, 13b are to be classed with them. On the other hand, 6 13-22, 7 6, 11, 13-16a, 17a, 18-21, 24, 8 1-2a, 3-5, 13a, 14-19, 9 1-17 make up another narrative in which God is the name for deity. In this the conception of deity is quite abstract, the style is formal and statistical, and the catastrophe is cosmic rather than local. In these respects the narrative of the first group of passages contrasts remarkably. (3) There are two ancient genealogical tables, 4 1, 16-24 and 5 1-28. In the first, man's descent is traced through Cain to Lamech; in the second, through Seth to Lamech. Since the two tables are altogether or nearly identical in respect to a number of the names, they may represent but two versions of some very ancient list. In the first Jehovah is used, the style is easy and flowing, and many personal incidents are given. In the second God is used, and the style is very formal and repetitious. (4) The story of Abraham's experience in Egypt, 12 10-20, is strikingly parallel, in general outline, to 20 1-18. In the first Jehovah, in the latter God, is the name for deity. At this point a new phenomenon appears: The style of 20 1-18 is unlike that of the preceding sections which use the same name God. It is the easy, flowing narrative style of the Jehovah passages. The significance of this will be noted later. (5) In ch. 17 God gives Abraham the promise of seed, while in ch. 18 Jehovah makes a similar promise. The sequel of ch. 18 is found in 21 1 (Jehovah); that of ch. 17 in 21 2-6 (God). (6) Ch. 37 contains two stories of Joseph's transportation to Egypt. In one (vs. 28a, 36), Midianites take him out of the pit and carry him away. In the other (vs. 27, 28b) his brethren sell him to the Ishmaelites.

5. From Exodus.

(1) In 1 1–7 7 there is, on the whole, a triple narrative. (a) 1 1-5 [with 6 14-27], 7, 13-14, 2 23b-25, 6 1–7 7 form one complete account of the initial stages of the Exodus movement. Read consecutively they are found neither to presuppose nor require anything mentioned in the intervening sections. It is also evident that 6 2-3 and those passages in Genesis in which a knowledge of Jehovah in the patriarchal age is assumed (cf. Gn 4 26, 12 8, 13 18, 15 2, 7, 16 5, 22 14, 24 3, 7, 12, 27, 31, 35, 40, 42, 44, 48 and many others) could not have been written by the same hand. (b) Separating out from Ex 1 1–7 7 the passages noted under (a), there remains a series of paragraphs, some using God, others Jehovah, the rest being less distinctive. Naturally, after ch. 3, and to a greater degree after 6 2-3, the name J", having now been revealed to Moses, could be used freely by all the writers. But this only makes the alternation of Jehovah and God more significant, and such a passage as 3 2-7 clearly evidences itself as woven together from two separate threads of narrative. Using this hint we may tentatively assign 1 15-21, 3 1, 4b, 6, 9b-15, and 4 17, 20b to the document using God, and the remaining passages to the one using Jehovah. (2) The plague narrative, 7 8–12 36, is also seen to be composed of several strands. In some passages Moses and Aaron together deal with Pharaoh, Aaron as speaker and performer of the wonders (7 2, 10, 19-20, 8 5, 6, 16, 9 8), while in others Moses acts alone (7 14-15, 8 1, 20, 9 1, 13, 22, 10 21-29). In some the emphasis is laid on Aaron's rod (7 9, 19, 8 5, 16), in others on Moses' rod, or hand (9 22 f., 10 12 f., 21 f.; cf. also 14 15 f., 21). 11 1-3 breaks the connection between 10 28 f. and 11 4-8 by introducing a matter belonging to an entirely different situation, and apparently from another narrative. (3) In 18 13-17 assistant judges are appointed by Moses at Jethro's suggestion, but in Dt 1 9-18 the same transaction is placed after the giving of the Law, Jethro is not mentioned, and the selection is made by the people, not by Moses. (4) In 19 1–24 18 there are evidently three accounts. a. 19 1-2 and 24 15-18a form a complete though brief introduction to the great revelation concerning the Sanctuary and its services (Ex chs. 25–31, 35–40; Lv [all]; etc.). b. A closely interwoven double narrative in 19 3–24 14, 15b. Evidence for this is (a) the alternation of God and Jehovah, which is otherwise inexplicable (19 3, 17-20, 20 1); (b) in the Jehovah parts of ch. 19 the people keep away from the mount when Jehovah descends, but in 19 17, 19, 20 1, 18-21 Moses and the people are quite near where God is, and only at the people's request is the distance between them and God increased; (c) 24 1-2, 9-11 can be interpreted only as describing the ratification of a covenant, or a covenant-meal. But essentially the same significance must be given to 24 3-8; (d) the religious injunctions in 20 22-26, 22 29-30, and 23 10-33 are repeated partly in identical words in 34 10-27, a passage which also is loosely attached to its context.

6. From Leviticus.

Ex. chs. 25–31, 35–40, the entire Book of Leviticus, and Nu 1 1–10 28 are closely connected, marked by the same style, deal with the same subject, and are written from the same points of view. In these respects they are sharply distinguished from the narrative sections that precede and follow them. (See also LEVITICUS and NUMBERS.)

7. From Numbers.

(1) Examining the narrative in Nu from 10 29 on, we find there are two accounts of the expedition of the spies. (a) In 13 17b-20, 22-24, 26b-31, in which the region about Hebron is the limit reached. (b) In 13 1-17a, 21b, in which the whole land of Canaan is examined. It is noteworthy that Dt 1 19-25 agrees with (a) rather than with (b). (2) The account of the great rebellion of Dathan and others in ch. 16 shows itself to be composite. (a) On, son of Peleth, is mentioned at first as one of the leaders, but nothing more is said of him. (b) The motive of the rebels is twofold. That of Korah is jealousy of the religious prerogatives of either the whole tribe of Levi vs. the whole congregation, or of Moses and Aaron vs. the rest of the Levites (see NUMBERS, § 2). But Dathan and Abiram are jealous of Moses' authority and declare that he has not fulfilled his promises. (c) The paragraphs alternate, vs. 4-11 dealing with Korah, 12-14 with Dathan and Abiram, 15-19 with Korah, while 20-35 is a composite account of the punishment, which differs in each case. (3) In the Balak and Balaam story (ch. 22) there seem to be two narratives. (a) In ver. 7 the "elders of Midian" go for Balaam, but in ver. 8 it is the "princes of Moab." (b) In ver. 20 God directs Balaam to go, but in ver. 22 ff. He is angry with him for going. (c) In ver. 5a Balaam lives in Pethor by the Euphrates, in ver. 5b in "the land of the children of his people" (i.e., according to the probable reading, in the land of Ammon). (d) The form of the oracles in ch. 23 is very different from that in ch. 24.

8. From Deuteronomy.

Deuteronomy forms a separate book directly connected neither with Numbers nor with Joshua. Its style is distinct from that of the preceding books. Its introductory narrative traverses briefly the same ground as Exodus and Numbers, but its representation of the events is different (cf. Dt 1 9-18 with Ex 18 13-26; Dt 1 19-40 with Nu ch. 13; Dt 2 1-8 with Nu 20 14-21). Its code (chs. 12–26, 28) is an amplification of the brief code in Ex chs. 20–23, the additional matter being suitable to a time much later than the Mosaic age. The religious polemic in Dt chs. 4–11 fits the situation in Judah in the 7th cent. as it does no other, while the literary affinities between Dt and other portions of the O T appear only from the 7th cent. onward (e.g., Jeremiah has much in common with Dt, but Hosea, Amos, Micah, and Isaiah [I] practically nothing; see DEUTERONOMY).

9. From Joshua.

The Book of Joshua presents a complex, difficult to disentangle. At some points there are traces of double or threefold narratives, as in other parts of the Hex. (1) In 2 15 a suitable conclusion of the narrative between Rahab and the spies is reached and vs. 16-21 appear to be part of another account. (2) In 2 15 Rahab's house is represented as built into, or a part of, the city wall; but in 6 22, after the wall has fallen down flat (6 20), Joshua sends the spies into the city to find the house. Evidently there were originally two different traditions, either of the location of Rahab's house or of the way in which the city was taken. A careful study of ch. 6 does, in fact, reveal a twofold narrative of the capture of the city. (3) In 8 3 ff. Joshua sends 30,000 men to lie in hiding behind Ai, while he makes a feigned attack in front. But in 8 10 ff. the very same plan is described, only the ambushment consists of but 5,000 men. (4) In 10 36-43 Joshua, at the head of all Israel, attacks and utterly destroys, among other places, Hebron, Debir, and the whole southern country, from Kadesh-barnea to Gaza. But in 14 6-12 the same region is given to Caleb to be conquered by him, and the story of its conquest by Caleb follows in 15 13-19 (cf. Judges 1 9-21). Similarly in ch. 8 all Israel makes the attack on Bethel and Ai, while in Judges 1 22-26 Bethel is captured by the house of Joseph alone. (5) In 13 1 Joshua, at Gilgal, "old and well stricken in years," apparently after the main work of conquest is over, is commanded to divide the land (13 7). But 18 1 ff. breaks into this procedure with another account of an allotment to only seven tribes at Shiloh. In 23 1 Joshua, again "old and well stricken in years," gives his farewell charge to Israel (place not mentioned), but in ch. 24 we have another and different farewell at Shechem. Such features do not favor the theory of single authorship.

II. ANALYSIS INTO THE ORIGINAL DOCUMENTS

10. Not Many Fragments, but Several Main Documents.

It is, from what has been said, evident that Genesis, Exodus, Numbers, and Joshua are composite, based upon older and originally independent accounts. Their unity is only apparent, due to editorial adjustment, not to single authorship. These separate accounts are, however, not all independent. While almost any section of the Hex. can be shown to be composite, its component elements are related to those of other sections. In other words, the separate strands in any given section are but sections of long, comprehensive documents that underlie the whole Hex. The character of these documents must next be determined.

11. The 'Priestly' Document. P or PC.

As we have seen, Gn 1 1–2 4a has a distinct style, vocabulary, and theological point of view. Gn ch. 5 has the same style, vocabulary, and point of view, also 6 9-22, many verses of ch. 7 (especially in vs. 13-24), 8 13-19, 9 1-17, 28-29, 10 1-32, and 11 10-27. In all these the theological position is strictly monotheistic and somewhat transcendental, the Divine plan rather than human motives is emphasized, and long stretches of history are covered in a merely statistical way. The writer has an exact and comprehensive chronology. The plan of the history is genealogical—note the "generations" of (1) the heavens and the earth, 2 4a; (2) of Adam, 5 1; (3) of Noah, 6 9; (4) of the sons of Noah, 10 1; (5) of Shem, 11 10; (6) of Terah, 11 27 (cf. the continuation in 25 12, 19, 36 1, 37 1). In 1 29-30, 2 1-3, 9 3-4, 12 we detect an interest in ceremonial usage and symbolism. These facts all point to an originally complete narrative, in which the same style and point of view were consistently maintained. This narrative can be traced by these its characteristic marks through the rest of the Pentateuch and on into Joshua (see below, § 28). It is the narrative of the origin of Israel, as the theocracy, and of Israel's religious institutions. The goal of the national development was reached in the establishment of the Sanctuary, Priesthood, and religious services. It neglected, sometimes contradicted, popular tradition. According to it the patriarchs did not offer sacrifices (as they had no priests or legitimate sanctuaries), nor did they know, or use, the name Jehovah (Ex 6 2-3). Because of its character this document is known as the Priestly narrative (symbol, P), and the legislation in it as the Priest's Code (PC).

12. The J and E Histories.

On the same basis of stylistic and other affinities other passages show that they once belonged together. Gn 2 4b–4 26 finds its continuation in 5 29b, 6 1-8, 7 1-5, 7-9, 12, 16b, 17b, 22 f., 8 2b, 6-12, 13b, 20-21, 9 18-28, etc. In all these the name for deity is Jehovah, the style is that of the story, told vividly and realistically. The tone is deeply religious and a profound interest is felt in man as a moral-religious being who is working out his lot in struggle and sorrow. As an Israelite, the writer was interested in the origin of Israel. He set forth the diversified character of the ancient world by a genealogical table, fragments of which remain,

10 8-19, 24-29, and 11 28-30, and by the story of the confusion of tongues, 11 1-10. With Abraham, summoned by Jehovah to leave his native land, the real history of Israel begins. The writer loves to detail the personal experiences of his heroes. His style, marked neither by diffuseness nor brevity, is remarkably attractive. In Gn ch. 20 we meet a phenomenon that long proved inexplicable. Here the word God is used in a section of popular, story-telling character. Up to this point such sections use the name Jehovah. The solution is that there were originally two separate narratives of this character, one using the name Jehovah throughout, the other using God, until the scene recorded in Ex ch. 3, when the name Jehovah was revealed to Moses. In style and mode of thought these two popular narratives are quite similar. Unlike P, they are not statistical, and have no systematic chronology. It is often difficult, sometimes impossible, to determine to which one a specific word, sentence, or paragraph is to be assigned. Yet each has its distinctive terminology, more evident in Hebrew than in English, and the frequent occurrence of duplicate accounts is ample proof that two such narratives once existed and were quite similar in plan and content. Like P, both of these narratives can be traced from Genesis on into Joshua. On the basis of their use of the Divine names God (Heb. 'ĕlōhīm) and Jehovah, these documents are denoted by the letters E and J.

13. The Documents No Longer in Their Original Form.

The three histories J, E, and P, with the once separate work Deuteronomy (D), form the documentary basis of the Hex. They now survive only as combined into one large work, not in their original form. Omissions and other changes were necessary in order to weave them into one. The combination was made, however, in a conservative spirit. In most cases as much as possible of the original documents was preserved. Very different accounts of the same thing could, in some instances, be placed one after the other, as Gn 1 1–2 4a (P), and 2 4b-25 (J). Very similar ones could be interwoven, as the story of the Flood (J and P), or of the call of Moses in Ex ch. 3 (J and E). In some cases the compiler let differences or contradictions stand (e.g., Ex ch. 3 [JE] and Ex ch. 6 [P]) or changed the order (e.g., Ex 34 10-26 [J] = parts of Ex chs. 20–23 [E], but placed at a different time), or omitted parts of one narrative in favor of the representation in another (the account of the organization of the worship by Moses in J and E was mostly omitted in favor of P's account). This process of editing and combining was long and complex, not all done in one period, by the same persons or always under the same influences. This can be shown most satisfactorily by tracing the history of the Hex. from its beginning to its final form.

III. History of the Formation of the Hexateuch

1. The Two Most Ancient Histories J and E.

Of the four main documents from which the Hex. was compiled the oldest were J and E. Each was a complete narrative beginning very early, J at the Creation and E at least as far back as Abraham, giving the history of Israel's origins, and closing (apparently) with the conquest of Canaan by Jehovah's Chosen People. It is evident that their authors used such information as was at their disposal. They describe events that happened long before their day, and nowhere claim personal knowledge of the facts. Whence, then, did they draw their information? This legitimate question may be answered as follows: a. They had at hand a limited amount of fixed material, possessing historical significance, such as (a) laws already codified and assigned to the period of Moses; e.g., a Decalogue, a series of religious regulations (Ex 20 23-26, 22 29-30, 23 10-19; cf. 34 10-26), and a civil code (Ex 21 1–23 9). (b) Ancient poems or songs, believed to have originated on specific occasions; e.g., Lamech's (Gn 4 23-24), Noah's (Gn 9 25-27), Isaac's (Gn 27 27-29), Jacob's (Gn 49 2-27), the Song of Victory in Ex ch. 15, the curse on Amalek (Ex 17 16), the invocation concerning the Ark (Nu 10 35-36), the fragments in Nu 21 14 f., 17 f., 27-30, the Balaam Oracles (Nu chs. 23 and 24), the Blessing of Moses (Dt ch. 33), and the poetic fragment in Jos 10 12-13. (c) Institutions, as to the origin of which tradition was fixed, as the Passover (Ex 12 21-27), the Priesthood (Ex 23 25-27), and the Sanctuary (Ex 33 7-11). b. They also had access to tradition, which among people of simple culture always holds a most important place. This historical tradition was of two kinds: (a) A general national tradition, much the same everywhere in Israel, to the effect that their forefathers came originally from the East, once lived in Canaan, had been delivered by Moses from oppression in Egypt, and had conquered Canaan after receiving from Moses a national and religious organization. Any Israelite historian would have constructed his history on this general basis. (b) There were also many specific, particularly local, traditions varying greatly in quantity and character, according to locality, or according to the tribe in whose midst they were handed down. The tribe of Ephraim, e.g., was particularly interested in the traditions concerning Joshua the Ephraimite, Judah in those concerning Caleb. Each local sanctuary, as Beersheba, Hebron, Bethel, Gilgal, Shechem, was a center of tradition. Originally, these traditions were independent and of different values. Some may have been Israelite transformations of Canaanite originals. The process of amalgamating these various traditions and building up therefrom a connected story of the patriarchal age began long before the writing of J and E. The tendency to embellishment as the stories were repeated from generation to generation must have been strong, and it is no longer easy to get back to the original facts on which they were based. In many cases it is best to admit this frankly and not to insist upon the historical accuracy of details. c. Finally, there were current in Israel many general views regarding God, man, and the world which Israel shared with the general Semitic world of the day. The presence of these is very noticeable in the early narratives in J. While the historians of Israel used these conceptions freely, they also modified them in accordance with their own higher ideas of deity, duty, worship, etc.

14. The Sources of J and E.

Such was the general character of the material to which our two historians had access. They used it carefully and conscientiously. Actuated mainly by practical religious motives, they were not 'critical' in the modern sense. But they were not inclined to sacrifice truth in order to glorify the men of the past. Of Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Judah, Moses, Aaron, Miriam, and others, things are told which are not to their credit. A degree of objectivity was actually attained, rare indeed in the annals of the ancient world.

15. The Spirit in Which J and E Were Written.

The two histories followed much the same general outline, and frequently related the same events. Each has its own style and other peculiarities. J is the richer in the variety of his material, broader in view, more liberal in spirit, and of deeper insight into the motives that actuate human conduct. In E the conception of God is, perhaps, more abstract. In both, the mastery of a chaste narrative style marked by profound pathos and winsomeness is noteworthy.

16. Comparison of J with E.

The questions that center about the authorship of J and E can be answered only approximately. (a) Who the authors were is unknown, as is the case with most O T books. It may be more correct, especially in regard to J, to think of a 'school' rather than an individual author. These works are often termed 'prophetic' histories, because of their general harmony with the teaching of such prophets as Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah. All that can be said with certainty is that the writers were earnest, sincere Jehovah-worshipers, probably members either of the prophetic or priestly orders. (b) In regard to the place of composition, many points of difference between the two histories seem best explained by the theory that J was written in Judah, and E in the Northern Kingdom. And it may be noted that the general agreement of these narratives, written by different hands and in different parts of Israel, is incidental evidence of no small value for the antiquity and essential accuracy of the historical tradition contained in them.

17. The Authors: Their Date and Place.

The way in which J and E were preserved is a matter of no little importance. Careful study shows that they are not now complete and that both have suffered at the hands of copyists or editors. Since they had no strictly 'canonical' character at first, they were easily subject to changes of various kinds. They could be supplemented here and there by additions. A possible case of this is the Flood narrative in J, which does not seem to be anticipated in Gn ch. 4. The process of copying gave abundant opportunity for many minor changes. It is likely that E was brought into Judah, probably to Jerusalem, about the time of the fall of the Northern Kingdom (722 B.C.). There it was preserved and studied, and furnished, in addition to J, a valuable history of Israel's origins. Of far greater importance was the fusion of the two histories into one compilation, JE. When this took place, since the two narratives had been written from somewhat different points of view, and were not at all identical in other respects, considerable editorial adjustment was necessary. Such passages as appear to be the work of this editor, or redactor, are denoted in modern criticism by the symbol RJE. As the author of Deuteronomy appears to have had some of these RJE passages before him, it is probable that the combination took place before Dt was written, i.e., not later than c. 650 B.C. The separate existence of J and E did not cease at once when they were combined into JE, but it was only in this form that they attained to a permanent place in Israel's literature.

18. The Preservation of J and E.

2. Deuteronomy (D).

With the details of the origin of D we are not here concerned (see DEUTERONOMY). Assuming that it originated somewhere near 650 B.C. and was, in 621, made the basis of the covenant obligation of II K ch. 23, it is evident that the book must have become very soon widely known and influential. This is made certain by the fact that the O T literature dating from c. 600 and after is full of Deuteronomic phraseology and is written from a distinctly 'Deuteronomic' point of view. When Judah went into exile in 586, they carried Deuteronomy with them as their law-book and JE as the record of their early history.

19. The Influence of Deuteronomy.

During the Exile these writings were studied with great care and devotion, and at some time within this period they were combined with D into one work by a Deuteronomic editor. This was easily accomplished by wedging D into JE at the place where Moses' last days were recorded. The editor left the record of JE from the beginning to the Mosaic period practically intact. There are no signs of his work up to Ex ch. 13. From there on many sentences, or expressions, in Ex and Nu seem to be from him. Into D the editor inserted from JE Dt 25 5-7, 31 14-23 (in part), ch. 33, and 34 1-10 (in part). The narrative of the conquest of Canaan by JE was completely worked over under the influence of a radically different view from that of JE. According to JE, Israel, except the East-Jordan tribes, crossed the Jordan at one time and united in the attack on Jericho, but then divided and conquered the highland region slowly and with difficulty. Judah and Simeon worked their way southward, conquered Hebron, and thence gradually spread over the whole territory later known as Judah. The house of Joseph conquered the middle highlands under Joshua. The other tribes followed in the wake of the house of Joseph, and conquered each for itself the territory in and north of the Plain of Esdraelon. But the Deuteronomic school, forgetful of the slow and difficult process of the conquest, held that all Israel, including the East-Jordan tribes, marching together under Joshua, conquered the whole land in one or two great sweeping campaigns, in which the Canaanites were exterminated and their cities in many cases utterly destroyed. Compare, e.g., Jos 14 6 ff. and 15 14-19 (JE) with 10 28-43 (Deuteronomic), or Jos 17 11 f. (JE) with 20. Combination of JE with D.

12 21 (Deuteronomic). The Deuteronomic school held that, since in Dt Moses had commanded Israel to conquer and utterly destroy (7 2) the Canaanites, and stamp out their worship, and since Joshua had been divinely appointed to carry out this command, it certainly must have been accomplished in just such a way. The more ancient and accurate notices of JE, therefore, while preserved in part, were practically ignored, as not describing the conquest in its true character as God's signal and complete act of providence for His people (cf. Dt 9 1-5). The combination of JE with D may be exhibited thus:

Narrative Line	From the Creation to the last days of Moses.	Moses' last days.	Conquest.
	JE (slightly revised by Deuteronomic editor).	D and small selections from JE.	JE extensively revised.

The critical symbol of this combination is $\frac{JE+D}{Rd}$.

3. The 'Priestly' Material of the Hexateuch (P and PC).

When Israel settled in Canaan and the religion of Jehovah became established, its official custodians were the priests of the various sanctuaries. These made known the 'law,' or custom, regarding all matters of religious or moral character, and of right procedure in the courts of justice (such as they were). Within priestly circles there grew up gradually an extensive body of such teaching regulative of worship and conduct, supposed to be based on Moses' directions, especially as time passed and much of it became very ancient.

21. The Priests the Teachers of the Law.

Of the early history of this material we actually know very little. Codifications were made early, as is seen from the code in E (Ex chs. 21–23, in the main). At the more important sanctuaries this body of priestly 'law' was preserved with care, and also continuously expanded, with increasing emphasis on ritual, and in view of the constant need of new applications of principles already formulated. Such legal material as we find in the H., apart from what was recorded in E, probably represents mainly the work of the priests of the great Sanctuary at Jerusalem—the Temple—and their exilic and post-exilic successors. In Jerusalem, in pre-exilic times, a large body of such 'law' was probably in possession of the priests of the Temple, partly written, but much also unwritten, consisting either of oral tradition or of well-known ceremonial. On this the author of Dt must have drawn mainly in constructing his written code (Dt chs. 12–26, 28), which was adopted as the national constitution in 621 B.C. Another example of such codification is the code found embedded in Lv, mainly in chs. 17–26 (see Leviticus). This section, as a whole, presents such striking contrasts to the main portion of the P material in the Hex. that it probably represents the conditions of a time earlier than that to which the main body of P belongs. In its present form it has been extensively worked over and altered by later post-exilic hands. This code covers the following points (see Carpenter and Harford, Comp. of Hex., p. 428 ff.):

22. Codification of Priestly Law.

23. The Holiness Code (HC).

1. Fundamental distinctions:
   (1) Exclusive loyalty to Jehovah vs. all 'Canaanite' practises, 18 1-5.
   (2) Animals killed to be eaten are sacrifices —regulations as to these, 17 1-16, 19 26a, 20 25 f.
2. The family and sexual purity, 18 6-30, 19 20-21, 20 1-24.
3. Miscellaneous laws, mainly of a 'civil' character, chs. 19 and 24 15-22.
4. Priestly holiness, 21 1–22 16.
5. Offerings, 22 17-33.
6. The calendar and related matter, 19 23-25, 23 1, ch. 25.
7. Hortatory conclusion, ch. 26.

The moral tone of this code is high and its religious spirit earnest and pure. Its emphasis on form, while not excessive, shows the presence of a tendency to reduce religion to correct formal practise. Many of the laws of HC were already old when incorporated into the code, and thus afford little evidence for its date. The question as to its date is complicated by the similarities between it and Ezk. Its affinities with Dt and with Ezk point to a date either a little before or after the Exile. If Ezekiel used HC, it would then be pre-exilic. If HC was influenced by Ezk, its date would then be somewhere near 540 B.C.

24. Ezekiel and the Priestly Legislation.

The influence of Ezekiel on the priestly legislation must have been large. In the outline he laid down for the organization of the new community (chs. 40–48), when it should once more occupy the Holy Land, holiness to Jehovah was the governing principle, a holiness that was to find expression in every detail of formal worship and community life. In his delineation of the new Jerusalem he begins with the Sanctuary and its details (chs. 40–43), passes next to the worship (chs. 44–46), and then gives regulations for the holy territory, to be occupied exclusively by a holy people (chs. 47–48). In this sketch it is noteworthy how important a place is assigned to the priests.

25. Interest of the Exiles in the Law.

Under such influences many of the Exiles looked forward to the establishment in Palestine of a community life which should perfectly express exclusive devotion to Jehovah. In such circles, composed mainly of priests, the work of perfecting an ideal constitution for Israel was undertaken. In addition to the codes in JE, D, and HC, they were, doubtless, in possession of much traditional material. Probably little progress had been made at the time of the Return in 536. The colonists who rebuilt the Temple and restored the worship probably used mainly the codes of D and HC. But those who remained in the land of captivity had an idealistic love for Jerusalem with its Temple, and for the institutions of Israel, and for these they worked assiduously.

The result of such work we hear of first in the case of Ezra, who, c. 458, set out from Babylonia for Jerusalem with "the book of the law" in his hands, intending to make its contents known to the community there.

26. Ezra's Law-Book.

Just what the contents of this 'book' were is a question of great importance, but difficult to decide.

The correctness of the prevalent view that it was P can be estimated best after a general survey of the contents of this ancient document.

27. Contents of P.

The material in P comprises two main elements: (1) a historical narrative and (2) a large body of laws. The manner in which these two elements are related to each other is seen in the following summary:

After the example of J the writer began with the Creation. From a standpoint of lofty monotheism, in exact, statistical style he unfolded the Divine plan of which Israel, a holy nation, was to be the culmination. In ten sections, indicated by the word "generations," he sketched the Creation (Gn $1^{1-2^{4a}}$), the ten genealogical steps from Adam to Noah ($5^{1-28, 30-32}$), the great universal deluge (6^{9-22}, chs. 7 and 8 [passim], 9^{1-17}), the descendants of the sons of Noah ($10^{1-7, 20, 22-23, 30-32}$), the "generations" of Shem (11^{7-26}), of Terah (= Abraham) (11^{27}–25^{11} [passim]), of Ishmael (25^{12-18}), of Isaac (25^{19}–35^{29} [passim]), of Esau (ch. 36 [in part]), and of Jacob (chs. 37–50 [passim]). In the history of Abraham he gave exact statistics of A.'s age, tells of his separation from his family ($11^{27, 31\ f.}$, $12^{4b, 5}$), and from Lot ($13^{6, 12}$). After relating the birth of Ishmael ($16^{1a, 3}$) in A.'s eighty-seventh year, he recorded the appearance of God Almighty to A. in his ninety-ninth year, promising to make him a father of many nations, at the same time instituting the rite of circumcision, and definitely assuring him of the birth of Isaac (ch. 17), who, in due time, was born (21^{1-4}). After this Sarah died (ch. 23), and then Abraham (25^{7-11a}). After a formal notice of Ishmael (25^{12-18}), a brief account of Isaac follows (25^{19-20}). Only fragments of P's narrative of the boys Jacob and Esau remain (25^{26b}, 26^{34-35}, 28^{1-9}), also of Jacob's experience with Laban ($29^{24, 29}$). The covenant relation of Jacob is clearly indicated ($35^{9-12, 15}$). Jacob's sons and his return to Isaac are noted (35^{22b-29}). After a summary description of Esau's descendants ($36^{1-30, 40-43}$), the history of the line of Jacob is given, preserved only in fragments (37^{1-2}, 41^{46}, 46^{6-27}, $47^{6, 8-11, 28}$), closing with the notices of the adoption of Joseph's sons (48^{3-6}), of the last words of the patriarch ($49^{1a, 28b-33a}$), and of his burial (50^{12-14}).

The oppression in Egypt is briefly told (Ex $1^{1-5, 7, 13-14}$, 2^{23-25}). Then comes the great revelation of God as Jehovah (Ex 6^{2-5}), with the commission to Moses and Aaron (6^{6}–7^{13}). Four plagues — blood, frogs, lice, boils — follow (7^{19}–11^{10} [passim]), as demonstrations of Jehovah's supreme power. The Passover is then instituted to be observed on the 14th of the current month, henceforth to be the first month of the year, and its law is given at length ($12^{1-20, 24, 28, 40-51}$, 13^{1-2}). The itinerary is narrated briefly, special attention being given to the law concerning the manna (13^{20}, 14 [passim], $16^{1-3, 5-36}$, 17^{1a}, 19^{1-2a}).

At Sinai the theocracy was formally organized. Moses ascended the Mount (24^{15-18a}) and there received the Divine plans concerning the Sanctuary, called in P 'the dwelling' (generally rendered "Tabernacle"), and its officials and services (chs. 25–31). Coming down with radiant face (34^{29-35}) he at once undertook the construction of the Tabernacle and the organization of the worship (Ex chs. 35–40, and Lv [all; see § 23, above]). A census was then taken (Nu chs. 1–4), in which special care was given to the enumeration of the Levites. After several laws (chs. 5–6), the offerings of the 'princes' at the dedication of the altar are described (ch. 7); then come regulations on various topics, closing with details regarding the order of the camp (8–10^{28}).

Next comes the story of the spies ($13^{1-17a, 21a, 25-26a, 32}$, $14^{1a, 2, 5-7, 10, 26, 32, 39}$). Ch. 15 contains legal material and chs. 16–17 record the great rebellion of Korah, in which the divinely appointed prerogatives of the Aaronic priesthood are vindicated (see NUMBERS). Appropriately, ch. 18 contains legislation concerning priestly revenues, and ch. 19 deals with the purification of the ceremonially unclean. In ch. 20 the itinerary is resumed with the story of the rebellion at Kadesh ($20^{1a, 2, 3b, 4, 6-8a, 9-13}$). At Mt. Hor Aaron died, succeeded by Eleazar (20^{22-29}). Finally the steppes of Moab were reached ($21^{4a, 10-11a}$, 22^{1}), and the Promised Land was in sight. Here Israel fell into grievous sin, in connection with which the zeal of the priest Phineas, son of Eleazar, was conspicuous (25^{6-18}). A second census was taken, which is recorded with extensive genealogical details (ch. 26). At this place the law of inheritance for heiresses is given (27^{1-11}). Moses, warned that he is soon to die, was now directed to have Joshua consecrated by Eleazar as his successor (27^{12-23}). Very curiously, we have next a list of the offerings proper to the several calendar seasons (chs. 28–29), followed by a law regulating vows (ch. 30). In this strange place occurs the record of the holy war against Midian (properly belonging after ch. 25), ending with the law concerning division of spoil (ch. 31). Next comes the arrangements made with the East-Jordan tribes ($32^{1a, 2b, 4, 18, 19, 28-30}$). An old itinerary, somewhat out of place, follows (33^{1-49}). Then come directions concerning the allotment of the land ($33^{50-51, 54}$, 34) and the Levitical cities (ch. 35) and, once more, the law concerning heiresses (ch. 36). Moses then ascended the mountains of Abarim and died (Dt 32^{48-52}, $34^{5b, 7-9}$). Following this we have the story of the conquest of Canaan by Joshua (Jos $3^{4a, 8, 14b-16}$, $4^{7b, 8, 13, 15-17, 19}$, 5^{10-12}, $6^{19, 24b}$, 7^{1}, 9^{17-21}), and the final establishment of Israel in full possession of its religious institutions in the land (13^{15-33}, 14^{1-5}, $15^{1-13, 20-62}$, 17^{1-10}, $18^{1, 11-28}$, $19^{1-46, 48-51}$, 20^{1-9}, 21^{1-40}, 22^{9-34}).

In this extended history the relation between the narrative and much of the legal material is so close that they can not be separated.

28. The Construction of P.

The narrative, evidently, was written largely to furnish a setting for the legal matter. The circumcision law, for example, is given in connection with Abraham's history, the Passover law on the occasion of the departure from Egypt, etc. On the other hand, many laws seem to have been inserted irrespective of any connection with the narrative. Furthermore, the code is not entirely homogeneous and self-consistent. The same subject is frequently treated of in different places, not always harmoniously. Many sections seem to be supplementary additions registering the altered practise of later times (for details, see especially Carpenter and Harford, op. cit., pp. 429–506). The only possible explanation of such phenomena seems to be that after the main historical work had been completed, it was afterward and at many different times supplemented by additional material, some of it already well known and long in use, as, e.g., HC, which probably was not a part of the first draft of P, and other portions later in date and registering new developments of priestly teaching. In this way the old was preserved and the new was incorporated into the body of authoritative law. No serious attempt was made to reconcile differences. It was probably felt that later enactments simply superseded earlier ones.

Returning to the subject of Ezra's "book of the law" the question actually is, whether Ezra had in his hand only the original draft of P, without its later supplements, or a later edition, in the 'editing' of which he himself may well have been concerned. To the present writer it seems most probable that, while the original draft of P antedated Ezra, the edition Ezra succeeded in getting adopted as the constitution of the community in Palestine was not PC as we have it now, since there are a number of sections that appear to be later than the time of Ezra. Those, however, are not very numerous or important.

It remains, finally, to consider the combination of the four main elements of the Hex. into their present form. It was the fusion of $\frac{JE+D}{Rd}$ (see § 20) with P that produced the Hex. The editor who did this took for his basis P's well-concatenated chronological narrative. This was not a difficult matter, since P itself had followed the general outline of JE. To combine JE with P was therefore easy for an editor who was not anxious to smooth away or eliminate all conflicting or contradictory representations (see § 13). His method was simply to insert in P at the proper places the more discursive narratives of J and E. In most places where this was not possible, the representation in P was retained and that of JE omitted. The material of Dt was left practically intact. The whole process required naturally more or less editorial work. The date of this final combination is in dispute. At all events, it took place probably in Ezra's day, or not long after, since the sect of the Samaritans (q.v.), which originated not far from c. 400 B.C., possesses the same Pentateuch as the Jews; that is, they took over the Hex., and preserved the legal portion (to the death of Moses) practically intact. Of the 'Joshua' part they were less careful, and therefore the Samaritan Book of Joshua is not identical with that of the O T.

29. The Combination of P with JE+D.

The subsequent division into the Law (Gn–Dt) and Joshua, and the still later subdivision of the Law (Torah) into five parts, called by the Jewish scholars the 'five-fifths of the Torah,' were early, probably before 250 B.C., but the details are not known.

30. Later Subdivisions.

LITERATURE: The literature on the H. is enormous, and a complete bibliography is out of the question here. The English reader will find the most exhaustive and satisfactory treatment of the whole subject, with analytical tables, etc., in The Composition of the Hexateuch by Carpenter and Harford, London, 1902; see also Driver, LOT.

HEZEKI, hez'ę-kai. See HIZKI.

HEZEKIAH, hez"ę-kai'ā (חִזְקִיָּהוּ, ḥizqiyyāhū), 'J" strengthens': The son and successor of Ahaz as king of Judah c. 719–690 B.C. (II K 18 1–20 19; II Ch chs. 29–32). He came to the throne after a weak administration, and gave himself to strengthening and reforming the nation. He began with the purification and centralization of the national worship at Jerusalem. To this end he abolished some of the local sanctuaries (high places), and made impossible, at least for a time, the idolatrous practises associated with them. With these shrines he also demolished the brazen serpent, giving it the contemptuous name "nehushtan" ('a thing of brass'), because the people had fallen into the habit of burning incense to it.

1. The Reformer King.

H.'s ideal of his responsibilities as king included a regard for the intellectual culture of his people. According to one tradition, he gathered about him a company of learned men, and put them to work collecting literary productions. A section of the Book of Proverbs claims to have been copied by "the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah" (Pr 25 1). A late tradition attributes to him 'and his college' the writing of the Song of Solomon and Ecclesiastes. This, though not trustworthy as to content, gives evidence of an older belief in a considerable literary activity during his reign. The "writing" under his name (Is 38 10-20) need not be his own composition, but only given his name because it expressed his feeling. His deference to Isaiah as a prophet of J" leaves no room for doubt that he appreciated spiritual ideals.

2. Patron of Learning.

In civil affairs H. aimed to advance the prestige and glory of the Judæan kingdom in every direction. He undertook a campaign against the Philistines, and subjugated their territory as far as Gaza (II K 20 13). He further carried out an extensive scheme for the fortification of Jerusalem and a provision of ample water-supply against the time of siege—constructing a pool and conduit (II K 20 20). See JERUSALEM, § 34.

3. Political Rule.

It was during the reign of H. that Merodach-baladan of Babylon attempted to form a great coalition with the purpose of breaking up the Assyrian Empire. H. seized the opportunity and declared Judah independent by refusing to pay tribute to Assyria. At the same time he was attacked by an apparently fatal illness (carbuncle), but recovered in answer to prayer, Isaiah assuring him of this by a sign (Is ch. 38). Merodach-baladan, on learning of H.'s recovery, sent an embassy ostensibly to congratulate him, but in reality in order to draw him into the alliance against Assyria. H. received the envoys with extraordinary effusiveness, attempting to impress them with the largeness of his resources by showing them the accumulated treasures and military equipment of his realm. This course of conduct was severely rebuked by the prophet Isaiah, who also predicted the downfall of the dynasty and the loss of the riches H. had displayed to the Babylonians. Upon the accession of Sennacherib, H. was compelled to submit once more to Assyrian suzerainty, and paid a heavy tribute, to levy which it became necessary to empty the treasury and even strip the gold from the Temple (II K 18 15 f.). But the greed of the Assyrians was not so easily satisfied. In 701 Sennacherib undertook a great campaign against Palestine, and threatened to subject Jerusalem to the treatment received by Samaria at the hands of his father. But at a critical point, on account of some mysterious disaster to the Assyrian army, traced by the Biblical narrator to the Divine will, the campaign came to naught, and H. was left unmolested for the rest of his days (see also SENNACHERIB).

HEZION, hi'zi-ǫn (חֶזְיוֹן, ḥezyōn): The grandfather of Ben-hadad I, and therefore probably one of the first kings of Damascus (I K 15 18). Possibly identical with the Rezon of I K 11 23.

HEZIR, hî'zẹr (חֵזִיר, ḥăzīr): 1. The ancestral head of the seventeenth course of priests (I Ch 24 15). 2. The head of a family of post-exilic Jews (Neh 10 20). E. E. N.

HEZRO, hez'ro (חֶצְרוֹ, ḥetsrō), and HEZRAI, hez'ra-ai (חֶצְרַי, ḥetsray): One of David's heroes from Carmel in S. Judah (II S 23 35; I Ch 11 37). E. E. N.

HEZRON, hez'rọn (חֶצְרוֹן, חֶצרֹן, ḥetsrōn): I. 1. An eponymous ancestor of a Reubenite family (Gn 46 9; Ex 6 14; Nu 26 6; I Ch 5 3). 2. A son of Perez, an eponymous ancestor of a family of Judah, the Hezronites (Gn 46 12; Nu 26 21; Ru 4 18, 19; I Ch 2 5 ff.; cf. Mt 1 3; Lk 3 33, Esrom AV). II. 1. A place on the S. boundary of Judah, W. of Kadesh-barnea (Jos 15 3 = Hazar-addar, Nu 34 4). 2. A town in S. Judea (Jos 15 25 = Kerioth-hezron, called Hazor, perhaps connected with I, 2). Map II, E 3. C. S. T.

HIDDAI, hid'da-ai or hid'dê (הִדַּי, hidday): One of David's heroes, from near Mt. Gaash (II S 23 30), called Hurai in I Ch 11 32. E. E. N.

HIDDEKEL, hid'de-kẹl. See TIGRIS.

HIEL, hai'ẹl (חִיאֵל, ḥī'ēl), 'El lives': A Bethelite, who rebuilt Jericho in the reign of Ahab (I K 16 34), and brought upon himself the curse of Joshua (Jos 6 26). A building accident may have caused the death of his two sons, or they may have been sacrificed to insure the stability of the foundation and wall. Cf. Macalister, Bible Side Lights from the Mound of Gezer (1907), p. 165 f. C. S. T.

HIERAPOLIS, hai''ẹ-rap'o-lis (Ἱερὰ Πόλις): A city between the Mæander and Lycus rivers, on a lofty (1,250 ft.) terrace overlooking the plain. H. grew up around a shrine of Cybele, whose sacred nature was enhanced by two natural phenomena: hot mineral (medicinal) springs and the Plutonium. The water of the springs, charged with carbonate of lime, rapidly forms an incrustation on anything over which it flows (it has raised the ancient level 15–20 ft., and has partially covered many of the ancient buildings). It now falls from numerous pool-basins in cascades (white stalactites) over a precipice 100 ft. high. The site is visible from afar (called "Cotton Castle"). The Plutonium, or 'Entrance to Hades,' was a narrow hole in the ground which emitted fumes deadly to all breathing them (eunuch priests of Cybele alone were immune). The town, which arose about the shrine (ἱερόν) of Cybele, was here called Hierapolis ('sacred city'), because Greek influence predominated, but in the Sandukli valley, where native influence predominated, the town about a similar hot spring and shrine was called Hieropolis ('city of the hieron'). The mineral water was efficacious for rheumatism and well adapted to dyeing (woolen stuffs, rugs), hence gilds of dyers flourished here. Historically H. is quite insignificant. Christianity was introduced into H. in connection with Paul's mission work at Ephesus (Ac 19 10), through which Colosse, Laodicea, H., and other towns received the gospel. Paul refers to the interest taken by Epaphras in the Christians of H. (Col 4 12 f.). John (Andrew also) labored here. H. was the home of the early Christian writer Papias (70–130 A.D.). In 320 A.D. H. was wholly Christian, and the mouth of the Plutonium was closed. Cybele-worship and the woolen industries made H. wealthy, as is attested by its vast ruins, both pagan and Christian. J. R. S. S.

HIGGAION, hig-gê'yon: A word of debated meaning that occurs apparently as a rubric, or musical direction, in Ps 9 16 (with ṣelāh), but also in the text proper of Ps 19 14 ("meditation" RV), 92 3 ("solemn sound" RV), and La 3 62 ("imagination" RV, better 'murmuring' or 'muttering'). The versions of the LXX. render it in Ps 9 by various words, mostly meaning 'song' (ᾠδή, μέλος, φθογγή, etc.). Its derivation would favor some meaning like 'meditative murmur,' a low, unobtrusive sound, a talking to oneself. W. S. P.

HIGH, MOST. See GOD, § 1.

HIGH PLACE: This is the literal rendering of the Heb. bāmāh, which, while often meaning simply 'heights' or 'elevations of land' (cf. Dt 32 13; II S 1 19, 25; Am 4 13; Mic 1 3), is most frequently used of places of worship located on such heights (I S 9 12-25, etc.), and then of sanctuaries in general, irrespective of their location. The ancient Semites appear to have looked upon a hilltop as especially suitable for places of worship. When Israel entered Canaan the land was dotted with these 'high-place' sanctuaries. The Israelite conquerors took over many of these, and appropriated them to their own worship of J", although retaining many of the features common to the old Canaanite worship. Throughout the preprophetic literature there is nothing to indicate that this was considered contrary to Israel's religion. Such a passage as Ex 20 24, in fact, expressly sanctions such sanctuaries, since a place where J" recorded His name became a holy place and was likely to become a 'high place' (i.e., a local sanctuary). These local sanctuaries were numerous in ancient Israel. Mizpah in Gilead (Jg 11 11), Dan (Jg 18 29 ff.), Bethel (Gn 12 8, 28 20-22; Jg 20 26 f., 21 2; I S 10 3; Am 7 13), Mizpah in central Israel (Jg 20 1; I S 7 6), Gibeon (I K 3 4; note the apology in ver. 2, and the apologetic reason given in II Ch 1 3), Ramah (I S 7 17, 9 12 ff., used by Samuel), Gilgal (I S 10 8, 11 15; Am 4 4, 5 5), Nob (I S 21 2), Bethlehem (I S 20 6, 29), Hebron (II S 5 1 ff., 15 7), Beersheba (Gn 21 33; Am 5 5)—all these, and doubtless many others, were "high places" whose altars even Elijah held in highest honor (I K 19 10, 14). In the course of time the worship at these places became corrupt, largely through the revival of old Canaanite practises. In the 8th cent. Amos, and especially Hosea, severely condemned it. The Code of Dt placed all these sanctuaries under the ban by prescribing that only in one place (Jerusalem) should sacrifices be offered, while the hortatory sections of Dt severely condemn all Canaanite forms of worship. It was in consequence of the public adoption of Dt in the reform under Josiah (621 B.C.) that these ideas became authoritative. The Books of Kings, edited in the spirit of Dt, consequently viewed all high places as illegitimate and condemned the kings of Judah who (in all innocence) worshiped at their altars. See SANCTUARY. HILKIAH, hil-kai'ā (חִלְקִיָּהוּ, ḥilqiyyāhū), 'my portion is J"': 1. A son of Hosah, a Merarite Levite in the reign of David (I Ch 26 11). 2. The father of Eliakim, the steward of Hezekiah (II K 18 18 ff.). 3. A son of Shallum (I Ch 6 13), and high priest during the reign of Josiah. He discovered the Book of the Law, which furnished the king the documentary sanction needed for his reformation (II K 22 4 ff.). 4. A Merarite Levite (I Ch 6 45). 5. A priest residing at Anathoth, and father of Jeremiah the prophet (Jer 1 1). 6. A priest who assisted Ezra (Neh 8 4). 7. The father of Gemariah (Jer 29 3), probably the same as 3. A. HILL, HILL-COUNTRY: In both the AV and RV the Heb. gibh'āh is always translated by "hill," when it is not used as the name of a town situated on a hill (Jos 24 33; Jg 19 16; I S 11 4). In a few other passages it might be understood as a proper name (cf. Jos 5 3; Jg 7 1; II S 2 24). It is the Heb. term for isolated elevations which can not be classed as mountains. In poetical passages, however, it is used as parallel with "mountain" (Is 42 15, 55 12; cf. Gn 49 26; Dt 33 15). The idolatrous rites of the Canaanites, which were adopted in part by Israel, took place on the 'hills' (Is 65 7; Jer 13 27; cf. Dt 12 2; II K 17 10; Hos 4 13, etc.). In the AV (I S 9 11) ma'ăleh is translated "hill." RV has it correctly "ascent." In Is 5 1 qeren ('the horn,' or 'top') is translated "hill." The RV translates 'ōphel ('the height' in a fortified city, and especially the name of an elevation on the SE. portion of the Temple Hill, II Ch 27 3, 33 14; Neh 3 26 f.) by "hill" (II K 5 24; Is 32 14; Mic 4 8). In the N T "hill" is the translation of βουνός (Lk 3 5, 23 30) and ὄρος (Mt 5 14; Lk 4 29, 9 37 AV). In the AV we find "hill" as the translation of har, which is a much more general term than gibh'āh. In most instances the RV has more correctly used "mountain" (Ex 24 4; Nu 14 44; I K 11 7, etc.). The Heb. har means a 'mountain' or 'mountain range,' and also a 'mountainous region'; with this last meaning it is translated in the AV (Jos 13 6, 21 11; cf. Lk 1 39, 65) "hill-country," but elsewhere "mound" or "mountains." The RV uses "hill-country" more frequently and uniformly for the mountainous tracts of country on both sides of the Jordan (Dt 2 37, 3 12). From a distance they have the appearance of one mountain. It is used also of the whole mountain range of W. Palestine (Dt 1 7, 19, 20), which is divided into the "hill-country of Judah" (Jos 11 21, 20 7, etc.) and the "hill-country of Ephraim" (Jos 17 15, 18 12; Jg 2 9; I K 12 25, etc.). In Jos 20 7 the "hill-country of Naphtali" is mentioned. See PALESTINE, §§ 4 ff.

HIRAH, hai'rā (חִירָה, ḥīrāh): An Adullamite, a friend of Judah (Gn 38 1, 12; cf. Gn 38 20 f.).
C. S. T.

HIRAM, hai'ram (חִירָם, ḥīrām), probably from 'ăḥīrām, 'exalted brother'; an alternate form in Chronicles is Huram: 1. A king of Tyre whose reign overlapped the last portion of David's and the first of Solomon's (II S 5 11; I K 5 1). Josephus (Ant. VIII, 2 6-9, 5 3; cf. Cont. Ap. I, 17 f.) testifies that Hiram was the son of Abibaal and reigned thirty-four years, dying at the age of fifty-three. But II S represents him as offering aid to David toward the building of his palace immediately after the latter's settlement at Jerusalem, or in the eighth year of his reign, and I K alludes to him as still living in the twentieth year of Solomon, thus giving his reign not less than fifty-two years. The difficulty has been met by the supposition that the order of II S is not chronological, the help given to David having come at the end of that king's reign. Others assume a corruption of text in II S, or a corruption, or error, in Josephus' account. A better explanation is that the H. of II S is the Abibaal of Josephus. Of the two names, however, that used by Josephus is only an official title. H.'s reign constitutes the Golden Age of the history of Phœnicia. For his services in the building of the Temple, Solomon offered him twenty cities in Galilee, which he declined. The relations of H. and Solomon were, on the whole, intimate and friendly. 2. The artificer whom the king of Tyre sent to Solomon to assist in the completion and decoration of the Temple (I K 7 13, 40, 43; II Ch 2 13, 4 11, 16). He was the offspring of a mixed marriage, his mother being either a Danitess (I K 7 14) or the widow of a man of Naphtali, and his father a Tyrian. His name is given also as Ḥūram-'ābhi (II Ch 2 13 Heb. text). A. C. Z.

HIRELING (or hired servant, sākhīr, μίσθιος, μισθωτός): The man who worked for wages, and not a mere slave ("servant"). While ordinary day-labor was not unknown in Palestine (cf. Mt 20 1, 7), probably it was more usual for men to be hired for stipulated periods (cf. Lv 25 50-55; Is 16 4). The Law protected the rights of such (cf. Lv 19 13, 25 5 f.; Dt 24 14). In the N T cf. HITTITE, hit'ait (חִתִּי, ḥittī, pl. חִתִּים, ḥittīm, Egyptian ḥiti, ḥetà, Assyr. ḥatti): A people whose home was in and about the later Cappadocia. They extended their power westward, and in the 16th cent. B.C. they controlled a large part of Asia Minor (q.v., § 1). After this they worked southward into the region between the middle Euphrates and the Mediterranean. Here they put an end to the Egyptian supremacy which had been established by Thothmes III (16th cent.). Rameses II undertook to restore the Egyptian control. A great battle was fought at Kadesh on the Orontes, and, although Rameses II claimed to have won a decisive victory, the Egyptians were compelled to recognize the Hittite supremacy over the region N. and NE. of Kadesh. A treaty of peace between them was at last signed (c. 1300 B.C.), a document remarkable for its many provisions regulating intercourse between the two powers. The Hittites remained a powerful people for many centuries after this, until at last they became absorbed into the Assyrian Empire. The racial character of the Hittites is obscure. The Egyptian monuments show them to have been a people of peculiar physiognomy, in many respects like the Mongolian type. They left many monuments and inscriptions scattered through Asia Minor, which up to this time (1908) have defied decipherment, in spite of many ingenious attempts. Quite recently a number of bilingual inscriptions have been found, which are now being studied by Hugo Winckler and, doubtless, in due time the key to their language will be discovered. When their inscriptions have been read many obscure points in their history will be cleared up. In the O T most of the references to Hittites are probably to the "children of Heth" in S. Palestine. See HETH. But in many cases the references are to the northern Hittites, who were fairly well known to the Israelites as the people who once controlled N. Palestine and were for a long time after that a great and powerful nation (e.g., Gn 10 15, where "Heth" is made a "son" of Canaan along with Zidon; I K 10 29, 11 1; II K 7 6, where for "Egyptians" we should read "people of Mutsri," a district N. of Palestine). The names "Hivite" and "Hittite" are sometimes confused. In Jos 11 3, Jg 3 3, II S 24 7 we should read "Hittite" for "Hivite."

HIVITE, hai'vait (חִוִּי, ḥiwwī): A petty tribe of Canaan, which was conquered by the Israelites. They seem to have inhabited central Palestine, for they are found chiefly at Gibeon (Jos 9 7) and Shechem (Gn 34 2). They scarcely could have pushed their way as far N. as Lebanon (consequently instead of "Hivite" read "Hittite" in II S 24 7). Racially they were closely connected with the Amorites (cf. the LXX. of Is 17 9). Many take 'Hivite' as a descriptive adjective rather than an ethnological term. If this view be correct, it signifies a tent-dweller (Lat. Paganus). In and after the reign of Solomon, the Hivites who had not been assimilated by the Israelites were subjected to forced labor (I K 9 20 f.). See also ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11. J. A. K.

HOBAB, hō'bab (חֹבָב, ḥōbhābh), 'beloved': A man whom Moses pressed into service as the guide of the tribes of Israel through the wilderness (Nu 10 29-32). He was related to Moses by marriage, but the exact nature of this relation remains an unsolved question. According to EVV (Jg 4 11) he was Moses' brother-in-law. In Nu 10 29 the same Heb. word is rendered "father-in-law." But, as in the last-named passage, the word "father-in-law" may with equal propriety be regarded as applying to Reuel, it is more likely that H. was a brother of Zipporah, the wife of Moses. The two passages also differ in that Nu makes him a Midianite and Jg a Kenite. A. C. Z.

HOBAH, hō'bā (חוֹבָה, ḥōbhāh): The place to which Abraham pursued Chedorlaomer and his allies. It was on the "left hand" (i.e., N.) of Damascus (Gn 14 15). A spring, Hoba, about 50 m. N. of Damascus, may indicate the locality. E. E. N.

HOCK (hough AV): A verb meaning to cut the cords of the hock joints of horses in order to render them unfit for use (Jos 11 6, 9; II S 8 4; I Ch 18 4). See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 6, and WARFARE, § 5. E. E. N.

HODIAH, ho-dai'ā, HODIJAH, ho-dai'jā (הוֹדִיָה, hōdhīyāh), 'J" is my glory': 1. The name of a man (as in RV), not of a woman (AV) (I Ch 4 19). 2. The name of several individuals, or families, in the days of Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh 8 7, 9 5, 10 10, 13, 18). E. E. N.

HOGLAH, hog'lā (חָגְלָה, ḥōglāh), 'partridge': One of the 'daughters' of Zelophehad. Probably a clan- or place-name (Nu 26 33, 27 1, 36 11; Jos 17 3). E. E. N.

HOHAM, hō'ham (הוֹהָם, hōhām): The Canaanite king of Hebron, one of the confederates against Gibeon, defeated by Joshua (Jos 10 3 ff.). E. E. N.

HOLD: A word frequently used in AV as the rendering of: (1) mᵉtsādh, mᵉtsūdhāh, 'a mountain fastness' or 'stronghold' (cf. I S 22 4, etc.). In a number of these references the cave of Adullam seems to be meant. (2) tsᵉrīaḥ, the meaning of which is uncertain in Jg 9 46, 49, though in I S 13 6 it evidently means a hiding-place, and is rendered "pits." In all such instances ARV gives "stronghold." (3) τήρησις (Ac 4 3, "ward" RV), 'a place of confinement.' (4) φυλακή (Rev 18 2), 'a prison.' E. E. N.

In the O T "holiness" is the rendering of qōdhesh (Ex 15 11, etc.); in the N T of ὁσιότης (Lk 1 75), ἁγιότης (II Co 1 12); holy, renders qādhōsh (Ex 19 6, etc.), also ḥāṣīdh (Dt 33 8, etc., but rarely); ἅγιος (Mt 4 5); ἱερός (I Co 9 13); ὅσιος (Ac 2 27). Among the ancient Oriental people, including the Semites, the idea of holiness appears to have been at first non-moral. At its root the study of comparative religions finds the notion of taboo, i.e., the prohibition of contact with some things from fear of harm, because of a mysterious and supernatural force in them (cf. J. G. Frazer, Golden Bough, 1900, I, 319 f., 387 f.; see Von Orelli, Religionsgeschichte 1899, pp. 830 ff.). But no sooner was the notion of taboo taken up into Hebrew thought than it was subjected to a process of spiritualization, culminating in its becoming a unique ruling idea through the O T.

1. Notion of Taboo.

The O T word qōdhesh, in which the idea is predominantly expressed, is derived from a root kindred to that which means 'newness' (ḥādhāsh, so Dillmann; but Delitzsch associates it with the Sumerian kadistu, 'free from defect,' putting it into connection with sacrifice). But whatever the origin of the word, its usage is quite fixed; it means 'separateness' as the basis of relation to God; God's separateness, which requires the same in the creature's relation to Him; and an adequate conception of the notion of holiness, must therefore begin with the definition of it as God's uniqueness. God is holy, because He is God. His holiness is His divinity. It includes His majesty, His greatness, His exaltation, His matchlessness ("Who is like to thee, glorious in holiness" [Ex 15 11]; "There is none holy as J" [I S 2 2]). God swears by His holiness as He swears by Himself (Am 4 2, 6 8; Ps 60 6, 89 35; Is 45 22).

2. Separateness of God.

The name Holy One (of Israel), used predominantly in the prophetic period, is simply a qualitative equivalent for God (cf. Hos 11 12). This is shown in the parallelisms of expression, where the terms are interchangeable (the ascription of holiness to the deity, however, is not an exclusively Hebrew idea). The Phœnician inscriptions contain the phrase "the holy gods." According to Ezekiel, God reveals Himself as Jehovah, the God of Israel, the mighty and true God, by sanctifying (i.e., manifesting) Himself in His holiness (20 41 f., 28 22, 36 23, 38 15, 23, 39 7). Holiness, therefore, when predicated of J", denotes not so much an attribute of His as the totality of His character. It distinguishes Him from all other beings.

3. The Holy One.

When holiness came to be identified with divinity in its breadth, it necessarily placed supreme emphasis on moral excellence (purity), lifting this element to a determinative place in the conception. Hence, though holiness and moral purity never seem to coalesce, yet absence of purity from a holy being becomes inconceivable when it is associated with godhead, for God is supremely pure (Hab 1 12 f.).

4. Holiness as Moral Purity.

Furthermore, holiness is not a negative quality; it is not the absence merely of stain or corruption, but rather a positive force, which secures two activities. The first is resistance to all that is unholy. No one can come into the presence of God; for His presence is a consuming foree (I S 6 20; Is 6 5; cf. also Ex 3 5). This is probably the connecting-link between the extra-biblical notion of taboo and holiness. When the positive energy of God's holiness was realized to be a force ineompatible with the evil of sin, it undoubtedly worked a corresponding fear that creature weakness likewise might perish in His presence, because of its frailty and unworthiness.

5. Holiness a Positive Quality.

The second active aspect of holiness is its self-impartation. What it does not destroy it changes into its own kind. If holiness in God is divinity, holiness in all else must be grounded in and measured by its relation to God. Hence those who are nearest to God are holiest. For this reason, to angels is attributed this characteristic; they are even ealled "holy ones" (Job 5 1, 15 15; Dn 8 13), though this does not mean that they are absolutely pure or perfect, for God finds folly in them (Job 4 18, 15 15). From this relation to Himself which justifies their being called holy, they also reeeive the name of "sons of God" (Job 38 7).

6. Self-Impartation of Holiness.

The holiness of human beings is based on their relation to God. But this relation requires both an outward and an inner character. As far as it is outward its ethieal value lies simply in association with and serviceableness to God. It may be, therefore, merely formal. Priests are made holy as they are by a speeial ceremony set apart to the service of J" (Ex 29 1 ff.), and are to be distinguished and respected as such (Lv 21 8). Prophets likewise are ealled "holy men of God" (II K 4 9; II P 1 21 AV), and beeome holy by appointment of God (Jer 1 5). The Nazirite during the days of his separation was to be called holy (Nu 6 5). In this sense the men with David at Nob are called holy (I S 21 5 f.), and the whole nation was holy (Dt 7 6, 14 2).

7. Holiness in Man.

Human holiness, as an attribute of character, is by the same reasoning dependent on a true relation to God, but goes deeper into one's inner being. Its mainspring and controlling principle are the realization of God's true character ("ye shall be holy, for I Jehovah your God am holy," Lv 19 1). In this command the so-called Law of Holiness is summed up. Such holiness must be attained by perfect conformity to the will of J", but, in accordanee with the whole conception of the O T, this will is expressed in a system of precepts including both moral and ceremonial prescriptions. At the heart of the system lies the moral element; and in the purer outbursts of devotional feeling it extricates itself and finds expression in its simplicity (Ps 15 1-5, 24 3).

9. Holiness of Things. The holiness of impersonal beings is determined by their introduction into the service of religion, or, in general, into relation with God. Heaven as God's habitation is expressly called holy (Jer 25 30; Zec 2 13). Upon earth the places in which He appears to men are holy ground (Ex 3 5; Jos 5 15). Most naturally the Temple, in which He had His mercy-seat and which is His house, deserves this epithet (Hab 2 20), and to its parts, according to the degree of nearness to His most intimate throne, are ascribed higher degrees of sanctity. So also Mount Zion and the whole city of Jerusalem (Is 11 9, 27 13, 48 2, 52 1; Dn 9 16, 20, 24; Zeph 3 11), and even the whole country in which God's people are to dwell, are made sharers in its holiness (Ezk 15 13; Zec 2 13). Further, the articles to be used in His service, such as the showbread (I S 21 6), the incense (Ex 30 35, 37), the oil (Ex 30 25), the sacrifices (Ex 28 28), and the priestly garments (Ezk 42 14) are all declared holy.

10. Holiness and Ceremonial Cleanness. The relation of the idea of ceremonial holiness to that of ceremonial cleanness is not simple. In general, these differ in degree or intensity (cf. PURIFICATION). That which is holy may be declared not clean ceremonially, and that which is clean may not be holy. The holy is declared unclean in order that it may not be touched without penalty. The distinction may be put in the convenient formula that the common and permissible stand between the two extremes, unclean and holy, both of which, but for ultimately different and contrary reasons, are prohibited. The distinction is illustrated in the rabbinical rule, "All holy Scriptures defile the hands" (Ryle, Canon of O T, 1892, p. 199).

11. Holiness in N T. In the N T the idea of holiness attains its completely spiritual stage. The standard pronounced for it is the sinlessness of Jesus Christ. The etymology of the words employed can not be pressed. The sense of these words is already fixed. They are not chosen for their etymological connotations. Accordingly, to give the essence of the N T idea would be simply to repeat that God only is absolutely holy (I P 1 16); all other holiness is derivative. But God is holy because He is morally good. And both impersonal and personal beings become holy by association with and assimilation to Him. Those who have entered into the ideal relation with God, as given in the person and teaching of Christ, are holy ones (saints).

HOLY SPIRIT: The name given in the O T to certain phases of the action of God upon nature and man, and in the N T (Holy Ghost AV) to the inner workings of God upon the human soul, as these were conditioned by the incarnation, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. The name is thus given in Christian theology to the third person of the Trinity.

The word "spirit" (Heb. רוּחַ, rūaḥ, Gr. πνεῦμα) originally meant "breath." In the act of breathing, probably, all primitive peoples have found the seat of life. For when death comes, it is breathing which first seems to stop, and in the last act of expiration the person departs from the body. Hence most languages have used the same word, both for the breath or the wind, and for the mysterious self or seat of life, even long after the crude first conceptions of the latter had been transcended. The Hebrews with their bold anthropomorphism applied this term to God Himself, and thus gave it a place of supreme importance in the religion of revelation. (1) Thus they conceived of Jehovah as ruling over the powers of the natural world by His Spirit (Gn 1 2; Job 26 13, 37 10; Is 40 7), but the allusions to this sphere of action are not numerous. (2) Much more numerous are those which describe man's life as due to the power of the Spirit of Jehovah (Gn 2 7; Job 33 4; Ps 104 29 f.; Ec 3 19, 21; Ezk 37 3-14). In this view, the life of man is more than a mere effect of the Spirit of God. It is that Spirit in a special form and manifestation. The metaphysical problems were not yet in sight. With complete naïveté the individual life was thus pictured as a work of the Spirit of God which, when life ceased, returned, not as a human soul, but as the Spirit of God to Him who gave it. (3) A further step is involved where the Spirit of Jehovah is associated with the performance of special feats of strength, valor, or skill, in the service of the theocratic kingdom (Jg 3 10, 6 34, 11 29, 14 6; I S 11 6). (4) This doctrine attains a new and most characteristic form when it is connected with the work of the prophets. True, other religions had their prophets (as the prophets of Baal, I K 18 19), but prophecy in Israel possessed features which are unique and traceable only to the selective will and purpose of God (cf. Briggs, Messianic Prophecy, Cap. I; A. B. Davidson, Old Testament Prophecy, chs. i, ix, x). No other people attributed their prophetic prowess to the Spirit of their god. This was peculiar to Israel, and was one of the vital elements in the development of their whole view of God and His relation to men. At first, as in all else, this feature of Divine revelation connects itself with the crude beginnings of what later became distinctive and complete. Prophecy appeared in connection with abnormal excitation, and these states of frenzy and ecstasy were taken as manifest proofs of the Spirit's presence and power (I S 10 6, 10, 19 9, 20, 23 f.). At times J″ even sent forth a "lying spirit" (I K 22 21 ff.). But gradually this view gave way to a higher one, according to which the Spirit of J″ possessed the mind and heart of men, who were not subjects of physical convulsions, but who were in living communion with Himself (Mic 2 7, 3 8; Hos 9 7; Ezk 2 2, 3 12, 14, 24, etc.; Neh 9 30; I Ch 12 18; II Ch 15 1). This was accompanied by the growth of the conception that the Holy Spirit controlled the history of Israel as a whole (Neh 9 20 ff.; Is 63 10-14), and above all was guiding it toward the Messianic Age (Ezk 36 26 f., 39 29; Is 4 4, 44 3; Zec 4 6; Jl 2 28 f.). The more direct connection of the work of the Spirit with man's moral and spiritual experience appears in the directly Messianic prophecies, especially as they gather round the figure of the Servant of Jehovah (cf. Is 11 2, 4, 42 1, 59 21, 61 1). (5) Beyond this, passages are not wanting which view the Holy Spirit as connected with the inner experience of the individual (Ps 51 10 f., 139 7, 143 10). It was reserved for a later stage of revelation to bring this into full view.

Throughout this O T usage of the words "Holy Spirit," or "Spirit of Jehovah," we do not find any attempt to define these terms. There is in certain passages (Ps 51 10; Is 48 16, 63 10-14; Ezk, passim) a tendency to hypostatize the Spirit. But even there we can not assert that a distinct subsistence is attributed to it. It may be still either a personification of an attribute or a periphrastic expression for Jehovah Himself. And yet the persistent, deliberate concentration of thought upon the idea of the Spirit of Jehovah as coming forth to deal with human nature and history has confessedly produced this tendency to use language which at least is not inconsistent with, and to a later age may even sound like, the recognition of distinctions within the Divine nature. This was a stage through which the minds of men were compelled to pass.

When we enter upon the N T we find the doctrine of the Spirit marvelously enriched. Professor Wood has pointed out that in the Jewish period (in the apocryphal lit.) the Spirit is used to describe God's relation to Israel in the past (O T hist.) and in the future (Messianic hope), but that no one claimed the gift of the Spirit for himself or his contemporaries. The spirit of prophecy had ceased. The N T is filled with the fact that the Messianic Age had now arrived and the ancient promise that the Holy Spirit would be no official or esoteric boon, but be poured out upon "all flesh" was now made good (Ac 2 4, 17 f., 33, 38). (1) This age was heralded by the revival of the prophetic gift in the case of John the Baptist (Lk 1 15-17; cf. 1 41, 67, 2 25-27, 36). But he himself claimed it not, conscious of the surpassing glory of the kingdom which was at hand (Mk 1 8, 10; Mt 3 11, 16; Lk 3 16; Jn 1 32 f.). (2) The Messiah Himself, Jesus of Nazareth, stood in relations to the Spirit of God which were all His own, and which yet were the channel through which He entered into His new action upon human history. (a) Even within the apostolic period accounts had arisen of the new foundations for His very self and nature, some accounts tracing these to the miraculous power of the Holy Spirit (Mt 1 18, 20; Lk 1 35; cf. Jn 1 14). (b) All the Gospels affirm the descent of the Spirit upon Him at His baptism (Mk 1 10, 12; Mt 3 16, 41; Lk 3 22, 4 1, 14; Jn 1 32 f.). (c) Thus, Jesus asserts that the Messianic prophecy (Is 61 1) is fulfilled in His person (Lk 4 18; cf. Mt 12 18, 28, 32; Jn 3 34). And yet, in His own recorded sayings the mention of the Spirit does not occur often. "It is significant that in no case does Christ speak of the Spirit as acting upon his followers while he is present with them. He would keep the thought of the disciples fixed upon himself as the revelation of the Father" (I. H. Wood, ut inf., p.137; cf. pp.141–143). (d) Apart from Mt 12 28 (cf. Lk 11 20) and Lk 11 13 (cf. Mt 7 11), we have one reference to the prophetic action of the Spirit in the O T (Mt 22 43), one terrible warning that in resisting Him the Jewish leaders were in danger of the supreme sin (Mt 12 31 f.; Mk 3 29), one promise that the Spirit will aid them in future emergencies (Mt 10 20; Mk 13 11; Lk 12 12), and the final command to baptize "into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit" (Mt 28 19).

2. In the N T. The Gospels.

In the Fourth Gospel our Lord is represented as speaking at great length regarding the Spirit with His disciples at their last gathering. His previous references are even more sparse than in the Synoptics (Jn 3 5-8, 6 63). But the last discourses glow with references to the coming of the Spirit, as to the supreme gift of God and the supreme experiences of man. (a) The Holy Spirit is the Spirit of truth, the paraclete, the comforter, without whom even the person and work of Christ in their hearts would not be complete (16 7-13a). (b) He will open up to them the truth in its fulness as Jesus taught it (14 26) and as it concerned their destiny (16 13). (c) He will not give a new revelation to supersede that of Jesus, but will unfold to their hearts and minds the whole meaning and power of Jesus Himself (15 26, 16 14 f.). (d) This Holy Spirit is sent by the Father in Christ's name (14 26); He is also sent by Christ (16 7), "from the Father" (15 26), but He also "comes" (16 7). It seems violent to say that these passages either merely personify a mode of the Divine action, or so identify the Spirit with God that He is in no way distinguished from the Father. While no ontological definition is given, it is not too much to say that an ontological distinction is involved in this mode of specch.

3. Acts and Epistles.

Judging by the mere number of our Lord's references to the Holy Spirit, we should be quite unprepared for the extraordinary phenomena disclosed in the remainder of the N T as to His presence and power. (1) In the Book of Acts, we find events which remind us of the O T. The entrance upon the new age is marked by excitements which affect even the physical life (Ac 2 2-4, 15 f., 33, 38). Like phenomena occur repeatedly, not only to Jews (9 17), but to Samaritans (8 15-19) and to Gentiles (10 44, 11 15). (2) Among the more striking results were the strange gift of tongues (I Co chs. 12–14), working of miracles (Ac 13 9 ff.; I Co 12 10, 29; Gal 3 5), prophecy (Ac 11 28, 21 4, 10 f.). (3) In the Epistles of Paul we find abundant references to the Holy Spirit. There are apparently two main points of departure, in addition to his knowledge of the O T and the influence of the Christian community, into whose atmosphere his conversion brought him, viz., his own experiences of the transforming power of the Gospel as the organ of God's Spirit, and the connection of the Holy Spirit with the person and work of Jesus Christ. (a) The inner power of the Spirit is found in the new consciousness of sonship toward God (Gal 4 6; Ro 8 9, 16), through apprehension of God's love and mercy (Ro 5 5; Tit 3 4-6). This Spirit is the means of our approach to God (Ro 8 26 f.; Eph 2 17; Ph 2 1, 3 3); the enlightener of our minds (I Co 2 10-16); the source of our power, as individual Christians (Eph 3 16) and as preachers (Ro 15 19; I Co 2 4); the seal of our acceptance with God and the earnest of our immortal life (Ro 8 15 f.; I Co 6 11; II Co 1 22; Eph 1 13 f., 4 30); the stimulator of acts of worship (I Co 14 2, 12, 14 f.); the bond of Christian communion (I Co 12 13; II Co 13 13; Ph 2 1); the life of the Church, "the body of Christ" (Eph 1 20-22; I Co 6 19, 20). See CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, §§ 5 ff. The Church is founded on the confession of Jesus as Messiah, a confession which is due to the Holy Spirit (I Co 12 3; cf. I Jn 4 2 f.); the confessor passes under "the law of the Spirit of life" (Ro 8 2), his whole ethical and religious experience flows from that new principle (Ro 8 5-10, 12-14), the new warfare of which he is conscious is the proof of that Spirit's living presence in him (Gal 5 16 f.), and his victory means the possession of all the present virtues and joys (Gal 5 22). (b) The Holy Spirit is constantly connected with the person and work of Christ. The Spirit without the historical Christ has no grip on intelligent faith, the historical Christ without the inner power of the Spirit has no meaning or relation to the individual will. The Spirit is "of Christ" as well as "of God" (Ro 8 9); in Him he was the Spirit of holiness (Ro 1 4), and it is even said "the Lord is the Spirit" (II Co 3 17 f.). Accordingly, the effects of the Divine grace in the heart are traceable to both (Gal 4 6; Eph 3 16 f.). As was said of the Johannine, so of the Pauline teaching, the Holy Spirit is both distinguished from, and identified with, both Christ and God. No theological explanation is attempted. Something greater is here, the disclosure in the field of experience through inspired men of the threefold operation of God upon human nature. That the Father, Son, and Spirit, thus revealed in relation to man, are described in mutual relations and in a fundamental identity is the conviction which underlies all the historical discussions of the doctrine of the Trinity.

HOMAM, hō'mam. See HEMAM.

HOMER. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 3.

HONEST: (1) The AV use of this word to translate the adjective καλός, which means 'excellent,' 'beautiful,' 'good' (in an esthetic rather than moral sense), was in accord with the usage of its day (1611). In modern English the word 'honest' is of much more restricted meaning. Consequently, in RV "honorable," "honorably" have been substituted (except in Lk 8 15) as more suitable renderings (cf. Ro 12 17; I P 2 12; etc.). (2) In Ph 4 8; I Ti 2 2 for σεμνός, σεμνότης ('grave,' 'venerable,' and 'gravity,' 'dignity'), RV gives "honorable" and "gravity." (3) In Ro 13 13; I Th 4 12 the Gr. εὐσχημόνως is exactly rendered "becomingly" in ARV. E. E. N.

HONEY. See FOOD, § 7.

HOOD. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8.

HOOK: The translation of several Heb. words: (1) wāw, a 'hook,' or 'peg,' of silver fastened on, or in, the posts of the tabernacle to support hangings (Ex 26 32, 38 28, etc.). (2) ḥaḥ, a 'hook,' or 'ring,' for the nose, used in reference to captives (II K 19 28; Is 37 29; Ezk 29 4, 38 4. Also Ezk 19 4, 9 RV for "chains" AV). (3) ḥakkāh, a 'fish-hook' (Job 41 1 [40 25]; Is 19 8; Hab 1 15). (4) 'agmōn (Job 41 2 [40 26]), "hook" AV, more correctly "cord" RV (5) ḥōaḥ (Job 41 2 [40 26]), "thorn" AV, "hook" RV (6) shᵉphattayīm (Ezk 40 43), 'hooks' or 'pegs'; by some translated 'their edge.' (7) tsinnāh (Am 4 2), the 'hook' or the 'barb' of a fishing-spear. (8) ἄγκιστρον (Mt 17 27), 'fish-hook.' C. S. T.

HOPE: Both the elements of the generic idea of hope—i.e., expectation and desire for the thing expected—distinctly appear in the Biblical usage. As soon as that which is expected is realized, hope ceases (Ro 8 24). Further, the term sometimes designates the expectation itself, and sometimes the thing expected (Col 1 5 is an instance of the latter usage). Hope and faith are closely related, but whereas faith seizes upon the invisible in general, whether past, present, or future, hope is limited to the realization of future good. Faith as a living principle, however, includes true hope. The hope of the wicked shall come to naught (Pr 11 23, 24 20), but the hope of the righteous is not vain (Ps 115 11, 9 19, 37 5, 40 4). Hence the definition of faith in Heb 11 1 as "the assurance of things hoped for." A. C. Z.

HOPHNI, hŏf'nī (חָפְנִי, ḥophnī): One of the two sons of Eli, called "base men" (I S 2 12, "sons of Belial" AV). Hophni and Phineas were priests and through their selfish and arbitrary exercise of the priestly function brought disrepute upon the worship of J". For this they were twice rebuked (I S 2 27-36, 3 11, 14, 18), and finally perished in the battle of Aphek, whither they had accompanied the Ark of the Covenant (for the derivation of the name cf. Halévy, Études Sabéennes, No. 14). A. C. Z.

HOPHRA, hōf'ra. See PHARAOH.

HOR, hōr (הֹר, hōr): 1. A mountain-top on which Aaron died (Nu 20 23 f., 21 4 [P]; Dt 32 50, noted also as one of the stages in the wilderness wanderings, Nu 33 37), not far from Kadesh-barnea, identified with the modern Jebel Nebi Harun, about 50 m. S. of the Dead Sea, near Petra, by a tradition as old as Josephus (Ant. IV, 4 7) and supported by Jerome (Onom. 303, 144). This mountain dominates the surrounding country, being nearly 5,000 ft. in height and crowned by a rugged double peak. But Mount Hor is defined as "by the border of the land of Edom"; and this description does not suit the location of Jebel Nebi Harun. H. C. Trumbull (Kadesh Barnea, pp. 128 ff.) with probable correctness has located Mount Hor at Jebel Madurah, NW. of Edom (cf. Buhl, Edomiter, p. 22). 2. A peak named as the ideal N. boundary of Canaan in Nu 34 7 [P]. There is nothing to determine its exact identity. Many regard Mt. Hermon, on account of its conspicuity, as the only landmark that could have been intended, but others contend that it was a NE. spur of the Lebanon range, Jebel Akker, according to Porter, Five Years in Damascus, II, 333. A. C. Z.

HORAM, hō'ram (הֹרָם, hōrām): A Canaanite king of Gezer who was conquered and slain by Joshua (Jos 10 33). E. E. N.

HOREB, hō'reb. See SINAI.

HOREM, hō'rem (חֹרֶם, ḥŏrēm), 'sacred': A fortified city in Naphtali (Jos 19 38). Site unknown. C. S. T.

HOR-HAGIDGAD, hōr"-ha-gid'gad (הֹר הַגִּדְגָּד, ḥōr haggidhgadh): A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 32 f.). The same as Gudgodah (Dt 10 7). E. E. N.

HORI, hō'rai, HORIM, hō'rim, HORITES, hō'raits (חֹרִי, חֹרִים, ḥōrī, ḥōrīm): The original inhabitants of Edom or Mt. Seir, who were dispossessed by the Edomites (Gn 14 6, 36 2 [?], 20-29; Dt 2 12, 22; I Ch 1 39). The name is usually held as equivalent to 'cave-dwellers,' and as the primitive inhabitants of Palestine were of this character, this explanation seems most reasonable. In Edom, in particular, there are many evidences of this. The name was thus probably not the real name of these people, but an epithet given them by their conquerors. E. E. N.

HORMAH, hōr'mā (חָרְמָה, ḥormāh), 'devoted' (to deity, which could be understood in several senses): A city in the "South." Here the Israelites were defeated by the Canaanites (Nu 14 45; Dt 1 44), but later, apparently in the same place, won a victory over the Canaanite king of Arad (Nu 21 3). Similarly, Judah and Simeon, 'devoted' the Canaanites of Zephath to destruction, and then called the place Hormah (Jg 1 17). It is possible that the last two references (also Jos 12 14) are to the same event. H. was counted both to Judah and to Simeon (Jos 15 30, 19 4). The site is uncertain. E. E. N.

HORN (קֶרֶן, geren, κέρας): 1. Horns of cattle were used as substitutes for bottles, being made into flasks for carrying oil (I S 16 1; I K 1 39). Long horns (especially of rams) were also used as trumpets (Jos 6 13). 2. Its pointed shape makes the horn the emblem of a peak (Is 5 1, RVmg.). 3. Since an animal uses its horns as weapons, they are emblems of power (I K 22 11; Dn 8 3 ff.). To "exalt the horn" is either to confer power or to claim power for oneself (I S 2 10; Ps 75 4 f., 89 24). 4. The corners of the altar were also called horns (I K 1 50 f.) from the horn-like extensions with which they were finished off (Jos. BJ. V, 5 6). See also ALTAR, § 2, and MUSIC, § 3 (2). A. C. Z.

HORNET (צִרְעָה, tsir'āh, from tsār'a, 'to strike'): The hornet is named as a pest through which God was to drive out Israel's enemies from the land of promise (Ex 23 28; Dt 7 20). There is no record of a literal plague of hornets during the period of the conquest, unless Jos 24 12 be taken as such (as it is in Wis 12 8-10). See also PALESTINE, § 26. A. C. Z.

HORONAIM, hōr"o-nê'im (חֹרֹנַיִם, חֹרֹנָיִם, ḥōrōnayīm), 'two hollows': A city in S. Moab (Jer 48 3, 34; Is 15 5, "the way of H."; Jer 48 5, "the descent of H."), near Zoar. It is mentioned in the Moabite Stone as a city to which one descended. It was probably at the foot of some cliff, and S. of the Arnon. See also Map II, H 1. C. S. T.

HORONITE, hōr'o-nait (הַחֹרֹנִי, ha-ḥorōnī), 'the Horonite': A title given to Sanballat, who opposed Nehemiah (Neh 2 10, 19, 13 28), since he was from Beth-horon. C. S. T.

HORSE. See PALESTINE, § 24, and WARFARE, § 4 f.

HORSE GATE. See JERUSALEM, § 32.

HORSELEACH: The Heb. term (עֲלוּקָה, 'ălūqāh) is of uncertain significance, and may mean 'sucker.' The reference (Pr 30 15) may be to a variety of leaches, or bloodsuckers, well known in the East and very troublesome to man and beast. Some scholars, however, think that a mythological vampire-like creature is referred to. E. E. N.

HORSEMEN. See WARFARE, § 4. (For Ezk 27 14 AV, see ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11, under Togarmah.)

HOSAH, hō'sā (חֹסָה, ḥōṣāh): I. A city on the NW. border of Asher, and apparently S. of Tyre (Jos 19 29). Site unknown, as the identification with Ušu of the Assyr. and Egypt. inscriptions is unsatisfactory. II. The ancestral head of a division of the door-keepers of the Second Temple (I Ch 16 38, 26 10-16). E. E. N.

HOSANNA: An acclamation which occurs in the Gospels in the story of the triumphal entry (Mt 21 9, 15; Mk 11 9-10; Jn 12 13), and quoted from Ps 118 25. It is the Gr. form of the Heb. hōshī'āh-nā', 'Save! we pray.' The same expression occurs in the plural in II K 19 19, and similar ones, without the particle of urgency, frequently in the Psalter. Hosea (הוֹשֵׁעַ, hōshēa', also Osee in N T [AV], identical with Hoshea and Joshua in derivation and meaning), the son of Beeri, the first of the minor prophets in the order given in the Hebrew canon. His ministry fell within the Assyrian period, which began with the middle of the 8th cent. B.C., and was located in the Northern Kingdom (Israel). According to the superscription of the book under his name, he prophesied during the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah (790–690 B.C.), and Jeroboam, the son of Joash, King of Israel (784–745 B.C.). While this superscription may be by a later hand, there is no doubt that it is in general correct. The length of his prophetic ministry, however, is not definitely fixed by it, as it does not indicate how much of the reigns of Uzziah and Hezekiah is to be included. Yet it may be safely inferred that the prophet was in public life not less than ten years and not more than thirty—i.e., from about 750 to about 730 B.C. Of his personal life and experiences nothing is known, except what is gathered from incidental allusions in his discourses. He was evidently a native as well as a prophet of the Northern Kingdom. He cherished a living interest in the affairs of his generation. Whether he occupied an official position of any sort it is not certain. Some have conjectured that he belonged to the gild of prophets, while others have inferred from his intimate knowledge of the corruptions of the priesthood that he was a priest. All that may be asserted is that he was a leading citizen of the realm.

1. Personal History.

H.'s call to the prophetic work came in connection with a sad domestic experience. He married a woman (Gomer) who afterward proved unfaithful to him. When her eldest son was born, H. gave him the symbolical name of Jezreel (1 4). To the next child, a daughter, he gave the name "Lo-ruhamah" (RVmg., "that hath not obtained mercy," 1 6). The next son was calle "Lo-ammi" (RVmg., "not my people," 1 9). After this, Gomer left H., and became the slave concubine of a man who could better satisfy her love of luxurious living (2 5). But H. persisted in his affection for her, sought her out, and bought her back with the price of a slave. She was thus brought into the new relation of a slave to her husband. That all this is the story of an actual occurrence has been denied by ancient and modern scholars. It has been alleged that it would be unthinkable for God to command conduct so contrary to His own moral law; that it must have taken years to bring into view the significance of the Divine command, if the prophet's experience had been literally lived through; and that during this time the prophet must have endured mental agony on account of the compulsory but revolting relationship with an unchaste woman. But these considerations are based upon the supposition that the literal occurrence of the transaction followed the command; viz., the statement that Hosea was bidden to "take a wife of whoredom" (1 2) means that he was told to deliberately marry a harlot. The facts in the case do not bear out such an interpretation. A "wife of whoredom" is not a prostitute, but a woman who has violated her marriage vow. The case rather stands thus: H., being married, discovered that his wife was unfaithful to him, and, realizing the strength of his own feelings of affection toward her, was led to find in this feeling an illustration of God's greater love for idolatrous Israel. In his taking back his unfaithful wife he was further led naturally to see God's willingness to forgive Israel and restore to it His favor. Inasmuch as this experience was manifestly under Divine guidance and control, he construed it as God's will that he should pass through it as a means of his prophetic equipment, and in the vivid style of the prophet represented it as God's command.

2. Domestic Experience Used as a Parable.

With the exception of this remarkable incident, nothing else of a specific nature is known of H.'s life. It is certain that he often came into conflict with the priests of his day (4 9, 5 1, 6 9); but he relates nothing like the concrete dispute narrated by Amos out of his own experience (Am 7 10 ff.). H.'s character is distinguished by fulness of feeling, combined with a keen perception of spiritual truth, and courage in its expression.

The Book of H. may be conveniently subdivided into two main parts. Chs. 1–3 are in narrative form and give the allegorization of his tragic domestic experience, as already explained. Chs. 4–14 are a series of denunciations, relieved by pleas in behalf of J", addressed to the people (exhortations to turn from idolatry and sin). A more minute analysis of this section is not practicable (for an attempted analysis see Harper in Int. Crit. Com., Amos and Hosea, p. clx), partly because of the abrupt breaks and reiterations to which the prophet resorts in his passionate way of preaching his message. In general, however, the theme of the whole section is given in the opening words of 4 1: "There is no truth, nor goodness, nor knowledge of God in the land."

3. Content.

The text of the book has been very much tampered with by later hands. A sufficient occasion for this was furnished by the obscurities of H.'s style. His utterances are at times ejaculatory. It is doubtful, however, whether the amount of corruption has not been largely exaggerated in recent efforts at criticism. Some instances where the text appears to be corrupt may be nothing more than the natural irregularities of the author's own method of expression, or the consequences of the arrangement of his discourses. These were no doubt at the beginning fragmentary.

4. Condition of Text.

The integrity of the work has also been called into question. The following seem to be interpolations: (1) References to Judah by a Judaistic editor (1 7, 5 10, 12, 14, 6 11a, 8 14, 10 11b, 11 12b). (2) Messianic allusions (1 10–2 1, 6-7, 14-16, 18-23, 14 1-8). (3) Explanatory insertions of technical, archeological, or historical character (4 13d, 5 6, 7 4, 16c, 8 8b, 9 1b, 9, 10, 10 5, 14b, 12 3, 13 4b-7). (4) Hopeless corruption (4 4, 18, 5 2, 7, 11, 6 7, 7 4, 8 10b, 13, 9 8, 13, 10 9, 11 3, 6 f., 12).

5. Integrity.

It has been assumed that the primary form of H.'s composition was poetical, or at least metrical. This, in general, is a correct assumption; but the restoration of the discourses to their primitive form involves textual reconstruction, for which no adequate materials are available at present.

6. Metrical Form.

H.'s religious message was one of rebuke, and yet one of hope. While he spares neither princes, priest, nor people in his denunciations, he holds out the mercy of God as sufficient for the reformation and restoration of Israel to the relation of privilege with J″ (ch. 14). He also presents J″'s law for Israel as one of ethical rather than ceremonial nature, and the key-word of his ethics is the word "mercy" ("goodness" RV), whose meaning, however, is more nearly that of the N T "love" than any other O T term. It is upon this basis, no doubt, that Jesus contrasts it with Pharisaic righteousness, as the essence of true religion (Mt 9 13, 12 7).

HOSEN: In Dn 3 21 RV we read "their hosen, their tunics, and their mantles"; the AV reads "their coats, their hosen, and their hats." The Aramaic ṣarbāl ("hosen" RV, "coats" AV) may perhaps mean 'mantle,' though this is not certain. The word paṭṭīsh or p'ṭash ("tunics" RV, "hosen" AV) is still more obscure, and no probable meaning can be suggested (cf. Driver in Camb. Bible, Daniel, in loc.).

HOSHEA, ho-shî'a (הוֹשֵׁעַ, hōshē'a), 'salvation'; in Assyr. inscriptions, Ausi' [a]: 1. The son of Elah, and the last king of Israel (733–722 B.C.) (II K 15 30, 17 1 ff.). He was raised to the throne by Tiglath-pileser III, upon the assassination of Pekah by the people. This fact indicates that in the alinement of parties in N. Israel he was a leader on the pro-Assyrian side. For a few years H. proved loyal to the king of Assyria, and paid him the tribute imposed, but, wearying of this relation, he defaulted and applied to the king of Egypt for an alliance against his former master. For this offense Shalmaneser IV invaded his territory and laid siege to Samaria. Sargon (Shalmaneser's successor) completed the work of Shalmaneser, captured the city, and put an end to the kingdom of Israel. As to H.'s fate nothing further is known. His character must be estimated in the light of the conditions of the realm. He was not strong, but possessed courage enough to make a desperate effort in behalf of the people's freedom from foreign oppression. 2. The original name of Joshua, the son of Nun (Nu 13 8, Oshea AV; Dt 32 44). 3. A son of Azaziah, an Ephraimite chief under David (I Ch 27 20). 4. A Levite who, with others, set his seal to the covenant (Neh 10 23).

A. C. Z.

HOSPITALITY (φιλοξενία), 'love of strangers': Hospitality, as the act and habit of entertaining strangers, is not a purely Biblical or Oriental characteristic. The Greeks recognized it and sanctioned it by the doctrine of a patron of all travelers and strangers (Zeus-Xenios. Hom. Odyss. IX, 270; XIV, 57). In the O T the total absence of inns, especially under the patriarchal system, made the exercise of hospitality an indispensable condition of all enterprise, as well as an expression of kindness (cf. Abraham, Gn 18 13; cf. He 13 2; also other cases, Gn 19 2, 24 25; Jg 19 16). The Deuteronomic law expressly provides for the care of strangers (Dt 14 29). The neglect of hospitality was a defect in the perfect man's character (Job 31 32). In Roman days, inns and taverns had come into existence, but they were notoriously dangerous, and often no more than houses of ill fame. Their keepers were for the most part unscrupulous, and their infamous practises are alluded to even in legal enactments, which were designed to check and correct the evils of the system (Ulpian, Dig. iii, 2, 4, 2; xxiii, 2, 43, 1; Tertullian, De Fuga in Persec. 13; Marquardt, Privatl. p. 471, n. 5); hence the injunction to hospitality as a duty in Apostolic and in early Christian times (Ro 12 13; cf. I Ti 3 2; Tit 1 8; I P 4 9; Clem. Ad Cor. I 10-12, 35) was not intended merely as a means of cultivating or otherwise expressing good-will toward men, but also as a protection of Christian travelers.

HOST: The rendering of (1) ḥayīl, 'strength,' 'force,' often used of an army (Ex 14 4, 17, 28; I S 14 48, etc.). (2) maḥăneh, 'camp,' or 'encampment,' also used frequently of a great company, or of an army (Gn 32 2; Ex 14 24, 16 13, etc.). (3) tsābhā' (from the verb tsābhā', 'to carry on war'), 'army' (Gn 21 22, 32; Jos 5 14; Jg 4 2; I S 17 55, etc.). This word is very common in the O T and is sometimes used in a broader sense of the whole body of Israel (Ex 12 41), very often of the multitude of the heavenly bodies, i.e., the stars (Gn 2 1; Dt 4 19, etc.), which were frequently worshiped (Dt 17 3; II K 17 16, etc.). The most common occurrence of the term is in the expression "Jehovah (LORD AV) of hosts," which is found a great number of times in the prophets and has been called "the prophetical title of Jehovah" (Driver). The origin of this expression is obscure. It may have meant originally 'J″, the God who leads the armies of Israel,' and have been later extended to express the universal sway of J″ (the prophetic idea), or it may have had this wider meaning (J″, ruler of the hosts of heaven) from the first (cf. Driver in Camb. Bible, Joel and Amos, p. 231 f.). (4) In Lk 2 13 στρατία means the heavenly angelic beings who worship God, while in Ac 7 42 the same word refers to the stars as objects of worship. (5) πανδοχεύς, 'innkeeper' (Lk 10 35). (6) ξένος, 'one who shows hospitality' (Ro 16 23). E. E. N.

I. The Tent of the Nomads.

The 'house' of the nomad is the tent, 'ōhel—even to-day called bait ('house') by the Bedawin. For a long period the Israelites, as nomads, dwelt in tents, and even many years after the main body of the nation had settled down in permanent abodes individual clans, like the Kenites (I S 15 6; cf. Jg 4 17) and the E. Jordan tribes, continued to use tents, because the nature of the land they occupied compelled them to follow the pastoral mode of life.

1. Evidence of the Early Use of the Tent.

The Heb. idiom preserved a number of survivals from the nomadic days, e.g., nāṣa', 'to depart,' lit. 'to pull out (the tent-pin)'; hālakh l'ōhŏlō, 'to go home,' lit. 'to return to his tent.'

The tent was either round and partly conical, or long—something after the form of an inverted ship's hull. Usually the tent coverings, yᵉrī'ōth, were woven from the hair of the black goat (Song 1 5), and stretched over three or five poles, 5 to 6 ft. high. In the roof of the tent were sewed wooden rings, which were connected by tightly drawn cords, mēthār, with the tent-pins, yāthēdh, driven fast into the ground. By this means the tent was held upright. If a cord broke or a pin was pulled up, the tent collapsed (cf. Job 4 21, 30 11). Instead of hair-cloth, however, skins were often used for the tent covering. Somewhere about the middle of the tent a support was placed to hold up the roof. In most cases the tent of a Bedawi is divided into two parts, of which the second, or innermost, ḥedher, is specifically for the women and children, though also used as kitchen and storehouse. Entrance to this room, in ordinary cases, is forbidden to men. Only one who is pursued may venture to take refuge here, where the real home is (Jg 4 17 ff.).

2. Construction of the Tent.

The booth, or hut, ṣukkhāh, constructed of branches or bushes, was used as a merely temporary abode, e.g., of the field-watcher (Is 1 8; cf. II S 11 11; Jn 4 5 ff.), or for cattle (Gn 33 19).

II. The Houses of the More Civilized Period.

When the Israelites passed from the nomadic to the agricultural mode of life they came to erect permanent houses—bayith—in which work the Canaanites were their teachers. In Palestine, as everywhere, the manner in which houses are constructed is dependent on the character of the climate and land. As far as the former is concerned, inasmuch as the houses were not constructed to protect from the cold, but to furnish covering from sun and rain, there are required, on the one hand, cool cellar-like rooms, and, on the other, a light, airy structure, inasmuch as the climate permits constant abode in the open air. The peasants use houses simply to protect them from the cool of the night while sleeping, or in order to enjoy their meals undisturbed by others, or to entertain friends, etc. It is the same with the townsmen. They love the outdoor life much more than Westerners do. In ancient times artisan work was carried on in houses as little as it is at present. It was conducted either on the streets or in special booths, which were situated in definitely fixed quarters in the city, where similar crafts were near one another, as is the case with the Oriental bazaars of to-day.

3. Structure Conditioned by Climate.

The character of the land influenced the style of building to the extent at least of limiting the material to that which the land could furnish. High forests never existed in Palestine; consequently, there was no long timber at hand for building purposes, and in ordinary houses the use of wood was greatly limited. For such woodwork as was indispensable the sycamore, shiqmāh, was used (I K 10 27; Is 9 9). For large and costly buildings, where long timbers were needed, resort was had to imported lumber, such as cedar, 'erez (I K 7 2 f.; Jer 22 14); and cypress, bᵉrōsh (I K 9 11 f.), and olive, zayith, were used but seldom, and then only to a limited extent, e.g., for doors, windows, and similar purposes. In a hilly country like Palestine there is no scarcity of good building stone. The white limestone can be quarried easily, and, as it is not hard, can be worked with no difficulty. In the lowlands houses were constructed of sun-dried brick, lᵉbhēnāh, though occasionally the bricks were burned.

4. Structure Conditioned by the Material at Hand.

As the conditions of life in Palestine have remained practically the same for centuries, the method of building houses was not different in ancient times from what it is at present. The prosperous fellahīn in the hill-country and in well-situated towns build for themselves vaulted houses of more or less finely hewn stone. Such buildings are either founded upon the native rock, or the foundation is sunk into the earth to a depth about equal to the height of the building. The violent winter rains would soon make an end of a house not well founded (cf. Mt 7 24-29). The dwellings consist of large rooms, with high ceilings, and surrounded by thick walls. The roof arches rest upon strong, massive pillars. In case of inability to procure the material for such a vaulted building, there is erected a square structure with walls of small stones held together with mortar or clay. These walls are roofed over with poles, branches, and brush, over which is stamped down a layer of soil about a foot thick. The houses in the lowlands, built of soft clay, are naturally very frail and liable to destruction. Even at the present time it can be noticed how quickly whole villages, when deserted, completely disappear, leaving no trace of their former existence.

6. Details of Structure.

(a) On the inner side the walls were often plastered or whitewashed, tāphel (Ezk 13 10 ff., 22 28). Sometimes they were also painted with vermilion, shāshar (Jer 22 14). More expensive buildings were adorned with artistically carved panelings (I K 7 7; cf. ceiled Jer 22 14; Hag 1 4), decorated with ivory (I K 22 39; Am 3 15), gold, silver, or precious stones (I Ch 29 2 ff.). (b) The floor was simply a layer of clay, or plaster, which, in the more costly houses, was overlaid with boards (I K 6 15), or with marble and other expensive stones (Est 1 6). The floors were covered with rugs, or, in the case of the poor, with mats of straw, on which one might tread only without sandals. (c) The ordinary house of the common people consisted of one large room divided into two parts, of which one was somewhat higher than the other. This served as a living-place for the family, while the other was occupied by the animals, which in a sense were counted as a part of the family of the fellahīn. In case a man had extensive herds, he had special stables for them. In the towns also the partition of the dwelling did not obtain. (d) The roof of the house, which had to be repaired annually before the beginning of winter, was a favorite resort for purposes of evening recreation (cf. II S 11 2), or for private conversation (I S 9 25), or for lamentation (Is 15 3; Jer 48 38). From such frequent use of the roof we get the reason for the common law in Dt 22 8, that roofs should be provided with a battlement. But in spite of this, one could easily leap from one roof to another, so that it was possible in this manner to go the length of whole streets (cf. Mk 13 15, and Jos. Ant. XIII, 5 3). Houses of the well-to-do were often provided with a superstructure on the roof, 'ălīyyāh, used as a sleeping-, guest-, or sick-chamber (I K 17 19; II K 4 10 f.). Here also one went for prayer (II K 23 12; Tob 3 10; Dn 6 11; cf. Ac 10 9). This usually had two places of exit, one leading to the lower chamber, the other directly to the street (cf. Mk 2 4). (e) Houses of more than one story were certainly very rare. According to I K 7 2 ff. Solomon's arsenal ("house of the forest of Lebanon"), which rested upon four rows of cedar pillars, was of three stories, as were also the side structures of the Temple (I K 6 5 ff.). (f) In most instances, as is the case to-day, the larger houses were probably four square (Job 1 19), enclosing a roomy court, αὐλή (Lk 22 55, "hall" AV), ḥātsēr (II S 17 18; Neh 8 16), surrounded with cloisters and galleries, paved, provided with a well (II S 17 18), and planted with trees. This court often served as a guest-chamber, or place for social intercourse. It was protected from the sun's rays by awnings (cf. Est 1 5 f., 5 1). (g) Very costly houses were adorned with marble pillars, 'ammūdhīm, not only within the court, but also externally (Song 5 15; cf. I K 7 15 ff.; II K 25 13). Larger houses had also a special fore-court (Jer 32 2), which served as an ante-chamber. At its door a keeper (sometimes a woman; cf. II S 4 6, LXX.; cf. Ac 12 13) had his station. From this fore-court stairs—often of costly wood (II Ch 9 11)—led to the roof and upper chambers. (h) The rear rooms, ḥedher, of the larger houses were reserved for the women (Jg 15 1; Song 1 4, 3 4). To these no man besides the head of the house had access. Here also were the sleeping-rooms (II S 4 7, 13 10; II K 11 2). Such a room is evidently referred to by the term "inner chamber" (closet AV), in Mt 6 6. (i) In the more elegant houses there were both summer and winter rooms, the situation of which was determined by the position of the sun. Winter rooms were heated by means of a brazier, 'āḥ (Jer 36 22), which to-day is made of fire-brick, and is placed in a depression in the middle of the room. In order to conserve the heat after the fire is burned out, a wooden frame is placed over the brazier and covered with a rug. (j) Windows, which were constructed only of latticework—(casement Pr 7 6 AV) (ḥallōn, 'side openings,' 'ărbāh, 'openings in the roof')—and served also for chimneys, in houses of to-day are formed almost wholly on the inner or court side, because of the dirt of the street. In ancient times, however, this was not the rule (cf. Jg 5 28; Pr 7 6). (k) Doors were sometimes of stone, as in the buildings in the Hauran, but usually of wood and somewhat low. Occasionally they were plated with bronze or gold (II Ch 4 9, 22). Such doors were provided above and below with bronze hinge-pivots, tsīr (Pr 26 14), which fitted into sockets, pōthōth (I K 7 50), in the stone threshold. Large doors had also several folding leaves, tselā'īm gelīlīm (I K 6 34). (l) In the door was fastened an iron ring for a knocker (Lk 12 36, 13 25; Ac 12 13), and a wooden bar, min'āl, man'ūl, and berīaḥ, which was pushed back from within. There were also others that by means of a key, likewise of wood, maphteḥ (Jg 3 25; Is 22 22), could be unfastened and pushed back from without. (m) According to Dt 6 9 (cf. 11 20) the door-post, me'zūzāh, was adorned with inscriptions, as, for example, Dt 6 4 ff., a custom that has spread all over the Mohammedan East. The same practise was also in vogue in ancient Egypt (see Wilkinson, Manners and Customs, etc., vol. ii, pp. 102, 123). (n) From Ezr 3 10 f.; Job 38 6 it is evident that, in the case of a large building, the laying of the corner-stone (always one well selected for this purpose) was a festal occasion. Similarly, when the headstone was put in position (Zech 4 7), and the house was dedicated (I K 8 63; Ezr 6 16), there was a joyous celebration. Possibly I K 16 34 (cf. Jos 6 26) finds its explanation in some such ceremony. W N.

HOZAI, hō'za-ai (חוֹזַי, ḥōzay): A word taken as a proper noun by RV in II Ch 33 19. Perhaps the true reading is 'his seers' (חוֹזָיו). E. E. N.

HUKKOK, huk'kŏk (חוּקֹק, ḥūqōq): A town of Naphtali (Jos 19 34), Map I, E 4, though this identification is not certain. E. E. N.

HUL, hul. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

HULDAH, hul'dā (חֻלְדָּה, ḥuldāh): A prophetess of repute (II K 22 14; II Ch 34 22), the wife of Shallum, the keeper of the wardrobe. King Josiah sent Hilkiah, the priest, to her to inquire about the law-book which had been found in the Temple. C. S. T.

HUMTAH, hum'tā (חֻמְטָה, ḥumṭāh): A city of Judah, near Hebron (Jos 15 54). Site uncertain. E. E. N.

HUNTING: The references to hunting are not numerous in the O T. While the Hebrews, in their nomadic period, were doubtless accustomed to the chase (cf. the story of Esau, Gn 25 27, 27 3 ff.), after their settlement in Canaan comparatively less attention was given to hunting, either as a profession or as a pastime. No national hero is spoken of as a hunter. Yet this sport was not entirely unknown. The old word tsīdh (from tsūdh, 'to hunt') meant not only venison (Gn 27 3), but was also used for "victuals," a "provision" in general (Jos 9 5, 14; Jg 7 8; Neh 13 15, etc.). The Law provided that animals taken in hunting should be properly killed (Lv 17 13). The wild animals allowed to be eaten in Dt ch. 14, such as the gazel, roebuck, wild goat, etc., could be taken only in the chase, and I K 4 23 shows that wild meat was not unknown on the royal table. The more dangerous pursuits, such as lion-hunting, a favorite pastime of the Assyrian kings, are not mentioned in the O T, though indirectly the hunting of the hippopotamus may be referred to in Job 41 26-29. The hunter made use not only of ordinary weapons, such as the bow and arrows (Gn 27 3), the sword, spear, and club (Job 41 26 ff.), but of nets, snares, and traps of various kinds, with which to catch both birds and quadrupeds. Several kinds of nets are mentioned, as the ḥērem (Mic 7 2; Hab 1 15), the mikhmār (large enough to catch an antelope, Is 51 20), and the resheth (the nature of which can be inferred from Job 18 8; Ps 9 15, 10 9, 140 5; Pr 1 17; Ezk 12 13, etc.). The exact meaning of the terms rendered snare and gin is uncertain; mōqesh perhaps means a noose, while paḥ refers to bird-traps, probably of various kinds (Ps 124 7; Pr 7 23; Am 3 5, etc.). In Job 18 10 ḥebhel ('cord'), rendered noose in RV, and malkhōdheth, trap (from lākhadh, 'to take'), both refer to some kind of snare. Fowler in Heb. is yāqūsh (Ps 91 3, 124 7; Pr 6 5; Hos 9 8; and cf. the foregoing mōqesh). Animals were often caught also in pits (cf. II S 23 20; Ps 35 7), which was perhaps the method mainly used for the more dangerous animals. Consult Driver in Camb. Bible, Joel and Amos, p. 157, and A. R. S. Kennedy in EB, article Fowl. E. HUPHAM, hiū'fam, HUPHAMITE, hiū'fam-ait. See HUPPIM.

HUPPAH, hup'ā (חֻפָּה, ḥuppāh): The ancestral head of the thirteenth course of priests (I Ch 24 13). E. E. N.

HUPPIM, hup'im (חֻפִּים, ḥuppīm): The ancestral head of one of the clans of Benjamin (Gn 46 21; I Ch 7 12, 15), the Huphamites (Nu 26 39, where the name is Hupham). E. E. N.

HUR, hūr (חוּר, ḥūr), 'noble' (?): 1. An Israelite associated with Aaron in supporting Moses at Rephidim (Ex 17 10, 12) and in the oversight of the people during Moses' absence in the Mount (Ex 24 14). According to Josephus (Ant. III, 2 4, 6, 8 1) he was the husband of Miriam. 2. The father of Caleb (I Ch 2 50; probably I Ch 4 1 refers to the same). 3. A son of Caleb and the grandfather of Bezaleel (Ex 31 2; I Ch 2 19). According to Josephus the same as 1. 4. A king of Midian (Nu 31 8; Jos 13 21). 5. An officer under Solomon (I K 4 8). 6. The father of Rephaiah, prominent in Jerusalem at the restoration (Neh 3 9). HUSBAND AND WIFE. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 4 f., and also under MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

HUSBANDMAN: An old English word meaning literally 'master of the house,' and used to translate (1) 'ikkār, 'tiller of the soil' (II Ch 26 10; Jer 31 24, etc.). From Am 5 16 we would infer that such persons were often asked to take the part of professional mourners. (2) 'īsh 'ădhāmāh, 'man of the soil' (Gn 9 21). (3) γεωργός, 'cultivator of the ground,' a term of general significance. In II K 25 12 the text is uncertain and in Zec 13 5 RV gives the correct rendering. E. E. N.

HUSBAND'S BROTHER. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, § 6.

HUSHAH, hiū'shā (חוּשָׁה, ḥūshāh): Probably the name of a place in Judah, whence came Sibbecai (q.v.) the Hushathite, one of David's heroes (I Ch 4 4, "Shuhah" in ver. 11; II S 21 18, 23 27; I Ch 11 29, etc.). E. E. N.

HUSHAI, hiū'sha-ai or hiū'shê (חוּשַׁי, ḥūshay): An Archite and loyal friend of David, who used him as a spy in the court of Absalom to defeat the counsel of Ahithophel (II S 15 32–17 23; I Ch 27 33). Probably he was the father of Baana (I K 4 16). C. S. T.

HUSHAM, hiū'sham (חוּשָׁם, ḥūshām): A king of Edom (Gn 36 34 f.). See also CUSHAN RISHATHAIM. E. E. N.

HUSHATHITE, hiū'shath-ait. See HUSHAH.

HUSHIM, hiū'shim (חוּשִׁים, חֻשִׁים, and חֻשָׁם, ḥūshīm): 1. The ancestral head of a clan of Dan (Gn 46 23, called Shuham [and the clan, Shuhamites] in Nu 26 42). 2. A son of Aher (I Ch 7 12). 3. A 'wife' of Shaharaim in a Benjamite genealogy; probably the name of a clan or place (I Ch 8 8). E. E. N.

HUSKS. See FOOD, § 5.

HUZZAB, huz'ab (הֻצַּב, hutstsabh): A word (Nah 2 7 [8]) of uncertain derivation and meaning. RV translates "it is decreed." Many find here the name or title of an Assyrian queen (RVmg.). C. S. T.

HYENA. See PALESTINE, § 24.

HYMENÆUS, hai''mę-nî'us (Ὑμέναιος): An unknown man (associated in I Ti 1 20 with Alexander and in II Ti 2 17 with Philetus), who without conscience spoke falsely of the sacred truths of the gospel and "made shipwreck of the faith." At the time of writing I Ti Paul hoped that severe chastisement might prove salutary (cf. a similar case in I Co 5 5), though it did not, for at the time of II Ti Hymenæus still represented a deadly error that was eating insidiously into the life of the Church. R. A. F.

HYMN. See HALLELUJAH, MUSIC, § 7, and PRAISE.

HYPOCRITE, HYPOCRISY, HYPOCRITICAL (Gr. terms from ὑποκρίνομαι, lit. 'to answer,' then applied to actors on the stage and thus coming to mean 'dissimulation,' 'hypocrisy'): In the O T the RV everywhere changes these terms to 'profane' or 'godless,' the real meaning of the Heb. ḥānēph. They occur in the LXX. only in Job 34 30, 36 13, but are more common in other Gr. versions of the O T, always in the sense of 'godless' or 'profane.' In the N T the words are confined almost entirely to the Synoptic Gospels, Jesus thereby characterizing the Pharisees apparently as a class that pretend to a piety which they do not really possess. The O T (LXX.) meaning is rare (Mt 24 51; cf. I P 2 1); the classical sense of 'actor' does not occur (unless in Mt 6 1 f.). R. A. F.

HYSSOP (אֵזוֹב, 'ēzōbh): A plant described in I K 4 33 as one "that springeth out of the wall." It was used in the Passover service, a bunch of it being dipped in the blood of the sacrificial animal, and applied to the lintel (Ex 12 22); also in other ceremonials involving purification (Lv 14 6, 48; Nu 19 6; Ps 51 7; He 9 19). The precise species of plant meant has been a matter of extensive debate. Of the proposed identifications, two only are worthy of special mention. Royle and Tristram regard it as the caper plant, a bright-green creeper, to be found plentifully in Bible lands. The main strength of this identification is that it explains Jn 19 29, where "hyssop" is used apparently as the equivalent of "reed" in Mt 27 48 and Mk 15 36; for a reed may be secured from the stalk of the caper plant long enough to be used as indicated. The theory, however, is not entirely satisfactory. The caper plant is not suitable for sprinkling. The etymology of the word, too, points to a different source. Hence G. E. Post proposes the Arabic ṣa'tar (Origanum maru, L.), which in other respects suits all the descriptions much better. But if this view be adopted, the hyssop of Jn 19 29 must be regarded as the leaves and fruit mixed in pulverized form with the wine, and not identical with the "reed" of the Synoptists. A. C. Z.

IBHAR, ib'har (יִבְחָר, yibhḥār), 'He [J"] chooses': A son of David (II S 5 15; I Ch 3 6, 14 5). E. E. N.

IBLEAM, ib'lę-am (יִבְלְעָם, yibhle'ām): A Canaanite town, assigned to either Asher or Issachar, but actually held by Manasseh, though not in the earliest period of the Conquest (Jos 17 11; Jg 1 27). In or near Ibleam Ahaziah, King of Judah (II K 9 27), and perhaps also Zachariah, King of Israel (II K 15 10 according to LXX.), were slain. It is called Bileam in I Ch 6 70. Map IV, D 8. See also GATH-RIMMON. E. E. N.

IBNEIAH, ib-nî'yā or ib''nę-ai'ā (יִבְנְיָה, yibhn'yāh), 'J" builds': The head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 9 8). E. E. N.

IBNIJAH, ib-nai'jā (יִבְנִיָּה, yibhniyyāh), 'J" builds': The ancestor of the preceding Ibneiah (I Ch 9 8). E. E. N.

IBRI, ib'rai (עִבְרִי, 'ibhrī): A Merarite Levite (I Ch 24 27). E. E. N.

IBSAM, ib'sam (יִבְשָׂם, yibhsām, Jibsam AV): The ancestral head of a family of Issachar (I Ch 7 2). E. E. N.

IBZAN, ib'zan (אִבְצָן, 'ibhtsān): A minor judge of Israel from Bethlehem (Jg 12 8, 10) of Zebulun (Jos 19 15), a town 7 m. NW. of Nazareth. He was the head of a large family or clan. C. S. T.

ICHABOD, ic'a-bod (אִי־כָבוֹד, 'ī khābhōdh), 'no glory': The son of the priest Phineas, born on the occasion of the capture of the Ark (I S 4 21, 14 3). 'Alas,' or 'wo as to the glory' is suggested by the LXX. as the meaning of the name. E. E. N.

ICONIUM, ai-cō'ni-um (Ἰκόνιον): A town mentioned by Xenophon as a border-town of Phrygia, by Cicero as the capital of Lycaonia, which latter position was certainly held by it under the Diadochi and the Romans. It was situated in what is practically an oasis in the great elevated (3,320 ft.), waterless plain of Lycaonia (q.v.), being surrounded by a country producing excellent crops of wheat and flax. I. owed its importance to its situation at the crossing of trade-routes, several of which intersect here.

The history of Iconium is the same as that of the kingdom and province of Galatia (see Asia Minor, § 6), in which it was situated until after the times of Paul. Under Hadrian, I. became a Roman colonia and the capital of Lycaonia. I., with Lystra, was visited by Paul, whose preaching was startlingly successful. He made many converts (among others, Timothy and also St. Thecla), but the resident nationalist Jews compelled him to leave (Ac 14 1-6). He returned later (Ac 16 1-5). The real historical importance of I. dates from the times of the Seljuk sultans, enlightened rulers, who embellished the city, surrounded it with strong and lofty walls, constructed palaces, mosques, medresses, khans, etc. The walls of I. were faced with ancient stones, often containing inscriptions, architectural fragments, and works of sculpture, while the space between the facings was filled with mud. After the destruction of I. in 1832 the stone facings were utilized to build a new city, thus exposing the intaglio impressions of inscriptions, etc., almost the only remains of Græco-Roman Iconium. J. R. S. S.

IDALAH, id'a-lā (יִדְאָלָה, yidh'ālāh): A town of Zebulun (Jos 19 15), about 2 m. S. of Bethlehem of Zebulun. Map IV, C 7. E. E. N.

IDBASH, id'bash (יִדְבָּשׁ, yidhbāsh): The name of a small clan of Judah (I Ch 4 3). E. E. N.

IDDO, id'do: The Eng. equivalent of several Heb. names: 1 (עִדּוֹ, 'iddō'). (a) The father of Ahinadab (I K 4 14). (b) A Levite (I Ch 6 21, "Adaiah" in ver. 41). 2 (יְעוֹ, ye'dō, and עִדּוֹ, 'iddō). A prophet, or seer, who wrote accounts of the reigns of Rehoboam, Jeroboam, and Abijah (II Ch 9 29, 12 15, 13 22). 3 (עִדּוֹ, 'iddō, and עִדּוֹא, 'iddō'). (a) The grandfather of the prophet Zechariah (Zec 1 1, 7; Ezr 5 1, 6 14). (b) The ancestral head of a post-exilic family (Neh 12 4, 16). 4 (אִדּוֹ, 'iddō). The head of a community of Nethinim at Casiphia (Ezr 8 17). 5 (יִדּוֹ, yiddō). (a) Chief of the Manassites in Gilead under David (I Ch 27 21). (b) One who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 43; Jadan AV). E. E. N.

IIM, ai'im (עִיִּים, 'iyyīm), 'ruins': A town in Judah near Edom (Jos 15 29). Site uncertain. See also Iye-abarim. E. E. N.

IJE-ABARIM, ai"jẹ-ab'a-rim. See Iye-abarim.

IJON, ai'jon (עִיּוֹן, 'iyyōn): A town in the extreme N. of Israel, somewhere near Dan and Abel-beth-maacah (I K 15 20; II K 15 29). It was depopulated by Tiglath-pileser, c. 734 (II K 15 29). Site not certainly known. E. E. N.

IKKESH, ik'kesh (עִקֵּשׁ, 'iqqēsh): The father of Ira, one of David's heroes (II S 23 26; I Ch 11 28, 27 9). E. E. N.

ILAI, ai'la-ai or ai'lê (עֵילַי, 'īlay): One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 29, called Zalmon in II S 23 28). E. E. N.

ILLYRICUM, il-lîr'i-cum (Ἰλλυρικόν): The Roman name of the province on the Adriatic, N. of Macedonia and W of Thrace. Its southern portion was called Dalmatia, a name which during the Apostolic Age was extended to denote the whole province. By Greeks the term Illyria was applied to parts of Macedonia. The province, inhospitable and mountainous, "separates, rather than connects, Italy and Greece" (Mommsen). At the same time it contained important cities. In Ro 15 19 "Illyricum" very probably means the Roman province, but whether Paul evangelized it can not be determined by this verse, some holding that his statement indicates merely the limit up to which his labors reached. (See Sanday and Headlam on Romans in Int. Crit. Com.). R. A. F.

IMLA, im'la, IMLAH, im'lā (יִמְלָא, יִמְלָה, yimlā', yimlāh), 'he fills': The father of the prophet Micaiah (I K 22 8 f.; II Ch 18 7 f.). E. E. N.

IMMANUEL, im-man'yu-el (עִמָּנוּ אֵל, 'immānū-'ēl), 'God with us'; also Emmanuel, Mt 1 23 AV: The symbolical name given to the child whose birth was promised as a sign of safety to Ahaz by the prophet Isaiah (7 14), and used again in 8 8, 10, not, however, as the name of an individual, but in its literal sense (in 8 8 the text, "thy land [אַרְצְךָ], O Immanuel," is probably corrupt, the final ך standing for כִּי; 'because'; so emended, the verse should read: "And the stretching out of his wings shall fill the breadth of the land because God is with us").

In Mt 1 23, the Virgin Mary is identified with the mother of Immanuel, and Jesus Christ with Immanuel himself. The question has been raised whether this identification was in the mind of Isaiah himself, or made by the evangelist erroneously, or by way of appropriating the words of an ancient oracle as suitable to his purpose, but not with the intention of committing their original author to his interpretation of them. The difficulties in the way of taking it to be the primary intention of Isaiah to foretell the virgin birth of Jesus are insuperable. The design of his employing the phraseology he does is so palpably fulfilled in the circumstances of his own day that as remote a reference as this to the birth of Jesus seems exegetically impossible. On the other hand, all interpretations which find in the reference to Immanuel a double sense, i.e., a first intention to speak of a child that might be born in his own days and a secondary one to predict the virgin birth of Jesus, are artificial and arbitrary. They have the appearance of ingenious devices to escape a difficulty rather than natural explanations of the facts of the case. The only admissible view, as far as the intention of Isaiah is concerned, is that he had in mind a child born in his own days, whose birth would be symbolical of the Divine favor displayed in such manifest power as to assure His people that God was with them. But if this was Isaiah's thought, the use of the passage by Matthew must be either the result of misunderstanding of the prophet's meaning, or the appropriation of his words as a formula in which the virgin birth of the Savior might felicitously be embodied. If the alternative be drawn sharply between these two views, the second would be by far preferable. But it is quite possible to suppose that the evangelist, without definitely putting the question to himself (as a historian and critic might do) whether Jesus was the child predicted by Isaiah in his oracle, did still discern in the birth of the Savior the fulfilment of the hopes roused by the promise of God's presence with and among His people, and expressed this thought in a vague appropriation of the prophecy to the event he was narrating. Such an appropriation would not be correct, judged by standards of modern literary and historical usage; but it would not depart very far from the ideas of what was regarded as perfectly proper at the time that the citation was made.

IMMER, im'ẽr (אִמֵּר, 'immēr): I. 1. The ancestral head of the sixteenth course of priests, which constituted a large priestly family in post-exilic days (I Ch 9 12, 24 14; Ezr 2 37, 10 20; Neh 7 40, 11 13). 2. A priest, the father of Pashhur (Jer 20 1). It is quite possible that 1 and 2 are identical. 3. The father of a certain Zadok (Neh 3 29).

IMMORTALITY. See ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 14–22, 37–39, 42 f., 49.

IMNA, im'na (יִמְנָע, yimnā'): The ancestral head of a family of Asher (I Ch 7 35). E. E. N.

IMNAH, im'nā (יִמְנָה, yimnāh): 1. The ancestral head of one of the clans of Asher (Gn 46 17; Jimnah AV; the Imnites, Nu 26 44, Jimnites AV; I Ch 7 30). 2. A Levite (II Ch 31 14). E. E. N.

IMRAH, im'rā (יִמְרָה, yimrāh): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 36). E. E. N.

IMRI, im'rai (אִמְרִי, 'imrī): 1. A descendant of Judah (I Ch 9 4). 2. The father of Zaccur (Neh 3 2). E. E. N.

INCENSE. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 15.

INCEST. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (c).

INDIA, in'di-a (הֹדּוּ, hōddū): The only reference to I. in the Bible is in Est 1 1, 8 9, where it figures as one of the extreme limits of the empire over which the Persian king held sway. How much of the modern Indian world was covered by it in this connection is unknown. The term Hoddū was introduced into the Semitic language by way of the Persian Hindoo. It is highly probable, however, that though the country was not clearly known, its wares were imported and used among the Hebrews in comparatively early days. A. C. Z.

INDITE: The word rendered "inditing" in Ps 45 1 AV is rāḥash, 'to be agitated,' and the idea is, "my heart is moved, or stirred, with a good matter" (cf. RV). E. E. N.

INFIDEL: This word occurs twice in AV as a rendering of ἄπιστος, for which RV gives "unbeliever" (II Co 6 15; I Ti 5 8). The unbelief Paul had in mind was not atheism, but the rejection of, or disbelief in, Christianity. E. E. N.

INK, INKHORN. See BOOKS AND WRITING, § 4.

INN: (1) The AV rendering of mālōn in Gn 42 27, 43 21, and Ex 4 24, which is rendered more accurately in RV by "lodging-place," since the reference is to a mere stopping-place for the night, not to an extensive or elaborate khān, or caravanserai. Such "lodging-places," probably located near springs, and consisting of a rude hut, or shelter of some sort, would be found on the caravan roads through uninhabited regions. (2) κατάλυμα, rendered "guest-chamber" in Mk 14 14 and Lk 22 11, is rendered "inn" in Lk 2 7, although it is by no means certain that a public lodging-house is meant. Joseph may have relied upon the hospitality of some acquaintance to place his "guest-chamber" at his disposal. (3) πανδοκίον (or πανδοχεῖον, from πας-δέχεσθαι, 'to receive every one') in Lk 10 34 is properly an "inn," corresponding to the modern khān, the innkeeper being called the πανδοχεύς. For an extended description of a modern khān see the articles on Inn in HDB and EB. See also Hospitality. E. E. N.

INSTRUCT, INSTRUCTION. See Church Life and Organization, § 6, and Education, § 5.

INSTRUMENT: The Heb. kĕlī ('vessel,' 'implement,' etc.) was frequently translated "instrument" in AV in places where a more specific term might have been chosen. In most of such cases RV has given more appropriate renderings (cf. Gn 49 5; Ex 25 9, etc.). In Ro 6 13 the Gr. ὅπλα means 'weapons.' For musical instruments see Music and Musical Instruments, § 3. E. E. N.

INSTRUMENTS OF WAR. See Arms and Armor.

INTERCESSION: In the O T the Heb. פָּגַע, pāga' (both qal and hiphil), 'to meet,' 'fall in with,' is used in the sense of interceding (Jer 7 16, 27 18, 36 25; Is 53 12, 59 16). In the N T we have the terms ἐντυγχάνειν (Ro 8 27, 34, 11 2; He 7 25) and ὑπερεντυγχάνειν (Ro 8 26), and although these words are not used in the related passages in the LXX., they correspond exactly to the Heb. pāga'. 'To meet' some one for the sake of another is to 'intercede' for the latter. E. E. N.

INTERDICT. See Decree.

INTERPRETATION: The necessity for interpretation arises whenever means for the expression of thought either are by nature, or become through lapse of time and through change, clouded and beset by obscurities. The interpreter's task in each case is to remove the obscurity, and let the thought intended to be expressed appear as fully and clearly as originally designed. In Biblical usage interpretation is always mentioned in connection with obscurities naturally inherent, and not with those which arise because of changed conditions. Interpretations are needed of utterances in unknown languages (Gn 42 23; II K 18 26, 28; μεθερμηνεύειν, Mt 1 23, etc.; cf. ἑρμηνεία, I Co 12 10, 30, 14 5, 13, 26-28, of "tongues"); of dreams (Gn 40 5, 8, etc.; Dn 2 4 ff.), of symbolism in visions (Dn 7 16 ff.; cf. 9 20 ff.), and of prophecy (II P 1 20). See also Church Life and Organization, § 7. A. C. Z.

INWARD PART: The rendering of (1) ḥedher, 'a secret place or chamber,' used metaphorically of the human motives or feelings (Pr 20 27, 30). (2) qerebh and ἔσωθεν, expressing the idea of 'being within,' 'in the middle,' or 'in the midst,' hence often used of the heart as the seat of emotion and determination (Ps 5 9, 49 11; Is 16 11; Jer 31 33; Lk 11 39; cf. Ps 62 4; Mt 7 15). The term ṭūḥōth (Job 38 36; Ps 51 6) is of uncertain meaning. E. E. N.

INWARDS. See Sacrifice and Offerings, §§ 6–10.

IOB, yōb (יוֹב, yōbh): The ancestral head of one of the clans of Issachar (Gn 47 13, Job AV), called "Jashub" in Nu 26 24, and I Ch 7 1. E. E. N.

IPHDEIAH, if-dî'yā (יִפְדְּיָה, yiphdᵉyāh, Iphedeiah AV), 'J" redeems': A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 25). E. E. N.

IPHTAH, if'tā (יִפְתָּח, yiphtāḥ, Jiphtah AV), 'he opens': A town of Judah, somewhere near Libnah (Jos 15 43). Site unknown. E. E. N.

IPHTAH-EL, if'tā-el" (יִפְתַח־אֵל, yiphtaḥ'ēl, Jiphtael AV), 'God opens': A valley on the boundary between Zebulun and Asher (Jos 19 14, 27). Probably the valley near Jotapata. See Map IV, C 6. E. E. N.

IR, ẹr (עִיר, 'īr, 'watcher'), IRI, ai'rai (עִירִי, 'īrī, 'my watcher'): The ancestral head of a clan of Benjamin (I Ch 7 7, 12). E. E. N.

IRA, ai'ra (עִירָא, 'īrā'): 1. A chief minister, or priest, in the time of David (II S 20 26). In the parallel list (II S 8 18) two sons of David are named in the place of Ira. 2. An Ithrite, one of David's heroes (II S 23 38; I Ch 11 40). 3. A son of Ikkesh, a Tekoite, also one of David's heroes (II S 23 26; I Ch 11 28, 27 9), and captain for the sixth month. It is possible that 1 is identical with 2 or 3. C. S. T.

IRAD, ai'rad (עִירָד, 'īrādh): The son of Enoch, in the genealogical table of J (Gn 4 18); cf. "Jared" in the table of P (5 16 f.). E. E. N.

IRAM, ai'ram (עִירָם, 'īrām): A "duke" ('clan chieftain') of Edom (Gn 36 43; I Ch 1 54). E. E. N.

IRI, ai'rai. See Ir.

IRIJAH, ai-rai'jā (יִרְאִיָּה, yir'īyāh), 'J" sees': The official who arrested Jeremiah at the time of the siege of Jerusalem (Jer 37 13, 14). E. E. N.

IR-NAHASH, ir"-nê'hash (עִיר־נָחָשׁ, 'īr nāḥāsh), 'serpent city,' but Nahash may be a pr. n. and "city of N." the correct reading: A place referred to in I Ch 4 12. The text may be corrupt and we may read (with the LXX.) "the city of N., the brother of the Kenezzite." The passage well illustrates the tendency to personify places by the genealogists. Site unknown. E. E. N.

IRON, ai'rən (יִרְאוֹן, yir'ōn): I. A city of Naphtali (Jos 19 38). Map IV, D 5. II. See METALS, § 3. E. E. N.

IR-PEEL, ir'-pē-el (יִרְפְּעֵל, yirpᵉ'ēl), 'God heals': A city of Benjamin (Jos 18 27). Site uncertain. E. E. N.

IR-SHEMESH, ir''-shî'mesh (עִיר־שֶׁמֶשׁ, 'īr shemesh), 'city of the sun': A city of Dan (Jos 19 41). See BETH-SHEMESH. E. E. N.

IRU, ai'ru (עִירוּ, 'īrū): A Calebite clan (I Ch 4 15). E. E. N.

ISAAC, ai'zac (יִצְחָק, yitsḥāq, יִשְׁחָק, yisḥāq), 'laughter,' so named from the circumstances of his birth (Gn 17 17, 18 12, 21 6): The only son of Abraham and Sarah and the "child of promise," through whom the covenant line was to be continued. His weaning-feast was the occasion for the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael (Gn ch. 21). Abraham's faith received its supreme test in the command to sacrifice I. (Gn ch. 22). Rebekah was brought from Mesopotamia to be his wife (Gn ch. 24). His family life and the dissensions of his sons are told in Gn 25 19–28 9. He died at the age of 180 years, and was buried by his sons in the cave on the field of Machpelah (Gn 35 28 f.; cf. 49 29-31). His name as a race-father occurs in oft-recurring patriarchal formulas, and by itself in Am 7 9, 16. As if to counterbalance the paucity of the narrative, his character has been highly praised by Jewish and Christian expositors.

An analysis of the chapters relating to him reveals two strata of presentation, one of which might be called personal, the other racial. The tendency of critics at the present day is to resolve the patriarchs into eponymous heroes, or personified tribes. This is undoubtedly greatly overdone, and shows a lack of perspective as great on one side as the defense of absolute historicity involves on the other. The personal narratives are those concerning his sacrifice and the blessings of his sons. Each is involved with the trials and experiences of greater characters. The former has its dénouement in the triumph of Abraham's faith. The latter explains how Jacob became so great and won the preeminence over his more favored brother. In both instances Isaac is a subsidiary figure.

The racial stories are those which record the struggles of the Hebrew clans with the neighboring races in the SW.; the strife for pasture land, and the dangers which the women of the tribes might undergo are the moving factors in the life of the Hebrews when Esau and Jacob dwelt together, jealous of one another's prerogatives, and held to temporary community of interest by the need of united front when the aborigines shut them out from water rights in the hard-won oases. It is a picture of a land punctuated with wells whose waters are often embittered with strife that we see, and yet a ripple of laughter runs through it all—of tribesmen who could stop in the midst of their bickerings to jest with destiny, or to sport even under the eye of the traditional foe. Isaac occupied but a corner of the land, and vanished from that as his more sturdy sons swept away into the rocky fastnesses of the desert, or seized with prescient faith the fertile plains of Palestine. The name Isaiah (יְשַׁעְיָהוּ, yᵉsha'yāhū) is of interest from more than one point of view. It was borne by many (cf. I Ch 25 3, etc.), but

1. Name. of these only one is designated by the full form yᵉsha'yāhū, while the others bear the abbreviated form (yᵉsha'yāh [Jeshaiah], I Ch 3 21, etc.). Of more importance is the meaning of the name. It is derived from yᵉsha' ('salvation') and yāhū, a shortened form of Jehovah, and these two parts properly stand related to each other as subject and predicate. This is true of other compound names, e.g., Abiram, 'my father is exalted' (Nu 16 1, etc.; cf. König, Neueste Princip. d. Alttestamentlichen Kritik, 1902, pp. 66 ff.). Hence yᵉsha'yāhū means 'Jehovah is salvation,' or, 'the source of salvation.' Accordingly, the man I. was, even through his name, a living symbol of the confession that the God of Israel, rather than Baal, was the source of salvation for man. This is evidence of the deeply religious sense of his family, for this name was probably given him by his father, 'Āmōts ("Amoz," Is 1 1).

An important question has been raised recently as to whether I. was a poet. (1) This question is

2. Character of His Work. due to the growing tendency to change the earlier theory that the O T contains poems into the newer view that it consists of poems. Duhm, for example, resolves the whole of ch. 1 into a poem (Com. on Is. 1902²). The truth is that I. has incorporated into his discourses certain "songs" (5 1, etc.; cf. König, Stilistik, etc., pp. 303 ff.). Further, like Amos and other authors, he has sometimes unconsciously slipped into the familiar rhythm of elegy, as, e.g., in the words, "Take a harp, go about the city, thou harlot, that hast been forgotten" (23 16). Again, his speeches, especially his fundamental statements, pass into the rhythm of poetically constructed utterance (the māshāl form, or 'sentence'; cf. the oracles of Balaam, Nu 23 7, etc.). The very first message which he brings from God (1 2b, 3, "I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me," etc.) possesses the highest degree of symmetry of parts. But further on, we meet phrases like this: "When you come to appear before me, who hath required this at your hand, to trample my courts?" etc. (1 12), in which there is too little symmetry to admit of their having been produced under the impulse to express himself in poetic form. The utterances of Isaiah should as a whole be called discourses.

(2) I. was a public speaker. He was a nābhī'

('prophet'), and this means 'one who makes declaration or announcement' (cf. Arab. naba'a, nuntiavit, in Nöldeke-Müller, Delectus Carminum Veterum Arabicorum, p. 216, or Assyr. nabû, 'to call,' 'announce,' 'command,' Delitzsch, Assyr. WB, p. 440). But nābhī' is more particularly a 'speaker' in the realm of man's highest interests, i.e., of religion, consequently the interpreter of the deity or 'his mouth,' as Aaron was to be "the mouth" of Moses (Ex 4 16), or his nābhī' (Ex 7 1). I. by implication calls himself such an interpreter of God, when he names his wife "the prophetess" (8 3), and when he designates himself as "the mouth" of God (30 2). I.'s discourses were remarkable. Whether one looks at the general arrangement (cf., e.g., ch. 1) or the artistic working over of details, there is everywhere in his addresses the same perfection. The same art which is evinced in the complete discourses is disclosed also in the formation of sentences, and in the choice of individual expressions. His periods are finely rounded off (e.g., 1 12, 3 6 f., 8 6-8, 29 3 f.). His metaphors are full of artistic splendor. Note his use of darkness and light as pictures of distress and bliss (5 30, 8 22 f., 9 1, etc.); or his comparison of the hosts of the enemy with floods of water (8 7 f., 28 17b, etc.). His antitheses are sharp, as in 3 24, where the words "branding instead of beauty" are most effective. His use of assonance is brilliant, as, e.g., in the original of 5 7: "He looked for justice (tsᵉdhāqāh), but, behold! oppression" (tsᵉʿāqāh) (cf. also 17 12, etc.). The forceful compactness of his style, as contrasted with Ezekiel's, was famed as early as the time of the Talmud (Bab. Chagiga, 13a), where I. is compared to a man of the city and Ezekiel to a villager. It is no wonder that Jerome likened him to Demosthenes.

This nābhī' was (1) no soothsayer. Many in Israel had indeed yielded to various kinds of divination. The O T historians were too truthful

3. His Inspiration. to conceal these wrong practises, but they record also that the true religion of Israel had nothing to do with them (Nu 23 23). I. expressly condemned the seeking after departed ("familiar") spirits (8 19; cf. 3 2, 29 4). (2) I. was no advocate of a foreign civilization (2 6 [cf. the present writer's booklet, Die babylonische Gefangenschaft der Bibel, 1905, pp. 54 ff.]). Just as little was he a preacher of partizan opinions. There was a type of prophet of J" in Israel by whom the views and tendencies of dominant parties were represented. These were the prophets whom I. denounces as false leaders of his people (3 2), "teachers of lies" (9 15), "friends of wine" (28 7). Such persons, whom he ironically calls "the prophets" and "the wise men" of the people (29 10, 14), held that the long-suffering of God was inexhaustible (5 19), and cried "peace" where there was no peace (cf. Jer 6 14, etc.). They were actuated by material motives and prophesied for money (cf. Mic 3 5, 11). (3) I. belonged to the true prophets of Jehovah, who were conscious of being commissioned by the living God. They were convinced by an experience, which surpassed all other experiences, that they were entrusted with a religious mission (Am 7 15; Is 6 1 ff.). They knew that against this they had objected (6 5 ff.), and had been overruled only by the overpowering will of J" (Jer 20 7). They denied that they derived their special knowledge from nature, or from history, or from their human understanding. I. noted indeed that God teaches the farmer through the nature of things to observe the law of rotation in tilling the soil (28 24-29). But as regards his own knowledge he says, "I have heard from the Lord Jehovah of Hosts" (22b). He advised his contemporaries not to overlook the hand of God in history (5 12), but he himself foretold the future course of events (31 8; cf. 37 36). I. speaks of his consciousness of 'being moved by God's hand,' i.e., by a superhuman impulse (8 11), and of being the instrument of God's spirit (30 1 f.; cf. Mic 3 8). Before one rejects his claim, let him consider the prophet's overflowing words: "Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil," etc. "Woe unto them that are wise in their own eyes, and prudent in their own sight!" (5 20 f.) One who so boldly denounces sophistical perversions of moral ideas and speaks of the conceit and self-deception of others should not be charged with basing his own call on mere imagination. I. must have come into mysterious contact with the Divine Spirit behind the visible universe—the Spirit as a rule concealed from man. It is precisely the latest discoveries regarding the substances and forces of the universe that warn us against the opinion that all secrets have been fathomed and that there can be no Divine Spirit (Is 31 3; Jn 4 24).

Where I. exercised this prophetic function is briefly told. For every reference to his residence, either directly (7 3 ff., 37 2 ff.) or indirect-

4. Place and Time. ly (1 9 f., 8 18, etc.), points to Jerusalem. It is more difficult to fix the time of his activity, for O T chronology is full of difficulties. We know indeed that I. prophesied during the rule of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah (1 1), the record of whose reigns is given in II K chs. 15–20 and II Ch chs. 26–32. But the dates of these reigns can not be fixed with absolute precision. In general, the computations of Rost are correct (*KAT*³, pp. 319 ff.). According to these, Uzziah reigned from 790 to 739 and Jotham from 750 to 735, first as regent for his father, who was incapacitated by his leprosy (II K 15 5). Rost dates the reign of Ahaz from 735 to 720, but in that case Ahaz must have still been reigning at the time of the fall of Samaria (722). This event, however, took place under Hezekiah, according to II K 18 1, and the historian must have known under what king of Judah such a fearful catastrophe occurred. The reformation of Hezekiah was begun under the deep impressions produced by this calamity. It may be conjectured that the sixteen years assigned to Ahaz are due to the imitation of the number sixteen in the years of his predecessor; Hezekiah's reign may then be placed in the years 724–696. Further, the number fourteen (Is 36 1) may have arisen from twenty-four, since Manasseh is not included among the kings during whose reigns I. ministered, and the O T lends no support to the tradition that I. was put to death during the persecutions of the prophets under Manasseh (II K 21 16), and especially to the legend that he was sawn asunder (Ascens. Is. 5 11), and was thus one of the martrys of the faith referred to in He 11 37 (ἐπρίσθησαν).

5. Historical Setting.

(1) The General Political Situation at the Time in SW. Asia.—The contact of Israel and Assyria which, according to the cuneiform inscriptions, had begun in the years 854 (Ahab at the battle of Karkar) and 842 (Jehu specified as paying tribute), was in the days of I. quite close. To Assyria's lust of conquest a vigorous impulse had been given by the king, who at first was called Pulu ("Pul," II K 15 19), and later, Tiglath-pileser III (ver. 29), and who reigned from 745 to 727. From II K 15 19 we would infer that Tiglath-pileser came into the land of Israel c. 738. He was in Philistia in the year 734 (*KAT*³, p. 321), and in 732 captured Damascus. His aggressive policy was continued by Shalmaneser IV (727–722), who began the conquest of Samaria. His successor, Sargon (722–705), mentions the capture of the city as an event occurring in the first year of his own reign (Winckler, Gesch. Ass. u. Bab., 1892, p. 234). In the battle of Raphia, Sargon defeated the Egyptian king Sō' (II K 17 4)—a name contracted from Seve, or Sabako, the first Pharaoh of the Ethiopian dynasty. Later (in 711), through his tartan, or general-in-chief, he made war against the freedom-loving city of Ashdod in Philistia (Is 20 1), and in 709 wrested the suzerainty over Babylonia from the patriot Marduk-bal-Iddin—the Biblical Merodach-baladan—of Bit Yakin on the Persian Gulf (Weber, Sanherib, 1905, p. 7). Sargon's son Sennacherib (705–686) undertook a campaign against Palestine (701), besieged Jerusalem (II K 18 13 ff.; Is 36 1 ff.), defeated at Altaḳu, in Philistia, an army led by the Ethiopian prince Tirḥaka (II K 19 9), but was providentially overthrown in the neighborhood of Pelusium, his host being devastated by a frightful pestilence (Is 37 36; Herodot. II, 141). What is here said of Tirḥaka is not invalidated by the fact that he did not become Pharaoh over all Egypt earlier than 691, and the assertion that Is ch. 36 f. has confused two sieges of Jerusalem by Sennacherib (so, e.g., Marti, Comm. üb. Is. 1901, on 37 9) is unfounded (wayyāshōbh, "and he returned," II K 19 9b, is the correct reading). That Sennacherib was drawn northward to Jerusalem later in a campaign against the queen of the Arabians (Weber, Sanherib, 1905, p. 21 f.) is not attested by the cuneiform inscriptions.

(2) The Ethical and Religious Character of the Age.—In the time of I. the internal affairs of Israel had reached a critical stage of greatest significance. (a) Loyalty to the national religion was, especially in the kingdom of Samaria, at a low ebb (I K 12 28, etc.), "They walked in the way of Jeroboam," i.e., they approved of Jehovah-images, and the nation was in danger of giving up those prerogatives that belonged to it in virtue of its peculiar religious history (Is 2 5 f.). From the east and the west strange views poured in (2 6), and the tendency to idolatry was universal (2 20, etc.). (b) At the same time, and as a result, the sense of the fundamental national unity with the sister kingdom was almost lost. For Pekah, the king of Samaria, as an ally of a foreign enemy, went even to the extent of besieging Jerusalem (II K 16 5; Is 7 1 ff.), so that Ahaz felt compelled to appeal to Assyria for aid (II K 16 7-9). (c) Social abuses followed, such as miscarriages of justice (1 10, etc.), the oppression of the poor (3 5 ff., etc.), and effeminacy and profligacy (5 11 ff., etc.).

6. Character of His Teaching.

When I. came to his ministry it was one of those moments in human history when God's mercy yields to His justice, and His holiness is disclosed. In other words, at such moments, His exaltation over all that is merely secular, particularly the unesthetic, the non-moral, and the irreligious, is brought into view (Is 6 3, 1 4b). But in the same historical crisis, all the more radiantly was that grace of God revealed, which ever leads the way for man in the stages of his development. Because of this twofold characteristic of his age there were two aspects to I.'s message. (1) On the one hand, he was called to lament the bitter fruit produced by the vineyard of God (5 1-7). Thus we see him as a censor of the indifferent masses (5 11), of the self-sufficient princes (7 11), of a high-minded minister of state (22 15), and of priests unfaithful to their duty (28 7 ff., etc.). I. was a most impressive teacher of morality. It is difficult to find anywhere a more severe arraignment than his words: "The ox knoweth his owner, but Israel doth not know," etc. (1 3). Idolatry (2 20, 8 19), covetousness, which exhausts a people (3 5, 5 19), oppressive injustice (1 17, 3 14 f., 10 1 f.), pleasure-seeking, and gluttony (3 16 ff., 22 13a, 28 7) have never been scourged with greater vigor than by I. The thunder of his woes against the conscienceless administrators of the vineyard of the Lord (5 8-24) is like that of the words of Jesus in Mt 23 13-29. (2) But besides this ministry of stern admonition I. was called to exercise one of edification and comfort. He was given the task of pointing out in clear terms the spiritual character of the Kingdom of God. For when great world-powers were developing in SW. Asia, it was the time to warn Israel against alliances with them, to hold it back from attempting to compete with them, and to remind it earnestly of its religious and ethical mission. Consequently, when an alliance with Egypt was proposed, I. bitterly complains that the spirit of the Eternal (i.e., the prophet himself as the instrument of this spirit) had not been consulted (30 1 f.), and, further, held before the citizens of the kingdom the high ideal: "In quietness and in confidence shall be your strength" (30 15b). Finally, like a sun-born rainbow the promise shines forth that, when the religion of the Eternal shall have attained supremacy over all forms of worship, the people shall turn their swords into the tools of peaceful industry (2 2-4). With this we touch upon the last portion of the task which I. was to accomplish. It was given him to let new light fall upon the way through which God was designing to realize His plan of leading humanity into harmony with Himself. There were two points in particular which he was to illuminate more clearly. First, in his day the eye of prophecy was opened more widely to the recognition of the superhuman endowment of the coming deliverer. The child "Immanuel, God with us," whose birth (7 14) is set forth mysteriously—only with the mention of its mother—is, in the words, "Thy land, O Immanuel" (8 8b), designated as the ruler of the holy land, and is further endowed with all the attributes of an ideal prince (9 6, 11 2). But see IMMANUEL. In the second place, the prophet saw more clearly the fact of the sufferings of that perfect Son of David. In Amos (9 11), and Micah (5 1), indeed, a humiliation of the house of David precedes the advent of the ideal Son of David. But I. discloses the exceedingly lowly condition of the house of David when the Savior King should spring from it. For not from the outspreading branches of the tree, but out of its roots will the ideal Son of David issue (11 1; cf. the echo of this in the later passage 53 2). In the reference to curdled milk and wild honey (7 15, 22)—the products of a devastated land—we find the same teaching. In short, the nature of the future Kingdom of God and the character of its coming ruler were revealed to no other prophet so clearly as to I. The light which was thrown by his prophetic knowledge upon the highest goal of human destiny illumined the following centuries (Sir 48 25).

The Book of Isaiah consists of two parts. The first (chs. 1–39) contains, in the main, the record of the prophetic work of I., the son of Amoz, the contemporary of Ahaz and Hezekiah. The second part (chs. 40–66) belongs to exilic (and post-exilic?) times. According to Driver, whose view represents fairly the general critical position (LOT, pp. 206 ff.), the first part falls conveniently into six subdivisions:

I. Chs. 1–12. A first collection of oracles relating to both Judah and Israel, of various dates from 740–701 B.C., arranged as follows: Ch. 1. The "great arraignment" (probably belonging to 701, the time of Sennacherib's invasion of Judah). Chs. 2–5. Among I.'s earliest prophecies (circa 734, in Ahaz's reign, or earlier). Ch. 6. Isaiah's call to his ministry. 7 1–9 7. At the time of the Syro-Ephraimitic war (735–734). 9 8–10 4. Addressed mainly to Ephraim (circa 735). 10 5–11 9. Relating to the advance of Assyria (date uncertain). 11 10–12 6. Date uncertain, possibly post-exilic.

II. Chs. 13–23. Relating chiefly to foreign nations (implicated in one way or another in the general political situation between 734 and 701).

III. Chs. 24–27. An early post-exilic prophecy of strong evangelical character.

IV. Chs. 28–33. Relating chiefly to the political crisis which led to Sennacherib's invasion of Judah (705–701).

V. Chs. 34, 35. Of exilic date, relating to Edom vs. Israel.

VI. Chs. 36–39. A historical narrative, taken mainly from II K chs. 18–20.

7. The Book. Its Arrangement.

The book containing the discourses of I. possesses (1) chronological order in the main; for it names the year of the death of Uzziah—circa 739 (6 1). It speaks of Ahaz reigning, and the kingdom of Samaria as an aggressive power (7 1 ff.). It mentions the year of the death of Ahaz—circa 724 (14 28). It alludes to Sargon sending an army against Ashdod—circa 711 (20 1). It mentions the fourteenth year of the reign of Hezekiah—probably the twenty-fourth, or in any case the year 701 (36 1)—so that its contents undoubtedly advance chronologically. (2) But the chronological order is not preserved in all its parts. Ch. 6, for example, relates the inauguration of the prophet to his office. Reasons adduced to make it appear that this chapter narrates a special experience in the course of I.'s prophetic ministry are overruled by the following facts: first, the confession of I. that he was a "man of unclean lips," whereupon a cleansing of his lips follows (6 6 ff.), and, secondly, the words of God, "Whom shall I send?" etc., and the offer of Isaiah, "Here am I; send me" (ver. 8). It is possible to see why ch. 6 has been displaced in the interests of an unchronological order by the discourse of ch. 1. The expressions in ch. 6, "In the year that King Uzziah died" (ver. 1) and "hear ye now continually" (ver. 9), may have led to the idea that I. had been prophesying for some time, while the lofty tone of the introduction to ch. 1, "Hear, O heavens," etc., and the impressive diction of the entire chapter, may have led to the putting of this discourse at the beginning of the collection; for it is noticeable that significant and weighty expressions are made the beginnings of divisions in the book (cf. 4 1, 9 1, 11 1). (3) But although the chronological arrangement of the book is not an absolute one, it does not appear so completely destroyed as has been recently claimed. F. Wilke, in his book Jesaja und Asur (1905), emphasizes the fact that the relation of I. to the Assyrian world-power was not a simple one. He claims that the prophet could not "in the same breath" have put into view the deepest humiliation of Jerusalem through Assyria, and a glorious salvation from the attacks of this enemy (p. 7). Therefore, he holds that I. passed from a pro-Assyrian to an anti-Assyrian attitude, and that this change of position after a lengthy preparation reached its culmination in the year 701, when Sennacherib besieged the temple-city of Jehovah. But no one has thus far claimed that I. gave utterance to his various expressions on the relation of Assyria to the destiny of Jehovah's people "in the same breath." Moreover, Wilke incorrectly describes I.'s attitude toward the Assyrians. For instance, the warning of I. (30 1 ff.) against an alliance with Egypt (cf. Wilke, p. 43) is not quite a demand on his part to take sides with the Assyrians; Israel as God's people was to act on an entirely different principle. It was not to enter into ambitious rivalry with the world-powers (30 5 ff.). But, thirdly, I. himself tells us (10 5 ff.) why he could no longer see in Assyria the executor of the punishment overhanging the impenitent majority. It was because the Assyrian in his pride had overstepped the Divine commission. The question, therefore, is simply this: whether I. could have issued even one threat against the Assyrian world-power without destroying the general impression of his prophecies, viz.: that Assyria was to be the Divine agent in Israel's punishment. Since, however, the spirit shown by Assyria in the destruction of Samaria might have led the prophet to infer (10 5 ff.) that such an overstepping of the Divine command could occur later in her attitude toward the kingdom of Judah, it was quite possible for him to threaten Assyria, while holding her up as the Divine agent in Judah's punishment. Consequently Wilke is not right in placing all the passages of I. that are friendly to Assyria (5 26-30, 7 1-16, 8 1-8, etc.) in one single period, antecedent to the year 701, and in a later period all those which ring with the assurance of victory over Assyria (9 1-6, 10 5-34, 11 1 ff., 14 24-27, 33 12-14, 18 4-6, 29 5-9 f., 30 27-33, 31 10-19, 37 6 ff.). (4) The same general chronological arrangement, though somewhat disturbed by other considerations on the editor's part, obtains in the next main division (chs. 13–39). This is seen in the sequence of the following events: the death of Ahaz is mentioned (14 28)—circa 724—Samaria is not yet captured (28 1)—before 722—events in the fourteenth year of King Hezekiah are recorded (36 1). The place and order of this division seem to be best understood as follows: After the chronological principle of arrangement has led in 10 5 ff. to the mention of Assyria as the most important of the contemporary foreign enemies of the theocracy, other discourses against opponents of the kingdom of God were appended, whether they were foreign nations (chs. 13 ff.) or Israelites who had no conception of the Divine ideal for the nation's life (ch. 28) or those in Judah who ignored the warnings and teachings of the prophets as agents of the Divine Spirit (chs. 29 ff.). But this arrangement has been more or less influenced by other considerations. There is, for instance, incorporated among the so-called "discourses against strange peoples" (chs. 13–27) a discourse against Jerusalem (ch. 22). It has been conjectured that the reason for this was the effort to place side by side characteristic expressions, as, e.g., "they fled away" (21 15a), and "all thy rulers fled away" (22 3a). It is customary to call such expressions "catch-words," though they constitute only a species of repetition (cf. König, Stil. Rhet. Poet. p. 154). Cornill has advanced the theory (ZATW, vol. iv, pp. 33 ff.) that regard for such "catch-words" has influenced the one who arranged the whole book (cf. W Rothstein, Die Genealogie d. Königs Jojachim, 1902, App.). This is not altogether impossible. Furthermore, it has been claimed that the discourses in chs. 13 ff. are put together because, with the exception of chs. 18 and 20, they all begin with the word "burden" (massā'), and that this word, according to this writer, indicates a threatening message. But as a term for prophecies this word does not signify threatening. It is the simple expression 'discourse,' or 'utterance,' as is clear from its use in the sense of "visions" in La 2 14. So that these chapters are not necessarily messages of doom, while the term itself is scarcely characteristic enough to have occasioned the incorporation of ch. 22 in this series. In any case the designation of I. as the recipient of these prophetic oracles (13 1) must have come from the fact that either the section 13 1–14 23, or the discourses of chs. 13–23, constituted at one time a partial collection of the prophecies of Isaiah.

8. The Second Part. Chs. 40–66.

(1) But the Book of Isaiah contains also imitations of the genuine discourses of I. (a) It could not all have proceeded directly from this prophet, for some parts of it contain traces of a peculiar style of diction. The negative "not," e.g., is generally represented by lō' (cf. 1 3b, etc.), but by the more unusual bal in 14 21, 26 10, 11, 14, 18, 33 20, 21, 23, 24, 35 9, 40 24, 43 17, 44 8 f. Further, the usual expression for the conjunction "also" is gam (cf. 1 15, etc.); but in 26 8 f., 11, 33 2, 35 2, 40 24, 41 10, 23, 26, 42 13, 43 7, 19, 44 15, 16, 45 21, 46 11, 48 12, 13, 15, it is the poetic 'aph. How is it to be explained that in a portion of the discourses particles are employed which in I.'s time were confined to poetic usage, and only later found their way into prose? The mildest assumption is that the discourses in which these unusual particles are found have been worked over by later hands—a process which was just as possible with these discourses as with the dedicatory address of Solomon (cf. I K 8 11-53 with II Ch 6 1-42). (b) Other indications of this fact that certain portions of the book are not from I. are found in their contents. In the discourses of chs. 1 ff. the people are indeed threatened with the punishment of exile (6 12, etc.); but in chs. 40 ff. they stand before the prophet as already in captivity. It might be asked, however, whether I. could not have addressed the people prophetically as exiles? But this would contradict the essential parallelism that exists between history and prophecy. In the O T we have a succession of prophets—each prophet speaking to the people of his own period in the language of their own time which they could understand. Had it been otherwise, God must have opened to the hearers a historical horizon unknown to them. Consequently such passages as Is 41 2, 44 28, 45 1, in which Cyrus is referred to as a great personality well known to the hearers, must have been written in Cyrus' own days, and 46 1, when Bel and Nebo are placed side by side, must belong to the period shortly before the fall of Babylon, as is evident from a similar arrangement of the names in the cuneiform inscriptions of that time (Keilinschr. Bibl. III, 2, pp. 47, 127, 131, etc.). (2) On the other hand, it must not be overlooked that the discourses in chs. 1 ff. and 40 ff. are bound together by a number of common characteristics. Chief among these is the designation of God as the "Holy One of Israel," which appears as an echo of the theophany of 6 1 ff., in 1 4b, 5 19, 24, 10 17, 20, 12 6, 17 7, 29 19, 30 11, 12, 15, 31 1, 37 23, 41 14, 16, 20, 43 3, 14 f., 45 11, 47 4, 48 17, 49 7, 54 5, 55 5, 60 9, 14. This common feature can not indeed prove that the discourses of 40 ff. issue from I.; for common elements of this sort may have been due to imitation, and the name of God alluded to is also found in Jer 50 29, 51 5; Ps 71 22, 78 41, and 89 19. A consideration of all the differences and agreements leads to the conclusion that either there existed literary remains of I. (e.g., chs. 53, 56 9–57 11), which were enlarged by a later author, which is not probable, or that a prophet who through his faith belonged to the "holy seed" of 6 13 was an indirect pupil of I. (8 16, 50 4, 54 3), and has imitated the great master in several features. The comforting speeches of this prophet came to be appended to the collection of the prophecies of I., because, according to an ancient tradition registered in the Talmud, his book closed the series of the three great prophets. The name of this prophet could, however, easily remain unknown, or become unknown, as was the case with the "man of God" who announced to Eli the destruction of his house (I S 2 27 ff.). This fact does not affect the Divine nature of the content of these prophecies. Their character lies essentially in the following three grounds of comfort: (1) In the calling to mind the fact of the absolute supremacy of the God of Israel (chs. 40–48), which made possible the use of a political agent in the deliverance of his people from captivity. (2) God was to work out the inner or spiritual salvation of Israel, and therewith, at the same time, that of all mankind (chs. 49–55). (3) In the promise that God would reward those who were true to the Law, no matter how often the opposite might seem to be the case, while those who despised the Law would not in the end escape their punishment (chs. 56–64).

9. Other Non-Isaianic Elements.

[As indicated in the analysis of chs. 1–39 (§ 7, above), a considerable amount of post-exilic material is included in the first main division of the book. Some of this (as chs. 24–27 and 34, 35) was probably inserted by the post-exilic compilers of I.'s oracles in the belief that it was of Isaianic origin. Other portions (as 11 10–12 6) may have originated in a desire to supplement the original prophecies by making them more applicable to the changed situation of later days.]

More detailed exposition of many points will be found in the writer's Einleit. in d. AT, pp. 312 ff., and The Exiles' Book of Consolation (1899). [See also the commentaries of Skinner (Camb. Bible), Whitehouse (New Century Bible), and G. A. Smith (Expos. Bible), and on the general critical questions Driver, in LOT and G. A. Smith, in HDB.]

ISAIAH, ASCENSION OF: The occasion for the use of the name and personality of Isaiah in apocalyptic writings is to be found

probably in the fact that he was introduced in his ministry through the means of a vision. How large this use was is not positively known, but the titles of four Isaianic apocalyptic books are mentioned by ancient writers. These are: The Martyrdom of Isaiah (Origen), The Anabatikon (Epiphanius, probably the same as Jerome's Ascension of Isaiah), The Vision of Isaiah, and The Testament of Hezekiah. The only work that has survived to modern times, however, is that brought to light in 1819 in Ethiopic, under the title Ascension of Isaiah. It consists of two parts, including respectively five and six chapters.

2. Contents, Part I.

Part I tells of how in the twenty-sixth year of the reign of Hezekiah, Isaiah prophesied that Manasseh would, under the influence of Satan, fall away from the worship of the Lord, and when Hezekiah desired to prevent this by putting Manasseh to death, the prophet forbade him (ch. 1). His prediction was fulfilled in due time, and after having fled into the wilderness he was, upon the charge of treason against the Holy City and usurpation of authority higher than that of Moses, seized and brought back before the king (2 1–3 12). The real reason, however, for Satan's hatred of Isaiah was the prediction of the coming of Messiah from the seventh heaven, and of his death, resurrection, ascension, and second coming. The mission of the twelve Apostles, the persecution of the Christians, the coming of Antichrist, and his destruction were also predicted (3 13–4 22). At all events, Manasseh caused Isaiah to be sawn asunder (ch. 5).

3. Contents, Part II.

Part II gives an account of a vision of the prophet which he saw in the twentieth year of Hezekiah, and told to the king and his counselors (ch. 6). In this vision he was taken up by an angel through the firmament into the seventh heaven, where he saw the patriarchs Adam, Abel, and Enoch, and was ushered into the presence of God Himself. But the chief object of his ascension was to receive the revelation of the Messiah's advent to earth (chs. 7–10). Being now taken back by the angel to the firmament, he saw in detail the circumstances of the birth, life, sufferings, death, and resurrection of Jesus, and His ascension into the seventh heaven. At this point the angel left him and his soul returned into his body. But because he told this vision to Hezekiah, Manasseh put him to death (ch. 11).

4. Composition, Date, Authorship.

It is quite clear from the outline here given that the Ascension of Isaiah is a composite book, consisting of at least two principal works, i.e., the Martyrdom and the Vision. Each of these is complete, and has probably been enlarged from an original somewhat bricfer in compass. The Vision was produced probably in the 2d cent. of the Christian era. The Martyrdom antedates it by a century or more, being, to all appearances, a reduction into literary form of the old tradition regarding the death of the great prophet.

The Ascension of Isaiah has been edited in the Ethiopic text discovered by Laurence in 1819, and, as revised upon the basis of two additional MSS., by Dillmann (1877). It has been translated into English, and published in the Lutheran Quarterly Review (1878, pp. 513 ff.). See also Kautzsch, Pseudepigrapha.

ISCAH, iz'cā (יִסְכָּה, yiṣkhāh): A name mentioned in the record of the family of Terah (Gn 11 29). It is very probable that a scribal error lies behind the present text. We should expect to read "the father of Sarai" instead of "the father of Iscah." The original reading may have been "Sarai," which has been corrupted into "Iscah." If, however, these verses relate to the amalgamation and relations of tribes instead of individuals, the statement and the text may be in perfect order, merely informing us that Haran (a tribe) was 'father' of not only Milcah, but also of Iscah (a tribe).

ISH- (in compounds): The Heb. אִישׁ, 'īsh, means 'man' and is used in a few compound proper nouns with this significance. In most proper nouns beginning with 'ish', this syllable is but a part of the verbal form contained in the name.

ISHBAH, ish'bā (יִשְׁבָּח, yishbaḥ): The clan apparently from which Eshtemoa was peopled (I Ch 4 17).

E. E. N.

ISHBAK, ish'bak. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

ISHBI-BENOB, ish''bai-bî'nob (יִשְׁבִּי בְנֹב, yishbī bhᵉnōbh): A name occurring in II S 21 16. The Heb. text of this and the preceding verse is doubtless corrupt. The original reading probably was, "and David and his servants with him went down and dwelt in Gob and fought with the Philistines," etc. The name of the gigantic opponent of David has been lost (see GOB).

ISHBOSHETH, ish''bō'sheth (אִישׁ בֹּשֶׁת, 'īsh bōsheth), 'man of shame' (also Eshbaal, 'man of Baal,' in I Ch 8 31): The fourth son of Saul (II S

2 8). After the death of his father and his three elder brothers at the battle of Mt. Gilboa, I. would naturally have fallen heir to the kingdom; but the leaders of the tribe of Judah raised David to the throne. Abner, in loyalty to his master, Saul, caused I. to be proclaimed king at Mahanaim on the east side of the Jordan. The result was a civil war. An effort to avert this by selecting twelve men on each side and allowing the issue to rest with the result of a combat between them proved unsuccessful, since all the combatants were mortally wounded. A battle was then fought in which the followers of I. suffered a crushing defeat. He continued to hold out, but when Abner transferred his allegiance to David on account of a rebuke which I. administered to him for unlawful intimacy with his father's concubine, Rizpah, his cause became desperate, and he was himself murdered by two of his captains, a crime which David promptly punished. A. C. Z.

ISHHOD, ish'hŏd' (אִשְׁהוֹד, 'ishhōdh, Ishod AV), 'man of glory': The ancestral head of a Manassite clan (I Ch 7 18). E. E. N.

ISHI, ai'shai or ish'ai (יִשְׁעִי, yish'ī), 'my help': I. 1 and 2. Descendants of Judah (I Ch 2 31, 4 20). 3. A descendant of Simeon (I Ch 4 42). 4. The head of a family of Manasseh (I Ch 5 24). All are probably clan-names. II (אִישִׁי, 'īshī). A symbolic term, expressive of the ideal relation between J" and Israel, meaning 'my husband' in a higher sense than ba'alī, 'my master' (Hos 2 16). E. E. N.

ISHIAH, ai-shai'ā. See ISSHIAH.

ISHIJAH, ai-shai'jā. See ISSHIJAH.

ISHMA, ish'ma (יִשְׁמָא, yishmā'): The ancestral head of a clan of Judah (I Ch 4 3). E. E. N.

ISHMAEL, ish'ma-el, ish'mê-, or -mê'- (יִשְׁמָעֵאל, yishmā'ē'l), 'God hears': 1. The son of Abraham and Hagar, Sarah's maid (Gn 16 11 ff.). Isaac, son of Sarah, Abraham's full wife, supplanted I. as the heir of Abraham, and through Sarah's jealousy, I. and his mother were expelled from Abraham's home (Gn 17 18 ff., 21 8-21). Nevertheless, I. was circumcised and thus (according to later theory) viewed as having some real connection with the Covenant (Gn 17 23-26). I. is represented as the ancestor of the Ishmaelites, subdivided according to Gn 25 12 ff. into 12 tribes. These "sons of Ishmael" were in reality tribes of NE. Arabia (Gn 25 18), believed to have had some early genealogical connection with Israel. They were thus easily confused with the Midianites (cf. Gn 37 25; Jg 8 24). Their wild, warlike character is indicated by the terms applied to I. himself in Gn 16 12 ("a wild ass of a man") and in 21 20 (an "archer" who dwelt "in the wilderness"). Some relationship between the Ishmaelites and the Edomites is implied in Gn 28 9 and ch. 36. 2. A man of Judah in Jehoshaphat's day (II Ch 19 11). 3. A Benjamite, one of Saul's descendants (I Ch 8 38, 9 44). 4. An officer who assisted Jehoiada in deposing Athaliah (II Ch 23 1). 5. The leader of a faction that conspired against and murdered Gedaliah, governor of Judah under Nebuchadrezzar (II K 25 23 ff.; Jer 40 8–41 18). 6. A priest (Ezr 10 22). E. E. N.

ISHMAELITE(S), ish'ma-el-ait(s) (יִשְׁמְעֵאלִי(ם), yishme'ē'lī[m]): The descendants of Ishmael. In Gn 37 25 ff. and Jg 8 24 they are introduced into a context which otherwise speaks of Midianites. Evidently such passages show different authorship and variant traditions. "Midianites" and "Ishmaelites" could easily be confused, as meaning Arab tribes inhabiting the deserts E. and SE. of Israel. See ISHMAEL and MIDIAN. E. E. N.

ISHMAIAH, ish-mê'yā (יִשְׁמַעְיָהוּ, yishma'yāhū), 'J" hears': 1. One of David's heroes (I Ch 12 4, Ismaiah AV). 2. The head of the tribe of Zebulon (I Ch 27 19). E. E. N.

ISHMEELITE, ish'mē-el-ait. See ISHMAELITE.

ISHMERAI, ish'mē-rai or ish'mē-rê (יִשְׁמְרַי, yishme'ray): A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 18). E. E. N.

ISHOD, ish'ŏd or ai'shŏd. See ISHHOD.

ISHPAH, ish'pā (יִשְׁפָּה, yishpāh, Ispah AV): A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 16). E. E. N.

ISHPAN, ish'pan (יִשְׁפָּן, yishpān): A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 22). E. E. N.

ISH-TOB, ish'-tŏb (אִישׁ טוֹב, 'īsh ṭōbh): In II S 10 6-8 AV this occurs as a proper name. RV reads, "men of Tob," which is probably correct. See TOB. E. E. N.

ISHVAH, ish'vā, ISHUAH, ish'yu-ā (יִשְׁוָה, yishwāh), and ISHVI, ish'vai, ISHUI, ish'yu-ai (יִשְׁוִי, yishwī): 1. Ishvi ("Isui," also "Jesui" and "Ishuai" AV) was ancestral head of one of the clans of Asher, the Ishvites (Jesuites AV) (Gn 46 17; Nu 26 44; I Ch 7 30). "Ishvah" ("Ishuah" AV) in Gn 46 17 and "Isuah" in I Ch 7 30 AV (omitted in Nu 26 44) are probably only duplicates of Ishvi. 2. A son of Saul (I S 14 49), probably the one called elsewhere Eshbaal, or Ishbosheth. E. E. N.

ISLE, ISLAND: These terms render the Heb. 'ī, pl. 'iyyīm)—i.e., a place whither one betakes himself for resting, from the standpoint of a mariner (Gr. νησίον, νῆσος). The singular is used (Is 20 6, 23 2, 6) for the "coastland" RV ("isle" AV) of Philistia and Phœnicia, with the adjacent country; cf. Jer 25 22 RVmg. If Caphtor (Jer 47 4) is Crete, the Heb. word is also used for an island. The plural form (Is 40 15) is used for islands in our sense of the word, and perhaps also in Jer 2 10; Ezk 27 6, if Chittim is Cyprus. Elsewhere the plural designates, in general, lands washed by the ocean; in part the seacoasts and islands of Asia Minor (Est 10 1; Dn 11 18), in part the seacoasts and islands of the Mediterranean (Gn 10 5; Ezk 26 15, 18, 27 3, 7, 15, 35; Ps 72 10; Is 11 11, 24 15). Distant lands are so referred to, often including the inhabitants (Is 41 1, 5, 42 4, 10, 12, 49 1, 51 5, 59 18, 60 9, 66 19; Jer 31 10; Ps 97 1; Zeph 2 11). In Is 42 15 "islands" means 'dry land.' In Is 13 22, 34 14; Jer 50 39, 'iyyīm is wrongly translated "islands." RV has "wolves" (margin, "howling creatures"). In the N T the translation is exact, except perhaps in Rev 6 14, 16 20, where distant lands are meant.

1. The Preparation.

(1) Land and People. The land of Israel, stretching from Dan, at the foot of Hermon, to Beersheba, on the edge of the Negeb, and including Bashan and Gilead E. of the Middle Jordan, had an extreme length of 150 m. with an extreme breadth of 50 m. It never included an area of more than 6,000 sq. m., nor a population of more than 2,000,000 souls. It had only very little fertile soil, and it was not its arable land that maintained its most virile citizens; it was the ruggedness and variety of its physical features that in large measure gave to its people their virility and morale. The true home of Israel through most of its history was the land of Ephraim and Judah, and also, toward the close, the hills of Galilee. The Israelites were a mixed people, and exhibited most of the noted qualities of the leading families of the Semites—the idealism and reflectiveness of the Babylonians, the commercial instincts of the Aramæans, the local patriotism of the Canaanites, the endurance or reserve force of the Arabs. Their Babylonian associations are suggested by the migration of their great ancestor Abraham from Ur of the Chaldees. Their Aramæan affiliations are attested by his residence in Haran and the renewed relations with the family of Laban. A Canaanitic admixture was a consequence of residence in Palestine in days before and after Moses and Joshua. An Arab infusion began early (Gn chs. 16, 21), was continued by the accession of Kenites, Kenizzites, and others, and by immigration from the desert all through their history. A close relation subsisted between Israel and Edom, Ammon, and Moab.

(2) Predecessors of Israel. Israel is an 'ancient' people in only a qualified sense. More than three thousand years before the settlement in Canaan, lower Babylonia had been drained and cultivated by a mixed Semitic and non-Semitic population, and was laying the foundations of one of the most potent civilizations the world has known, with highly developed trade, industry, jurisprudence, mythology and religion, art and science. Palestine was controlled by the Babylonians from about 4000 B.C. to 1700 B.C. In the 16th cent. B.C. Egypt overran Palestine and Syria, and held Palestine by military occupation, with interruptions, till 1180 B.C. Meanwhile the native races of Palestine were unable and unwilling to amalgamate. The chief of these were the Amorites, the people that made the first settlements both E. and W. of the Lebanons, and probably included the Canaanites. The latter is not a racial but a geographical term, meaning originally the inhabitants of the seacoast, and afterward applied as well to their kindred of the interior, W of the Jordan. The name Amorite clung to the people E. and S. of Hermon, who, at the time of the rise of Israel, were moribund, and are little heard of thereafter. The smaller peoples of Canaan (Hivites, etc.) were doubtless subdivisions of the old Amorites. The Hittites were an exception, they having been an advance band of the Hittite immigration which came from the N. in the 16th cent. B.C.

2. The Unorganized Stage.

The links between the "tribes" of Israel and their racial elements can not be made out fully; but we may assume a general situation as follows: Not later than the 16th cent. B.C. certain Aramæans from the Babylonian domain of the moon-god Sin, the patron deity of nomads (for whom the Wilderness of Sin and Mt. Sinai had been already named in the W., and whose eastern seat was in Ur of the Chaldees), moved westward along the Euphrates and settled in Haran (Charran), the Mesopotamian seat of the same divinity. Here a young chief, Abram, formed a new expedition to Canaan at the head of a considerable clan, who finally chose S. Palestine as its pasture-ground. Here toward the end of the 15th cent. B.C. the proximate descendants of this clan were known as "Hebrews" (the Chabire of the Amarna tablets). A little later still another family-group, or clan, was founded under the leadership of the eponym Jacob-Israel.

3. The Growth of Tribal Union.

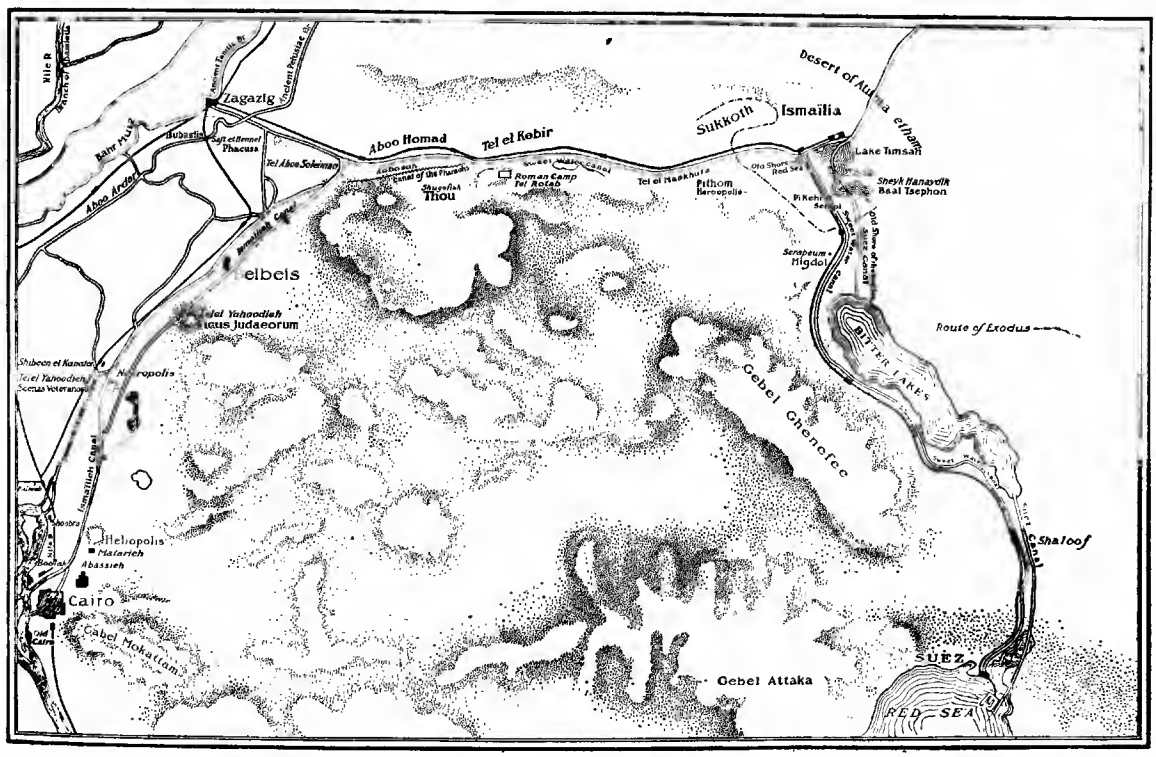
(1) First Palestinian Period. The "sons" of Jacob were divided into four groups, named from his wives and their handmaids. The four eldest first secured an independent footing. But Reuben, E. of Jordan, was early absorbed by border tribes. Simeon and Levi were almost destroyed in a feud with the Canaanites, with whom they had made alliance (Gn ch. 34). Simeon was later absorbed by Judah, who had strengthened himself by Canaanitic alliances (Gn ch. 38). Levi was distributed among the other tribes. Issachar and Zebulon early made a settlement in the valley of Jezreel and northward. Joseph and Benjamin had no independent footing in the old Palestinian days. Joseph fell into bond-service in Egypt. The descendants of Gad, Asher, Dan, and Naphtali were all border tribes, and became half-foreigners. About 1250 B.C. there was a people "Israel" in Palestine whom Merneptah of Egypt claims to have laid waste or destroyed. (2) Egypt and the Exodus. After a short servitude, Joseph prospered in Egypt, and his people were replenished by many of their kindred from Canaan. But the Pharaohs of the 19th dynasty cruelly oppressed the Hebrews, and after a residence of over a century in Egypt they migrated to their ancestral home. Their leader was Moses, of the family of Levi, who by a long residence among the Kenites had become imbued with the religion of J″, whose seat was in Sinai. Pursued by the Egyptians, a way was opened for them over an arm of the Red Sea. This signal proof of the favor and power of J″ conciliated them to His religion. Moses led the march to Sinai, and there confirmed their allegiance by a formal covenant. Here also he propounded to them the principles of law, order, and justice which were put into practise during a long desert wandering as a preparation for settled life. Thus Moses became the first and greatest of the prophets of Israel. (3) The Permanent Settlement. The Egyptians had now (circa 1170 B.C.) withdrawn entirely from Palestine, so that no united nation opposed the entrance of the Hebrews. They had, moreover, the help of their kindred remaining in the country, mostly E. of the Jordan, and of their allies the Kenites and other half-Arab tribes. An entrance was effected into the center of the country by way of Jericho and Bethel. Striking successes were at first gained over many small city-states; then came a period of long-drawn-out hostilities, ending mostly with compromises. In the sequel the Canaanites were absorbed, being less virile and without such a unifying bond as was the religion of J″ to Israel. But they still held for a time the chief fortified cities (cf. Jg 1 19 ff.). Meanwhile the Hebrews kept learning the ways of the more civilized and corrupt people of the land, and came to worship the local Baals, while nominally devoted to J″. The Joseph tribes, Manasseh (Machir) in the N., Ephraim in the center, and "Benjamin the youngest" (Ps 68 27) formed the main bulwark of the settlement. They joined the northern tribes in the first great unifying struggle when Issachar, Zebulon, and Naphtali were contending for their life against a combination of northern Canaanites (circa 1130 B.C.). Judah and the eastern tribes long held aloof from common action. (4) The Judges. The chief impulse to federate came from the attacks of outsiders: Aramæans (who were now filling up Syria), Moabites, Midianites, and Ammonites. The whole domain of Israel was not overrun at one time by any of these invaders. The incursions of the Midianites (circa 1090 B.C.) threatened it seriously, since the center of the country was attacked by way of Manasseh. On each occasion a "judge," or regulator, was chosen, who acted as dictator till the danger was over. On this occasion Gideon, the dictator and deliverer, was made a virtual king against his will by his fellow tribesmen. The most deadly foes were the Philistines, who, by 1040 B.C., were everywhere victorious over Israel, the best portion of whose territory they held as tributary. Samuel, the last and greatest of the judges, tried in vain to unite his discouraged people, who were again becoming disintegrated, in part by the tendency to form separate city governments after the fashion of old Canaan, and in part by the prevalence of Canaanitic customs, social and religious. He at last acceded to the popular demand and anointed as king Saul, a substantial landholder of Benjamin.

4. The United Kingdom.

(1) The Government of Saul. Saul at first rescued Jabesh in Gilead from the Ammonites, and many of his people rallied to his support against the Philistine occupation. Aided by his heroic son Jonathan, he expelled the Philistines from the highlands, and bade fair to establish the kingdom securely, when a mental disorder impaired his will and judgment, so that the better part of his reign was clouded with distraction and failure. A loyal young officer, David of Bethlehem, a friend of Jonathan, prevented by Saul's suspicious jealousy from taking the lead against the national foe, was at length obliged, with a band of followers, to seek protection among the Philistines, to whom he for a time became a professed vassal. Jonathan, still faithful to him, fell at the side of his father and two of his brothers in battle against the Philistines. David, still nominally a vassal of the Philistines, was made king in Hebron by his own tribe of Judah, and after a few years was accepted by the other tribes also, who for him abandoned Ishbaal (Ishbosheth), the son of Saul (circa 995 B.C.). (2) The Reign of David. The sagacity and popular qualities of David drew all Israel to him, and in less than twenty years he had completely quelled the old Philistine oppressors, and made Israel the most powerful people of SW Asia, by bringing into subjection the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, as well as the Aramæans of S. Syria. His statesmanship was shown by his organization of the government, his choice of officials, and the selection of Jerusalem as his capital. Like Saul, however, he failed as a ruler to fulfil the promise of his early years. The extension of his kingdom had not been complete before the seeds of dissension and discontent had been sown outside of his own tribe of Judah, which he favored to the neglect of his northern and eastern subjects, while his domestic crime and folly robbed him of his moral prestige. It was thus easy for the crown prince Absalom to win a large following in an endeavor to seize the throne; and it was only through the devotion of a few loyal friends and the strategy of his able general Joab that the insurrection was checked by the defeat and death of his rebellious son (see also DAVID). (3) The Reign of Solomon. At the death of David (circa 965 B.C.) his son Solomon came to the throne, after a court intrigue on the part of Adonijah, the next heir after Absalom, had come to naught. The reign of Solomon was remarkable for the prosperity of its opening and the decline of its closing years. He developed trade and industry, cultivated friendship and commercial relations with neighboring princes, and organized his kingdom into districts for administrative purposes. He was, however, no genuine patriot, as he sought chiefly the aggrandizement of his own court, and of Judah and Jerusalem, for which he impoverished the rest of the country.



THE LAND OF GOSHEN. SHOWING THE PROBABLE ROUTE OF THE EXODUS.

(By permission of Egyptian Exploration Fund.)

His reign was memorable for religion and literature, the former obtaining its perpetual national seat in the Temple built by him on Mt. Moriah, and the latter beginning its unrivaled course with the earliest collection of epic ballads and the traditions of the tribal heroes. By the end of his reign all the vassal states, except Edom, had thrown off the yoke. and when his son Rehoboam aspired to rule over all Israel he was confronted by a popular assembly at Shechem, which chose a former Ephraimite malcontent, Jeroboam, to be king over "the ten tribes" of the N., or "Israel," so-called (934 B.C.).

5. The Kingdom of Israel.

(1) Jeroboam I to Elah. This was a period of semi-anarchy, since the whole kingdom had never been properly organized N. of Jerusalem, and the nominal subjects of Jeroboam were scattered and divided by the nature of their territory and their habits of life. Galilee was especially loose in its attachment to the central power. Wars soon arose with Judah, to the advantage for a time of the better-organized and equipped, though smaller power. Jeroboam's son, Nadab, was slain by a usurper, Baasha of Issachar (913), who fixed his capital at Tirzah, and built up fortresses close to the border of Judah. He also made an alliance with Damascus, which, however, Asa of Judah succeeded in breaking, and the Aramæans invaded and annexed the fertile lands NW. and W. of the Sea of Galilee. Baasha's son, Elah (888), was slain in a conspiracy of the soldiers, and after the failure of two other pretenders, the general Omri was chosen as king (886). (2) Omri to Joram. Omri was the real founder of the Kingdom of Israel and the greatest of its kings. He selected Samaria as its capital—a site almost rivaling Jerusalem in defensibility. His policy won Judah over to permanent and almost unbroken friendship. Alliance was made with Tyre, and sagacious plans were laid to check the aggression of the Aramæans, who still held to their acquisitions in N. Galilee. Ephraim (with Manasseh), Jezreel, and Gilead were recognized by Omri as the tenable limits of the kingdom, and these were as much as possible consolidated. Northern Moab was invaded and annexed to Gilead. Omri's son Ahab (875) pursued the same political aims with fair success. But his marriage with Jezebel of Tyre was of material injury to his country, by reason of the introduction of the luxurious and lustful cult of the Phœnician Baal and Astarte (Ashtoreth). Against this rival to J" the prophet Elijah took the field as preacher and censor, and his crusade was made more popular by the injustice done by Ahab and Jezebel to a freeholder, Naboth, whom they had despoiled and slain. He gained some successes against the Aramæans, who were rapidly rising to be a great power. In 854 he was actually found fighting as an ally (or vassal?) of Damascus against the invading Assyrian Shalmaneser II. In 853 he was slain in a battle against the Aramæans at Ramoth in Gilead, where Jehoshaphat of Judah was fighting at his side. In his reign the Moabite king, Mesha (q.v.), freed northern Moab from the dominion of Israel. Ahaziah, son of Ahab, died soon after his accession, and Joram, his brother, took his place as king (853). He continued the established policy at home and abroad, and waged bitter war against Damascus. At the instigation of the prophet Elijah he and his mother, Jezebel, were put to death by one of his officers, Jehu, who usurped the throne (842). (3) Jehu to Shallum. Jehu sent presents (i.e., tribute) to Shalmaneser II of Assyria, so as to get help against the Aramæans. This availed him little, for after 839 the Assyrians ceased operations in Syria for a long period. Hazael of Damascus then ravaged the whole of Palestine and exacted heavy penalties as the price of submission. Jehu's reign was mainly a failure, and under his son Jehoahaz (799–783) the Aramæans also held their advantage, until the renewed (and successful) attacks of Assyria on Syria gave peace to Israel. The Assyrians themselves also soon retired, and Israel was relieved from its greatest external dangers. Jeroboam II, son of Joash, now raised the power and prosperity of Israel to a height beyond all precedent. The old ideal limits were once more reached, and the country became wealthy and luxurious. Such conditions naturally brought about moral and religious decay, as Amos and Hosea proclaimed in their prophecies of the time. Political decline came as surely at last. Jeroboam's son Zechariah was slain by Shallum, a usurper, just as he ascended the throne, and he in his turn was put aside as rudely by Menahem, an officer in the army (741). (4) Menahem to Hoshea. Under Menahem Israel first felt directly the weight of the Assyrian power. In 738 he bought off at his borders Tiglath-pileser III for a thousand silver talents. In the brief time of respite, his son Pekahiah (735) was slain by the general Pekah, who succeeded him. Pekah now combined with Damascus against Assyria. The Assyrians returned in 734, overran and depopulated Galilee, conquered Damascus, and put an intriguer, Hoshea, in the place of Pekah. Hoshea rebelled in 724 at the instigation of one of the ambitious princes of Egypt, now under the Ethiopian dynasty.

At the end of 722 Samaria was taken by Sargon of Assyria, 27,290 Israelites were deported to remote parts of the great empire, and the country was made an Assyrian province.

6. The Kingdom of Judah.

(1) Rehoboam to Jotham. At the time of the Schism (934 B.C.) the portion of Benjamin which included Jerusalem with its northern environment remained true to the house of David. Rehoboam had also the trained body-guard and the national treasury. Through these advantages he and his successors held a factitious superiority over N. Israel during most of the period preceding Omri. The smallness and compactness of Judah made it also more defensible, as well as more solid and manageable. Thus, with the additional advantages of descent from David, the throne was maintained in the same single royal line for three centuries and a half, while the Northern Kingdom, after many violent changes of dynasty, lasted for less than two centuries. Abijah (918) in his short reign maintained the standing of Judah in war, but his son Asa was obliged to invoke the help of Damascus against Israel (§ 5 (1), above). Before his death, however, he bound his kingdom in firm friendship with Omri (886), after which Judah, as a rule, recognized the natural superiority of the larger country. The only injury from without suffered by Judah was the raid of Shishak of Egypt (929), who seized Jerusalem, but whose invasion had a merely temporary effect. Jehoshaphat (872) was an active ally of Ahab against Damascus (§ 5 (2), above), and married his son Jehoram to Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab, who introduced the Phœnician Baal into Jerusalem. Jehoram (853–843) lost control of Edom. He was succeeded by Ahaziah, who fell a victim to the fury of Jehu (§ 5 (2), above), along with his uncle Joram of Israel. Athaliah herself then usurped the government for six years, when the reforming priests of J″ placed on the throne young Jehoash, son of Ahaziah, under whom the Temple services were purified, and Judah suffered from the terrible ravages of Hazael (§ 5 (3), above). Amaziah, son of Joash, recovered Edom with its Red Sea trade and the W. Arabian caravan traffic. His successes led him into a foolish and disastrous war with Joash of Israel (circa 790), to whom he surrendered the royal treasures. Uzziah (or Azariah, who became sole ruler about 769) raised his kingdom to its greatest prosperity and power at the same time that Israel also flourished under Jeroboam II. He subdued and held much of the Philistine country, besides putting Moab under tribute. He was an imitator of the great Assyrian kings, as well as of David, the founder of his line. Jotham (sole ruler 738?) maintained successfully the same policy during his regency and separate reign. (2) Ahaz to Josiah. With the accession of Ahaz (735), the era of Assyrian influence began. He besought the help of Tiglath-pileser III against the combination of Pekah (§ 5 (4), above) and Damascus. Judah was saved from impending defeat (734), but necessarily became an Assyrian vassal, and Ahaz adopted Assyrian modes of worship. Hezekiah (719) prospered while he remained quiescent under the counsel of the prophet Isaiah, but in 701 he joined a great insurrection against King Sennacherib, and suffered more terrible losses than had as yet been inflicted upon Judah, his capital itself being saved from capture only through the breaking out of a plague in the Assyrian army. Isaiah's subsequent reforms were checked by the premature death of Hezekiah (690), whose successor, Manasseh, was a degenerate in both religion and morals. Babylonian modes of worship now became fashionable. Manasseh rebelled against Assyria toward the end of his reign, and had to appear before King Asshurbanipal (668–626) in Babylon, which had been the center of the wide-spread insurrection. This was the last rebellion of Judah against Assyria. Amon (641) showed no improvement upon Manasseh, while Josiah (639–608) was the best of the kings of Judah. Under him the "law of Moses" was published (621) and put in force (see DEUTERONOMY), and all religious and moral evils were sternly repressed. He was slain at Megiddo in battle against Pharaoh Necho, who was threatening his territory on his march against the moribund kingdom of Assyria (608). (3) Jehoahaz to Zedekiah. Judah now became the vassal of Egypt instead of Assyria, whose empire came to an end at the hands of the Medes in 607. Pharaoh Necho dethroned Jehoahaz, the second son of Josiah, after a three months' reign, and placed Eliakim (Jehoiakim), the eldest son, upon the throne. But the brief Egyptian régime in Asia was terminated in 604 by Nebuchadrezzar of Babylon, which had fallen heir to the Assyrian Empire, and Judah submitted to the new master. Jehoiakim, instigated by Egypt, rebelled in 598, and after his death his son and successor, Jehoiachin, was carried to Babylonia with many of his subjects (597). Under Zedekiah, the youngest son of Josiah, Judah again rebelled, in 588, against the counsel of the prophet Jeremiah, who had always favored submission to the Chaldeans. In 586 Jerusalem fell, the king and many more of his subjects were deported, and an end was made of the kingdom.

7. The Chaldean Régime.

(1) The Remnant in Palestine. Gedaliah, a noble of Jerusalem, was put in charge of the people left behind. Before long he was murdered, the victim of the hatred of a fanatical apostate named Ishmael. Nebuchadrezzar, as a punishment, made a further deportation of offenders, and many of the remainder took flight to Egypt, having with them (though against his will) the prophet Jeremiah. Many, however, were still left in Palestine. (2) The Babylonian Exile. The first and most important deportation (of 597) was directed mainly to the banks of the canal Chebar in central Babylonia. Abundant employment was furnished to the people, as well as to their successors, in agricultural and irrigation works and in other state and private enterprises. Many of all classes at length purchased their freedom and became prominent in trade and business. Hence Babylonia became the basis of the various efforts made subsequently to restore Israel in Palestine. The religion of J″, to the surprise of friend and foe alike, proved equal to the strain of transference to a foreign land; and while its worship was purified from idolatry, its literature was augmented, or reedited and adapted to present and future needs. The hope of the restoration which Jeremiah had predicted was revived by Ezekiel and later by the "Second Isaiah" and others, till the expectation was fulfilled by the liberator Cyrus, King of Persia, to whom Babylon itself surrendered without fighting, in July, 539. One of the first public acts of Cyrus was to offer release to all foreign captives and a safe conduct to their former homes.

8. The Persian Period.

The Jews warmly embraced the opportunity offered by Cyrus. Sheshbazzar, a "prince" of the line of David, with a large band of followers, set out for Palestine in 538 B.C. Samaritans and other neighbors offered bitter opposition to the resettlement, and the difficulties of the whole situation were so great that, although the foundations of a new Temple were soon laid, it was not completed till 521 B.C., in the reign of the generous and tolerant Darius Hystaspes. The leader now was Zerubbabel, also of the Davidic line, whose exertions were inspired and seconded by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah. The restoration of the Temple services did not, however, bring religious earnestness and moral depth to the community. The next two generations also showed decline rather than progress socially and politically. Separation from the Gentiles was the most imperative need. The reformation was accomplished by Nehemiah, cupbearer of Artaxerxes I, on the political, social, and moral side, and, on the religious side, by Ezra, a priest and scribe from Babylonia, both of whom came armed with royal authority. Ezra promulgated a new edition of the Law, the pillar of Judaism (444 B.C.). Nehemiah rebuilt the walls of Jerusalem, relieved the poor from oppressive financial burdens, suppressed mixed marriages, and restored the right observance of the Sabbath. The result was that for a century the Jewish state held well together, and religious purity was no longer seriously affected.

9. The Hellenistic Era.

After Israel came under Hellenistic sway through the conquests of Alexander the Great, the Ptolemies of Alexandria held control for over a century (323–203). They succeeded in doing what the old Pharaohs had failed to accomplish in Palestine (§ 1 (2), above), for they exercised both political and intellectual influence. This was done more by reflex than by direct action. Large numbers of Jewish colonists in Egypt, strongly attached to the religious and social system established by Ezra, became prosperous and cultured, and reacted intellectually upon the Jews in the home-land. Alexandria became a great center of Jewish thought and study, and constant intercourse with Jerusalem strengthened and deepened Judaism in both regions. It was in Egypt that the Septuagint translation of the Old Testament was made by and for Hellenistic Jews. In 203 B.C. the Egyptian gave way to Syrian control under Antiochus III. Antiochus IV (Epiphanes) succeeded in corrupting the priesthood, and, introducing heathen rites, actually profaned the Temple (170–168 B.C.).

10. The Maccabæan Period.

Nothing seemed now to oppose the final and permanent triumph of the Gentiles. But a noble priest, Mattathias, raised the standard of revolt in 167 B.C. Two years later his son and successor, the great Judas Maccabæus, recovered Jerusalem, purified the Temple, and restored the ancient religion. After many vicissitudes of fortune and much heroic effort, often dashed with cruelty and worldliness, independent rule was finally firmly established by Simon Maccabæus in 141 B.C. It was maintained till 63 B.C., when Pompey the Great made Syria a Roman province, with Judæa as an integral part, while the sacred territory itself was placed under the control of a vassal high priest (see also MACCABEES and HEROD). ITALY: The classical, as it is the modern, name of the European region of which Rome is the center and capital. It is referred to in four N T passages: (1) In Ac 18 2, as the country from which Aquila had come with his wife Priscilla, because of the edict of Claudius expelling all Jews from Rome (see CLAUDIUS). (2) In Ac 27 1, as the destination of the company of prisoners, sent from Syria, under charge of the centurion Julius, of which prisoners Paul was one (see PAUL, § 16 f.). (3) In He 13 24, as the country where resided the Christian brethren who sent greetings to the readers of the Epistle (see HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE, § 5). (4) In Ac 10 1, as the country that gave its name to the legion stationed at Cæsarea, of which Cornelius was the centurion (see AUGUSTAN BAND). M. W J.

ITHAI, ith'a-ai or ai'thê. See ITTAI.

ITHAMAR, ith'a-mār (אִיתָמָר, 'īthāmār): The youngest son of Aaron and, in late priestly circles, considered the head of one of the two main priestly lines (Ex 6 23; Nu 3 2, 4, 4 28 ff., etc.; I Ch 24 3-6; Ezr 8 2). See PRIESTHOOD, § 10. E. E. N.

ITHIEL, ith'i-el (אִיתִיאֵל, 'īthī'ēl): 1. A Benjamite (Neh 11 7). 2. A word of uncertain significance in Pr 30 1. The rendering of the RVmg. though widely adopted, is not certain. E. E. N.

ITHNAN, ith'nan (יִתְנָן, yithnān): A city in the extreme S. of Judah (Jos 15 23). Site unknown. E. E. N.

ITHRA, ith'rɑ. See JETHER.

ITHRAN, ith'ran (יִתְרָן, yithrān), 'eminent': 1. The ancestral head of a Horite clan (Gn 36 26; I Ch 1 41). 2. The head of an Asherite family (I Ch 7 37), probably the same as "Jether" in ver. 38. E. E. N.

ITHREAM, ith'rę-am (יִתְרְעָם, yithrᵉ'ām), 'the people is eminent': A son of David (II S 3 5; I Ch 3 3). E. E. N.

ITHRITE, ith'rɑit (יִתְרִי, yithrī): 1. The designation of a family of Kiriath-jearim (I Ch 2 53). 2. Two of David's heroes, Ira and Gareb, are called Ithrites (II S 23 38; I Ch 11 40), perhaps =Jattirites, i.e., from Jattir (q.v.). E. E. N.

ITTAI, it'tɑ-ɑi, it'ê, or it-tê'ɑi (אִתַּי, 'ittai; perhaps from אֵת, 'ēth, 'with,' 'companionable'): 1. A Philistine of Gath, who shortly before Absalom's rebellion had become one of David's captains, and who remained loyal to David, accompanying him in his flight (II S 15 19 ff.). He was made captain of one-third of David's forces (II S 18 2 ff.). 2. A son of Ribai from Gibeah of Benjamin, one of David's heroes (II S 23 29 =Ithai [I Ch 11 31]). C. S. T.

ITURÆA, ɑi''tu-rî'ɑ or it''yu- (Ἰτουραία): A district to the NE. of Palestine, beyond the Jordan, in the neighborhood of Jebel Hauran. The name, derived from Jetur (Gn 25 15), is thought to mean 'country of the mountaineers.' The Ituræans were reckoned among the 'sons' of Ishmael (Gn 25 15), or desert tribes of N. Arabia; Strabo says they were mixed with Arabs, along with whom they inhabited the mountainous region. In agreement therewith are the inscriptions of the Hauran region, which cover the 1st to the 6th cent. and contain Arabic names of gods and men. The Ituræans were semi-nomads, wild, warlike border-men, and for a long time there was no definitely defined territory called I., the ethnic name (Ituræans) alone being used until the 4th cent. A.D. (In Lk 3 1 the word is probably an adjective.) I. overlapped Trachonitis, and even shifted beyond Trachonitis to the Beḳā'. An independent kingdom of I. is often mentioned in Maccabæan times, after its conquest (105 B.C.) by Aristobulus I, who annexed it to Judæa. This bordered on, and at one time included, Galilee, and centered in the Anti-Lebanon region (Abilene). Its king, Ptolemæus, son of Mennæus, resided at Chalcis and harried the whole region until he was crushed by Pompey (66 B.C.), from whom he bought immunity at the price of 1,000 talents. He reigned from about 85 to 40 B.C., and was succeeded by his son Lysanias I, who was executed by Antony, 36 B.C. Antony gave the tetrarchy to Cleopatra (36 B.C.), who leased it to Zenodorus, but as Zenodorus assisted the Arabs in their raids in Trachonitis, the leased tetrarchy was cut up, and part of it (Trachonitis) bestowed on Herod the Great by Augustus (23 B.C.). Zenodorus died in 20 B.C., when Augustus gave the rest of his possessions (tetrarchy of Lysanias I) to Herod. After Herod's death (4 B.C.) it passed to his son Philip, who held it till his death in 34 A.D. In 37 A.D. Caligula gave the two tetrarchies to Agrippa I, with the title of king, and in 40 A.D. added thereto the tetrarchy of Herod Antipas. Agrippa I was confirmed in its possession by Claudius (41 A.D.), who also gave him the whole kingdom of his grandfather Herod. On his death the tetrarchy was incorporated into the Provincia Syria, and administered by procurators. But in 53 A.D. Claudius conferred on Agrippa II the tetrarchy of Philip and that of Lysanias I (Abilene), and they were held by him till his death in 100 A.D. In the reign of Tiberius, as is clear from an inscription found at Abila, Abilene was severed from the kingdom of Chalcis (that of Lysanias I). The tetrarch of this separate Abilene was a Lysanias II, and the name of Lysanias continued to cling to the place (Lk 3 1 is correct). J. R. S. S.

IVORY (שֶׁנְהַבִּים, shenhabbīm, 'elephant's tooth,' or simply שֵׁן, shēn, 'tooth'; ἐλεφάντινος, Rev 18 12): Ivory was brought to Palestine both by ship (I K 10 22) and by caravan (Ezk 27 15). It was a type of richness and beauty (Song 5 14; cf. 7 4). Solomon's throne was of ivory overlaid with gold (I K 10 18), and we read also of benches (Ezk 27 6), beds (Am 6 4), and houses (I K 22 39; Ps 45 8; Am 3 15) which were apparently decorated with ivory inlays. L. G. L.

IVVAH, iv'vā (עִוָּה, 'iwwāh, Ivah AV): A city probably in Syria and conquered by Sargon as would be inferred from II K 18 34, 19 13, and Is 37 13. From this city colonists were brought to the conquered cities of Israel in Samaria, if Avvah (עַוָּה, 'awwāh, II K 17 24) is the same place. C. S. T.

IYE-ABARIM, ɑi''ye-ab'ɑ-rim (עִיֵּי הָעֲבָרִים, 'iyyē hā'ăbhārīm, 'iyim of the further regions'—namely, the highlands of Moab; Ije-abarim AV): A station of Israel on the E. border of Moab (Nu 21 11, 33 44), the same as Iyim (33 45, Iim AV). It is called Iyim of "the further regions," to distinguish it from Iyim in S. Judah. C. S. T.

IYIM, ɑi'yim (Iim AV). See IYE-ABARIM.

IYYAR, î''yār': The second month of the Jewish year. See TIME, § 3.

IZHAR, iz'hār (יִצְהָר, yitshār), 'he shines,' or 'oil': The ancestral head of one of the great subdivisions of the Kohathite Levites, the Izharites (Ex 6 18; Nu 3 19, etc.). E. E. N.

IZLIAH, iz-lɑi'ɑ (יִזְלִיאָה, yizlī'āh, Jezliah AV): A Benjamite (I Ch 8 18). E. E. N.

IZRAHIAH, iz''rɑ-hɑi'ā (יִזְרַחְיָה, yizraḥyāh), 'J" is risen' or 'shines': 1. The ancestral head of a family of Asher (I Ch 7 3). 2. A leader of the singers at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12 42, where the form is Jezrahiah). E. E. N.

IZRAHITE, iz'ra-hait, יִזְרָחִי, yizrāḥ[ī]: The patronymic (?) of Shamhuth (I Ch 27 8). Perhaps the same as "Zerahite" (ver. 11), but, possibly, a copyist's mistake. See SHAMHUTH. E. E. N.

IZRI, iz'rai (יִצְרִי, yitsrī): A Levite, the leader of the fourth course of musicians (I Ch 25 11, Zeri in ver. 3). E. E. N.

IZZIAH, iz-zai'ā (יִזִּיָה, yizzīyāh, Jeziah AV): One of the "sons of Parosh," who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 25). E. E. N.

JAAKAN, jê'a-kan (יַעֲקָן, ya'ăqān): An Edomite clan (I Ch 1 42; Akan in Gn 36 27). The 'wells (Beeroth) of the sons of Jaakan' are mentioned in Dt 10 6 as a station on the wilderness journey. Their exact location is unknown. E. E. N.

JAAKOBAH, jê"a-kō'bā (יַעֲקֹבָה, ya'ăqōbhāh): The head of a Simeonite family (I Ch 4 36). E. E. N.

JAALA, ja-ê'la (יַעְלָא, ya'ălā'), JAALAH, ja-ê'lā (יַעֲלָה, ya'ălāh): The ancestral head of a subdivision of "sons of Solomon's servants" (Ezr 2 56 = Neh 7 58). E. E. N.

JAALAM, ja-ê'lam. See JALAM.

JAANAI, jê'a-nai or -nê. See JANAI.

JAARE-OREGIM, jê"a-rî-ōr'ę-jim (יַעְרֵי אֹרְגִים, ya'ărē 'ōrgīm): Evidently a textual corruption in II S 21 19 for yā'īr, which appears in the parallel passage (I Ch 20 5). The small rēsh in ya'ărē (see Hebrew text) indicates that the word was early regarded as textually suspicious, while 'ōrgīm, 'weavers,' has arisen through a scribe's error in repeating the word at the end of the verse. A. S. C.

JAARESHIAH jê"a-rę-shai'ā (יַעֲרֶשְׁיָה, ya'ăreshyāh, Jaresiah AV): A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 27). E. E. N.

JAASIEL, ja-ê'si-el (יַעֲשִׂיאֵל, ya'ăsī'ēl): One of David's heroes, called a Mezobaite, i.e., of Mispah? (I Ch 11 47). Perhaps the same person is referred to in I Ch 27 21. E. E. N.

JAASU, jê'a-sū (יַעֲשָׂו, ya'ăsāw, Jaasau AV): One who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 37). E. E. N.

JAAZANIAH, jê-az"a-nai'ā (יַאֲזַנְיָהוּ, יַאֲזַנְיָה, ya'ăzanyāhū, ya'ăzanyāh), 'J" heareth': 1. A Maacathite, captain of some of the guerrillas left in Judah by Nebuchadrezzar (II K 25 23 = Jezaniah, Jer 40 8), who came to give allegiance to Gedaliah the governor. 2. One of the Rechabites whom Jeremiah tempted with wine (Jer 35 3 f.) as an example to Judah. 3. The son of Shaphan, one of seventy elders who were seen in a vision to offer incense (Ezk 8 11) to idols. 4. Son of Azzur, one of the princes against whose counsel Jeremiah was commanded to prophesy (Ezk 11 1). C. S. T.

JAAZIAH, jê"a-zai'ā (יַעֲזִיָהוּ, ya'ăzyāhū): 'J" strengthens': A Merarite Levite (I Ch 24 26 f.). E. E. N.

JAAZIEL, ja-ê'zi-el (יַעֲזִיאֵל, ya'ăzī'ēl), 'God strengthens': A Levite musician (I Ch 15 18; "Aziel" in ver. 20). E. E. N.

JABAL, jê'bal (יָבָל, yābhāl): A son of Lamech (Gn 4 20). With his "brothers," Jubal and Tubal, he is counted as one of the originators of early civilization. The Heb. word for 'ram' is very similar to "Jabal," but this may have nothing to do with the statement that he was the "father" of tent-dwellers and cattle-owners, i.e., of the nomads. "Jubal," also, is similar to yōbhēl, 'ram,' or 'ram's horn,' a musical instrument. The original source of this genealogical list is too remote to determine what it actually signified. It may have been semi-mythological in its earliest form. E. E. N.

JABBOK, jab'bok (יַבֹּק, yabbōq): A river E. of the Jordan, named as the N. limit of the domain of Sihon, King of the Amorites (Nu 21 24; Jos 12 2; Jg 11 22). It also furnished the N. boundary-line of Ammon (Dt 2 37, 3 16). Its sources are in the vicinity of Rabbath Ammon, whence it flows NW by N., approaching Gerasa and turning W., and emptying into the Jordan about 25 m. N. of the Dead Sea. Its modern name, derived from its clear blue aspect, is Nahr ez-Zerka (cf. GASmith, HGHL, p. 534 f.). A. C. Z.

JABESH, jê'besh (יָבֵשׁ, yābhēsh), 'dry': The father of Shallum (II K 15 10). E. E. N.

JABESH-GILEAD, jê"besh-gil'ę-ad (יָבֵשׁ גִּלְעָד, yābhēsh gil'ādh), 'the dry [place] of Gilead' (or Jabesh alone, as in I S 11 1 ff., 31 11 f.; I Ch 10 12): A town of Gilead, mentioned in the peculiar and late story in Jg 21 5 ff. as destroyed and depopulated by the Israelites, four hundred maidens alone being saved to provide wives for the Benjamites. A more historical notice records the rescue of the town from the Ammonites by Saul and the loyalty of the inhabitants to his memory (I S 11 1 ff., 31 11 ff.; II S 2 4-7). The name survives in the Wâdy Yâbis, which rises in the mountains of Gilead and enters the Jordan Valley 10 m. below Beth-shean. After a thorough examination of the whole wâdy, Merrill gives weighty reasons for rejecting Robinson's earlier identification with ed-Deir (Map IV, H 2), and finds Jabesh in the massive ruins at Miryamim, a few miles NW of ed-Deir (Am. PEFSt, 1877, p. 80 f.). L. G. L.

JABEZ, jê'bez (יַעְבֵּץ, ya'bēts): I. The head of a family of Judah, who had large possessions (1 Ch 49 ff.). His name is connected with the Heb. root 'atsabh, 'sorrow.' II. A place in Judah inhabited by the scribes (I Ch 2 55). They are represented as descendants of the Calebite Hur, and related to the Kenites and Rechabites. C. S. T.

JABIN, jê'bin (יָבִין, yābhīn), 'intelligent': 1. A king of Hazor, who headed an unsuccessful alliance against the Israelites under Joshua (Jos 11 1). Hazor was captured and Jabin put to death (Jos 11 10). 2. Another king of Hazor, probably of the same dynasty. He oppressed Israel during the period of Judges. His army led by Sisera was defeated by Barak (Jg 4 2 ff.). Perhaps the two accounts relate to the same person. A. C. Z.

JABNEEL, jab'ne-el (יַבְנְאֵל, yabhne'ēl), 'God buildeth': 1. The westernmost town on the N. border of Judah (Jos 15 11), captured from the Philistines by Uzziah (II Ch 26 6, where it is called Jabneh). It is mentioned in the Apocrypha as Jemnaan (Jth 2 28) and, frequently, as Jamnia (I Mac 4 15; II Mac 12 8, etc.). In the time of the crusades J. had become Ibelin. It is now Yebnah, a village near the left bank of the Nahr Rûbîn, on the road from Gaza to Jaffa. The site contains ruins dating from the crusades, while the remains of the ancient harbor lie near the mouth of the river, 5 m. to the NW. Map I, B 8. Like most border cities, J. suffered severely from the vicissitudes of war. At the beginning of the Christian era, however, the city was large and prosperous. It was especially famous for its rabbinical learning, and, according to Jewish tradition, the Sanhedrin escaped hither before the destruction of Jerusalem. J. was later the seat of a Christian bishopric, but was then rapidly declining in wealth and population. 2. A place of uncertain location, mentioned only as a part of the northern boundary of Naphtali (Jos 19 33). It is called Kaphar Yama in the Talmud, and may be the ruin Yemma, between Mt. Tabor and the Sea of Galilee. Map IV, E 7. L. G. L.

JACAN, jê'can (יַעֲקָן, ya'kān, Jachan AV): The head of a Gadite family (I Ch 5 13). E. E. N.

JACHIN, jê''kin (יָכִין, yākhīn), 'He establishes': I. 1. The ancestral head of one of the clans of Simeon (Gn 46 10; Jarib in I Ch 4 24), the Jachinites (Nu 26 12). 2. The ancestral head of the twenty-first course of priests (I Ch 24 17), whose representatives are referred to in I Ch 9 10; Neh 11 10. II. One of the brazen pillars of the Temple. See TEMPLE, § 16. E. E. N.

JACINTH, jê'sinth. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

JACKAL. See PALESTINE, § 24.

JACOB, jê'cob (יַעֲקֹב, ya'ăqōbh), 'supplanter,' a meaning attested by Hos 12 3: It has frequently been suggested that originally the name was Jacob-el; cf. the Babylonian Ya'qub-ilu, as well as the Egyptian form Y'q'b-ara (= יַעֲקֹב־אֵל), on the name-list of Palestinian towns conquered by Thothmes III.

The story of Jacob is found in Gn chs. 25–50, though from ch. 37 on Joseph is the chief figure. In Gn the word, found mostly in passages assigned to JE, refers to the individual, but in the subsequent literature it is generally a synonym for the nation. In Gn the P sections relating to Jacob are very short.

The stream of the patriarchal epos runs turbid and broken where it is concerned with Jacob. The pure and lofty unworldliness of Abraham and the quiet innocence of Isaac are entirely wanting in Jacob. Eddies and shoals, treacherous cross-currents and the deep and mighty movements of a great river, hastening to the sea, such are the varying phases of his life. To many the formal division of the narrative between J and E (see GENESIS, § 4) may seem mechanical and forced; but it should be remembered that whoever the writer and whatever the age of our present document, the material and events come down from a remote age. The author of Gn was but the collector of traditions that must have originated in different localities and have had a varied history. Gunkel, in his commentary on Gn, has discerned several groups of traditions, which he designates as the Jacob-Esau, the Jacob-Laban, and the Canaan stories. Each of these has a somewhat composite structure, and each revolves about certain religious centers. Bethel is preeminent in one, Shechem in another, Penuel in a third. In part, these stories explain the origin of religious symbols and sanctuaries. As originally told, they were more concerned with the successes and exploits of the national ancestor than with the moral elements. It is manifest to all that the cleverness of Jacob is more emphasized than his moral obliquity. The way Esau despised his birthright is more the subject of reprobation than the cold-hearted craft with which Jacob takes advantage of him.

The question much discussed at the present day is, How large a part do tribal memories play in the patriarchal narratives? It is evident that tribes often figure as sons of an individual (Gn 25 1 ff.), and amalgamations of clans and migrations might easily be associated with the biography of a great ancestor. It seems, however, too artificial and fanciful to account for everything upon the theory of a personalized tribe. There must be at least a starting-point and a germ in a true historic existence. Yet personification is a frequent figure of speech, and no one could for an instant assume that wherever Jacob is mentioned a man is meant. The beauty of many a prophetic oracle is due to bold personification. When we ask, however, what elements of the story we should connect with the man Jacob, we are at once involved in uncertainty. Probably the picture is so complex that satisfactory division is impossible. The birth of the twins (Gn 25 24 ff.) is told as if it were a genuine family history, but the oracle (Gn 25 23) relates to nations. The bargaining over the mess of pottage is realistic and personal, but Gn 25 30 recalls the red rocks of Esau's territory. Rebekah's incitement of Jacob to impersonate Esau is a very human touch, but the blessing (Gn 27 27 ff.) covers the history of races and the tragedy of supremacy won at the sword's point. The vision at Bethel has all the pathos and intensity of a personal experience; the tender love for Rachel, lasting through the long years of a strenuous life, has little significance as a racial memory; but the names of the sons and the mimetic etymologies appear like the efforts of a later age to account for groupings, antipathies, and characteristics which antedated the historians' memory. So, too, the struggles with Laban and the nomadic movements in Palestine are a bewildering mixture of personal and racial elements.

Does the author of the present narratives intentionally personify? This question should probably be answered in the negative. Originally the stories were doubtless told for the sake of entertainment, but the prophetic purpose was edification. The picturesque element was retained and perhaps even heightened, but the prophetic writer of Gn did not care so much to tell how a shrine became sacred as to magnify the moral or spiritual significance of an event transacted there. We find that the question asked during the celebration of the Passover (Ex 12 26) became the occasion for the recital of the old story of deliverance; undoubtedly the question thus embalmed in that rite was the type of many asked when worshipers gathered at pilgrimage shrines. Curiosity might first have dictated the inquiry, but curiosity became the occasion for teaching and the answer the vehicle for a lesson or a doctrine. So when asked about the pillar at Bethel or the sanctity of Penuel, an answer must be forthcoming. The method at first might have been crude, but in the form we now possess the product is unrivaled.

Archeologically it is of intense interest to trace the long past movements of the Jacob-clans and their struggles for a foothold in Canaan, to see them seizing upon advantage whenever a foe was off guard, to observe their appropriation of spots where they first caught glimpses of desirable pasture-lands, or when by a vigil they prepared themselves for a critical encounter; but religiously it is of greater value to see these events as they are interpreted in their bearing upon individual human life. Jacob is preeminently the eponymous patriarch; in him his children's strength and weakness are mirrored. His name is theirs and each can receive reproof and take courage from his experience. Hosea, in words which run off into obscurity, discerns this microcosmic analogy (Hos 12 4, 12). The author of Is chs. 40–66 uses the name in tones of tenderness, recognizing the constancy of a relation founded on a covenant.

It is not as we should think to-day that all the bitter fruits of deceit and trickery are described in Jacob's history, but we are told how a lonely man on a barren hillside found God, how in a strange struggle on the borders of the wilderness he discerned dimly the possibilities of greater rewards, and won them at the cost of pain and deformity, yet through the struggle he gained a strength and majesty which make his figure loom up great though human in every line. The story tells of a man whose aspirations and successes were along the low plane of the merely worldly, but who gained step by step a larger outlook and came into a fuller life, whose triumph in the dark hour before the dawn at Penuel was real and lasting.

The modern tendency is to see in the two names Jacob and Israel two distinct national elements, the reminiscence of a time when a foreign wave of immigration swept into Palestine and was amalgamated with earlier indigenous inhabitants. It may well be that the distant memory of such events survives in the dual name, but it is far from the purpose of the writer of Gn to tell such a story. The man who wrestled at Penuel went into the contest as Jacob—'he who grasps the heel'—seeking a material victory; when he comes out he is Israel—'he who perseveres with God'—and has won by his persistence and his steady courage where before his work had been underhanded and ignoble.

Outside of Gn the name is usually national. The locality to which it seems originally to have been confined was the central region—the mountains of Ephraim. This is confirmed by the occurrence of "Jacob-el" in the Thothmes list, where it is associated with other towns in this geographical area, and also by the fact of the strong centralization of the people's life in the territory of the Northern Kingdom. Bethel and Shechem were the spots around which religious memories clustered most tenaciously The father and the best-loved son, with little Benjamin lying to the S., were the great eponyms of the richest portion of the land. It was in the Exile that the deep consciousness of race unity asserted itself and the men of Judah, who were longing for the homeland, could be addressed as "Jacob my servants," whom a career of suffering and trial was to fit for a mission to the world and the inheritance of long-deferred promises. JACOB'S WELL: A well mentioned only in Jn 4 5-12, the general locality of which, however, is easily determined by Gn 33 19 and Jos 24 32 as near Shechem. A constant tradition has identified it with the well near Mt. Gerizim, where the fruitful plain of Mukhnah turns into the Shechem valley. To the Samaritans, who considered themselves the true descendants of Jacob, the whole region about Shechem was full of sacred associations, all more or less clearly reflected in the woman's conversation

The Mouth of Jacob's Well (Present Condition).

(cf. Gn 33 19, 48 22 [cf. RVmg.]; Dt 27 4, 12 f.; Jos 8 30 ff., 24 32). On the SW of the well rises Mt. Gerizim, the sacred mountain of the Samaritans (4 20), on which were the ruins of their Temple, destroyed by the Jews 128 B.C., and across the valley is Mt. Ebal, on the outer slope of which lies Askar, the Sychar (q.v.) of the gospel story, a little over half a mile N. of the well. At the well the road branches to the W. to Shechem—2 m. distant—and Samaria (Nâblus)—8 m. away—which Jesus probably avoided by taking the N. branch past Askar into Galilee. The existence of Jacob's well in this finely watered region has occasioned difficulty. It was dug probably by the patriarch for his household and cattle, in order to prevent trouble with his neighbors already in possession of other sources of supply. The well, though choked with rubbish, is still over 75 ft. deep. It is really a cistern 7½ ft. in diameter, walled in toward the mouth, which was below the surface, and supplied evidently by infiltration from the rainfall. The quality of the water is particularly good, being much superior to that of the brooks and springs from the limestone hills. The woman, who possibly came at noon to draw water for villagers laboring in the wheat-fields near by, understood Jesus to claim by His promise of "living water" that He had access to a spring of better water than Jacob's well afforded. JADA, jê'da (יָדָע, yādhā'), 'He knows': A Jerahmeelite clan (I Ch 2 28, 32). E. E. N.

JADAU, ja-dê'u or jê'dō. See Iddo.

JADDUA, jad-diū'a (יַדּוּעַ, yaddūa'), 'known': 1. A chief of the post-exilic community (Neh 10 21). 2. Chief priest c. 350–300 B.C. The list in Neh 12 11, 22 shows that be belonged to the third generation after Nehemiah. He is, therefore, to be identified with the Jaddua of Josephus (Ant. XI, 7 12, 8 4, 7), the contemporary of Alexander the Great. The story in Josephus about the means taken by Jaddua to appease the wrath of Alexander as he was marching against Jerusalem is improbable, conflicting with other data of Alexander's campaign. Its historical kernel may be only this, that Alexander was, on the whole, favorably disposed toward the Jews. E. E. N.

JADON, jê'don (יָדוֹן, yādhōn): A man from Meronoth (site unknown), who assisted at the building of the wall (Neh 3 7). E. E. N.

JAEL, jê'el (יָעֵל, yā'ēl), 'mountain-goat': The wife of Heber, the Kenite. When Sisera was defeated at the battle of Esdraelon and his army scattered, he fled to the tent of Heber, trusting in the peace existing between him and his own master Jabin. Jael received him with the appearance of the most cordial kindness, but when such suspicions as he might have had as to her possible attitude had been disarmed, and he had fallen asleep, she put him to death in a most revolting manner by driving a tent-pin through his temple. This is the story in Jg 4 20 f. In the song of Deborah (Jg 5 24-27) she is represented as striking Sisera down with a "workman's hammer" (probably the hammer used in driving the tent-pins), in the very act of drinking the sour milk she had given him ("At her feet he bowed, he fell: Where he bowed, there he fell down dead"). Of the two versions the poetical is probably the more accurate. Sisera could not have claimed the rights of hospitality from Heber, the Kenite, who was in alliance with the Israelites. It is, moreover, easier to understand how Jael achieved her renown for courage by striking down a man, as the poem has it, than by taking advantage of him when asleep. A. C. Z.

JAH, jā (יָהּ, yāh): A shortened form for "Jehovah," sometimes used alone, especially in poetry

JAHATH, jē'hath (יַחַת, yaḥath): 1. A clan of Judah, living near Kiriath-jearim (I Ch 4 2; cf. 2 52-54). 2. The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Gershonite Levites (I Ch 6 20, 43, 23 10, 11). 3. A Kohathite Levite (I Ch 24 22). 4. A Merarite Levite (II Ch 34 12). E. E. N.

JAHAZ, jē'haz, JAHAZA, ja-hē'za or jē'ha-za, JAHAZAH, ja-hē'zā or jē'ha-zā, JAHZAH, jā'zā (יַהְצָה, יַהַץ, yahats, yahtsāh): A city of the Amorite kingdom of Sihon, where Sihon was slain by Israel (Nu 21 23; Dt 2 32; Jg 11 20 f.). It was S. of Heshbon, on the main road along the table-land (Jer 48 21). It belonged to Reuben (Jos 13 18) and was given to the Levites, children of Merari (Jos 21 36; I Ch 6 78 [63]). The Mesha inscription states that it was fortified by Israel, but captured by Mesha and added to Dibon. Not identified. C. S. T.

JAHAZIAH, jē'ha-zai'ā. See JAHZEIAH.

JAHAZIEL, ja-hē'zi-el (יַחֲזִיאֵל, yaḥăzī'ēl), 'El sees': 1. One of the thirty heroes who joined David at Ziklag (I Ch 12 4). 2. A priest and trumpeter for service before the Ark (I Ch 16 6). 3. A son of Hebron, a Kohathite (I Ch 23 19, 24 23). 4. A Levite, of the sons of Asaph, who encouraged Jehoshaphat and Judah against Moab (II Ch 20 14). 5. A Jew in Babylon, whose son returned with Ezra to Jerusalem (Ezr 8 5). C. S. T.

JAHDAI, jā'dai or jā'dê (יַהְדַי, yāḥday): A Calebite (I Ch 2 47). E. E. N.

JAHDIEL, jā'di-el (יַחְדִיאֵל, yaḥdī'ēl), 'God gives joy': The ancestral head of a Manassite clan E. of the Jordan (I Ch 5 24). E. E. N.

JAHLEEL, jā'lē-el (יַחְלְאֵל, yaḥl'ē'ēl): The ancestral head of a clan of Zebulun (Gn 46 14), the Jahleelites (Nu 26 26). E. E. N.

JAHMAI, jā'ma-ai or jā'mê (יַחְמַי, yaḥmay): A clan of Issachar (I Ch 7 2). E. E. N.

JAHZAH, jā'zā. See JAHAZ.

JAHZEEL, jā'zē-el (יַחְצְאֵל, yaḥts'ē'ēl), 'God divides': The ancestral head of a clan of Naphtali (Gn 46 24; Jahziel in I Ch 7 13), the Jahzeelites (Nu 26 48). E. E. N.

JAHZEIAH, jā-zī'yā (יַחְזְיָה, yaḥzᵉyāh), 'J" sees,' AV Jahaziah (Ezr 10 15): Son of Tikvah; according to RV, one of four to oppose Ezra in getting the Jews to put away their foreign wives. RVmg. and AV represent him as one who helped Ezra. C. S. T.

JAHZERAH, jā'zē-rā (יַחְזְרָה, yaḥzērāh): A priest (I Ch 9 12), also called Ahzai (Neh 11 13, Ahasai AV). E. E. N.

JAHZIEL, jā'zi-el. See JAHZEEL.

JAIR, jē'ēr (יָאִיר, yā'īr): 1. A descendant of Manasseh, whom the dominant tradition made the conqueror of Amorite territory N. of the Jabbok, and the eponymous hero of the Havvoth-jair ('tent-villages of Jair'), whose number varies in the different accounts from 23 to 60 (Nu 32 41; Dt 3 14; Jos 13 30; I K 4 13; I Ch 2 22). The date of this conquest is quite uncertain; recent commentators make it post-Mosaic, from the similarity of the narrative to Jg ch. 1, and because of his possible identity with the Gileadite judge Jair (Jg 10 3-5), who is said to have given his name to a group of tent-villages. I Ch 2 22 makes Jair a Machirite on his mother's side and a Judahite on his father's, which suggests that a clan of mixed lineage from the west established itself by conquest in Gilead. Ira, the Jairite (II S 20 26), was probably a descendant of Jair. 2. The father of Mordecai (Est 2 5). 3 (yā'īr). The father of Elhanan, the Bethlehemite (I Ch 20 5). A. S. C.

JAIRITE, jē'ēr-ait. See JAIR.

JAIRUS, ja-ai'rus ('Ιάειρος, according to Nestle =Heb. ya'ir, 'he will awaken'): A synagogue ruler (ἄρχων, Mt 9 18) who besought Jesus to come and restore his daughter. The tradition concerning him varies somewhat. The original form of it is found probably in Mt (9 18 ff.), where no name is given. Since D omits the name also in Mk (5 22), it may have been inserted in this Gospel for the sake of giving the narrative vividness. J. M. T.

JAKAN, jē'kan. See JAAKAN.

JAKEH, jē'ke (Pr 30 1). See AGUR.

JAKIM, jē'kim (יָקִים, yāqīm), 'He raises': 1. The ancestral head of the twelfth course of priests (I Ch 24 12). 2. A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 19). E. E. N.

JALAM, jē'lam (יְעֻלָם, ya'lām, Jaalam AV): The ancestral head of a clan of Edom (Gn 36 5, 14, 18). E. E. N.

JALON, jē'lon (יָלוֹן, yālōn): A descendant of Caleb (I Ch 4 17). Probably a place-name. E. E. N.

JAMBRES, jam'brîz. See JANNES AND JAMBRES.

JAMES ('Ιάκωβος): The name of three prominent N T persons. 1. The son of Zebedee (Mk 1 19) and Salome (cf. Mt 27 56 with Mk 15 40), and the elder brother of John (before whom he is always named, Mk 1 19, 29, 5 37, 9 2, 10 35, 41, etc.), and, with him, one of the Apostles (Mk 3 17; Mt 10 2; Lk 6 14), sometimes called "the greater" to distinguish him from "James the less." On the supposition that Salome was a sister of Mary (cf. the four names given in Mk 15 40 and Mt 27 56 with the statement of Jn 19 25), these brothers were the cousins of Jesus. It was possibly because of such relationship that Salome requested of Jesus special honors for them in the expected Messianic kingdom (Mt 20 20 f. See JOHN THE APOSTLE). His home was probably in Capernaum, and from the reference to hired servants in the employ of Zebedee (Mk 1 20) and the mention of the fact that Salome was one of the women who ministered of their substance to Jesus and His company (cf. Mk 15 41 with Lk 8 3), the family was in all likelihood one of means. The passage Jn 1 35-46 leaves it uncertain whether J. was a disciple of the Baptist. He is first mentioned in the call of the four fishermen at the Sea of Galilee (Mk 1 16-20 and ||s). From his prominent position in the Apostolic lists (Mk 3 16 f.; Mt 10 2; Lk 6 14; Ac 1 13) and his place in the group of Jesus' three intimate disciples (Mk 5 37, 9 2, 13 3, 14 33), he was with his brother evidently one of the foremost of those chosen to the Master's service. The name "Boanerges" (q.v.), referred to in the list of Apostles in Mk as given the brothers by Jesus (Mk 3 17), does not need to be understood as given at the time of their choice as Apostles; it is likely rather to have been the result of later events, such as that recorded in Lk 9 52-54.

Though no mention is made of J. after the Resurrection until the record of his martyrdom at the hands of Herod Agrippa (44 A.D., Ac 12 2), the fact that in order to curry favor with the Pharisaic party he was selected along with Peter (who was cast into prison, ver. 3) as the first object of official cruelty shows, probably, that he had not ceased to be prominent among the Apostles and that, beyond his brother, he had retained his bold aggressiveness of character. In this he evidently shared with Peter and it marked them both for attack. The statements in the Hypotyposes of Clement of Alexandria and the Apostolica Historia of the Pseudo-Abdias regarding his death and those regarding his patron sainthood in the Church of Spain are wholly apocryphal. 2. The son of Alphæus, one of the Apostles (Mk 3 18; Mt 10 3; Lk 6 15; Ac 1 13), possibly a brother of Matthew (cf. Mk 3 18 with 2 14). Beyond this, nothing certain is told us about him in the N T. If Alphæus =Clopas (Jn 19 25), then he was "James the less," his mother was Mary, and his brother Joses (Mk 15 40); but the identity of these names is most questionable. The further supposition (on the basis of Jn 19 25) that his mother was a sister of Mary and that he was thus the cousin of Jesus is not warranted, in view of Mk 15 40 and Mt 27 56. (See above, under 1.) 3. The brother of the Lord (Gal 1 19), a later son of Joseph and Mary (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD), in patristic literature called "the Just." The brothers of Jesus were unbelievers in Him throughout His ministry, J.'s conversion being due apparently to a special appearance of Jesus to him after the Resurrection (I Co 15 7). The N T references to him are thus practically confined to the period after the Ascension. He is first mentioned as remaining with his brothers in Jerusalem, in company with his mother, the faithful women, and the Apostles, awaiting the promised gift of the Spirit (Ac 1 13 f.). At the time of Paul's first visit to Jerusalem, he was already of prominence in the Church (Gal 1 19); see APOSTLE; at the time of Peter's imprisonment, his importance had not decreased (Ac 12 17); while at the time of the Jerusalem Council he is referred to, with Peter and John, as one of the "pillars" of the Jewish Christian discipleship in general (Gal 2 9). In fact, the Acts account of the Council shows him to have been the authoritative head of the Jerusalem community (15 13, 19). This is the meaning of the statement in Gal 2 12, where James is referred to, not as the reason for the influence upon Peter of these representatives of the conservative element in Jerusalem, but as the official source of their mission. This also explains his prominence in the closing incident of Paul's active mission life (Ac 21 17-26). From I Co 9 5 it has been inferred that J. was married. As to his authorship of the Epistle which bears his name, see the following article.

It is clear from J.'s utterances at the Council (Ac 15 13-20) and on the occasion of Paul's last visit to Jerusalem (Ac 21 18-25) that J.'s position regarding the observance of the Law as conditioned by the admission to the Church of uncircumcised Gentile converts is to be identified with that of the party of piety (the οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, Ac 11 2; Gal 2 12) rather than with that of the party of bigotry (the τινες τῶν ἀπὸ τῆς αἱρέσεως τῶν Φαρισαίων οἱ πεπιστευκότες, Ac 15 5). The latter held salvation through Christ to be impossible apart from the full observance of the Mosaic Law; so that they were opposed to the admission of Gentile converts without circumcision (Ac 15 1). The former were willing to accept these converts into all the privileges of the spiritual covenant people of God without submission to Jewish rites, but felt that the Jewish Christians should continue piously to observe the Law for themselves, even though (inconsistently) it made impossible full fraternization with the Gentile element in the Church. From this point of view the recognition of Paul and Barnabas as fellow workers with the Jerusalem Apostles (Gal 2 9 f.) was for James a perfectly sincere act. On this basis also the pressure exerted at Antioch by the representatives of this piety party on Peter (Gal 2 12), as the acknowledged leader of this element in the Church, was easy to understand and not without justification. Its unfortunate results were due to the way in which Peter yielded to it, rather than to its character as a demand.

According to Josephus (Ant. XX, 9 1), the Sadducees took advantage of the interval between the death of Festus and the coming of Albinus, in the year 62 A.D., through the high priest Annas, to summon J. before the Sanhedrin on the charge of breaking the sacred laws. Though J. was found guilty and stoned, the indignation of the better class of the Jews at the high-handed action of the high priest was such that, on their complaint to Agrippa and Albinus, Annas was deposed from his position. This account may be accepted as in general representing the facts in the case, though there is no reason to believe that the Pharisees did not unite with the Sadducees in the action, or that the protest to the king and the governor was motived by any personal sympathy or regard for J. The account of his death given by Hegesippus (Eus. HE, II, 23) is legendary —possibly derived from the aprocryphal Ascents of James; while the tradition of his election to be first bishop of Jerusalem (Clem. Alex. in Eus. HE, II, 1) and his exalted position of rulership over the Church at large (Clementine Recognitions, 1 68) are to be resolved in the N T statements of his leadership in the early Church given above.

To James has been assigned the apocryphal

Protevangelium Jacobi, as well as the Jerusalem (or Antioch) Liturgy—the earliest service of the Eastern Church—and the Ascents of James, unknown except through description by Epiphanius (Panarium, 30, 16, 25).

One of the N T writings assigned to the group of the so-called Catholic Epistles (q.v.).

1. Form and Contents.

It is peculiar in its form, lacking all closing salutations and having the briefest greeting of any N T Epistle; while its material is not developed argumentatively, but arranged as separate topics in a sequence whose connections it is not always easy to discover. In its contents, though not possessing the literary quality of Hebrews, it is, like that Epistle, of a distinctively homiletic character, being composed almost wholly of exhortations and warnings bearing upon practical religious living.

It begins with a treatment of the testings involved in the Christian life (1 2-27), urging a joyful view of them, based on the fact of their proving and perfecting character (1 2-4), adding an exhortation to prayer, if need is felt of spiritual wisdom in their enduring (1 5-8), and to a cheerful acceptance of the changes of fortune which they may involve, because of the blessings to character which must result (1 9-12). This is followed by a warning as to a right view of the sources of temptation as distinct from testing (1 13-18). The readers are then exhorted to a proper hearing and a practical doing of the word, based on the essential principles involved in their spiritual attitude toward it (1 19-27).

What follows to the close of the Epistle (2 1–5 20) may possibly be considered in general a treatment of the relationships involved in the Christian life, though the thought which leads from one exhortation and warning to the other is not always clearly discernible. There is, first, a warning against a partiality toward the rich, based on God's honoring of the poor, their oppression by the rich, and the fundamental law of neighborly love (2 1-13). Possibly because of the dead orthodoxy involved in such a tendency to be influenced by the externals of life, the author is led to an instruction as to the true relation of faith and works (2 14-26), and possibly because of the element of doctrine involved in this instruction, he is brought to a warning against the multiplication of mere doctrine teachers (3 1), the peculiar danger of whose vocation lies in the fact that the teacher's work is specially open to the abuse of speech (3 2), this being followed naturally by a general presentation of the importance, depravity, and untamableness of the tongue, which is illustrated by various examples (3 3-12). Over against such possibilities the author exhorts his readers to meekness and peaceableness (3 13-18). To this he adds a reminder that the source of factions and warrings among themselves is their own unspiritual living (4 1-6), against which he enters a strong and urgent plea (4 7-10). There then follows an exhortation against the evidently related fault of uncharitable judgment, usurping, as it does, the place of God, as Judge and Interpreter of the Law (4 11 f.). Possibly because of the idea of haughtiness in their thinking, the author proceeds to a condemnation of those presumptuous plans for the future which ignore the uncertainty of life (4 13-17). As such plans seem to be made largely by the self-complacent rich, this judgment upon them leads him to a pronouncement of wo upon this class of the Church's people, because of their miserly oppression of the poor and their self-indulgent luxury (5 1-6). This brings him to the general thought of patience, which is presented from various points of view through the remainder of the Epistle (5 7-20). There is, first, an exhortation to the patient endurance needed under such oppression, to which endurance the sufferers are encouraged by the nearness of the coming of the Lord, having an inspiring example in the O T prophets and patriarchs (5 7-11); then there is a warning against that mark of impatience which is given by swearing (5 12), in contrast with which the readers are urged to turn to prayer in trouble (suggesting possibly the grace of praise in joy and the wisdom of availing themselves of the healing help of the Church in sickness), 5 13-15; in general, they are urged to enter into the fellowship of the Christian brotherhood in all their spiritual experience, from which habit of fellowship comes the possibility of large service and rich blessing to one another (5 16-20).

2. Relation of Epistle to Apostolic Age.

From this review of the contents of the Epistle the question naturally arises as to the conditions in the Church of which it is the product. Are they the conditions of an early or of a late period in the Apostolic Age, or of a period before or after that age? It is on this question that the chief debate regarding the Epistle has centered.

Obviously, the general topics of the spiritual significance of trials, the obligations of religious living, the temptations which come upon, and the help which is open to, the poor oppressed by the rich belong to every age of the Church, and nothing can be determined from a cursory reading of the Epistle as to when it was written. It is only from a more detailed study of the contents that determinative conclusions can be drawn.

2a. Readers.

First, then, as to the readers of the Epistle: The letter was sent to Jewish Christians. The claim that it was originally a pre-Christian writing intended only for Jews (Spitta, Zur Geschichte u. Litteratur des Urchristentums, ii, 1896; Massebieau, in Revue de l'histoire des religions, 1895) (1) ignores the fact that the readers are not termed in the address (1 1) the twelve tribes of Israel (as in Mt 19 28; Lk 22 30; Rev 21 12; cf. also Ac 26 7 and the Protevangelium Jacobi, § 1) which in the Dispersion of foreign lands looked to Palestine as their native country and to Jerusalem as their Holy City. The absence of this distinctive national term shows that they are considered rather as the twelve tribes which in the Dispersion of an earthly sojourn looked for an abiding country and city above—a favorite N T designation of Christians from the Jewish point of view (cf. He 13 14; I P 1 1, 17, 2 11, 4 7). (2) It fails also to recognize not only that the purpose of the letter is to urge its readers against such faults as those to which distinctively Jewish converts would naturally be tempted—for, after all, such faults might belong to Jews outside the Church—but that its Jewish message is cast in a specifically Christian mold (e.g., the idea of a Divine birth, through the word of truth, 1 18-21 [cf. Jn 1 13; I P 1 23]; a perfect moral law which is a law of liberty, 1 25, 2 12 [cf. Jn 8 32, 36; Gal 2 4]; an heirship in the kingdom of God through faith, 2 5 [cf. He 11 13, 32, 39 f.]; the contemplation of suffering and trial as a source of exultant joy, 1 2, 9-12 [cf. Mt 5 10-12; I P 4 14]).

A letter, however, addressed to Jewish Christians covering such an extent of country as is implied in this idea of the Dispersion necessitates an early period in the Apostolic Age, when the 2b. Date. Christian Church was exclusively Jewish and communities of this exclusively Jewish character had spread beyond Palestine, as far as Damascus (Ac 9 2, 26 10-12), and Antioch (Ac 11 20-23), and Phœnicia (Ac 15 3). In this letter there is no allusion to the presence of Gentiles in the Church; there is no reference to sins of idolatry, or mention of the relation of masters and slaves. The readers' surroundings within as well as without the Christian brotherhood are Jewish (cf. 2 2, 6 f., 18 f., 5 12). This inference as to the early date of the letter is confirmed by the reference to the Parousia in 5 7-9, where the situation obviously is not one in which the coming of the Lord has been so long delayed that the expectation of it has been given up or questioned (as in II P 3 3-9), but one in which it is still a vital hope to be summoned to one's aid in the midst of trial and suffering (as in II Th 1 4-10; cf. also Mt 24 33). It is further strengthened by the unorganized condition of the church life disclosed in 3 1, where the instruction referred to is not carried on by special persons appointed to this function (as the διδάσκαλοι of I Co 12 28 and Eph 4 11), but indiscriminately by individual members of the community (more as the διδάσκαλοι of Ac 13 1 and Ro 12 7). The elders referred to in 5 14 correspond to the πρεσβύτεροι of general functions, who were the natural officials of primitive communities (cf. the case of the Jerusalem Church, Ac 11 29 f. and the Church of Paul's first mission, Ac 14 23; cf. also I Th 5 12 and see ELDERS). In fact, the healing with oil which they accomplished is mentioned but once elsewhere in the N T (Mk 6 13), and is more of a forerunner of the later Charismata than a sequence from them.

It is clear that the religious condition to which the letter was addressed, while in agreement with an undeveloped period of the Church's life,

2c. Situation. at the same time discloses a falling away from the religious enthusiasm of the first years of the Church's living, due not so much to oppressive measures from outside (2 6 f.) as to the loss of vital conceptions of religious duty and privilege on the part of the readers themselves. (a) There was a tendency to underestimate the spiritual value of the changes of fortune which came to them (1 9-11) and so not only to yield to the influences of the world in their attitude toward the rich (2 1-4, 9), but to adopt the spirit of the world in their own business (4 2-4, 13-17, 5 1-6) and to lose the sense of brotherly relations among themselves (1 26 f., 2 8-12, 4 1, 11 f., 5 9). (b) There was, deeper than this, a tendency to forget the vital connection between creed and conduct —to think that faith was enough without its realization in life (1 5-8, 2 14-20, 3 16 f.)—in fact, to revert to their old Jewish confession of monotheism (2 19) and hearing of the Scriptures (1 22-25), as all that was required of them, or to concentrate religion along certain agreeable lines, ignoring those which were not to their liking (2 8-13). In consequence of this lifeless orthodoxy they were possessed with an inordinate zeal to go about as teachers, imposing upon one another their own ideas (3 1), falling into a spirit of dogmatism and proselytism ruinous to peace among themselves (1 19 f., 3 2-16). (c) These tendencies were accompanied naturally by a loss of the sense of their spiritual privileges as children of God (1 5, 12, 17 f., 2 5, 4 6-8a, 10, 5 7 f., 10 f., 13-17, 19 f.). In brief, their religious life had lost its spiritual fervor and was becoming hardened into the spirit of the world around them. That such a condition could have developed soon in the Jewish Christian communities is evident from the experience of the Jerusalem Church itself (Ac 5 1-11, 6 1). The enthusiasm of Pentecost did not become a permanent grace. The new religion was young; it did not have behind it the steadying force of accumulated habit, and the same human nature was present that in these early days manifested itself with such greed of gold in the Church of Samaria (Ac 8 9-24) and later with such bitterness of faction in the Church of Corinth (I Co 1 10 ff.). To meet such a situation this letter might have been written even before the conversion of Saul (35 A.D.). At all events, the treatment of faith and works in 2 14-26 makes clear that it must have been written before the great discussion aroused by Paul's first mission journey—i.e., before 49 A.D. For this treatment presupposes no such controversy. And if it be claimed that deadening of faith resulted later from the abuse of Paul's Gospel and this letter simply misunderstands Paul's position, it must be remembered that no letter written to Jewish Christian churches after the Council in Jerusalem could have treated the relation of faith and works this way; for on the basis of the issue before this Council the argument which would have been directed against the Jewish Christian was not that faith but works was overemphasized. As a matter of fact, the discussion in this second chapter is in perfect accord with the position of Paul, and the argument it presents is against that fossilizing of faith which came from a reversion to Jewish formalism and not against that distortion of it which came from an abuse of Gentile liberty. James is not talking about faith as the act of entrance upon the Christian life, but as the habit of grace within the Christian life. It is the perfecting rather than the beginning of Christian experience which is before his mind (cf. ver. 22 and with this cf. such references to faith as in 1 3, 6, 2 1, 5, which lead up to this passage. Cf. also Thielemann, in NKZ, 1894, Heft 7). This is a situation, then, earlier than that brought about by Paul, and assigns the Epistle to a date as early at least as 48 A.D.

With the Jewish Christian character of the readers determined, and the early date of the Epistle assured, the problem of authorship

3. Author. practically solves itself. The James of the address designates himself not as an apostle but "a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ." He can not be, therefore, the son of Zebedee, nor the son of Alphæus, but must be the son of Joseph, the brother of the Lord. As head of the Jerusalem Church it would be well within his rights and privileges to send a pastoral letter to the Jewish Christian communities of Syria and Phœnicia, and it would be but natural that he should endeavor to meet their failing spiritual life with such exhortations and warnings as this Epistle presents. To claim that the address is the work of the 2d-cent. forger (Harnack, Chronologie, i, 485–491) is to underestimate the temptation which must have come to one who desired to pose as this revered authority in the early Church so to describe himself in the address or so to refer to himself in the body of the letter as to leave no possible doubt regarding his identity. It is of no significance that the James of the Protevangelium does not clearly distinguish himself. That document was a gospel and the N T Gospels bear no names. Our document was an epistle and, as a rule, the N T Epistles are clearly identified in the authority of their authorships. Obviously in a 2d-cent. forged epistle the assuming of an authorship from Apostolic times was solely for the sake of its authority and called for an unmistakableness of identity.

4. Relation to Other N T Writings.

The determination of the Epistle's early date makes clear that being thus the earliest N T writing it is in no literary dependence upon any of the writings in the Canon. As to the dependence of the other writings upon it, it is questionable whether a letter sent to Jewish Christian communities in Syria and Phœnicia and dealing, not with a propaganda of the works of the Law, but with the danger of making faith merely formal, would present itself to Paul (cf. Smith in JBLE) as in any way affecting the great debate into which his Gospel had brought him, if indeed he knew of the existence of the letter. If it came before him at all, it would be in his later controversy with the hyper-Gentile movement, dealt with especially in Romans (q.v.), in which freedom from the ceremonial law was exaggerated into irresponsibility to the moral law, and in this debate Paul would have had to show his agreement with James and not his opposition to him, or his modification of his views. The Judaizers, as Mayor contends (Epistle of St. James, pp. xc ff.), may have misinterpreted James's views in support of their own position, but if Paul had been acquainted with his letter, he would have pointed out the misinterpretation, as well as combated the false views. This he nowhere does. It is barely possible that James may have been used in other Epistles, though such use would be confined to I Peter (cf. Mayor, pp. xcvii–ciii).

5. Canonicity.

It belongs to the group of the Antilegomena, being recognized by Eusebius as one of the disputed books, though accepted by himself. It is omitted from some of the early lists (e.g., the Muratorian Canon), but included in others (e.g., the Peshiṭto). It is fully quoted as Scripture first by Origen. Its brief form, its unpronounced authorship, and the fact that it was originally sent to an exclusive Jewish circle in the East may largely account for its tardy recognition as part of the literature of the Apostolic Age.

LITERATURE: Among the Introductions in English, Jülicher (transl. 1904) represents the advanced, Zahn (transl. 1908) the conservative German view. The most extensive Commentary is that of Mayor (1897²), besides which may be consulted Beyschlag in Meyer, Krit.-exeget. Kom. üb. d. N T (1897⁶) and Von Soden in Holtzmann, Hand-Kom. z. N T (1893). The most important discussion is that of Spitta, Zur Geschichte u. Litteratur d. Urchristentums, ii (1896). See also Harnack, Chronologie d. Altchristlichen Litteratur, i; Feine, Der Jakobusbrief nach Lehranschauungen u. Entstehungsverhaltnisse (1893); Dale, Discourses on the Epistles of Paul (1895). M. W J.

JAMIN, jê'min (יָמִין, yāmīn), 'the right hand (or side)': 1. The ancestral head of a clan of Simeon (Gn 46 10, etc.), the Jaminites (Nu 26 12). 2. The ancestral head of a family of Judah (I Ch 2 27). 3. A priest (Neh 8 7). E. E. N.

JAMLECH, jam'lec (יַמְלֵךְ, yamlēkh), 'He grants dominion': The head of a Simeonite family (I Ch 4 34). E. E. N.

JANAI, jê'na-ai or jê'nê (יַעְנַי, ya'nay, Jaanai AV): The head of a Gadite family (I Ch 5 12). E. E. N.

JANIM, jan'im (יָנִים, yānīm, Janum AV): A city of Judah (Jos 15 53). Site uncertain, but see Map IV, E 2. E. E. N.

JANNAI, jan'na-ai (Ἰανναί, Janna AV): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 24). E. E. N.

JANNES, JAN'nîz, AND JAMBRES, jam'brîz: Names given in II Ti 3 8 to the Egyptian miracle-workers who "withstood Moses" (Ex 7 11 f.). They are probably of Egyptian etymology. The Targum of Jonathan inserts them in Ex 7 11. An apocryphal document under the title of Jannes and Mambres is mentioned by Origen (in Matt. Comm. 117), and by other early Church writers (Ambrosiaster, Hilary, etc.). But it is doubtful whether this apocryphal work is the one upon which II Ti 3 8 is based. All efforts to reach further into the origin of these names, or to reduce them into some sort of mythical emblems, are for the present to be regarded as mere guesses. A. C. Z.

JANOAH, ja-nō'ā (יָנוֹחַ, yānōaḥ): 1. A town of Naphtali, depopulated by Tiglath-pileser in 734 B.C. (II K 15 29). Map IV, F 5. This site, however, seems too far W. 2. A town on the border of Ephraim (Jos 16 6, 7, Janohah AV). Map III, G 4. E. E. N.

JANUM, jê'num. See JANIM.

JAPHETH, jê'feth. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, §§ 9, 11.

JAPHIA, ja-fai'a (יָפִיעַ, yāphīa'): I. 1. A king of Lachish, conquered and slain by Joshua (Jos 10 3). 2. A son of David (II S 5 15; I Ch 3 7, 14 6). II. A town on the border of Zebulun (Jos 19 12). Map IV, C 7. E. E. N.

JAPHLET, jaf'let (יַפְלֵט, yaphlēṭ), 'He delivers': I. The ancestral head of a clan of Asher (I Ch 7 32 f.). II. A town on the SW border of Ephraim, the home of the Japhletites (Jos 16 3, Japhleti AV). Site unknown. E. E. N.

JAPHO, jê'fō. See JOPPA.

JARAH, jê'rā (יַעְרָה, ya'rāh): One of Saul's descendants (I Ch 9 42), called Jehoaddah in I Ch 8 36. E. E. N.

JAREB, jê'reb or jar'eb (יָרֵב, yārēbh): A king of Assyria (Hos 5 13, 10 6). As this name does not occur in cuneiform literature, the identity of the monarch to whom it refers is in dispute. Sayce's conjecture, which makes it the natal name of Sargon, has met with no favor. The Heb. yārēbh is commonly connected with the root rībh ='to strive,' and variously translated, "the warlike king," "King Combat," etc. The Heb. may also be rendered "the great king." Most scholars identify Jareb with Tiglath-pileser III. J. A. K.

JARED, jê'red or jar'ed (יֶרֶד, yeredh): The father of Enoch (Gn 5 15, etc.); cf. "Irad" in the parallel list in 4 18. E. E. N.

JARESIAH, jar''ę-sai'ā. See JAARESHIAH.

JARHA, jār'ha (יַרְחָע, yarḥā'): An Egyptian slave, who married into the Jerahmeelite family of Sheshan, and became the head of a long line of descendants (I Ch 2 34 f.). It is probable that unions of clans, not individuals, are referred to, possibly a N. Arabian, mutsrī (not mitsrī, 'Egyptian'), clan with a Jerahmeelite one. E. E. N.

JARIB, jê'rib or jar'ib (יָרִיב, yārībh), 'He strives': 1. See JACHIN, I. 1. 2. A teacher in Ezra's company (Ezr 8 16). 3. A priest (Ezr 10 18). E. E. N.

JARMUTH, jār'muth (יַרְמוּת, yarmūth): 1. A Canaanite royal city assigned to Judah (Jos 10 3 f., 15 35). Jerome (Onom. 266, 132) locates a Jermucha 10 Rom. m. from Eleutheropolis, on the way to Jerusalem, and as this corresponds with the modern Khirbet el Yarmūk on the one side, and the Biblical location of Jarmuth on the other, the identification is regarded as satisfactory. Map II, D 1. 2. A Levitical city in Issachar (Jos 21 29; in I Ch 6 57 Ramoth), probably the modern Er-Rāme. Map III, E 2. A. C. Z.

JAROAH, ja-rō'ā (יָרוֹחָ, yārōaḥ): A Gadite (I Ch 5 14). E. E. N.

JASHAR, jash'ar, BOOK OF (סֵפֶר הַיָּשָׁר, ṣēpher hayyāshār), 'book of the upright,' Book of Jasher AV: An ancient collection of poetical compositions celebrating the earlier heroes and conquests of Israel. It is twice expressly quoted in the O T (Jos 10 13; II S 1 18). A third quotation is probably to be found in I K 8 12 f. This passage is not given as a quotation in the Heb. text, but in the LXX. it appears with the added formula: "Is this not written in the Book of the Song?" which appears to be the rendering of an original Heb. text, ṣēpher hashshīr, easily detected as a corruption of ṣēpher hayyāshār. The book was put together after the time of David, and before the 8th cent. B.C. A. C. Z.

JASHEN, jê'shen or jash'ęn (יָשֵׁן, yāshēn): The "sons of Jashen," in the list of David's heroes (II S 23 32), stand immediately after "Elihaba the Shaalbonite." The parallel text (I Ch 11 34) reads "sons of Hashem the Gizonite." The Heb. word for "sons of" is similar to the ending '-bonite,' and it was probably by a scribal error that "sons of" crept into the text of II S in the place of the "Gizonite" of Ch. The text of Ch is probably correct, except that "Gizonite" should be emended to 'Gunite' (see Gr. of Lucian's text of LXX. and cf. Nu 26 48). E. E. N.

JASHOBEAM, ja-shō'bę-am or ja-sheb'ę-am (יָשָׁבְעָם, yāshobh'ām), 'the people will return': The son of Zabdiel the Hachmonite, the chief of David's thirty mighty men (I Ch 11 11, 12 6, 27 2), the correct reading for Josheb-basshebeth (II S 23 8 RV), who lifted up his spear against 300 (800) at one time, and was commander of that division (24,000 men) of the army which was on duty the first month of the year. The Gr. versions seem to have read Ishbosheth (=Eshba'al). C. S. T.

JASHUB, jê'shub or jash'ub (יָשׁוּב, yāshūbh), 'he returns': 1. The ancestral head of one of the great clans of Issachar, the Jashubites (Nu 26 24; called Iob [Job AV] in Gn 46 13). 2. One of the "sons of Bani" (Ezr 10 29). E. E. N.

JASHUBI-LEHEM, ja-shū''bai-lî'hem or jash''yu-bai- (יָשֻׁבִי לֶחֶם, yāshūbhī leḥem): A word of very irregular formation and therefore probably not a proper name (I Ch 4 22). It may be the survival of "and they returned to Bethlehem." E. E. N.

JASIEL, jê'si-el, ja-sai'el, or jas'i-el. See JAASIEL.

JASON, jê'sǫn (Ἰάσων): A common Gr. name used by the Jews as an equivalent for Joshua or Jesus. 1. Jason of Cyrene, who wrote, not earlier than 160 B.C., a history in five books of the wars for Jewish freedom under the Maccabees, of which an epitome is given in II Mac. It is less reliable than I Mac. 2. Jason, second son of Simon II, brother of Onias III, who about 175 B.C. secured the high-priesthood from Antiochus Epiphanes, with whom he cooperated eagerly in his endeavor to Hellenize the Jewish nation, introducing Greek practises, which were an abomination to the patriotic party. Being supplanted by Menelaus, he escaped after many adventures to Sparta and "perished in a strange land." 3. Jason of Thessalonica (Ac 17 5-9), Paul's host, and for that reason attacked by the Jews—possibly the same as the Jason of Ro 16 21, a kinsman of Paul, i.e., a fellow Jew. R. A. F.

JATHNIEL, jath'ni-el (יַתְנִיאֵל, yathnī'ēl): A son of Meshelemiah (I Ch 26 2). E. E. N.

JATTIR, jat'ęr (יַתִּיר, yattīr): A city in Judah (Jos 15 48, 21 14; I S 30 27; I Ch 6 57). Map II, E 16. E. E. N.

JAVAN, jê'van or jav'an. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, §§ 9, 11.

JAVELIN. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 1.

JAW-BONE. See LEHI.

JAZER, jê'zęr (יַעְזֵר, ya'zēr): A town of the Amorites near the border of Ammon, taken by Israel (Nu 21 32) and given to Gad (Jos 13 25; II S 24 5; I Ch 26 31), who fortified it (Nu 32 35). Later it became a Levitical city (Jos 21 39; I Ch 6 81). It was in a country suited for grazing (Nu 32 1, 3) and for producing wine (Is 16 8 f.; Jer 48 32). It came into the possession of Moab (Is 16 8 f.), and was a city of the Ammonites in the time of Judas Maccabæus (I Mac 5 8). Eus. and Jer. in the Onomasticon place it 15 m. N. of Heshbon and 8 m. W. of Philadelphia. The ruins of Khurbet Sar would correspond to this. For another identification see Map I, G 8. "The Sea of Jazer" (Jer 48 32) seems to be a corruption of the text. C. S. T.

JAZIZ, jê'ziz (יָזִיז, yāzīz): David's chief shepherd (I Ch 27 31). E. E. N.

JEALOUS. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (b); DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 7 (12); SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 12; and GOD, § 1.

JEATHERAI, je-ath'e-rai (יְאַתְרַי, ye'athray, Jeaterai AV): A Gershonite Levite (I Ch 6 21; Ethni in ver. 41). E. E. N.

JEBERECHIAH, je-ber''e-cai'ā (יְבֶרֶכְיָהוּ, yebherekhyāhū), 'J" blesses': A son of Zechariah (Is 8 2). E. E. N.

JEBUS, jî'bus. See JERUSALEM, § 19.

JEBUSITE, jeb'u-sait (יְבוּסִי, yebhūṣī): For the Jebusites of Canaan see ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11. In Zech 9 7 "Jebusite" seems to mean "Jerusalemite." The prophecy looks forward to a time when the Philistine remnant shall be incorporated into the purified Jewish commonwealth. See JERUSALEM, § 19. E. E. N.

JECAMIAH, jec''a-mai'ā. See JEKAMIAH.

JECHILIAH, jek''i-lai'ā (יְכִילְיָה, yekhīlyāh), 'J" is able': The mother of King Uzziah (II Ch 26 3; Jecholiah in II K 15 2). E. E. N.

JECHONIAH, jec''o-nai'ā, JECHONIAS, jec''o-nai'as. See JEHOIACHIN.

JEDAIAH, je-dê'yā or je-dai'ā, the transliteration of two Heb. names: 1 (יְדָיָה, yedhāyāh). 'J" praises': a. A Simeonite chieftain (I Ch 4 37). b. One who helped rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 10). 2 (יְדַעְיָה, yedhā'yāh). 'J" knows': a. The ancestral head of the second course of priests (I Ch 9 10, 24 7; Ezr 2 36; Neh 7 39, 11 10, 12 6, 7, 19). b. A priest (Neh 12 7, 21). c. A returned exile (Zech 6 9, 14). E. E. N.

JEDIAEL, je-dai'a-el (יְדִיעֲאֵל, yedhī'ă'ēl), 'known of God': 1. The ancestral head of one of the clans of Benjamin (I Ch 7 6 ff.). 2. One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 45, 12 20). 3. A Korahite doorkeeper (I Ch 26 2). E. E. N.

JEDIDAH, je-dai'dā (יְדִידָה, yedhīdhāh), 'beloved': The mother of Amon, King of Judah (II K 22 1). E. E. N.

JEDIDIAH, jed''i-dai'ā. See SOLOMON, § 1.

JEDUTHUN, je-dū'thun (יְדוּתוּן, יְדִיתוּן, yedhūthūn, Kethibh of Pss 39, 62, 77 (titles); Neh 11 17; I Ch 16 38, yedhīthūn): According to the Chronicler, the name of one of the three chief singers in the service of the Sanctuary at the time of David (I Ch 9 16, 16 38 f., 25 1 f.; II Ch 5 12, 29 14, 35 15), the same as Ethan (I Ch 6 44, 15 17, 19). It is rather the name of a post-exilic musical gild (Neh 11 17) which was connected by the Chronicler with the Levites. In the titles of Pss 39 ("for" mistake for "after the manner of"), 62, 77 the RV translates correctly "after the manner of (the choir of) yedhūthūn." C. S. T.

JEEZER, je-î'zer, JEEZERITE, je-î'zer-ait. See ABIEZER.

JEGAR-SAHADUTHA, jî''gar-sê''ha-dū'tha (יְגַר שָׂהֲדוּתָא, yegar sāhădhūthā'): The Aramaic equivalent of the Heb. gal'ēdh, 'heap of witness' (Gn 31 47). E. E. N.

JEHALLELEL, je-hal'e-lel (יְהַלְלְאֵל, yehallel'ēl, Jehaleleel AV), 'God praises': 1. A Calebite (I Ch 4 16). 2. A Levite (II Ch 29 12). E. E. N.

JEHDEIAH, je-dî'yā or je-dai'ā (יְחְדְיָהוּ, yeḥdeyāhū), 'J" is glad': 1. The overseer of David's asses (I Ch 27 30). 2. A Levite (I Ch 24 20). E. E. N.

JEHEZKEL, je-hez'kel (יְחִזְקֵאל, yeḥezqē'l, Jehezekel AV), 'God strengthens' (cf. EZEKIEL): The ancestral head of the twentieth course of priests (I Ch 24 16). E. E. N.

JEHIAH, je-hai'ā (יְחִיָה, yeḥīyāh), 'J" lives': A Levite doorkeeper (I Ch 15 24). E. E. N.

JEHIEL, je-hai'el (יְחִיאֵל, yeḥī'ēl), 'God lives': 1. A member of David's court (I Ch 27 32). 2. A son of Jehoshaphat (II Ch 21 2). 3. A priest (II Ch 35 8). 4. The ancestor of a family of Gershonite Levites (I Ch 23 8, 26 21 f.; here called Jehieli, 29 8). 5. The father of Obadiah (Ezr 8 9). 6. One of the "sons of Elam" (Ezr 10 2, 26). On II Ch 29 14 see JEHUEL. 7. A priest (Ezr 10 21). 8. The name of two Levites: (1) I Ch 15 18, 20, 16 5; (2) II Ch 31 13. E. E. N.

JEHIZKIAH, jî''hiz-kai'ā (יְחִזְקִיָהוּ, yeḥizqīyyāhū), 'J" strengthens': A chief of Ephraim under Pekah (II Ch 28 12). E. E. N.

JEHOADDAH, je-hō'ad-dā (Jehoadah AV). See JARAH.

JEHOADDAN, jî''ho-ad'an (יְהוֹעַדָּן, yehō'addān), and JEHOADDIN, jî''ho-ad'din, 'J" gives delight': The mother of Joash, King of Judah (II K 14 2; II Ch 25 1). E. E. N.

JEHOAHAZ, je-hō'a-haz (יְהוֹאָחָז, yehō'āḥāz), 'J" lays hold': 1. The son and successor of Jehu as king of Israel (II K 10 35, 13 1-9; called Joahaz in II K 14 1), involved in unsuccessful wars with Benhadad II of Syria. He reigned 16 to 18 years (815–799 B.C.). 2. The third son and immediate successor of Josiah at Jerusalem (II K 23 30-34; called Joahaz in II Ch 36 2-4; apparently also called Shallum, Jer 22 11; cf. I Ch 3 15). He was raised to the throne by the people, possibly as the one among the king's sons who was identified with the anti-Egyptian policy. When Pharaoh Necho, after the battle of Megiddo (608 B.C.), became master of the kingdom of Judah, Jehoahaz was seized and carried to Riblah and thence to Egypt, where he was detained until his death. 3. The same as Ahaziah, King of Judah (II Ch 21 17, 25 23). A. C. Z.

JEHOASH, jẹ-hō'ash (יְהוֹאָשׁ, yᵉhō'āsh, also called Joash), 'J" gives,' or 'J" is strong': 1. The son of Ahaziah, and king of Judah (II K ch. 11 f., etc.) (837–798 B.C.). He was rescued as an infant by Jehoiada, the priest, from Athaliah's effort to annihilate the royal family. At the age of seven he was proclaimed king, Athaliah being put to death. He is said to have reigned forty years, but the six years of Athaliah's usurpation may be included in this reckoning. He undertook to raise funds for the repairing of the Temple at Jerusalem, and, after some difficulty with the Temple priesthood, he succeeded. Being threatened with an invasion by Hazael, he stripped the Temple of its gold and sent it to the king of Syria as a bribe. Soon afterward, he was assassinated by a band of conspirators. 2. The son of Jehoahaz and king of Israel (II K 13 10-25, 14 8-16), noted for his admiration of the aged prophet Elisha, who, however, on his death-bed severely rebuked J. for his weakness in prosecuting the war against Syria (13 14-19). J. was fairly successful in this war (13 23-25), and also against the rash attempt of Ahaziah of Judah to conquer him (14 8-14). His reign of sixteen years saw the revival of Israel from its humiliation at the hands of Syria. 3. A son of Becher (I Ch 7 8). 4. The keeper of the oil-cellars of David (I Ch 27 28). 5. The father of Gideon (Jg 6 11). 6. A son of Ahab (I K 22 26). 7. A Judahite, son of Shelah (I Ch 4 22). 8. One of the mighty men of David (I Ch 12 3). A. C. Z.

JEHOHANAN, jĭ"ho-hê'nan (יְהוֹחָנָן, yᵉhōḥānān, also Johanan), 'J" is gracious': 1. One of the gatekeepers of the Tabernacle in the reign of David (I Ch 26 3). 2. A captain appointed by Jehoshaphat (II Ch 17 15; cf. 23 1). 3. One of the "sons of Bebai," who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 28). 4. A priest of the time of Jehoiakim (Neh 12 13). 5. A priest of the time of Nehemiah (Neh 12 42). A. C. Z.

JEHOIACHIN, jẹ-hoi'a-kin (יְהוֹיָכִין, יְהוֹיָכִן, yᵉhōyākhīn, and יוֹיָכִין, yōyākhīn; also, by transposition of the two parts of the name, Jeconiah [Jer 24 1, 27 20; I Ch 3 16, 17] and Jechonias [Mt 1 11, 12 AV]; also Coniah [Jer 22 24, 28, 27 1]), 'J" appoints': The son and successor of Jehoiakim, King of Judah. He was called to the throne at the age of eighteen (598 B.C.), and reigned three months. It was during his reign that Nebuchadrezzar, in his campaign against 'the Westland,' reached Jerusalem, besieged and captured it, took all the treasures stored up in the Temple and the king's palace, deposed J., and, together with a large retinue of leading men and artisans numbering over 10,000, carried him to Babylon. The gate of the Court of the Priests, through which Jehoiachin was led out of the Temple on this occasion, was, according to the Mishna, called the "Gate of Jeconiah" (Middoth 2). This deportation became commonly known as "the captivity of Jehoiachin" (II K 25 27; Jer 52 31; Ezk 1 2), and included, besides the great number above alluded to, the mother and the wives of the king. While the majority of the other captives lived in comparative freedom in the land, J. was kept in prison in Babylon during the entire reign of Nebuchadrezzar. At the end of that period, he was released by Evil-merodach (561 B.C.), restored to his royal rank, though not returned to his kingdom in Jerusalem, and supported at the expense of the king of Babylon in royal state. According to a tradition (incorporated in Targ. Sheni, near the beginning), many prominent Jews imprisoned by Nebuchadrezzar were also liberated at the same time for the sake of J. How long after this date J. survived, the records do not state (cf. Jer 52 31-33). A. C. Z.

JEHOIADA, jẹ-hoi'a-da (יְהוֹיָדָע, yᵉhōyādhā'), 'J" knoweth': 1. The father of Benaiah, an officer of David (II S 8 18; I K 1 8 and often; I Ch 11 22 and often). He resided in Kabzeel (II S 8 18), and may have been a priest (I Ch 27 5; cf. 12 27, which probably refers to the same man, unless with RVmg. we read "chief minister" and refer it to Benaiah). In I Ch 27 34 we should probably read "Benaiah son of Jehoiada." 2. The high priest during the reigns of Ahaziah, Athaliah, and Joash (II K 12 10 [11]). Jehosheba, a sister of Ahaziah, was his wife (II Ch 22 11). He cared for Joash, the son of Ahaziah (II K 11 2; II Ch 22 11), who had been rescued from the king's mother, and after six years placed him on the throne, having brought about the death of Athaliah (II K 11 4 ff.; II Ch 23 1 ff.). He led the people to make a covenant with J" (II K 12 17), and caused the destruction of the temple of Baal (II K 12 18). J. is said (II K 12 9 f. [10 f.]) to have set up a chest beside the altar, into which was put the money that was brought into the house of J" For the AV Jehoiada of Neh 3 6, see JOIADA. C. S. T.

JEHOIAKIM, jẹ-hoi'a-kim (יְהוֹיָקִים, yᵉhōyāqīm), 'J" raises up': A son of Josiah, and king of Judah (609–597 B.C.), called before his accession Eliakim, which name Pharaoh Necho changed to Jehoiakim (II K 23 34). When his father, Josiah, died in battle against Necho, he would naturally have succeeded him, but the populace enthroned his brother Jehoahaz, possibly because he sympathized with, or even headed, the anti-Egyptian party in Judah, while Eliakim, the elder brother, favored submission to Pharaoh. Necho deposed Jehoahaz, and made Jehoiakim king, who, by a systematic taxation, now succeeded in raising the tribute imposed by the conqueror. But the peace he thus purchased from the Egyptians did not prove of long duration; for three years after this victory Nebuchadrezzar overwhelmed Necho at Carchemish, and took from Egyptian control all the territory "from the brook of Egypt unto the river Euphrates, all that pertained to the king of Egypt" (II K 24 7). Jehoiakim was thus reduced to the condition of a tributary to Babylonia. In his internal administration, he evidently wielded a strong hand. He earned the reputation of shedding "innocent blood" (II K 24 4). His relations with the prophet Jeremiah were not cordial (cf. Jer passim, esp. 22 13-19). He took offense at the stern rebukes of the prophet, burned a MS. containing prophecies which had come into his possession, and attempted to seize and punish the prophet himself, but was foiled by Jeremiah's hiding himself (Jer ch. 36). In the 6th or 7th year of his reign, after three years of submission to Babylon, he rebelled. It was some years before Nebuchadrezzar undertook to march in force against him and other rebellious vassals. How he came to his end is uncertain. According to II K 24 6 he died at Jerusalem (in peace? cf. Jer 22 18 f., 36 30), but according to II Ch 36 6 f. he was deported to Babylon. A. C. Z.

JEHOIARIB, je-hoi'a-rib (יְהוֹיָרִיב, yᵉhōyārībh, I Ch 9 10, 24 7; יוֹיָרִיב, yōyārībh, Neh 11 10, 12 6, 19), 'J" contendeth': The name of one of the twenty-four classes of priests. It was counted the first in the time of David (I Ch 24 7), and the seventeenth in the time of Zerubbabel (Neh 12 6). They dwelt in Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (cf. Neh 11 10, which should read as I Ch 9 10). C. S. T.

JEHONADAB, je-hon'a-dab (יְהוֹנָדָב, yᵉhōnādhābh, also called Jonadab), 'J" is noble': 1. A nephew of David, who planned for Amnon the sin against Tamar (II S 13 3-6). 2. The son of Rechab (II K 15 15 ff.), who organized his family into a clan characterized by their nomadic type of life and by total abstinence from wine. The strictness with which this feature of clan life was preserved was used by Jeremiah (ch. 35) as a ground of rebuke to the Israelites for their own failure to keep the commandments of J" A. C. Z.

JEHONATHAN, je-hon'a-than. See JONATHAN.

JEHORAM, je-hō'ram (יְהוֹרָם, yᵉhōrām; also called Joram), 'J" is exalted': 1. A king of Israel (851–842). He was the son of Ahab, and succeeded his brother Ahaziah. His reign was noteworthy for the rebellion of Mesha (q.v.), King of Moab. To quell this rebellion, Jehoram appealed to his father's old ally, Jehoshaphat, and with Jehoshaphat's aid and that of the king of Edom defeated Mesha's forces (II K ch. 3). In the last year of Jehoram's reign, his nephew Ahaziah, King of Judah, made him a visit at Jezreel, where both kings were surprised and slain by Jehu (q.v.). 2. Son of Toi (Tou) of Hamath (II S 8 10), called, however, in I Ch 18 10 Hadoram. 3. A son of Jehoshaphat, King of Judah. For the sake of cementing the alliance entered into by his father with Ahab, Jehoram married the latter's daughter Athaliah, and under her influence favored the introduction of Baal-worship into Judah (II K 8 18). According to II Ch 21 4 when he succeeded his father and found himself in a strong position he slew his brothers. During his reign (849–841) Edom and Libnah revolted, the former establishing itself into a separate kingdom (II Ch 21 10). The mention of a letter written to Jehoram by Elijah (II Ch 21 12 ff.) can be regarded only as an anachronism (see ELIJAH). 4. A Levite, son of Jeshaiah (I Ch 26 25). 5. A priest (II Ch 17 8). A. C. Z.

JEHOSHABEATH, jĭ''ho-shab'e-ath (יְהוֹשַׁבְעַת, yᵉhōshabhᶜath), 'J" is an oath': The daughter of King Jehoram and wife of Jehoiada the priest (II Ch 22 11), who rescued and concealed Joash, the young son and heir of Ahaziah. In II K 11 2 she is called Jehosheba. C. S. T.

JEHOSHAPHAT, je-hosh'a-fat (יְהוֹשָׁפָט, yᵉhōshāphāṭ; called also Josaphat in Mt 1 8 AV), 'J" has judged': 1. The son of Asa, King of Judah, and Azubah, the daughter of Shilhi (I K 15 24, 22 41, etc.; II Ch 20 31). He succeeded his father on the throne and reigned twenty-five years (873–849 B.C.). He at once adopted a conciliatory policy toward the Northern Kingdom, entering into a contract with Ahab, whose daughter Athaliah he secured as the wife of his son Jehoram. He also aided Ahab in his campaign against Ben-hadad I, of Damascus (I K 22 1 ff.; II Ch 18 3 ff.). He further took part in the war of Jehoram against Mesha (q.v.) of Moab (II K 3 4), undertook an expedition into Ophir, and had a vessel built for this purpose. But as the expedition was wrecked in the neighborhood of Ezion-geber, he took this as an omen that Judah's glory should be limited to land, and abstained from further enterprises to build up the navy (I K 22 48). His attitude toward the religion of J" was one of enthusiastic adherence. Both personally and through his officials, he undertook to instruct the people in the requirements of the true service of J", and did much to put an end to Asherah-worship and the high places within his territory. But his success in this regard was evidently not complete (II Ch ch. 19; cf. I K 22 43; II Ch 20 33). 2. The son of Nimshi and father of Jehu (II K 9 14). 3. The son of Ahilud and recorder under David and Solomon (II S 8 16; I K 4 3). 4. The son of Paruah and prefect in Issachar under Solomon (I K 4 17). 5. One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 43, Joshaphat). 6. A trumpeter under David (I Ch 15 43). A. C. Z.

JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF. See JERUSALEM, § 5.

JEHOSHEBA, je-hosh'e-ba. See JEHOSHABEATH.

JEHOSHUA, je-hosh'yu-a, JEHOSHUAH, je-hosh'yu-ā. See JOSHUA.

JEHOVAH, je-hō'vā (יְהֹוָה, yᵉhōwāh, but properly יַהְוֶה, yāhweh): In compound personal names J", like 'El ('God'), was frequently used as a component part, nearly always as the subject to which the other part of the name forms the predicate. In such names the shortened form yō (yᵉhō) was used at the beginning, and yāh (yāhū) at the end (y = j). In the Eng. transliteration the final syllable is often written 'iah.' This use of the name of J" appears prominently first in the Davidic period and ultimately became very popular. See also GOD, § 2, and NAMES, § 6. E. E. N.

JEHOVAH-JIREH, -jai're (יְהוָה יִרְאֶה, yāhweh yir'eh), 'J" will see': The name of the place where Isaac was brought to be sacrificed (Gn 22 14). In the light of the latter half of the verse it may be inferred that the original reading was "J" will be seen," i.e., 'will reveal Himself.' The verse is a late addition to the earlier narrative, connecting the scene directly with the Temple mount in Jerusalem, and the proverbial expression quoted probably had reference originally to Mt. Zion. E. E. N.

JEHOVAH-NISSI, -nis'sai (יְהוָה נִסִּי, yāhweh nissī), 'J" my banner': The name of the altar erected by Moses to commemorate his victory over the Amalekites (Ex 17 15). The name was indicative of the confidence in J" as the giver of the victory. E. E. N.

JEHOVAH-SHALOM, -shê'lem (יְהוָה שָׁלוֹם, yāhweh shālōm), 'J" is peace': The name given to the altar erected by Gideon after receiving the encouraging message "peace be unto thee" from the angel (Jg 6 24). This altar was probably still standing when the narrative was written. E. E. N.

JEHOZABAD, jẹ-hez'a-bad (יְהוֹזָבָד, yᵉhōzābhādh), 'J" gives': 1. One of the conspirators who slew Joash, King of Judah (II K 12 21). His mother seems to have been a Moabitess (II Ch 24 26). He was executed for his crime by Amaziah, son of Joash (II K 14 5), who, however, refrained from following the usual custom of visiting the sins of fathers upon their children (II K 14 6). 2. A son of Obed-edom (I Ch 26 4). 3. An officer under Jehoshaphat (II Ch 17 18). E. E. N.

JEHOZADAK, jẹ-hez'a-dak (יְהוֹצָדָק, yᵉhōtsādhāq; also called Jozadak and Josedech), 'J" is righteous': A priest of the line of Zadok. He was the son of Zeraiah and father of the high priest Jeshua, who accompanied Zerubbabel at the return from the Captivity (I Ch 6 14 f.; Ezr 3 2, 8, etc.; Hag 1 1; Zech 6 11, etc.). A. Z. C.

JEHU, jî'hiū (יֵהוּא, yēhū'), probably 'J" is He': 1. The son of Hanani, a prophet who denounced Baasha, King of Israel (I K 16 1, 7, 12). He also wrote a history, including among other things an account of the reign of Jehoshaphat (II Ch 20 34). 2. The son of Jehoshaphat, son of Nimshi, and the founder of the fifth dynasty in Israel (II K ch. 9 f.). He was holding the post of general in the Israelitic army when Jehoram, the son of Ahab, retired to Jezreel to recover from the wounds received in the siege of Ramoth. The denunciations of the house of Ahab, based on the wicked character of Jezebel, by the prophets Elijah and Elisha had prepared the people for the overthrow of the dynasty and the transfer of the reins of government into new hands. Jehu was designated as the man best qualified to bring the change about, and at the same time succeed to the throne (I K 19 16). In accomplishing the task given him by the prophet, he boldly assumed the royal title and, being accepted by his fellow officers, through a rapid movement surprised Jehoram at Jezreel, and without hesitation slew him with his own hand. He also mortally wounded Ahaziah, King of Judah, who was at the time visiting his kinsman. After the death of Jehoram, his first effort was toward exterminating the house of Ahab, which he accomplished by the aid of the local governors of cities and districts. He next laid a plot to entrap and destroy the priests of Baal. His object in this course, however, was rather the selfish and political one of rendering it impossible for the adherents of the former régime to regain power than the pure love of J" worship. He did not, therefore, completely win over to himself the prophets of J". Their judgment on his policy is expressed in the formula: "He departed not from the sins of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, wherewith he made Israel to sin." During the latter half of his reign, war again broke out between Syria and Israel, and Jehu was not able to prevent the king of Syria from inflicting considerable damage upon Israelitic territory, E. of the Jordan. Hazael wrested from Israel large tracts of land within the borders of Manasseh and Gad. But these operations did not lead to any decisive results within Jehu's lifetime. Jehu is mentioned on the black obelisk of Shalmanezer III (860–824) as paying tribute to Assyria in the year 842. He doubtless put himself under the suzerainty of Assyria with the hope of aid against the encroachments of Damascus. He died at the end of a reign of twenty-eight years (circa 842–815), leaving behind him a good reputation for intrepidity and strategy. 3. An Anathothite, one of David's heroes (I Ch 12 3). 4. A son of Obed, a Judahite (I Ch 2 38). 5. A son of Josibiah, a Simeonite (I Ch 4 35). A. C. Z.

JEHUCAL, jẹ-hiū'cal (יְהוּכַל, yᵉhūkhal, Jehukal AV), 'J" is able': An officer under King Zedekiah (Jer 37 3; called Jucal in 38 1). E. E. N.

JEHUD, jî'hud (יְהוּד, yᵉhūdh): A city of Dan (Jos 19 45). Map III, D 4. E. E. N.

JEHUDI, jẹ-hiū'dai (יְהוּדִי, yᵉhūdhī), 'Jew': An officer in the service of Jehoiakim (Jer 36 14 ff.), possibly of foreign origin and naturalized as a 'Jew' (i.e., 'man of Judah'). E. E. N.

JEHUDIJAH, jî"hu-dai'jā. See JEWESS.

JEPHTHAH, jef'thā (יִפְתָּח, yiphtāḥ; also called Jephthae in He 11 32 AV), 'He [God] opens': One of the major judges of Israel (Jg 11 1–12 7). He was a Gileadite, and became prominent, first as the head of a company of irresponsible men ("vain fellows"), and afterward undertook successfully the championship of Israel against the Ammonites. The most interesting feature of the story of J. is his vow (Jg 11 31). The text leaves no room for doubt that in fulfilment of it he sacrificed his daughter. Efforts to evade this conclusion have proved futile. Either J. was ignorant of the law against human sacrifices, or he flagrantly violated it. The last undertaking of J. was his successful war with the Ephraimites, who attacked him because they said he had not invited them to go with him against Ammon (Jg 12 1 ff.). Criticism has busied itself with the tracing of the account in Jg to its sources, but has not achieved a consensus. The story is by some (Wellhausen, Moore) assigned to one source, into which an interpolation has been incorporated (11 12-28). Moore, however (Int. Crit. Com., ad loc.), believes in the preservation of genuine history through this source. Others (Budde and Cheyne) assign it to two sources. Budde finds these preserved respectively in 11 1-11 and 11 34-40. Cheyne (EB) finds that one of these originally was concerned with Jair, and either by textual corruption or otherwise was transferred to J. Cf. Moore (Int. Crit. Com.), Budde (Handkommentar), and Frankenberg (Composition d. Deuteron. und Richterbücher, 1895, pp. 35–38). A. C. Z.

JEPHUNNEH, ję'fun'ę (יְפֻנֶּה, yᵉphunneh): 1. The father of Caleb (Nu 13 6, etc.). 2. The head of an Asherite family (I Ch 7 38). E. E. N.

JERAH, jī'rā. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

JERAHMEEL, ję-rā'mę-el (יְרַחְמְאֵל, yᵉraḥmᵉ'ēl), 'God has mercy': 1. The eponymous ancestor of the clan, or tribe, of Jerahmeelites living in the "South" of Judah (I S 27 10, 30 29) and afterward absorbed into the tribe of Judah, so that J. was reckoned genealogically as one of the grandsons of Judah and the brother of Caleb (I Ch 2 9, 25-27, 33, 42). 2. The name of a subdivision of the Levites (I Ch 24 29). 3. A son of Jehoiakim, King of Judah (Jer 36 26). Jeremiah (on the name see foregoing article) was the prophet of the decline and fall of the Hebrew monarchy (called Jeremy in Mt 2 17, 27 9 AV, and Jeremias in Mt 16 14 AV). Beginning his prophetic ministry in the 13th year of Josiah (626 B.C.), he continued it till we lose sight of him in Egypt, whither he was carried against his will shortly after the fall of Jerusalem in 586. If at his call he was a youth of twenty or twenty-two, he must at his death have been over sixty. He was of priestly descent, being one of a little community of priests settled at Anathoth (I K 2 26), 3 m. N. of Jerusalem, where his family owned land (32 8). His prophetic 'call' took place (1 2, 25 3) in the 13th year of Josiah, five years before the memorable discovery of the 'book of the law' (i.e., Dt) in the Temple (II K 22 3 ff.). Of his personal life during the rest of Josiah's reign and the three months of Josiah's successor, Jehoahaz, no particulars are known; but his book contains abundant details of the part played by him in the anxious times which began soon after the accession of Jehoiakim (609 B.C.). Politically, the 4th year of Jehoiakim (605), in which Nebuchadrezzar defeated Pharaoh-necho at Carchemish, was the turning-point of the age. J. at once grasped the situation. He saw that Nebuchadrezzar was destined to achieve further successes; he greeted him with an ode of triumph (46 3-12), promised him the conquest of Egypt (46 14-26), and declared that the whole of Western Asia would fall under his sway (ch. 25), implying thereby, what he afterward taught explicitly, that the safety of Judah lay in yielding to the inevitable, and accepting the condition of dependence upon Babylon. Jehoiakim became for a while Nebuchadrezzar's vassal, but after three years revolted (II K 24 1). Under Jehoiachin, his son and successor (697), Jerusalem was besieged by the Chaldeans. After a reign of three months the king surrendered, and both he and his court, and the élite of Jerusalem generally, were exiled to Babylonia (II K 24 10-16). Zedekiah, Jehoiachin's uncle, having sworn a solemn oath of allegiance to Nebuchadrezzar (Ezk 17 11-18), was made king over those who remained in Jerusalem. After a few years, however, Zedekiah entered into treasonable negotiations with Pharaoh Hophra; and in his 9th year (588 B.C.), the second siege of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans began. Jeremiah now (21 1-10) declared unambiguously that the besiegers would prevail, adding as a piece of practical advice to the people generally that desertion to the Chaldeans was the sole guaranty of personal safety (21 9). His counsel did not proceed from any unpatriotic motive, though it is easy to see that it might be so interpreted; it was simply a corollary from the position adopted by him in 605 (ch. 25). Jeremiah's further experiences during the siege are told in chs. 37. 38. Arrested in the N. gate of the city on a charge of deserting to the Chaldeans, he was confined first in a dungeon, then, after having been sent for by the king, and questioned by him as to the issue of the siege, in a part of the palace precincts called the "guard-court," after that in a disused underground cistern, from which he was released only by the intercession of a friendly foreigner, an Ethiopian, Ebed-melech, to be again confined in the guard-court, where, after a second interview with the king, he remained until after the capture of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. J. was treated with consideration by the Chaldeans, and allowed to live where he pleased till he was forced by some of the Jews left in Palestine to accompany them into Egypt (chs. 42–44).

The foregoing outline of the history of J.'s time will be of use in enabling the reader to understand the scope and contents of the Book of Jeremiah. The book consists partly of prophecies, partly of narratives of events in the prophet's life. Its several parts are not arranged chronologically, the imperfect order being due, no doubt, to the fact that the book reached its present form by a series of stages. We learn from ch. 36 that its nucleus consists of a collection of prophecies, delivered during the twenty-three preceding years, which were first committed to writing in the 4th year of Jehoiakim (605), at J.'s dictation, by his friend and amanuensis, Baruch; after the king, when the roll was read before him in the following year, had burnt it in a fit of passion, it was rewritten, we are told, with many additions (ver. 32). This last statement is important, for it shows that even the prophecies dictated to Baruch by J. himself which must have formed the nucleus of the present book were not verbal reproductions of the discourses as they were originally delivered. The original collection comprised in all probability (not counting later additions) chs. 1–9, 10 17-25, 25, 46–49 33, perhaps also parts of chs. 11–20. This was afterward gradually enlarged by the insertion or addition, partly of prophecies of later date than 605 (including some, as 10 1-16, not by J. himself), partly of biographical and historical notices, till the book assumed its present form. The narratives in the third person about J. are generally supposed to be from the hand of Baruch.

2. General Character of the Book.

Chs. 1–6 consist of prophecies dating mainly from the reign of Josiah. Ch. 1 describes the vision of J.'s call; it is to be his mission to announce the weal or wo of nations, and he is not to be discouraged by the opposition which his words may provoke. Chs. 2–6 contain J.'s earliest prophecies (626 B.C.–c. 619); in 2 1–4 4 the prophet passes his verdict upon Israel's history; he reproaches it with its declension from the ideal of the past, and its persistent idolatry, while promising it, if penitent, a return of J'''s favor; in 4 5–6, in strains of deep feeling and remarkable poetical power, he announces the coming judgment, to be inflicted by a formidable but unnamed foe from the North. The imagery is probably suggested by the hordes of Scythians who were, c. 625 B.C., overrunning Western Asia. Chs. 7–10 (excluding 10 1-16) form a second group of prophecies, belonging probably to the early part of the reign of Jehoiakim (comp. ch. 7 with ch. 26). The scene described in 7 1-28 is a striking one. The prophet stands at the gate of the Temple, rebukes the people for pointing to J'''s dwelling among them as of itself guaranteeing their security, and bids them, if they desire to remain in that place, to 'amend their ways and their doings.' In the rest of this section, J., in a succession of plaintive elegies, bewails the corruption of the nation, and describes the alarm and despair which will seize the people when they see the foe in the midst of them. 10 1-16 (against standing in awe of the idols of the heathen) interrupts the connection, and, to judge from the argument and situation presupposed by it, is not J.'s at all. In 11 1-8 J. exhorts the people to obey the Deuteronomic law; but in 11 9-17 he is warned that Judah, for its disobedience, is doomed to disaster, and that he must not intercede on his people's behalf. In 11 18–12 6 he describes a plot formed against his life by his own townsmen, and the moral perplexities which the impunity of the conspirators raised in his mind. The passage 12 7-17 threatens exile to some of Judah's unfriendly neighbors, but promises them restoration if they afterward embrace from the heart Israel's religion. In ch. 13 the corrupt condition of the people and the certainty of approaching exile are again insisted on by the prophet; ver. 18 f. here (cf. II K 24 8) belongs to the reign of Jehoiachin. Chs. 14, 15 contain a dialogue between the prophet and J'', arising out of a drought (interpreted as a sign of J'''s anger). J. intercedes for his people, and seeks to excuse them on the ground that they have been deluded by their prophets, but J'' refuses to hear him. He bewails the hard fate imposed upon him of having to predict the ruin of his country, but in the end (15 19-21) is taught that his success and happiness depend upon his abandoning the false path of distrust and despair. In 16 1–17 18 the coming disaster, with its cause, the people's sin, is set forth in even plainer terms than before. The passage 17 19-27 is an exhortation to obey the Sabbath (thought by many recent critics not to be J.'s—the importance attached to ceremonial observances, vs. 24-26, being contrary to his usual teaching). In ch. 18, by observation of the methods of a potter, J. is taught the conditional nature of prophecy. In spite of the judgments pronounced against Judah, therefore, it would not be too late for it to repent, were it not too obstinate to do so. His words provoke another plot against his life (ver. 18), and the ch. ends with vehement imprecations against its authors. Chs. 19, 20 describe how J. was thrown into the stocks for having declared by the symbolism of a broken cruse the irretrievable nature of the disaster impending upon the nation. After his release he breaks out into a passionate complaint of the misery of his lot (20 1-18); he could not resist the impulse to prophesy, but it had brought him nothing but hostility and detraction. The passage 21 1-10 places us at the end of Zedekiah's reign (588 B.C.); the siege has begun; Zedekiah sends to inquire of the prophet respecting its issue; he replies that the city will inevitably fall into the hands of the Chaldeans. The passage 21 11–23 8 contains J.'s judgments on the contemporary kings of Judah; the exile of Jehoahaz (608) is pathetically foretold (22 10-12); the exactions of Jehoiakim (608–597) are contrasted bitterly with the justice exercised by his father, Josiah (22 13-19); rejection and banishment are to be the fate of Jehoiachin (22 20-30); and in 23 1-8, in contrast to the imperfect rulers, there is drawn a picture of the rule of the future ideal king, and of the happiness which he will secure for his people. Next, 23 9-40, we have a polemic against the false prophets who misled the people by deceptive promises of security, and made no efforts to reclaim them from their sin. Ch. 24 was written shortly after the exile of Jehoiachin (597); by the significant figure of the two baskets of good and bad figs it is shown that the exiles with Jehoiachin are much better than those left in the city with Zedekiah, and that the hopes of the future depend upon them. Ch. 25 contains the prophecy of the 4th year of Jehoiakim (605), in which J. declares that Nebuchadrezzar is to have the rule of the entire known world. Ch. 26 tells how J. nearly lost his life for threatening that, if the people did not amend their ways, Jerusalem would share the fate of Shiloh (cf. ch. 7). Chs. 27–29 (beginning of Zedekiah's reign) describe how J. exposed the futility of attempting to throw off the yoke of Babylon and of hoping that the Babylonian domination would speedily cease; and how he even wrote to the exiles in Babylonia, exhorting them to settle down contentedly in their new home. Chs. 30–33, dating from the dark days of the siege of Jerusalem, contain J.'s promises (addressed to Israel as well as to Judah) of a brighter future ultimately to come; in ch. 32 the prophet, in the full assurance that his countrymen, though exile is imminent, will again own their native soil, redeems from a cousin land belonging to his family at Anathoth; 31 31-36 is the great prophecy of the New Covenant, when Israel will be ruled by a law written in the heart, filling all with the knowledge of J" and prompting all to perfect obedience. Chs. 34–45 are largely historical; ch. 34 (end of Zedekiah's reign) tells us of the rebuke which J. addressed to the people when they refused to fulfil the promise, made when the siege was temporarily raised, to emancipate their Hebrew slaves; in ch. 35 (end of Jehoiakim's reign) J. points a lesson to his countrymen from the faithfulness of the Rechabites to the precepts of their ancestor; ch. 36 is important, as it relates how Jeremiah's prophecies were first committed to writing in the 4th year of Jehoiakim (605), and how after the king in the following year had burned the roll in a fit of passion, it was rewritten, with additions; chs. 37, 38 give particulars of J.'s personal history during the siege (see § 1, above); chs. 39–44 narrate what happened to him after the fall of the city, including his forced migration into Egypt; in 43 8-13 he foretells the future conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadrezzar; and in ch. 44 he rebukes the fugitives in Egypt for relapsing into their old idolatries, and declares that of the entire body a handful only should return into Judah; ch. 45 is a short prophecy of mingled encouragement and rebuke, addressed to Baruch, and forming a supplement to 36 1-8. Chs. 46–51 are prophecies on foreign nations, declaring successively, with much variety of imaginative form, the doom impending upon Egypt, the Philistines, Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Elam, and Babylon. The first seven of these prophecies (that on Elam is assigned to Zedekiah's reign), in so far as they are J.'s (for most recent commentators consider them to have been more or less amplified by later hands), will reflect the profound impression produced upon the prophet by Nebuchadrezzar's victory over the Egyptians at Carchemish (cf. ch. 25). The incident narrated in 51 59-64a is no doubt historical; but the preceding prophecy (50 1–51 58) displays a spirit and point of view so unlike J.'s that it is generally recognized as not his work. Ch. 52 contains an account of the capture of Jerusalem, and the exile of the inhabitants—excerpted, in the main, from II K 24 18–25 30.

4. Personal Characteristics.

J. possessed a susceptible, deeply emotional nature. The adverse course of events impresses him profoundly, and he utters without reserve the emotions which in consequence are stirred within him. The trials which he experienced in the discharge of his prophetic office, the persecution and detraction which he encountered from those to whom his words were unwelcome (11 18-23, 15 10, 15, 17 15-17, 18 18, 20 7-10, 26 11 ff., 37 15 ff.), the disappointment which was the only fruit of his efforts to convince his people of their sin, and the ruin to which, as he saw too truly, his country was hastening, overpowered his sensitive, highly strung organism. He breaks out into bitter lamentations and complaints; he bewails pathetically his nation's doom (4 19-21, 6 26, 7 29, 8 18-22, 9 1, 13 17, and elsewhere); he calls for vengeance upon his persecutors; he reproaches the Almighty with having misled him (20 7) and with forsaking him (15 18); he wishes himself unborn (20 14-18; cf. 15 10). His mental struggle is intense; he would gladly relinquish the thankless office imposed upon him; but ever and again the higher voice within him bids him be trustful and courageous (1 7 f., 17-19, 12 5 f., 15 19-21, 20 11, 13), and his human wishes and human weakness are overcome. Love for his country is powerful within him, though he knows it to be in vain (7 16); through two long chapters (14–15) he pleads on behalf of his erring nation. The aim of his life is to lead his people, if only it will be led, to better things.

5. Significance of His Work.

J.'s poetry is exquisite. It has not indeed the majesty of Isaiah or the brilliance of Job; but sweet and tender elegies, beautiful in diction and instinct with pathos, flow without art or effort from his lips. He has been well called by Cornill the "poet of the heart." The deep springs of human feeling toward his neighbor, toward his people, and toward his God are revealed by him more clearly than by any other writer of the O T, more clearly even than by Hosea.

In the history of religion J. marks an epoch in that he brings out, more distinctly than had been brought out before, the significance and reality of personal religion, of a direct relationship of the individual soul to God. A lonely man, without domestic or social joys (16 2, 8, 15 17), full of unrequited affection for his people, mocked and misunderstood by those whom he loved, he casts himself upon God, and finds a refuge and a solace in communion with Him. As a prophet to his contemporaries, his labor was in vain; but his life was not spent in vain, either for himself or for the future. "Through sorrow and wo there arose within him the certainty of personal fellowship with God, the truest essence of piety" (Wellhausen). J. opens out his whole soul to God; he unfolds before Him his thoughts and feelings and emotions, and looks to Him for a response. It is in accordance with this sense of the religious significance of the individual that he emphasizes (31 30) the truth of individual responsibility; and that in his great prophecy of the New Covenant the essence of religion is identified by him with a personal knowledge of God implanted in the heart (31 33 f.; cf. 3 16, where an external symbol of religion, as the Ark, is to be no more needed in the ideal future). When he had passed away, men began to realize the greatness and beauty of his character. "The oppressed people saw in his sufferings a type of itself, and drew from his constancy courage to endure and be true. Imagery from the scenes of his life and echoes of his words fill many of the Psalms, the authors of which were like him in his sorrows, and strove to be like him in his faith" (Davidson).

6. The Text of the Book of Jeremiah.

The LXX. text of Jer differs more widely from the Heb. than is the case in any other book of the O. T. There are numerous omissions, sometimes of single words (often, however, of unimportant words, as "the prophet" attached to the name Jeremiah, or of the parenthetic "saith Jehovah"), sometimes of clauses or passages (as 8 10-12 [=6 13-15], 11 7-8, 29 14, 16-20, 30 10 f. [=46 27 f.], 33 14-26, 39 4-13, 48 40 f. [=49 22]; chs. 27, 28, also are materially shorter in the LXX. than in the Heb.); there are also occasionally additions, variations of expression, and transpositions (the foreign prophecies 46–51 stand in the LXX. after 25 13). Though some of these differences may have originated with the translators, many must have existed in the Heb. MSS. used by them, and they combine with the unchronological arrangement of the Heb. to show that in early times many hands worked at the 'redaction' of the book, and that it must have assumed two forms in the process. Each individual case must be judged on its own merits. On the whole, the Heb. text is undoubtedly superior; but there are certainly many particular cases in which the text of the LXX. is to be preferred.

The opinion has gained ground among recent commentators that the original words of J. or (in the historical narratives of Baruch, have in various) places been amplified by later redactors, for the purpose of giving expression to the thoughts and feelings which harmonized with the picture that they had formed of J.'s position, or which they desired to find expressed in his writings. It may be doubted whether this opinion rests always upon a sufficient foundation. The theory which it involves has been carried to its furthest point by Duhm, who considers that J. himself was exclusively a poet, and that his genuine literary remains consist of not more than about 270 couplets—each line of the couplet being written in the meter of the Heb. elegy, forming a number of distinct prophetic forms. For J., both the poet and the man, as he pictures him, Duhm has the highest admiration and appreciation; but it is arbitrary thus to limit his literary ability, nor has this conclusion of Duhm's been indorsed by other scholars (see especially Cornill).

LITERATURE: Davidson in HDB; Wellhausen, Israel. u. Jüd. Geschichte, ch. x; the commentaries of Graf (1862), Keil (1872); Cheyne (exposition of the text) in the Pulpit Com. (1883–5), Ball (vol. i) and Bennett (vol. ii) in the Expositor's Bible (1890, 1895), Giesebrecht (1907²), Duhm (1901), and Cornill (1905). Graf and Keil (especially Keil), like Payne Smith in the Speaker's Comm., Plumptre in Ellicott's Comm., and Streane in the Cambridge Bible, are not critical enough; the others, especially Duhm, are apt to be hypercritical. A good English comm. adequate to the requirements of the present time is a desideratum; Peake's (in preparation for the Century Bible and Kirkpatrick's in the Int. Crit. Com.) will doubtless supply the need. The present writer has published The Book of Jeremiah; a Revised Translation, with Introd. and Short Notes (1906), intended for the assistance of ordinary English readers of the book. Duhm's view of the book is attractively exhibited (in a popular form) in Das Buch Jeremiah, Uebersetzt von B. Duhm (1903). S. R. D.

JEREMIAH, EPISTLE OF: A writing extant in a Gr. text (also in Syriac and Latin translations) which purports to be the letter referred to in Jer 29 1, where the prophet is said to have sent a letter "unto the residue of the elders of the Captivity, and to the priests, and to the prophets, and to all the people, whom Nebuchadrezzar had carried away captive from Jerusalem to Babylon." In this apocryphal writing Jeremiah is represented as foretelling that the Captivity of the Jews should last for seven generations, and end in their peaceful return (ver. 1 f.); but in Babylon they should see gods of gold and silver and wood (ver. 3). They are warned not to be led astray by the common feeling of the Gentiles regarding these idols (vs. 4 f.); for they are creatures of men's hands, and have no power either to help or to harm any one (vs. 6-71); therefore a righteous man without regard for idols is stronger, for he will suffer no reproach (ver. 72).

The production bears marks of having been originally written in Gr. A point of departure for the date of the composition is given in II Mac 2 2, where it is alleged that Jeremiah "gave the captives the law, that they should not forget the commandments of the Lord, and that they should not be led astray in their minds, seeing images of gold and silver and the adornment about them." But whether the Epistle of Jeremiah is an expansion and an explanation of this passage, or the author of II Mac alludes to an already extant Epistle is an open question. Nevertheless, the dates of these two Apocrypha can not be very far apart. A. C. Z.

JERIBAI, jer′i-bai or jer′i-bê (יְרִבַי, yᵉrībhay): One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 46). E. E. N.

JERICHO, jer′i-cō (יְרִיחוֹ, yᵉrīḥō), 'city of fragrance' (?), or 'city of the moon-god' (?), also called several times the "city of palm-trees" (Dt 34 3; cf. Jg 1 16): J. was situated in the lower Jordan valley 820 ft. below the Mediterranean, Map III, G 5. The climate is subtropical, the natural capabilities of soil and situation are great, and as a defensible locality the site offers many points of vantage.

Inhabited from very early days, the position of J. made it the key of W. Palestine (from E. of the Jordan). But the enervating heat took the stamina from its people and, instead of being the fortress of Jerusalem, it was, as G. A. Smith says, only its pantry (HGHL, p. 268). When Israel crossed the Jordan it seemed a formidable citadel, demanding the most careful preparations on the part of the besiegers. To consecrate a war was a Semitic custom, and at Gilgal, accordingly, the reproach of Egypt was rolled away (Jos 5 9), and by special rites the people became a consecrated host. The capture of Jericho was to be no wild scene of unrestrained license and plunder, but as first-fruits of conquest it was devoted to J″. The graphic description of the seven days' circuit and the falling of the walls is a strong objective portrayal of the absolute prostration of the inhabitants of the city in the face of the terrible foe from the desert (Jos ch. 6). Recent excavation seems to show that the mound by the 'Ain es-Sultān ('Fountain of Elisha') covers the remains of an old Amorite city, destroyed before Israelite influence had affected it. Mighty walls and strong towers have been discovered together with many articles of secular and religious life, including a collection of clay tablets still blank, awaiting the stylus of a scribe, who perished perhaps at the hand of Joshua, the son of Nun. It is not certain that Hiel the Bethelite (I K 16 34) built on the Amorite mound. But the rich plain of the Jordan at the base of the mountain land was too attractive to remain unused. In Elisha's day prophets dwelt there (II K 2 5, 15). At the Return, 345 men of Jericho are reckoned in Nehemiah's census (Neh 7 36), and this city also furnished workmen who helped rebuild the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3 2). These later towns were for the most part S. of the old Jericho, and the plain up to the entrance of the Wâdy el-Kelt is dotted with ruins. Cleopatra's concession, taken by Herod, was here, and Roman ruins are visible, including plaster, still bright with the red so dear to Roman eyes. In one of these structures Herod the Great died.

Christ's feet trod this region more than once, and the scene of the Temptation may well have been in the forbidding mountains above. To reach the reputed place of the Baptism He must have passed through the streets and villas of the town. The road that leads to Jericho He made the background for a parable (Lk 10 30). His last journey to Jerusalem led Him into Jericho, where He healed Bartimeus (Lk 18 35) and met Zacchæus (Lk 19 1 f.). One does not wonder, then, at the numerous monasteries once to be found here. But the Moslem's touch has blighted the palm-groves, the land is now the Sultan's freehold, and er-Riha, the present village, with its few hundred dark-visaged, Egyptian-like inhabitants, is but a travesty of past magnificence. JERIOTH, jer'i-ŏth or jî'ri-ŏth (יְרִיעוֹת, yᵉrī'ōth): Either the wife or daughter of Caleb (I Ch 2 18). The text seems to be corrupt. The name is probably that of a place. E. E. N.

JEROBOAM, jer''o-bō'am (יָרָבְעָם, yārābh'ām), probably 'the people increases': 1. The son of Nebat of the tribe of Ephraim, and a resident of Zereda (I K 11 26). He was the leader of the ten tribes in their revolt against Rehoboam, and became the first king of the Northern Kingdom (931–915). During the lifetime of Solomon, J. proved himself a capable administrator of affairs, and was appointed by the king as overseer of the contingent from the house of Joseph engaged in work upon the fortifications of Jerusalem. But, instigated by the prophet Ahijah of Shiloh, he rebelled against his master, and was compelled to flee to Egypt, where he took refuge with Shishak. As soon as Solomon died, J. returned and put himself at the head of the people, now fully determined no longer to endure the yoke of heavy taxation imposed upon them during the reign just closed. When the overtures made to Rehoboam had been flatly rejected, the northern tribes seceded and Jeroboam was made their king. He first fixed his capital at Shechem, but probably changed it to Tirzah. Very little is known of his conflict with Judah. Perhaps both kingdoms soon became engaged in a more absorbing warfare with Shishak. For the purpose of preventing the people of the Northern Kingdom from gravitating back to the house of David, Jeroboam revived two old shrines at Bethel and Dan, setting up golden calves as images of J″ By the prophets of J″ this was denounced as a capital sin, and occurs as the refrain of the story of such of the subsequent kings as adopted Jeroboam's policy. 2. Jeroboam II (784–745), the son of Jehoash, of the dynasty of Jehu. Under his government Israel reached the summit of her power, extending her control over nearly the whole territory ruled by David. This was rendered possible by the weakening of the countries E. of the Jordan through repeated Assyrian invasions, a condition of things predicted by Jonah, the son of Amittai (II K 14 25). At the same time the religious, social, and moral conditions of the people reached a low ebb, against which the prophets Amos and Hosea, contemporaries of this king, entered a vigorous protest in the name of J″. JEROHAM, jẹ-rō'ham (יְרֹחָם, yᵉrōḥām), probably a shortened form of Jerahmeel, 'God pities': 1. An ancestor of Samuel (I S 1 1). 2. The father of Joelah and Zebadiah (I Ch 12 7). 3. The head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 8 27, 9 8). 4. A Danite (I Ch 27 22). 5. The father of Azariah (II Ch 23 1). 6. A priest (I Ch 9 12; Neh 11 12). 1. Historical and Religious Importance.

Jerusalem (יְרוּשָׁלַ͏ִם, yerūshālaim; Amarna letters, Urusalim; Assyr. Ursalîmmu; Syr. Urishlem; Gr. Ἱερουσαλήμ, Ἱεροσόλυμα; Lat. Hierosolyma; Arab. El-Ḳuds, 'The Holy'): An ancient royal city of the Canaanites, captured by David about 1000 B.C. and the capital, first of the united Hebrew monarchy, and then of the kingdom of Judah. It was the site of the Temple of Solomon, and as such became the 'Holy City' of Judaism. It was the scene of the activity of all the writing prophets except Amos and Hosea, and in it most of the books of the O T were written. It was destroyed by Nebuchadrezzar in 586 B.C.; but was rebuilt after the Exile, and was invested with ever-increasing sanctity by the Jews during the Persian, Greek, and Roman periods. It was the scene of a considerable part of the ministry of Jesus and of His death, resurrection, and ascension, thus gaining new holiness in the eyes of the Christian Church. It was destroyed by Titus in 70 A.D., but was rebuilt by Hadrian in 136. In 637 A.D. it was conquered by the Calif Omar, was connected with the tradition of the Prophet Mohammed, and soon became the most important holy place of the Moslem world after Mecca and Medina. In 1099 A.D. it was taken by the Crusaders, and in 1517 by the Turks, in whose hands it has remained to the present time.

2. Location and Climate.

Descriptions in ancient writers and numerous archeological remains leave no doubt that modern J. stands on substantially the same site as the ancient city. It is situated 33 m. E. of the Mediterranean, 14 m. W. of the Dead Sea, 133 m. SW. of Damascus, on the high central ridge of Judæa, at an altitude in its highest parts of 2,500 ft. above the sea. The hills consist of bare white rocks of Eocene limestone and chalk. The lower slopes and the bottoms of the valleys are covered with a stony but fertile soil, in which olives, walnuts, and various fruit-trees, barley, wheat, and vegetables flourish. The climate is similar to that of northern Italy. The winters are cold and considerable snow falls, which, however, does not lie long. The temperature drops as low as 35° Fahr. and palms, oranges, and lemons can not be cultivated. The heat of summer is tempered by the altitude of the city, and the average maximum temperature is not over 86°. The hottest months are May and October, when the sirocco blows. Rain falls only between the months of November and March, with an annual average of 22 in.—about the same as that of London.

I. The Topography of Jerusalem.

3. Method of Study.

The problem of the topography of the ancient city is much complicated by the scantiness of records, the repeated destructions and rebuildings, the absence of inscriptions, and the misleading testimony of Jewish, Christian, and Mohammedan tradition. In a scientific study of the topography of J. legend must be disregarded, and one must go back to the evidence of the Bible and of other ancient writings. The testimony must be arranged in chronological order, and the greatest importance must be attached to the earliest statements. Under no conditions should we start with tradition and work backward, endeavoring to twist ancient statements into conformity with it; and where ancient evidence is lacking tradition may be used only with extreme caution. So much for the method in general. In particular, the investigation should proceed from the more certain to the less certain. The most certain thing in the topography of ancient Jerusalem is the location of the Temple. This, therefore, should be the starting-point of our study. Next to this the valleys, springs, and pools of antiquity are most easily identified, and after these the hills and city quarters. These main physical features that remain unchanged down to the present time having been determined, we may then proceed to study in chronological order the buildings, such as palaces, walls, gates, etc., that from time to time have been erected in the city. We take up, then, first the location of the Temple.

The Temple is one of the few fixed spots in the topography of ancient Jerusalem. Solomon's sanctuary remained undisturbed until its destruction by Nebuchadrezzar in 586 B.C. During the brief period of the Exile its site was not forgotten (cf. Jer 41 5; Hag 2 3; Ezr 3 12). It was rebuilt by Zerubbabel in the old place in 516 B.C. (Ezr 6 15).

4. The Location of the Temple.

Herod's Temple, according to Josephus (Ant. XV, 11 2; BJ, V, 5 1), was merely an enlargement and beautification of its predecessor. An unbroken tradition of Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans places it on the site of the Ḥaram esh-Sherīf, the 'Noble Sanctuary,' or Mosque of Omar. The correctness of this tradition is confirmed at every point by archeology (see TEMPLE). From this fixed point we must set out in our study of the ancient city.

I. The Valleys of Jerusalem.

5. The Kidron.

The one most often named is the naḥal, or "brook," Kidron (qidhrōn, Gr. Κεδρών). Frequently "Kidron" is omitted and it is called simply "the brook" (II Ch 32 4). This designation suggests that it is to be identified with Wâdy Sitti Maryam, the deep gorge on the E. of Jerusalem, since this is the only one of the valleys that has a perennial flow of water. This identification is confirmed by all the Biblical references. From II S 15 23, I K 2 37 (cf. II S 16 5) it appears that the Kidron lay E. of the city; from I K 15 13 = II Ch 15 16; II K 23 4, 6, 12; Jer 31 40; II Ch 29 16, that it was adjacent to the Temple. II Ch 32 4 describes it as flowing through the midst of the land, and as containing much water. Nehemiah on his night-ride around the wall rode down the valley on the W. and S. of the city and then (Neh 2 15) up "the brook." According to Jn 18 1, Mk 14 26 Jesus crossed the Kidron in going from the city to the Mount of Olives, but the location of the Mount of Olives on the E. side of the city is established (cf. Jos. Wars, V, 2 3, 6 1, 12 2; VI, 3 2). The Valley of Jehoshaphat ('Yahweh judges') in Jl 3 12 is probably a place invented as a scene for the final judgment. Its identification with Wâdy Sitti Maryam (the Kidron) is not found before the 4th cent. A.D. and is destitute of authority.

The valley of the "Son (Sons) of Hinnom" (hinnōm), or simply "valley of Hinnom," is always called the gay, or 'broad, open valley,' in contrast to the naḥal, or 'brook,' of Kidron. This name suggests that it is to be identified with the modern Wâdy er-Rabābi, the broad valley that encloses Jerusalem on the W. and S. All the

O T references favor this identification. According to Jos 15 8, 18 16 Hinnom was the boundary-line between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin; but Jerusalem lay wholly in the tribe of Benjamin (cf. Jer 6 1 and the frequent phrase "Judah and Jerusalem"), hence Hinnom can not be identified either with Wâdy Sitti Maryam or with El-Wād, the valley that runs through the heart of the city. The valley gate of Neh 2 13 must have opened upon the Valley of Hinnom, but the excavations of Bliss seem to have proved that this gate was situated near the SW. corner of the modern city. The Arabian geographer Idrisi (1154 A.D.) applies the name Jehennām, that is, Gē-Hinnōm, or Valley of Hinnom, to Wâdy er-Rabābi, and in 1838 Robinson found this name still attached to it. This identification is generally accepted by modern topographers, but W. Robertson Smith, followed by a few others, identifies Hinnom with the modern El-Wād. Hinnom was the place where children were sacrificed to the god Molech (q.v.), according to II K 23 10; Jer 2 23, 7 31 f., 19 2, 6, 32 35. Later Jewish abhorrence of this practise caused the name Gehenna, or Valley of Hinnom, to be used as a name for Hell.

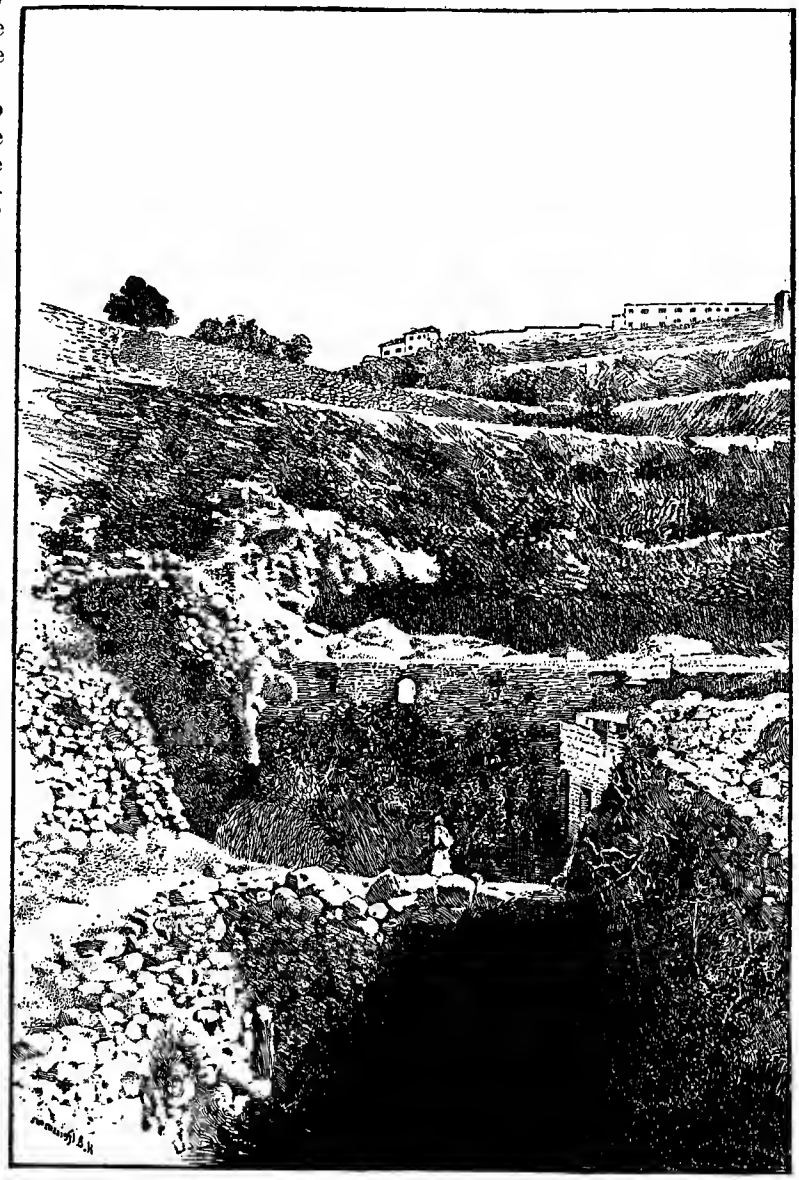
7. Rephaim. According to Jos 15 8, 18 16, the "vale of Rephaim" lay W. of Hinnom, and formed part of the boundary-line between Judah and Benjamin. It is to be identified with the modern Wâdy el-Werd through which the railway runs from Jaffa to Jerusalem.

8. The Vale of Shaveh. In Gn 14 17 f. it is stated that Melchizedek, King of Salem, met Abram in the 'ēmeq, or 'enclosed plain,' "of Shaveh (the same is the King's Vale)." If Salem be J. (§ 19, below), then Shaveh may be one of the plains near J. In II S 18 18 Absalom is said to have built himself a monument in the "king's dale." According to Jos., Ant. VII, 10 3, this monument was two stadia distant from J. It has been conjectured that the Vale of Shaveh is the broad, open head of Wâdy er-Rabābi (the Hinnom) W. of the city. This is now known as Wâdy el-Mēs. Through it Abram might naturally have passed in coming from Damascus to Hebron.

The valley called the Tyropœon (ἡ τῶν τυροποιῶν φάραγξ, 'the valley of the cheesemakers') is mentioned by Josephus, BJ, V, 4 1. He says that it divided the Upper City from the Lower City, and that it came out at the Pool of Siloam. Siloam is known to be identical with the modern 'Ain Silwān, and consequently the Tyropœon must be identified with some part of El-Wād, the valley that runs through the heart of the city.

9. The Tyropœon. The only dispute is, which of the branches of El-Wād is to be identified with the upper course of the Tyropœon. The common view is that it is the N. branch, which runs under the Damascus Gate. This is most likely, since this is the deeper depression, and since it is the one which the people of modern J. regard as the main valley. A rival theory, first suggested by Robinson, is that the upper course of the Tyropœon is to be found in the W. branch of El-Wād, that comes down from the Jaffa Gate under the modern David street. Still another theory, advocated by Tobler and Mommert, is that the Tyropœon is the slight depression that runs from the SW corner of the city and joins El-Wād at a point a little way above Siloam. Both of these theories identify the Tyropœon with small branches of the city valley such as Josephus would never have selected as a main division between the two hills, and neither of these identifications would ever have been thought of but for erroneous ideas concerning the location of the Lower City. The Tyropœon is perhaps identical with "the Maktesh" (Zeph 1 11 "mortar" mg.).



MODERN POOL OF SILOAM—SHOWING THE MOUTH OF THE UNDERGROUND CONDUIT FROM THE VIRGIN'S FOUNTAIN.

II. The Springs of Jerusalem.

Closely connected with the question of the valleys is the question of the springs and pools. Two springs, En-rogel and Gihon, are mentioned as near Jerusalem. These can not be identical, because in I K ch. 1 the coronation of Adonijah takes place at En-rogel, while that of Solomon takes place at Gihon. There are only two springs in the neighborhood of the modern city: 'Ain Um ed-Deraj, 'Spring of the Mother of Steps,' as it is called by the Moslems, or 'Ain Sitti Maryam, 'Spring of the Lady Mary,' as it is called by the Christians, which lies in the Wâdy Sitti Maryam, a short distance from the SW. corner of the city; and Bîr 'Eiyūb, 'Job's Well,' which lies in the same valley a short distance below its junction with Wâdy er-Rabābi. With these springs En-rogel and Gihon must be identical. The evidence is clear that En-rogel is Bîr 'Eiyūb. According to Jos 15 7, 18 16, it was reached by going down the Valley of Hinnom. According to II S 17 17 and I K 1 9, it was out of sight of the city, but not very remote from it. The name may mean 'Spy's Spring,' certainly not 'Fuller's Spring.' Apparently it is the same as the Dragon's (jackal's RV) Well of Neh 2 13.

SECTION OF THE UNDERGROUND CONDUIT AT THE VIRGIN'S FOUNTAIN.

If En-rogel is Bîr 'Eiyūb, then Gihon must be the other spring of Jerusalem; namely, 'Ain Sitti Maryam, the Virgin's Fountain. This is an intermittent spring to which the name of Gihon, or 'gusher,' is peculiarly appropriate. According to I K 1 33, it was close to Jerusalem and within hearing distance of En-rogel. II Ch 33 14 states that it lay in the naḥal or Kidron valley, and II Ch 32 30 connects it with the rock-hewn conduit which still leads from the Virgin's Fountain under the E. hill to 'Ain Silwān. Other theories which identify Gihon with one or other of the pools on the W. side of the city ignore the fact that it was a spring (cf. Jos., Ant. VII, 14 5). The sanctity of these two springs, which led them to be selected as places of sacrifice and anointing, is noteworthy. Near Gihon, where there was plenty of water, was the fuller's field (II K 18 17; Is 7 3, 36 2).

III. The Pools of Jerusalem.

Bethesda (Bethsaida, or Bethzatha; cf. RVmg.) is mentioned in Jn ch. 5 as the scene of the healing of a lame man by Jesus. Our only clues to the location of this pool are that it was near to something connected with sheep, that it had five porches large enough to hold a multitude of sick people, that its waters flowed intermittently, and that it lay outside of the city, so that Jesus violated the Jewish Sabbath law in telling the man to carry his mat to his home. On the hypothesis that the προβατική was the Sheep Gate in the N. wall of the Temple, Bethesda has been traditionally identified with Birket Isra'īl, a large pool N. of the Ḥaram. The excavations of the White Friars near the Church of St. Anne have disclosed a vaulted cistern, which the Crusaders believed to be the Pool of Bethesda. Neither of these sites, however, fulfils all the conditions of the narrative of John. The Gihon, or Virgin's Fountain, is the only intermittent spring in the vicinity of Jerusalem (see § 8, above) and, therefore, this is probably the site of Bethesda, where the waters were periodically troubled. It is true that no remains of porches are to be seen here, but no excavations have been undertaken at this point. In all other respects this identification fulfils the requirements of the Gospel narrative.

12. Bethesda.

The names Shīlōaḥ (Shelah, Neh 3 15, Siloah AV) and Silōam are the exact equivalent in Heb. and Gr., respectively, of Silwān, in the modern Arabic name ('Ain Silwān) of the pool at the mouth of El-Wād. All the ancient references agree with this identification (cf. Neh 3 15; Jos., BJ, V, 4 1, 2, 6 1, 9 4, 12 2; II, 16 2; VI, 7 2, 8 5). In spite of its modern designation as an 'ain ('spring'), Siloam is not a spring, but is fed by a tunnel cut through the rock from the Gihon, or Virgin's Fountain. Before this tunnel was constructed a channel on the surface of the ground, discovered by Schick in 1886, led the water of Gihon to the Old Pool, or Lower Pool, which is identical with the modern Birket el-Ḥamra, below 'Ain Silwān, at the mouth of El-Wād. Is 8 6 (reign of Ahaz) probably refers to this when it speaks of "the waters of Shiloah that go softly." According to II K 20 20; Is 22 9, 11; II Ch 32 4, 30, Hezekiah, in anticipation of the coming of Sennacherib, stopped up the channel on the surface of the ground and diverted the water of Gihon from the Old, or Lower Pool, through a subterranean conduit to the New, or Upper Pool, which lay within the fortifications (see § 34, below). This conduit to the Upper Pool is referred to in II K 18 17 = Is 36 2, and in Is 7 3. In Neh 2 14 it is called the King's Pool, either because it was built by King Hezekiah or because it was adjacent to the King's Garden (see § 38, below).

IV The Hills of Jerusalem.

The two main valleys of Jerusalem, the Kidron and the Hinnom, form a V-shaped plateau that is connected with the table-land of Judæa only on the N. This plateau is divided by the Tyropœon, or central valley, into two unequal divisions, which we may call the W. hill and the E. hill. The W. hill is three times as large as the E. hill, and at its highest point near the SW. corner of the city rises to a height of 2,550 ft., 14. Topographical Arrangement.

so that it overlooks the Temple mount. By the arms of the Tyropœon this hill is subdivided into four smaller hills, which we may designate for convenience as NW, N, SW, and C (Central). The E. hill, on which the Temple stood, is subdivided by branches of the Kidron into three summits, which we may designate as NE, E, and SE. The task now before us is the identification of the hills and city quarters of antiquity with the seven summits of the modern city.

15. The City of David.

The term "city of David" occurs first in II S 5 6-8 =I Ch 11 5 f. as the name which David gave to the stronghold that he took out of the hand of the Jebusites. This fortress must have been near a water-supply, and the Gihon, or Virgin's Fountain, is the only spring close to J. This suggests that the City of David lay on SE. II S 15 23 and I K 1 33 both suggest its nearness to the Kidron and to Gihon. Nowhere is one said to go up to the City of David; but, on the other hand, one goes up from it to the Temple and to the palace which adjoined the Temple (cf. I K 8 1, 9 24). This language is explainable only if it lay on SE, which is considerably lower than the Temple hill. Is 29 1, 2, 7 connects the City of David with the Temple in such a way as to show that it must have lain on the E. ridge. Ezk 43 7 accuses the kings of Judah of defiling the Temple by putting their sepulchers close to it, but according to I K 11 43, 14 31, etc., these were in the City of David. NE was not built upon until a much later date, consequently the City of David must have lain on SE. Neh 3 15 shows that the City of David lay close to the Pool of Siloam (cf. Neh 12 37). II Ch 32 30 shows that it lay between Gihon and Siloam; II Ch 33 14, that it lay due west of Gihon. According to I Mac 1 33, 7 32 f., 14 36, it was identical with the Akra of the Syrians and was in immediate proximity to the Temple. Jos. (Ant. VIII, 3 1-2) also equates the City of David with the Akra of the Syrians.

In BJ, I, 1 4; V, 4 1, 6 1, he identifies it with the Lower City, and says that it was separated from the Upper City by a deep valley. There is universal agreement that the Upper City of Josephus is SW, but in regard to the identification of the Lower City there has been a great variety of opinions. Brocardus, Robinson, Conder, Fergusson, De Saulcy, Pierotti place it on NW; Fallmerayer, Williams, Lewin, De Vogüé, Warren, Merrill, Schick place it on N; Schultz, Kraft, Schafter on NE; Tobler and Mommert on C; von Alten and Thrupp on E; Olshausen, Caspari, Menke, Riess, Furrer, von Klaiber, Wilson, Benzinger, Buhl, Guthe, W. R. Smith, G. A. Smith, and most recent authorities on SE. The last theory is the only one that does justice to all the statements of Josephus in BJ, V, 4 1. SE is lower than SW, the Upper City; it is separated from it by a deep valley, the Tyropœon; it is lower than the Temple hill; and there is no valley at present between it and the Temple, although the excavations of Guthe seem to show that such a valley once existed (cf. Ant. XIV, 16 2; BJ, II, 17 5; IV, 19 2; VI, 6 3, 7 2). After the destruction of J. the thread of authentic tradition was broken, and the City of David was supposed to have lain on SW, where to-day the Tomb of David is shown by the Moslems; but of this tradition there is no trace before the 4th cent. A.D., and it is worthless over against the unanimous ancient testimony in favor of SE.

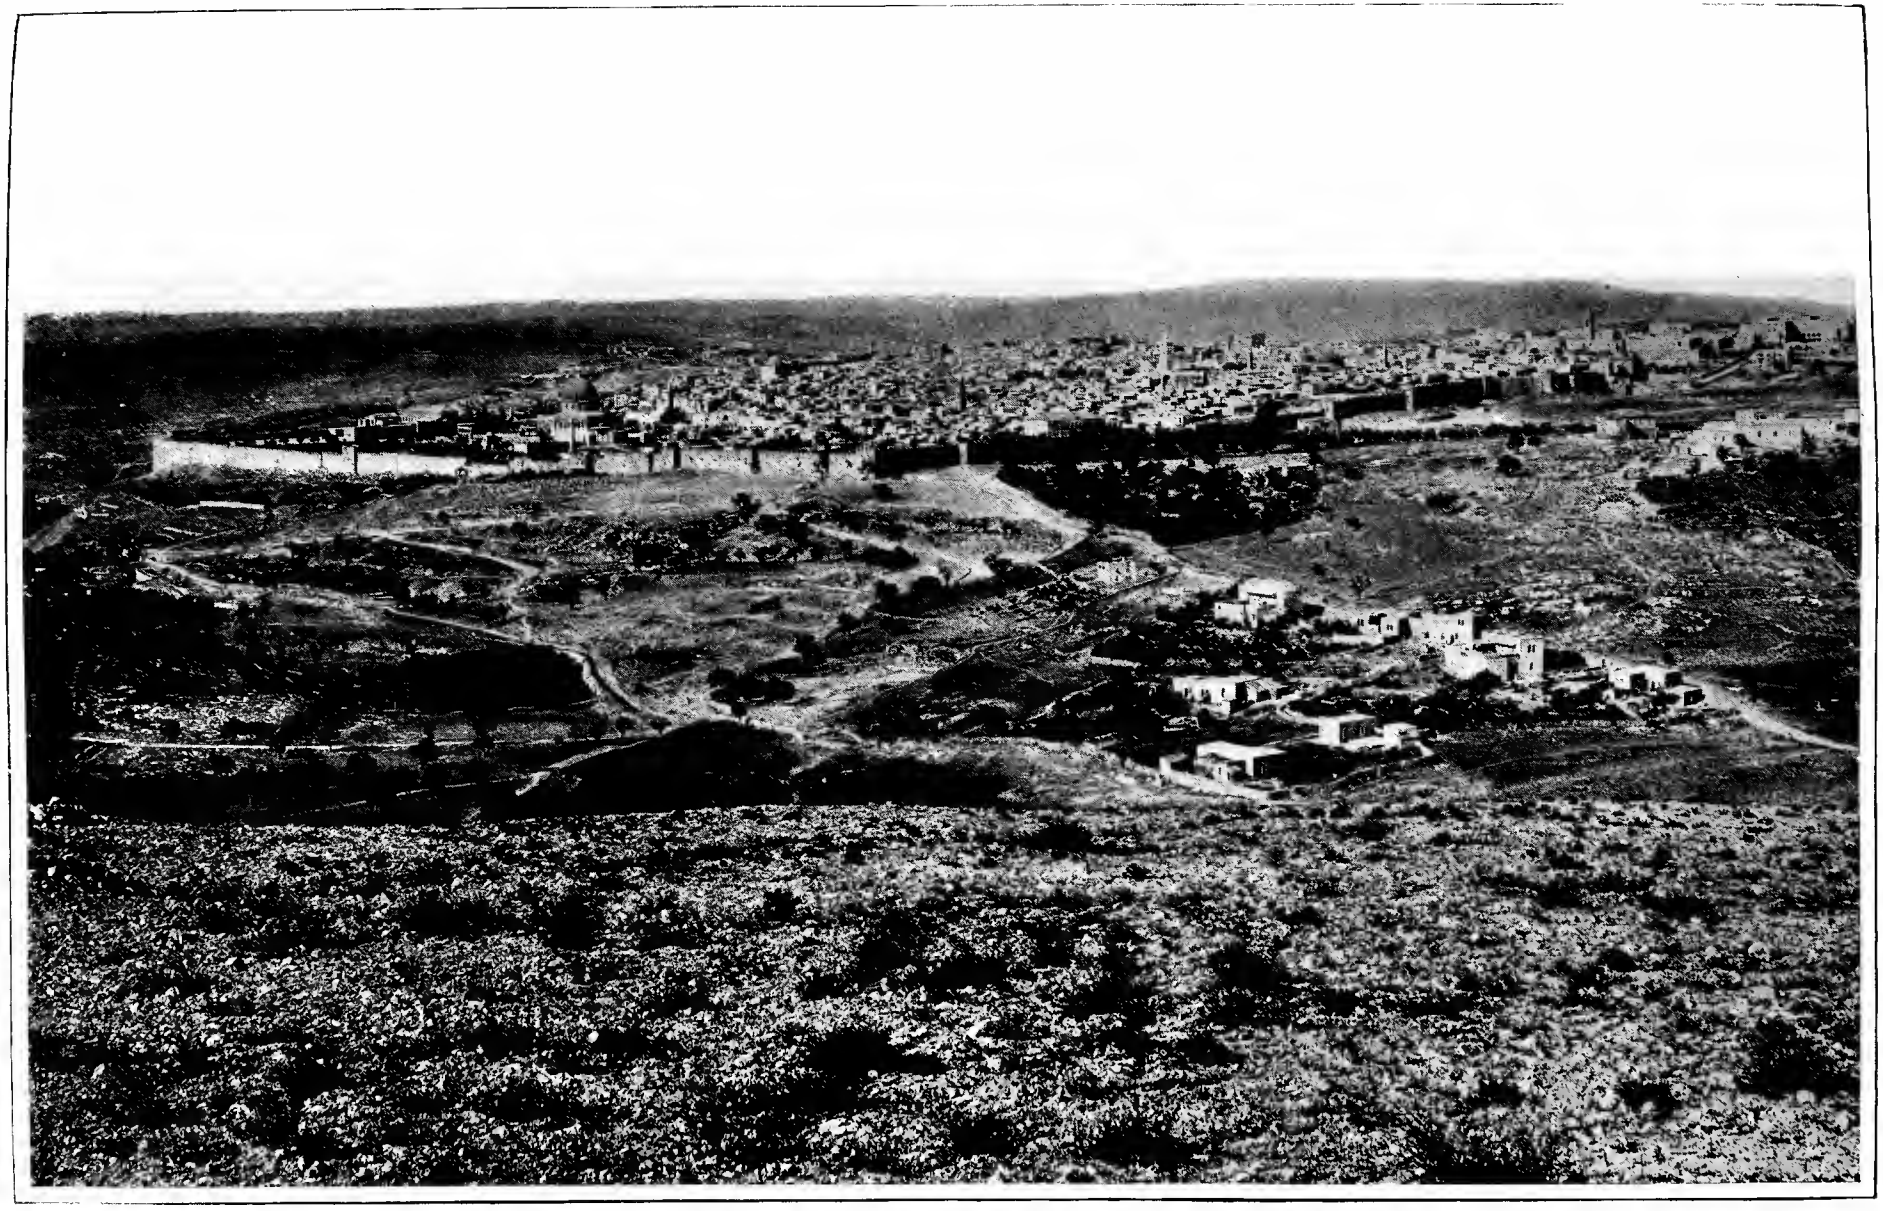
In regard to the location of the hill Zion (tsīyōn, Gr. Σιών), theories have been as diverse as they have been in regard to the City of David. The tradition of the Greek and Latin Churches since the 4th cent., followed by Brocardus, Robinson, Williams, and Lewin, places Zion on SW. Aben Ezra, De Lyra, Lightfoot, Fergusson, and Thrupp identify it with NW; Clark, Buckingham, and Ritter, with the Hill of "Evil Counsel" S. of the city; Caspari, Birch, Weikert, Socin, Guthe, Benzinger, Buhl, G. A. Smith, and most modern investigators, with the entire E. ridge. The arguments in support of this last view are as follows: (1) All the early references identify the City of David with Zion in such a way as to show that both must have lain on the same ridge (cf. II S 5 7 =I Ch 11 5; I K 8 1 =II Ch 5 2). (2) The pre-exilic prophets speak of Zion as in a peculiar sense the abode of J". This shows that it was the hill on which the Temple stood (cf. Am 1 2; Is 2 3, 4 5, 8 18, 14 32, 18 7, 29 1, 7, 8, 31 4, 9, 33 20; Mic 3 12, 4 7; Jer 8 19, 31 6, 12). (3) The early prophets mention Zion as the residence of the king and the nobility, but Solomon's palace is known to have stood on the E. hill near the Temple (cf. Am 6 1; Is 3 16 f., 16 1, 28 16; Mic 4 8; Song 3 11). (4) The exilic writings connect Zion with the Temple as frequently as do the pre-exilic writings (cf. La 1 4, 2 6 f., 4 11; Ob ver. 17; Is 52 7 f., 60 14, 64 10 f.; Jer 50 5, 28, 51 10). (5) The post-exilic prophets in like manner speak of Zion as the dwelling-place of J" (cf. Zech 2 10, 8 2 f.; Jl 2 1, 15, 3 16, 17, 21; Is 24 23). (6) In the Psalter, Zion is scarcely ever mentioned except in connection with the Temple and its worship (cf. Ps 20 2, 78 68 f., 87 2, 5, 48 2, 74 2, 76 2, 99 2, 132 13, 146 10, 9 11, 14, 2 6, 53 6, 87 2, 14 7, 50 2, 110 2, 128 5, 133 3, 134 3, 51 18 f., 65 1, 84 7, 137 1, 3, 102 21, 147 12, 125 1). (7) In the Apocrypha, Zion is identified with the Temple mount in the same manner as in the earlier literature (cf. I Mac 4 37 f., 5 54, 7 32, 14 27; Sir 24 10; I Es 8 81). (8) Josephus never uses the name Zion, but in Ant. I, 13 2 he states that David's tent for the Ark (on Zion, according to II S 6 12) was pitched on the same mountain on which the Temple afterward stood. We thus find an unbroken tradition from the earliest times down to about 100 A.D. identifying Zion with the E. hill. In certain poetical passages Zion is used in parallelism with J., as though it were a name for the whole city, but this is evidently a case of synecdoche. In prose Zion is never anything else than the Temple hill. The modern tradition which identifies Zion with SW is probably derived from the old "Zion" Church that stood in this quarter (see § 42, below).

17. Ophel.

The hill of Ophel ('ōphel) is first mentioned in Mic 4 8 as "the hill ["Ophel" mg.] of the daughter of Zion." Since Zion was the E. ridge, Ophel must have lain on the same ridge. From Neh 3 26 f., 11 21; II Ch 27 3, 33 14; Jos., BJ, V, 4 2, 6 1, it is certain that Ophel was the part of the E. hill immediately S. of the Temple.



Jerusalem from Scopus (NE. of the City).

The use of the name "Moriah" for the Temple mount is peculiar to II Ch 3 1. Gn 22 2, 14 (editorial) seems also to know it, since it explains it as meaning the place where men ought to appear before J"; that is, the Temple. In all early writings Zion is the name for the Temple mount. Moriah is apparently a late Jewish designation that has arisen from the conjecture that the altar on Zion was the scene of Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac (in Gn 22 2 it is described as one of the mountains of the land of Moriah). If this is a real name, it must be supposed to refer to one of the smaller peaks of the E. ridge, or Zion. Moriah will then be the northern summit, Ophel the central, and City of David the southern.

18. Moriah.

II. History of Jerusalem.

I. The Canaanite Period.

Concerning the origin of the city of Jerusalem we have no information. Even the etymology of the name is uncertain. Ezk 16 3 says of the city: "Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of the Canaanite; the Amorite was thy father, and thy mother was a Hittite." In Gn 14 18 it is uncertain whether Salem, the residence of Melchizedek, has anything to do with Jerusalem (see Salem). The identification first appears in Ps 76 2 and is followed by Jos. Ant. I, 10 2; VII, 3 2. Even if Salem be Jerusalem, the story of Melchizedek is of such uncertain origin that it throws no light upon the early history of the city (see Melchizedek).

19. Jebusite Jerusalem.

In the Tell-el-Amarna tablets (1400 B.C.) the city appears as Urusalim (Winckler, Tell-ei-Amarna Letters, Nos. 179–185). Its king Abd-khiba appeals to the Pharaoh Amenhotep IV for help against an invading people called the Khabiri (Hebrews?). J. next appears at the time of the Israelitic conquest about 1200 B.C. According to Jos 1 10, its king joined with the kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon in a confederacy against the Israelites. He was defeated by Joshua, but his city was not taken (cf. Jg 1 1-7). According to Jos 15 63; Jg 1 21, 19 12, the city remained in the hands of the Jebusites. The Jebusites appear in lists of the tribes of Canaan in JE (Gn 10 16, 15 21; Ex 3 8, 17, 33 2, 34 11; Nu 13 29), in D (Ex 13 5, 23 23; Dt 7 1, 20 17), also in Jos 3 10, 9 1, 11 3, 12 8, 24 11; Jg 3 5; I K 9 20 = II Ch 8 7; Ezr 9 1; Neh 9 8. They were doubtless of the same Semitic stock as the other Canaanites. In the light of Urusalim in the Amarna letters it seems likely that Jebus, as a name for the city, is a late formation out of Jebusite. The stronghold of the Jebusites was subsequently called the City of David. It must, therefore, have lain on the S. end of the E. hill, near the spring of Gihon. Whether settlements had also been made on the W. hill we have no means of determining. The possibility that this was the case is suggested by Jg 19 11 f.; Jos 15 8; Jos. Ant. VII, 3 2; BJ, V, 4 1.

II. Davidic Period.

According to II S 5 6 f. = I Ch 11 4 f., David captured the stronghold of Zion, made it his residence, and called it the City of David. Here he undertook the following building operations: A structure called "Millo" is mentioned in II S 5 9; I K 9 15, 24, 11 27; II Ch 32 5. From these passages we gather that it was a fortification of some sort, which was already in existence when David took the city, and it could be successively enlarged by David, Solomon, and Hezekiah; that it lay in the City of David; and that it defended this city on its weakest side. Apparently it was a rampart, which protected the N. end of the SE. hill. The LXX. identifies it with the Akra, a citadel S. of the Temple. The name millō, 'filling,' like Assyr. mulû, or tamlû, suggests that it was a double wall filled in with earth, such as the excavations have disclosed in the contemporary city of Gezer.

In II S 5 9 it is stated that "David built round about from Millo." This can only refer to a wall enclosing the City of David. It began at the Millo, or embankment, which crossed the S. portion of the E. hill, followed the Kidron at some distance above its bed, encircled the rocky cliff at the S. end of the hill above Siloam, and then ran up the E. side of the Tyropœon valley to join the Millo once more. Traces of this wall and of the rock scarps that formed its foundation were discovered by Bliss on the E. and S. sides of the SE. hill. In this wall perhaps was the Tower of David (Song 4 4). The tower near the Jaffa Gate, known to-day as the Tower of David, is really the tower Phasaēlus, built by Herod as a part of his palace.

21. David's Wall.

In II S 5 9 (LXX.), 5 11 it is recorded that David built him a house in the City of David. Neh 12 37 indicates that it stood at the N. end of the city. According to II S 5 11, it was erected by Tyrian workmen sent by Hiram. The walls were of stone, and it was roofed with cedar beams from Lebanon (cf. II S 7 2, 11 8, 9, 27, 15 16, 19 11, 30, 20 3).

22. David's Palace.

Neh 3 16 mentions, as situated in the City of David, the "house of the mighty men." This seems to have been a dwelling for the men of the body-guard, whose names are recorded in II S 23 8-39.

23. The Guard-House.

I K 2 10 tells us that "David slept with his fathers and was buried in the City of David." All the other kings of Judah down to Ahaz were buried in this tomb, according to the Book of Kings. Ezk 43 7 speaks of it as adjoining the wall of the Temple. Neh 3 16 mentions it as lying between the Pool of Siloam and the Water Gate on the E. side of the city. These statements are inconsistent with the traditional location of the Tomb of David on the S. end of the W. hill (cf. Jos. Ant. XIII, 8 4; XVI, 7 1; Ac 2 29).

24. David's Sepulcher.

III. Solomonic Period.

With Solomon a new building era began in Jerusalem. The following structures are ascribed to him by the Book of Kings: The "house," or sanctuary proper, stood on the summit of the E. hill a little W of the ṣakhra, or 'Rock' under the Dome of the Rock, which marks the site of the altar of burnt offering. The name dᵉbhīr ("oracle") for the Holy of Holies means properly 'west,' and shows that it lay at the W. end of the Temple (cf. Ezk 8 16). The Temple proper was surrounded with a court, which in I K 6 36 is called the inner court, to distinguish it from the great, or outer court, that enclosed all Solomon's buildings. In Jer 36 10 it is called the upper court, because it stood on a higher level. Unlike the later Temples of Zerubbabel and of Herod, Solomon's Temple had only one court (see TEMPLE, §§ 6, 24, 27, 31 f.).

26. The King's House.

According to I K 3 1, 7 1, 9 1, 10, 15, 10 4, 5, 12, Solomon built a palace for himself at the same time that he reared the house of J". This is frequently mentioned in the later history under the name of the "king's house." From many passages it is clear that it adjoined the Temple (cf. I K 6 36, 7 8, 12; Is 1 26 ff.; Ps 2 6; II K 12 18, 14 14, 16 8, 18 15, 24 13, 25 9; Jer 36 12 ff.). It can not have adjoined it on the N., because that quarter was not yet enclosed, nor on the E. or W., because there was no room. It must accordingly have lain S. of the Temple. With this agree numerous passages which speak of the palace as higher than the City of David and lower than the Temple (cf. I K 8 1, 9 24, 10 5; II K 11 19; Jer 22 1, 26 10; Mic 4 8).

27. The House of Pharaoh's Daughter.

Adjacent to Solomon's palace, probably on the W., was the house of Pharaoh's daughter, or the Harem (I K 7 8, 9 24). These two buildings were surrounded with a court spoken of as "another court" (I K 7 8), or the middle court (II K 20 4 mg.), or the court of the guard (Jer 32 2; II K 11 5, 19; II Ch 23 5; Neh 12 39, 3 25). The N. wall of this court was identical with the S. wall of the inner, or Temple court.

28. The Porch of Judgment.

According to I K 7 7, S. of the middle, or palace court stood the "porch of judgment." It served as the royal audience-chamber, and contained Solomon's throne of ivory and gold (I K 10 18-20).

29. The Porch of Pillars.

A little S. of the porch of judgment stood the "porch of pillars" (I K 7 6), which measured 50 by 30 cubits. Apparently, it served as an anteroom to the throne-room in which Solomon held audience.

30. The House of the Forest of Lebanon.

The most southerly of the buildings on the Temple hill was the "house of the forest of Lebanon" (I K 7 2). Its dimensions were 100 by 50 cubits. Its roof was supported by forty-five pillars of cedar wood in three rows. According to I K 10 16 f., Is 22 8 (cf. 39 2 = II K 20 13), it was used as a royal armory. Its name was derived from the cedar trunks that formed its pillars. Its proximity to the palace is shown not only by the narrative of I K ch. 7, but also by I K 10 16 f., which states that the shields were kept in it that were borne before the king on festal occasions. The last three buildings, as well as the inner and the middle court, were included in the outer, or great court, which surrounded all Solomon's edifices (I K 7 12). See LEBANON.

31. Solomon's Wall.

According to II S 5 9, David built the wall of the City of David. According to I K 3 1, 9 15, Solomon built the wall of J. round about. Jerusalem must be a larger idea than the City of David, and this new wall must have enclosed part at least of the W. hill, which before this time had been undefended. In I K 8 1 = II Ch 5 2; II K 9 28, 14 20; Is 10 12, 32, 22 10, 30 19; Jer 51 35; Zec 1 14; Neh 3 15, 12 37 the City of David, or Zion, is distinguished from J. as a part from the whole. This indicates that even in pre-exilic times the city had spread to the W. hill. On the N. Solomon's wall probably coincided with the first, or inner, wall described by Jos. BJ, V, 4 2, which ran from the Tower of Hippicus, near the modern Jaffa gate, straight E. to the W. wall of the Temple. On the S. it probably followed the inner line of fortification discovered by Bliss around the S. summit of the W. hill. Not until a later time was it found necessary to enclose the lower S. slopes of the W. hill (see § 35, below).

32. Gates in Solomon's Wall.

The upper gate, or gate of Benjamin, is described in I K 15 35 = I Ch 27 3; II Ch 23 20; Jer 20 2, 37 13; Ezk 8 3, 14, 9 2; Zec 14 10 as lying in the N. wall of the Temple court, which was at the same time the N. wall of Solomon's city. The gate of Ephraim, according to II K 14 13 = II Ch 25 23; Neh 8 16, 12 39, was situated in the N. wall on the W. hill, 400 cubits from the NW corner of the city. The corner gate, according to II K 14 13 = II Ch 25 23, 26 9; Jer 31 38, lay at the NW. corner of Solomon's city, substantially on the site of the modern Jaffa gate. The valley gate, according to II Ch 26 9, Neh 2 13-15, 3 13, opened upon the Valley of Hinnom, and is to be identified with the ancient gate which Bliss excavated on the SW. slope of the W. hill. It was probably the same as the gate Harsith of Jer 19 2. Just beyond this lay the "turning of the wall" (II Ch 26 9), which corresponds with the bending northward of the inner wall discovered by Bliss. The horse gate, according to II K 11 16 = II Ch 23 15; Jer 31 40; Neh 3 28; Jos. Ant. IX, 7 3, lay in the E. wall near the SE. corner of the Temple enclosure.

IV Period of Hezekiah and Manasseh.

33. The Interval Between Solomon and Hezekiah.

After the death of Solomon J. does not seem to have received any enlargement for nearly 200 years. It was not until the Northern Kingdom began to decline after the death of Jeroboam II in 744 B.C. that the fortunes of Judah revived. Uzziah is the first king of whom extensive building operations are recorded (cf. II Ch ch. 26; Jos. Ant. IX, 11 2). His son Jotham, according to II Ch 27 3, "built the upper gate of the house of Jehovah, and on the wall of Ophel he built much" (cf. Jos. Ant. IX, 11 2). Under Hezekiah (719–691 B.C.) still more extensive public works were undertaken.

II K 20 20, 18 17 = Is 36 2; II Ch 32 4, 30; Is 7 3, 22 9, 11 speak of a new conduit, constructed by Hezekiah in anticipation of Sennacherib's invasion, to bring the waters of Gihon down to the W. side of the City of David. This can only be the rock-hewn tunnel under the E. hill, which leads the waters of the Virgin's Fountain to the upper pool of Siloam. In this an ancient Heb. inscription has been found, the so-called Siloam Inscription, which reads as follows: "The tunnel. And this was the history of the tunnel. While still the picks were each over against one another, and while three cubits still [remained to be excavated there was heard] the voice of one calling to the other, for there was a zdh in the rock, toward the south and toward the north. And on the day of the tunnel the quarrymen struck pick against pick, one over against the other. And the waters flowed from the source to the pool, one thousand two hundred cubits. And a hundred cubits was the height of the rock over the head of the quarrymen." This was doubtless erected by Hezekiah's workmen, and is the oldest Israelitic inscription of any length that has come down to us. The word mōtsā' which this inscription uses for 'source' is the same one that II Ch 32 30 uses for the 'spring' of Gihon (see §§ 11 and 12, above).

34. Hezekiah's Conduit.

From II Ch 32 5; Is 22 10 f. it appears that Hezekiah built a new outer wall. Two outer walls are known to archeology, one on the N., the other on the S. From the exprcssion "betwcen the two walls," which Is 22 10 f. (701 B.C.) uses of the upper pool of Siloam, it appears that Hezekiah's wall must have been the outer wall on the S., since the two walls can only have been the wall on the W side of the E. hill, and the wall on the E. side of the W. hill. This is the wall described by Nehemiah in 3 13-15, 12 31-37; Jos. BJ, V, 4 2, and it is the outer line of fortification on the S. excavated by Bliss. It ran in a long loop around the extreme S. end of the W hill, crossed the Tyropœon above Siloam, and there joined the wall of the City of David.

35. Hezekiah's Wall.

According to II Ch 33 14, Manasseh "built an outer wall to the city of David, on the west side of Gihon, in the valley, even to the entrance at the fish gate." The mention of the fish gate shows that Manasseh's construction was the second wall on the N., in which the fish gate is known to have been situated (Neh 3 3, 12 39). The mishneh, or second quarter, college AV (II K 22 14 =II Ch 34 22; Zeph 1 10), which lay near the fish gate, is not mentioned before Manasseh. Manasseh and his successors are the first kings who are said to have been buried in J., but not in the City of David (II K 21 18; II Ch 33 20; II K 21 26, 23 30 =II Ch 35 24). Apparently, therefore, the mishneh was the new quarter enclosed by Manasseh's second wall on the N., and in this quarter were the tombs of Manasseh and his successors. Here also was the Maktesh (Zeph 1 11), or 'the mortar' (mg.), a region inhabited by Canaanites. This outer wall was the one rebuilt by Nehemiah (Neh 3 1-8, 12 39) and described by Jos. BJ, V, 4 2. From neither of these descriptions can the course of this wall be traced with certainty, and the evidence of archeology is equally obscure. Only one fact is certain, namely, that an ancient wall followed the line of the present N. wall from the Jaffa gate to the Damascus gate. Whether this was the second or the third wall described by Josephus (BJ, V, 4 2) is one of the most difficult problems of Jerusalem archeology, in regard to which there is as yet no consensus of opinion. The theory which identifies the present wall with the third wall appeals to the location of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher inside of this wall. Christ was crucified outside of the second wall; hence it is claimed that the present N. wall can not be the second. Unfortunately the genuineness of the Sepulcher rests upon too slender historical evidence for its location to be a decisive argument in the case. It is also claimed that remains of the second wall are found inside of the Church of the Sepulcher; but a careful examination of the stones makes it doubtful whether any of them ever belonged to a city wall. The wall as laid down by Schick inside of the Sepulcher follows an inconceivably bad course, running on low ground all the way, and making three rectangular bends without reason. It does not correspond with Josephus' description of it as "circling about," and it does not do justice to his statements in regard to the distance between the second and the third wall, the size of the city, and the distance of the third wall from the monument of Helena and from Scopus. We must conclude, accordingly, that the remains along the line of the present N. wall are to be identified with Manasseh's wall, the second wall of Josephus; and that the third wall built by Agrippa in 43 A.D. is to be sought still further N. in the remains described by Robinson in 1838.

36. Manasseh's Wall.

V Persian, Greek, Maccabæan, and Herodian Periods.

Nehemiah rebuilt on the old lines and included all that had been added by the early kings. On the E. and W. his line coincided with that of David and Solomon, on the S. with that of Hezekiah, and on the N. with that of Manasseh. His account of it is found in Neh 2 2-15, ch. 3, 12 27-40. This was identical with the wall of Josephus (BJ, V, 4 2), exclusive of the third, or outer wall on the N.

37. Nehemiah's Wall.

From Neh 3 1, 32, 12 39, it appears that the sheep gate was identical with the upper gate, or gate of Benjamin (see § 32, above), and lay on the N. side of the Temple enclosure. A little NW. of this lay the tower of Ham-meah, Meah AV (Neh 3 1, 12 39). This is identical with the bīrāh, or castle, which Neh 2 8 describes as "the castle which appertaineth to the house (of Jehovah)" (cf. Neh 7 2). The word is the Assyr. birtu, 'fortress,' and is not found in the O T before the Persian period. The castle was the residence of the Persian governor and later of the Hasmonæan (Maccabæan) priest-kings. Josephus (Ant. XV, 11 4; XVIII, 4 3; BJ, I, 21 1) calls it Baris. It was rebuilt by Herod the Great and was named Antonia in honor of Mark Antony. Josephus gives a detailed description of it in BJ, V, 4 2, 5 8. From this it appears that it lay on the site of the modern Turkish barracks, on a cliff near the NW. corner of the Temple court. According to BJ, V, 5 8, it was connected with the Temple by a portico. It was garrisoned with a strong force of Roman soldiers, who were ready to rush out in a moment, if there should be any commotion in the Temple (cf. Ac 21 30-40, 23 10, 16, 32). This castle should be carefully distinguished from the Akra, or 'citadel,' which lay S. of the Temple (see § 15, above).

Still further NW was the tower of Hananel, Hananeel AV (Neh 3 1, 12 39; Jer 31 38; Zec 14 10), on the cliff near the present Damascus gate, at the N. corner of the city. Just beyond this was the fish gate (Neh 3 3, 12 39; II Ch 33 14; Zeph 1 10), which is to be identified with the modern Damascus gate. Apparently it was the same as the middle gate (Jer 39 1-3). The old gate (Neh 3 6, 12 39; Zec 14 10, read ישׁן, 'old,' instead of ראשׁון, 'first') is identified by Zec 14 10 and by the order in Neh with the corner gate that stood in the NW. corner of Solomon's wall (see § 32, above). The broad wall (Neh 3 8, 12 39) corresponds with the present W wall of the city S. of the Jaffa gate. The tower of the furnaces (Neh 3 11, 12 38) corresponds with the rock-cut foundations of a tower known as Maudslay's Scarp in the grounds of Bishop Gobat's School. The valley gate (Neh 2 13, 3 13, 12 31) we have met already at the SW corner of Solomon's wall (see § 32, above). The dung gate (Neh 2 13, 3 13, 12 31) is the ancient gate excavated by Bliss at the extreme S. corner of the city. The fountain gate (Neh 2 14, 3 15, 12 37), as its name implies, lay close to the fountain of Siloam at the point where the wall crossed the Tyropœon valley. It is the same as "the gate between the two walls" (II K 25 4; Jer 39 4, 52 7). Next came the pool of Siloam (Neh 2 14, 3 15; see § 13, above). The king's garden (II K 25 4; Jer 39 4, 52 7; Neh 3 15) was the fertile tract in the mouth of the Tyropœon that was watered by the overflow from Siloam. Here apparently were situated the king's wine-presses (Zec 14 10). The stairs of the city of David (Neh 3 15, 12 37) correspond with rock-hewn steps that may still be seen at the S. end of the E. hill. The wall described in Neh 3 16-26 followed the line of the one excavated by Bliss and Guthe on the E. side of the E. hill. The "tower standing out" is the tower excavated by Warren S. of the Haram. The water gate (Neh 3 26, 12 37, 8 1) lay near this tower and gave access to the spring of Gihon. The horse gate (Neh 3 28) we have met already in Solomon's wall by the SE. corner of the Temple court (see § 32, above). The gate of Hammiphkad, 'the mustering' (Neh 3 31), was identical with the old east gate of the Temple (see TEMPLE, § 8).

39. Between Nehemiah and N T Times.

During this interval J. had come to be the religious center of world-wide Judaism. Under the Maccabees and, to a still greater degree, under Herod the Great, its population increased rapidly. The Maccabæan princes paid much attention to buildings and fortifications. On the W hill they erected their palace. On the same hill Herod the Great erected his most magnificent palace (Jos. BJ, V, 4 4). Herod greatly strengthened the fortifications of the city, notably by the erection of the three imposing towers, Hippicus, Phasaēlus, and Mariamme, all in the W. wall. A hippodrome, a gymnasium, and a theater were also features of the J. of Herod. It was under the same king that the Temple underwent a complete reconstruction (see TEMPLE, §§ 29–34), involving extensive alterations in the walls and fortifications of the Temple hill. In fact, the J. of the N T times was practically a new city.

VI. New Testament Period.

40. Extent of the City.

Nehemiah's wall was the outermost wall in the time of Christ, and there was probably a large extramural population. The third wall on the N. was not built by Agrippa until several years after the Crucifixion.

41. Jesus' Visits to Jerusalem.

Christ's relation to J. was only that of an occasional visitor. His first three appearances are connected with the Temple (Lk 2 22-39, 41-50; Jn 2 13-22); His fourth, with the Pool of Bethesda (Jn ch. 5; see § 12, above); His fifth, with the Temple (Jn ch. 7 f.); His sixth, with Siloam (Jn ch. 9; see § 13, above). On His seventh and last visit He made His triumphal entry into the Temple and taught there on Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday of Passion Week (Mk chs. 11–16, and ‖s).

42. The Upper Room.

On Thursday Jesus ate the Last Supper with His disciples. The scene of this meal was a large upper room (Mk 14 15), probably in the home of Mary, the mother of Mark. This same upper room seems to have been the meeting-place of the infant Church after the Ascension. Epiphanius records (Weights and Measures, ch. 14) that Hadrian, on his visit to J. (135 A.D.), found this building still standing in spite of the destruction of the city in 70 A.D. This testimony is confirmed by other early evidence, and there seems, accordingly, good reason to believe that the traditional Cœnaculum on the S. end of the W. hill (now the Moslem Tomb of David) is the real scene of the Last Supper, of the descent of the Holy Spirit, and of the founding of the first church of Christendom. Adjoining the Cœnaculum a building known as the "Church of Zion," or "Church of the Apostles," existed as early as the 4th cent.

43. Palace of Caiaphas.

From the Last Supper Christ went to the Garden of Gethsemane on the W. slope of the Mount of Olives (Mk 14 26; Jn 18 1). Here He was apprehended by the officers and taken to the High Priest Annas, and by him sent to Caiaphas (Jn 18 12, 24). A tradition which goes back to the Bordeaux Pilgrim (333 A.D.) places the priestly palace on the W. hill near the Cœnaculum. This is probably correct, since this was the quarter in which the Jewish priestly aristocracy dwelt.

44. The Prætorium and Pavement.

From the palace of Caiaphas He was taken to the Prætorium (Gr. πραιτώριον, judgment-hall AV) of Pilate (Jn 18 28). Tradition identifies this with the Castle of Antonia at the NW corner of the Temple area, on the site of the modern Turkish barracks (see § 38, above); but it is unlikely that the governor made his residence with the common soldiers in the fortress, and the best recent authorities are agreed that by Prætorium is meant the palace of Herod the Great, on the site of the modern Citadel, near the Jaffa gate. The Jews were unwilling to enter the Prætorium for fear of ceremonial defilement, so Pilate went out to them to a place called Gabbatha, or Pavement (Jn 19 13), which was probably the large open court in the center of Herod's palace, corresponding with the court in the center of the modern Citadel. Pilate sent Jesus to Herod Antipas, Tetrarch of Galilee, who was probably residing at the old palace of the Hasmonæans on the E. side of the W. hill opposite the Temple, on the site of the modern Ashkenazi Synagogue (cf. Jos. Ant. XIV, 1 2, 4 2, 13 3 f.; XVIII, 4 3; XX, 8 11; BJ, I, 6 1, 13 3 f.; II, 16 3, 17 6), and Herod returned him to Pilate. Pilate then sentenced Jesus to death, and He was led out to be crucified.

45. Golgotha, Calvary.

The traditional scene of the Crucifixion and entombment is the Church of the Holy Sepulcher in the NW quarter of the modern city. If the second wall on the N. ran inside of this site, it may be genuine; but if, as is probable (see § 36, above), the second wall corresponds with the present N. wall, from the Jaffa gate to the Damascus gate, then the traditional Sepulcher can not be genuine, for all our authorities agree that Jesus was crucified and buried outside the city wall (Mt 27 32; Mk 15 20; Jn 19 17, 21, 41; He 13 12). Where the real place of crucifixion was must remain a matter of conjecture. Our only clue for its identification is its Aram. name Golgotha, 'skull' (Lat. calvaria, Eng. Calvary), which can hardly have been given because it was a place of execution, or because of a tradition connecting it with the skull of Adam, but must have referred to its shape. There is a knoll just outside of the Damascus gate which bears a singular resemblance to a skull, and many modern travelers have conjectured that this is the real Golgotha.

46. Akeldama, Potter's Field.

"Akeldama" (from the Aram. חֲקַלְדְּמָא, ḥăqaldᵉmā', 'field of blood') was the name of a piece of land near J. that was used for the burial of strangers. According to Mt 27 3-9, it was originally a potter's field, and received the name Akeldama from the fact that it was bought with the money paid Judas to betray Jesus, and subsequently returned by him to the chief priests. According to Ac 1 18 f. it was called the "field of blood" because Judas here committed suicide. Harmonistic commentators have supposed that Judas bought the field with the price of his treachery, killed himself there, and that then the field was bought by the priest with the money that he had returned. More probably Akeldama is an old name for which Christian tradition has given two independent interpretations. Since the 7th cent. a place known as Ḥakḳ ed-Dumm, 'price of blood,' on a cliff S. of the Wâdy er-Rabābī, SW. of Siloam, has been regarded as Akeldama, and its possession as a holy place has been keenly contested by the Christian sects. Whether there is any authority for this identification we do not know. The absence of clay in the neighborhood makes it an unlikely location for a potter's field.

JESHIMON, jesh'i-mon or jᵉ-shai'mon (יְשִׁימֹן, yᵉshīmōn), 'barren desert': In a few instances this word is regarded as a geographical term. In Nu 21 20 Pisgah is said to look down upon Jeshimon. Some scholars locate the place here referred to in the Jordan Valley, NE. of the Dead Sea. At the same time, however, it is the name of the desert into which David retired before Saul. It was near Ziph and Maon, which lay to the S. of Hebron, and, consequently, designates the E. section of the Judæan hills, which stretch toward the Dead Sea. This is an absolutely barren region with many natural fastnesses, and has ever been the home of the outlaw (I S 23 19, 24, 26 1, 3).

JESHISHAI, ję-shai'shai or ję-shai'shê (יְשִׁשַׁי, yᵉshīshay): A Gadite (I Ch 5 14). E. E. N.

JESHOHAIAH, ji''sho-hê'yā or jesh''o-hê'yā (יְשׁוֹחָיָה, yᵉshōḥāyāh): A Simeonite (I Ch 4 36). E. E. N.

JESHUA, jesh'u-a (יֵשׁוּעַ, yēshūa'), 'J" is salvation'; another form of 'Joshua': I. 1. A name used once for Joshua, the son of Nun (q.v.) (Neh 8 17). 2. The name of the 9th of the twenty-four classes of priests (I Ch 24 11, Jeshuah AV). 3. The name of a family of Pahath-moab, which returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 6; Neh 7 11). 4. One of the Levites in charge of the distribution of the tithes (II Ch 31 15). 5. The high priest who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7, called "Joshua" in Hag 1 1, and Zec 3 1 ff.). He helped in rebuilding the altar (Ezr 3 2, 8) and the house of God (Ezr 4 3, 5 2; cf. Ezr 10 18; Neh 12 1, 7, 10, 26). 6. A Levitical family, or its heads, who assisted in rebuilding the Temple (Ezr 3 9), in expounding the Law (Neh 8 7), and in sealing the covenant (Neh 10 9 [10]; cf. Ezr 2 40, 8 33; Neh 3 19, 7 43, 9 4, 5, 12 8, 24).

II. A post-exilic town in the S. of Judah (Neh 11 26). Conder identifies it with Khirbet Sa'wi, Map II, D 4. Perhaps it is the same as the Shema of Jos 15 26 ("Sheba" in Jos 19 2). C. S. T.

JESHURUN, jesh'u-run (יְשֻׁרוּן, yᵉshūrūn), 'upright one': A poetical name of Israel designating it under its ideal character. In Dt 32 15 it is used in reproach of Israel, which had departed from its ideal; elsewhere it is a title of honor (Dt 33 5, 26; Is 44 2). C. S. T.

JESIMIEL, ję-sim'i-el (יְשִׁימִיאֵל, yᵉsīmī'ēl), 'God places': A Simeonite (I Ch 4 36). E. E. N.

JESSE, jes'ę (יִשַׁי, yīshay): The grandson of Boaz (Ru 4 22), and, apparently, a prominent inhabitant of Bethlehem. From his descent we should assume that he was the chief man of the village. He is almost always mentioned in connection with his youngest son David (I S 16 1 ff., etc.). During his pursuit by Saul, David sent his parents, who must have been aged, to the king of Moab (I S 22 3 f.). So to treat with a neighboring prince indicates the prominence of David and his family. J.'s name appears also in Is 11 1, 10, where the contrast is between small beginnings and future glory, as in Mic 5 2. A. S. C.

JESUI, jes'yu-ai. See Ishvah.

JESUS (Ἰησοῦς): The Gr. form of 'Joshua,' or 'Jeshua.' 1. For Joshua (so RV), the son of Nun, in AV (Ac 7 45; He 4 8). 2. A Jew in Rome called Justus, a fellow worker and comforter of Paul (Col 4 11). C. S. T.

I. Introductory.

1. Sources.

The only sources for the life of Christ which need to be considered are the four Gospels. The reference in Tacitus (Ann. XV, 44) merely alludes to Christ as the originator of an exitiabilis superstitio, which in spite of His execution under Pilate succeeded in reaching Rome; that in Josephus (Ant. XVIII, 33) is a Christian interpolation. The later calumnies of the Talmud and the Toledoth Jesu show the relation of Jews to Christians, but have nothing to do with the life of Jesus (cf. Herford's Christianity in Talmud and Midrash). Even the other writings of the N T add nothing to speak of. In Ac 20 35 we have the one word of Jesus outside of the Gospels which is indubitably authentic; there may be another concealed in I Th 4 15. The ἄγραφα, or unwritten sayings of Jesus, have been collected by Resch and sifted by Ropes (Texte u. Untersuchungen, V, 4; XIV, 2), but they do not add to our knowledge of Him; and the same must be said of the apocryphal gospels, not excepting the Gospel of Peter, a large fragment of which was discovered in 1892, and of the Λόγια Ἰησοῦ (1897), and New Sayings of Jesus (1904), published by Grenfell and Hunt. The interest of religion and of history in Jesus must be satisfied from the canonical Gospels, or not at all. The indubitable Pauline epistles, of course, establish the fact that He lived, and that He made an extraordinary impression on His followers; but they hardly yield any picture of His life. It is important, therefore, to indicate the nature and value of our Gospels.

Taking together Mk, Mt, and Lk, there are some points on which scholars are practically agreed. (1) The common framework of the narrative—that is, the general order of the events—is originally due to Mk. Hence in questions of order, Mk, Mt, and Lk, as against John, are not three witnesses, but one. Mk's narrative, according to the unanimous tradition of the Church, represents the teaching of Peter; but the oldest tradition (Papias' elder in Euseb. HE, III, 39) does not claim for it the merit of chronological order. (2) The great mass of words of Jesus, common to Mt and Lk, but not found in Mk, probably came from a document used in a somewhat different form by the first and third Evangelists; this document in its original form was older than Mk (though Wellhausen, Einleitung, S. 73 ff., denies this), and was the work of the Apostle Matthew. (3) Taking into account the spaee between the baptism and the death of Jesus, the matter peculiar to Mt belongs to what is historically of least value in his Gospel, that peculiar to Lk to what is of most value in his. (4) The use which a historian can make of John has been and is much disputed. The extremes are represented by Loisy (Le quatrième Évangile) or Wrede (Charakter und Tendenz des Johannesevangeliums) on the one hand, who do not regard it as historical at all in comparison with the Synoptics, and by Westcott or Godet on the other. Sanday's Criticism of the Fourth Gospel (1905) gives a fair survey of the whole question. The difficulty arises from the juxtaposition in the Fourth Gospel of what seem irreconcilable things; on the one hand, an element that is either irreducibly historical or, which is an impossible alternative, gratuitous fiction —notes of time, place, personal names, and characters, more vivid and precise than anything in the Synoptics; and on the other, especially in the discourses ascribed to Jesus, something at once systematic and elusive, a mingling in uncertain proportions of tradition, symbol, and doctrine, which makes the page waver as we read, as the colors waver in watered silk, and suggests that what we hear is not so much the voice of Jesus, as He spoke in the fields of Galilee or the streets of Jerusalem, as the voice of the Risen Lord, speaking through His Spirit in the soul of an aged, deeply experienced, and profoundly reflective disciple. This state of the case has simply to be recognized. The notes of time and place in John are of the highest value, especially where they seem intentionally to correct the Synoptic tradition (e.g., Jn 3 24, compared with Mt 4 12); but for the historical form of the teaching of Jesus we must depend mainly on the Synoptics.

2. Chronology. The life of Jesus, so far as it is covered by the apostolic testimony—in other words, so far as we have strictly historieal evidence for it—extends from the baptism of John to the Ascension (Ac 1 21). To know the length of this period is more important than to be able to date either its beginning (which is elaborately done in Lk 3 1) or its end. The Synoptics mention only one passover, that at which Jesus died, and leave a prima facie impression that His ministry lasted a year or rather less (Lk 4 19 was interpreted thus by many of the Fathers and perhaps by the Evangelist); but John corrects this. He mentions at least three passovers (2 13, 6 4—this is shown to be a passover by the "much grass" in ver. 10, even if the words τὸ πάσχα were not originally in the text—and 12 1); that is, he extends the ministry of Jesus to somewhat over two years. Referenees in the Synoptics yield undesigned and, therefore, strong support to this. Thus the "green grass" in Mk 6 39 suggests the spring season, as in Jn 6 10, and, though the incident may be misplaced, the same holds of the plucking the ears of corn, Mk 2 23. Earlier visits of Jcsus to Jerusalem, though not mentioned by the Synoptics, are suggested not only by Mt 23 37 ("how often would I have gathered thy children together"), but by Lk 10 38 (the village is Bethany, close by Jerusalem), and by the friends and acquaintances whom Jesus evidently had in the capital (Mk 14 13 ff., 15 43. Probably "the hundred and twenty" of Ac 1 15 were not all Galilæans). Hence we adopt the chronological, which carries with it the geographical, framework of John; and hold that the public life of Jesus extends over two years and some months, and was carried on in Jerusalem and Judæa and, even on occasion, in Samaria, as well as in Galilee and Peræa. It is true that the almost total absence of chronologieal data within the Synoptics, and the unquestionable fact that incidents are narrated in them (e.g., in Mk 2 1–3 6) in an order determined not by time, but by some inward affinity, make it impossible to distribute the matter of the Synoptics with any certainty over the time assumed by John; but this does not affect the truth either of his chronology or of their facts. It only means that we can not draw up a calendar of the life of Jesus. If we look at the date, as opposed to the duration of the ministry, our starting-point must be Lk 3 1. The fifteenth year of Tiberius is from 28–29 A.D., counting from the death of Augustus in 14 A.D. But as Tiberius had been associated in the government from the end of 11 or the beginning of 12 A.D., Jesus might have appeared as early as 26. Allowing for uncertainties in the counting of parts of years, Luke's date synchronizes fairly well with that of Jn 2 20. The building of the Temple began in 20–19 B.C., and forty-six years brings us to 26 or 27 A.D. The most probable result of careful investigation is that the three passovers in the ministry of Jesus were those of 27, 28, and 29 A.D. On the whole of this intricate subject cf. C. H. Turner, Chronology of the N T, in HDB, also Andrews, Life of Our Lord, and Stevens and Burton, Harmony of the Gospels for Historical Study.

3. Environment. When Jesus was born Herod the Great ruled all Palestine under the suzerainty of Rome. On his death his kingdom was divided, and Jesus bceame politically the subject of his son Herod Antipas—the person who is always meant when Herod is mentioned in the Gospels without any addition (Mk 6 14 ff.; Lk 13 31, 23 8). When He visited Jerusalem, He passed from Herod's jurisdiction and came directly under that of Rome; for Judæa on the death of Archelaus (Mt 12 22), 6 A.D., had been incorporated in the Roman province of Syria, and was governed by a procurator (ἐπίτροπος, ἡγεμών, Lk 3 1; Mt 27 2), who resided at Cæsarea and alone had the power of life and death. In internal affairs much was left to the Sanhedrin, or council of elders, chief priests, and scribes, and espeeially to the high priest. During the whole public life of Jesus, Herod Antipas was tctrarch of Galilee and Peræa, Pontius

Pilate procurator of Judæa, and (Joseph) Caiaphas high priest in Jerusalem. By this political environment we can not say that Jesus was influenced at all. The one thing He resolutely excluded from His conception of the Kingdom of God was the political and national hopes of Jewish patriotism.

We might almost say as much of His relations to the religious parties, the characteristics of which are known to us from the Gospels and Josephus. He had attended none of their schools (Jn 7 15). The Sadducees had the center of their power in Jerusalem. He can have been little in contact with them, and their worldly, rationalizing, unspiritual temper must have been extremely antipathetic to Him. The Pharisees were to be found everywhere. They represented the popular conception of religion. Having a zeal for God, though it was not according to knowledge, they might have been expected to command a certain amount of sympathy from Jesus, and indications have been sought in the Gospels that He tried to form some kind of connection with them (Lk 7 36, 11 37, 14 1; cf. Mt 23 2 f.), but without success. Jesus never appears in the Gospels except as the critic and eventually the judge of Pharisaism (Mt chs. 5–7, 15, 23). Of the Essenes of Josephus (Bell. Jud. II, 8) there is no trace in the Gospels, not even in connection with John the Baptist.

The religious environment of Jesus in His early years was that which we see in Lk chs. 1 and 2. He was brought up among lowly people, dutifully observant of the commandments and ordinances of God, and devoted to the hope of Israel. The religion of obedience and of hope could degenerate, and no doubt it had degenerated in multitudes, and especially in the Pharisaic party, into what may be called legalism and apocalyptic (cf. Holtzmann, Neut. Theol., I, 30)—a religion which affected in its own strength to fulfil punctiliously all God's requirements, to put God by doing so under obligation to it, and then to claim from Him, as of right, the fulfilment in a blankly supernatural fashion of the wildest national ambitions. But it could also be saved from degeneration, and doubtless was, in people like Zacharias and Elizabeth, Joseph and Mary, Simeon and Anna, and 'the poor' or 'the meek,' in the land generally. It was among them that Jesus was brought up, and the purest tradition of Jewish piety was continued in Him. Apart from this the Gospels allow us to see only two forces which counted for much in His life, the O T and John the Baptist.

In the O T He makes most frequent reference to Deuteronomy, the Psalms, the second part of Isaiah, and Daniel, but is evidently familiar also with the historical books. To John, as the one contemporary spiritual influence the power of which He amply acknowledged, it is necessary to pay more attention.

II. Events Preliminary to the Ministry.

The relation of John to Jesus, as Jesus Himself understood it (Mt 11 10; Lk 7 27), was that of one who prepared the way for a greater to follow (Mal 3 1. It is Jesus who makes the quotation; observe the change from "my face" in Mal to "thy face" in the Gospels, in order to apply the prophecy to Jesus instead of God). It does not follow that John understood this. Jesus knew the Baptist's significance better than he did himself.

4. The Forerunner. When the Jews asked John, "Art thou Elijah?" (Jn 1 21), he said, "I am not." But Jesus said of him to the people: "If ye are willing to receive it, this is Elijah, that is to come" (Mt 11 14). This may partly explain the difference between the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel in their representation of this subject. In the Synoptics, though John baptizes Jesus, he bears no express testimony to Him; the one greater than himself, who comes after him and is to baptize with the Holy Spirit and with fire, is never in so many words identified with Jesus. What John does, as Jesus represents it, is to initiate a powerful moral movement associated with Messianic expectations (Mt 11 12), which, so far as it does not come to nothing through moral relapse (Mt 12 43-45; Jn 5 35), finds its goal and satisfaction in Jesus. The one moral peril the Baptist has to encounter is the possibility of being "offended" in Jesus (Mt 11 6); i.e., of failing to see that in Jesus the hopes which inspired and had been inspired by his own work were finding their true fulfilment, and, therefore, of turning from Him in unbelief. This is unquestionably the strictly historical view. The rôle of forerunner was one which John filled to a large extent unconsciously; when, therefore, the Fourth Gospel represents his functions as summed up in bearing witness to Jesus (Jn 1 6-8, 3 26, 5 35), and includes in his testimony the sublimest doctrines of the Christian faith (1 15, 1 29-34, 3 31), it is putting explicitly into his lips something which was in a way involved in his relation to Jesus, but which he could not have so expressed. Jesus realized it as the truth of John's relation to Himself, but John could not. The depth of the impression John made on Jesus is seen by Jesus' frequent references to him, His extraordinary appreciation of his greatness, and the recurrence in His own utterances of impassioned phrases of the Baptist (Mt 11 7-19, and ‖ in Lk; Mt 17 10-13, 21 23-32; 7 19; cf. 3 10; 23 33, cf. 3 7). Jesus recognized unequivocally the Divine mission of John, and regarded acceptance of his baptism as included in the fulfilment of all righteousness (Mt 3 15). Accordingly He came from Galilee to Jordan to be baptized with the rest.

5. Baptism of Jesus. The baptism of Jesus was a crisis in His life and the occasion of a great spiritual experience. The narrative in Mk may be read as though no one were concerned but Jesus. It is He who sees the heavens rent asunder and the Spirit as a dove descending; it is to Him that the voice comes out of the heavens, "Thou art my beloved Son, in thee I am well pleased" (Mk 1 9-11). In Jn, on the other hand, the occasion is one on which the Baptist receives this same revelation; and the third person ("This is my son") in Mt 3 17 and the "bodily form" in Lk 3 22 suggest that these evangelists also conceived that others as well as Jesus heard and saw. However the literary and historical questions thus raised are to be settled, they do not affect the intention of Jesus nor His experience. The great difficulty in the baptism has always been to understand how one whom the Evangelists, like all N T writers, regarded as sinless could submit to a baptism of repentance having remission of sins in view. The difficulty was felt by John himself, no doubt after some intercourse with Jesus (Mt 3 14 f.), and it was felt by the author of the Gospel of the Hebrews (cf. Nestle's N T Græci supplementum, p. 76). There is no answer to it unless we can say that Jesus in pure love identified Himself with His people, made common cause with them as a sinful people, mourning over their sin and repelling it as they did, only with a far deeper sense of what it meant. In doing this He "fulfilled all righteousness," i.e., He did justice to all the moral interests of God and man involved in the situation. He exhibited the grace of God to the sinful in an act which showed Him inexorable to sin. It was not a chance that He heard in that hour, and not another, the heavenly voice which declared Him Son of God. The heavenly voice spoke in O T words, since the Divine assurance of what He was and was called to be was mediated to Jesus through Ps 2 7 and Is 42 1. He was to unite in His own person and work the victorious Messianic King of the Psalm, and the Servant of the Lord, "graced with meekness and constancy," whom we see in the prophet. This is the revelation of the baptism for us. It shows that Jesus, in His own consciousness, from the very beginning of His ministry, united these two characters which His people had never been able to relate to each other. How two ideals, apparently so disparate, came to coalesce in His mind, we can not tell. We know nothing of a growth of the Messianic consciousness. No doubt it had psychological antecedents and conditions, which prepared for it and made it possible, but we can only conjecture vaguely upon them. It appears as suddenly as a lightning flash, and it shows no trace of development or of modification. How the seemingly inconsistent elements in it were to be fused only His future life would show. But see GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 6.

Can we tell, then, what is meant by the Spirit descending and abiding on Him? The Spirit in the O T means God in act, God putting forth His power, and the nearest synonym for spirit here would be one suggesting this. Compare Ac 10 38 and Lk 4 14, and the fact that Jesus did no mighty work till after this time, and referred such works to the Spirit (Mt 12 28). Jesus was from this time on divinely empowered for the work He had to do. Without such 'accesses' of Divine excitement as are elsewhere referred to the Spirit (Ac 4 31, 13 9), He had God always with Him in the power His work required—to heal (Lk 5 17), to preach the glad tidings (Lk 4 18), to be gentle and constant till He had achieved victory for God (Mt 12 18), to read men with superhuman insight (Jn 2 24 f.). No question can be raised here about the personality of the Spirit, or the similarity of the experience of Jesus to that of Christians who received the Spirit after Pentecost (on this last subject, cf. O. Holtzmann, War Jesus Ekstatiker?). Thus divinely assured of His calling and divinely empowered for it, Jesus was prepared to face His life's work. He never returned to Nazareth to resume the old family and business relations. As the end of an old life and the beginning of a new, baptism was to Jesus what it was to all who heard John's summons, but in one important respect it differed. For the others baptism with water and baptism with the Spirit were contrasted, for Him they coincided. Their normal coincidence was to be the rule in the Church (Jn 3 5), and in this sense the baptism of Jesus is the type of Christian baptism.

Jesus was now empowered for His work, but He was not to enter on it at random. It was His task, in the Messianic consciousness revealed in the heavenly voice, to bring in the Kingdom of God among men; but how? What paths were open to one who was called to win or to exercise ascendency among men for God? This is the problem we see Jesus confronting in the Temptation. The same spirit with which He was anointed drove Him into the desert to face it alone. It was a terrible experience, and in the narratives we find in Mt and Lk He gave His disciples some idea of it. The form is largely poetic and imaginative, the essence is spiritual. The temptations, if we may use such a distinction, are not personal, but official; or rather they are the temptations of Jesus, not in a private capacity (e.g., as a carpenter of Nazareth), but in His new Divine calling as the Son of God and Servant of the Lord. They are temptations all of which throw light on the Kingdom of God, rather than on the moral trials of common life. Jesus has in His mind the heavenly voice and the calling which is involved in it, and as He looks on the actual world in which that calling has to be realized, what are the paths which lie open and inviting to Him? (1) The first is that which suggests that an easy way to win ascendency over men for God is to supply their bodily wants, turn the stones to bread, base the Kingdom on material comfort. This was a real temptation, which Jesus encountered in His work. When He fed the five thousand, they wanted to take Him by force and make Him (Messianic) King, Jn 6 15. But He resisted it from the beginning, and in spite of His compassion for the destitute, which makes humanity the principle of the last judgment (Mt 25 35-42), He insists on giving a primacy to the spiritual. He says here to Himself what He says to all in Mt 6 33. (2) As the first temptation deals with the nature of the Kingdom, so the second deals with the methods to be used in its establishment. To cast Himself down from the pinnacle of the Temple, and, upheld by angels, to alight unhurt, was to appeal to men by a miracle of ostentation; it was to take leave of piety and of moral sanity, and to try by dazzling men's senses or dumfounding their understandings to win them for God. This temptation also often came to Jesus. We see it in the characteristic temper of the Jews (I Co 1 22), as again and again they ask a sign from heaven (Mt 12 38, 16 1; Jn 6 30). Jesus steadily declined it. He always acted within the limits of piety and sanity. His miracles were works of mercy, wrought in and for faith. He was no thaumaturge. He decided from the beginning that, as the Kingdom was spiritual in its nature, only spiritual methods were open to Him in introducing it. He would "speak the word" unto them—that was all. (3) The third Temptation deals with the power at His disposal in founding the Kingdom. Any one born to rule, as Jesus was, sees at a glance what enormous power in the world is wielded by evil. It has vast resources at its command, great bribes to offer. Lk 4 6 is only a temptation, because it is true. But can any one who is to carry out the vocation of the Son of God and the Servant of the Lord consent to take help from evil? Can he for the sake of some supposed advantage, present or remote, allow, so to speak, its right to exist? Can he compromise with it, only for the moment of course, till by its help he gets into a position where he can repudiate it? For a man who is in dead earnest to accomplish something in this present evil world, this is the most importunate of temptations, but Jesus discerns and repels it from the first. He repels it with passion (Mt 4 10), as seeing in it the utmost malignity of the Tempter. He can make no compromise with evil; His only resource must be God. And here again He says to Himself what He says later to all: "What doth it profit a man to gain the whole world and forfeit his life (i.e., himself)?" (Mk 8 36). In this spiritual conflict, in which He was sustained by heavenly help (Mk 1 13), Jesus overcame in principle all the kinds of temptations which He encountered in His calling. They recurred continually (Lk 22 28), but once decisively vanquished (Mk 3 27 and ‖s), the prince of this world had nothing in Him (Jn 14 30).

III. The Ministry.

I. Chronological Arrangement.

The ministry of Jesus begins after the Temptation, and in some special sense after the arrest of John (Mk 1 14; Lk 4 14, cf. 3 19 f.; Mt 4 12).

7. Opening Events. How it was related to the last, except chronologically, is not apparent. Even the chronology was not clear to the synoptists; for Jn 3 24 consciously corrects them, and so makes room for a Judæan ministry, including at least the events of Jn 1 19–4 45, before the Galilæan ministry, as recorded by the synoptists, begins (cf. Tischendorf, Synopsis Evangelica, §§ 14 ff.). The two returns of Jesus from Judæa to Galilee, mentioned in Jn 1 44 and in 4 1-3, had somehow ceased to be distinguished in the primitive oral tradition, and with this confusion of perspective the ministry in the Synoptics is shortened by nearly a year (cf. Godet on Jn 3 24). During this period, the work of Jesus is of a preliminary character; as Godet puts it, He has to act as His own forerunner. After receiving testimony from the Baptist, He attracts His first followers from the Baptist's circle (Jn 1 29-51), impressing them by the superhuman penetration with which He reads their characters, and awakening from the first the highest hopes in their minds. The miracle at Cana, as the frontispiece to John's Gospel, represents for him the significance of Jesus, just as Lk 4 16 ff. does for the earlier Evangelist. Jesus is for John the person who raises religion from a lower to a higher power, transforming the cold baptism of His forerunner into the glowing baptism of the Spirit. How the brief visit to Capernaum (Jn 2 12) is related to the settlement there which made Capernaum His own city (Mt 4 13) we do not know.

8. Early Judæan Period. It was followed by the journey to Jerusalem for the first passover in the ministry 27 A.D. Here John puts the cleansing of the Temple. It is inconceivable, surely, that Jesus did this twice. Once, it was an inspired act, the outcome of consuming zeal; repeated, it would have been commonplace, even if the traffickers had again yielded. Hence we must choose between John and the Synoptics, and as the tradition preserved in the latter, according to which Jesus visited Jerusalem only once, had really no choice, if it was to record this incident at all, we conclude that John has placed it rightly. Its spontaneity does not deprive it of the character of an appeal to all whose hearts were right with God to rally round Jesus as representing His Father (ver. 16), and the words about the destruction of the Temple and the rebuilding of it in three days have the originality of Jesus in them, and explain, as nothing else does, the charges of the false witnesses in Mt 26 61 and ‖. For the rest, John tells little of a ministry which probably extended over three-fourths of a year. The passover was in the spring; the "yet" in Jn 4 35 probably implies December or the January following. It was a ministry including miracles (Jn 2 23), and begetting a kind of faith. Men believed in Jesus, but He did not believe in them (2 25). The chief persons to whom it introduces us are Nicodemus and the woman of Samaria. What we learn from the first is the gulf which had to be bridged before a Jew could comprehend Christianity as the Evangelist had come to comprehend it, and as it was enshrined in the sacrament of the new birth. The reference to Christian baptism in 3 5 seems to the present writer indisputable, and it has this value—it defines the Spirit in an historical way. The Spirit which regenerates is that which is normally coincident with baptism in the name of Jesus, uplifted on the cross, in a death of atonement for sin (Jn 3 15, 1 29). In the woman of Samaria we see the thirst of the soul for God in the most unexpected quarter, and the incredible grace and joy with which it is satisfied by Jesus. That the woman who had had five husbands may to some extent represent the Samaritan people, so that in this or that trait the narrative has a symbolic rather than a literal value, is, in view of many features in John, not to be questioned (cf. Holtzmann, Hand-Commentar). Nevertheless, the work of Jesus in Samaria is not a reflection into His lifetime of what only took place later; it is a preparation for and an anticipation of Ac 8 5.

9. Galilæan Period. The ministry of Jesus in Jerusalem secured for Him a welcome when He returned to Galilee. The Galilæans received Him gladly, having seen all that He did at the feast (Jn 4 45). From this point on, we have to dispose of the whole material of the Synoptics (Mk 1 14 ff.; Mt 4 12 ff.; Lk 4 14 ff.) as well as the few incidents selected for interpretative comment by John. Any arrangement of the synoptic matter in the Johannine framework is precarious, for reasons already stated (see § 7 f., above). The order of events in Mk is often topical, rather than chronological. In Mt the teaching of Jesus is arranged in long discourses (chs. 5–7, 10, 13, 18, 23–25), which, as compositions, are the work of the Evangelist, and unite matter of various dates. Lk also, in the long insertion (9 51–18 14), connects with the last journey of Jesus to Jerusalem practically everything which Mk had not located in Galilee, while the topography of this journey itself is in Lk very hard to make out. It is scarcely exaggerating to say that the synoptists have no chronology; they have a certain plan and structure which exhibit their conception of the work of Jesus, and enable us to get a grasp of it as a whole; but there is scarcely another note of time to set beside Mk 9 2, till we come to Passion week. The clearest indication, if not of a precise sequence of events, yet of a certain movement in the life of Jesus, is given in the Gospel of Mt. The whole is broken into two periods marked by the identical phrase, "from that time Jesus began" in 4 17, 16 21. The first was mainly occupied with preaching, the second with teaching; the first was more public, and if the word may be used, evangelistic; the second more private, and devoted to the instruction of the Twelve; the first presents Jesus proclaiming the Kingdom of God, interpreting its laws, and calling men into it; in the second we see Him preoccupied with His own Person and death in their relation to the Kingdom. The healing ministry, as dependent in some way upon the people, is more conspicuous in the first period than in the second; although Mt, when Jesus toward the close of His life comes again into contact with multitudes, notes that this side of His activity was renewed (19 2, 20 29 ff., 21 14). Besides this broad distinction it is possible to trace a gradual change within the first period. From 4 17 to 11 1 we have hardly the sense of a check in the story, though Pharisaic opposition appears in 9 1-17 (9 34 is probably an anticipation of 12 24). The Evangelist evidently means to suggest that the course of Jesus began with a great and growing promise of success. This is the import of 4 23-25 and of 9 35-38; this is the force, too, of such remarks as 7 28 f., 8 27, 9 33. His work increased upon His hands till He had to share it with the Twelve (Mt 10 1), whom He had chosen that they might be with Him, and that He might send them forth to preach and to heal (Mk 3 14). The sending forth of the Twelve on a kind of apprentice mission marks the culminating point of the hopeful activity of Jesus. From this time forward untoward events multiply, and from 11 2 to 16 20 almost every section in Mt might be headed σκάνδαλον, or "offense." For one reason or other, Jesus proved unacceptable to His own people. Superficially attracted as they almost always were, they came at last on something in Him to which they could not be reconciled. Thus in 11 2 we hear how the Forerunner hesitated. Jesus was not the Messiah he anticipated, the awful Judge with the ax and the fan. In 12 1-14 we have two of the Sabbath miracles, and words of Jesus in connection with them which so angered the Pharisees that they conspired to kill Him. Later in the same chapter we see Pharisaic antipathy culminate in blasphemy against the Spirit of God at work in Jesus to redeem men from the tyranny of the devil, and even His own kinsfolk fail to appreciate Him (Mt 12 46 ff.; Mk 3 21, 31 ff.). In the beginning of ch. 13 the parable of the sower is spoken in the mood of despondency, or pathetic irony, as we see from the quotation of Is 6 9 (Mt 13 13 ff.), and at the end Jesus is rejected in Nazareth. In ch. 14, when Jesus on the return of the Twelve feeds the 5,000, they want to "take him by force and make him a king" (Jn 6 15), and He has to compel His disciples (Mt 14 22), who are susceptible to the same politically Messianic hopes, to enter the boat and face a storm, while He gets rid of the crowds. It was inevitable that multitudes who found their hopes so inexorably treated should turn away, as the Fourth Gospel tells us (Jn 6 66).

10. North Galilæan Period.

Finally, in Mt ch. 15 (‖ Mk ch. 7) we have a decisive breach between Jesus and the religious authorities of His nation on the subject of tradition—a breach so violent that it led to His retreat into the northern lands beyond Palestine, and the practical close of His ministry in Galilee. It is not possible to say more of the course of events in the first part of Jesus' life than that it had this general character. When it culminated in the conclusive falling away of the people from Him, He turned to devote Himself in private to the education of the men who had become sure in spite of everything that He was the Christ, and that He had "words of eternal life" (Jn 6 68). To trace the sequence of events after Jesus withdrew to the parts of Tyre and Sidon (Mk 7 24) is all the more difficult, as at this point in the synoptic story there is possibly a series of doublets (Mk 6 33–7 37 being in much parallel to, and perhaps another tradition of, Mk 8 1-26). But the confession at Cæsarea Philippi marks a decisive moment in the history, and so does the Transfiguration a week later. With it Jerusalem enters the horizon of the synoptists, and though Jesus seems to bid a kind of farewell visit to His own city (Mk 9 33 f.), He does not wish any one to know of His passing through the country (9 30). His work in Galilee is done.

11. Later Peræan and Judæan Period.

He goes up to Jerusalem via Peræa and Jericho. It is only in the Fourth Gospel that the program of these last months can be more fully traced. From this source we see that Jesus went to Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles 28 A.D. (Jn 7 2), remaining there apparently till the Feast of Dedication in December of the same year (10 22); that He then retired to Peræa (10 40), to the district with which He had been familiar in the days of the Baptist, returning thence after about three months on hearing of the illness of Lazarus; and that after this last event He withdrew once more to a city called Ephraim, only coming back, about a fortnight later, for the last passover (29 A.D.) and what followed. (For an arrangement of the events lying within the second great period of Jesus' ministry, see Stevens and Burton's Harmony, part vi f.; Gilbert's Student's Life of Jesus, pp. 140 ff.)

II. The Work of Jesus.

Without pursuing the purely historical question further, we may now attempt to give some idea of the teaching of Jesus. We may trace a progress in His teaching, but hardly in His mind; it is for pedagogic reasons that subjects emerge in one order rather than another. Speaking broadly, He may be said to teach, first, about the Kingdom of God; then about Himself, and especially His death; while in all the Gospels this is followed by what may be called prophetic, or eschatological, teaching, dealing either with a spiritual and immediate future, as in Jn (the coming of the Holy Spirit), or with a transcendent and to some extent indefinite future, as in the Synoptics (the coming of the Son of Man). This is the outline we shall follow, but as the ministry included healing as well as teaching it will be convenient here to refer to the miracles.

12. The Miracles of Jesus.

All our sources speak of wonderful or mighty works done by Jesus. The usual name for them in the Synoptics is δυνάμεις, 'deeds of power,' and in Jn σημεῖα, 'signs,' or ἔργα, 'works.' The Evangelists do not think of defining them, as theologians have sometimes done, by relation to laws of nature, of which they had no conception, and for the religious appreciation of them it is not necessary that we should do so either. The N T interpretation of them is entirely personal and ethical. The wonderful works of Jesus show what God can do and is minded to do through Him for those who need and seek His help, and they show to some extent the conditions on which His help is given. The great mass of them consisted of works of healing. Among diseases specially mentioned are leprosy, fever, paralysis, blindness, deafness and dumbness, epilepsy, and insanity. In addition to disease in its more ordinary or manageable forms there is what is known as "possession" by a demon, or demons (not by "the devil"). But besides individual healings narrated in the Gospels, Mk, Mt, and Lk all refer in general terms to the healing ministry of Jesus as a great and characteristic part of His work (Mt 4 23 f., 9 35, cf. 10 1, where He extends His power to the Twelve, 19 2, 21 14; Mk 1 32 ff.; Lk 9 11). Indeed, it has been held that in Mk we have the argument from miracle, as in Mt that from prophecy, that Jesus is the Christ. The healings worked by Jesus were personal, not scientific, achievements. He did not use any of the resources of medical science; He had no treatment, no regimen, no arts of any description. What we read of in Mk 7 32, 8 23; Jn 9 6 has symbolic or educational significance for the sufferers (whose infirmities made it difficult to communicate with them), but not medical value. The great word in all the wonderful healings is faith (πίστις). The healer must have faith, i.e., such a dependence on God and such an assurance of God's will and power to help as conducts the Divine power to the case before him. While Jesus never failed in this respect (Jn 11 41 f.) His disciples sometimes did (Mt 17 19 f.). But those who were to be healed also required faith, i.e., such an attitude of the soul to God as recognized and took hold of His saving power present in Christ and operative through Him. Faith in this sense establishes a sympathetic personal relation between Jesus and those who seek His help, and it is on such a relation that His power to heal ordinarily depends (Mk 6 5). The miracles of healing, therefore, have an essentially spiritual side. They imply a relation to Jesus which has no precise counterpart in the relation of his patients to a modern scientific practitioner (although here also confidence in the physician favors a cure). Much of the interest of the miracle narratives in the Synoptics lies in the picture they present of the struggle of faith to come to birth in the soul, and to maintain itself through trial to triumph. This is so whether the faith is that of the person requiring help, or the 'vicarious' faith of friends who seek it for those who are physically or mentally incapable of it (cf. especially Mk 2 5, 5 36, 9 19-24; Mt 9 28, 15 21-28). The many memorable words of Jesus about faith—almost all spoken in connection with His miracles and intelligible only in their context—are the strongest evidence that the miracles were actually performed (cf. Bruce, Miraculous Element in the Gospels, p. 104). Among the mighty works of Jesus, those on which the Apostles (Ac 10 38) and He Himself (Mt 12 28; Lk 11 20) laid greatest stress were the cures of demoniacs. Possession by demons was the theory of the time for the explanation of many morbid conditions of the mind and body, but no science, either medical or psychological, has accepted it as a working hypothesis in modern times. As Jesus did not come to teach medicine or psychology, but to reveal the Father in delivering men from all that disabled and ruined life, it does not matter that on the cause of such illnesses He shared the opinions of those around him. What matters is the fact that by the power of God bestowed upon Him He actually delivered men from them. It is hardly possible to argue that out of the many instances of possession recorded in the Gospels those are to be distinguished as truly such in which the possessed recognize Jesus as the Messiah (cf. Gilbert, Student's Life of Jesus, p. 192; Alexander, Demonic Possession; Weiss, Leben Jesu[4], I, 436 ff.). Many who admit the works of healing, without allowing them to be in any proper sense supernatural (e.g., O. Holtzmann in his Leben Jesu, who finds analogies in abundance at Lourdes and Trèves), peremptorily exclude the 'nature miracles' —the feeding of the multitude, the stilling of the storm, the walking on the sea, and the raisings from the dead. It can only be said here that these things can not be judged alone. All of them are represented in the oldest stratum of apostolic tradition in Mk, and the first in particular is connected, as an event which made an overwhelming impression on the multitudes, with a crisis in the life of Jesus (Jn 6 15 and ‖). When the supreme miracle of the resurrection of Jesus Himself is admitted, there is no a priori reason for questioning these. In the Fourth Gospel the miracles are the same in kind as in the others, with the exception that no case of possession is mentioned. But the mode in which they are conceived of is different. The motive of Jesus in them is not represented as compassion (as in Mk 1 41 and often), but as the manifestation of His own or the Father's glory (Jn 2 11, 11 4). Where faith is spoken of, it is not so much as the condition of healing, but as a consequence of it (2 11, 4 53, 11 45). Although faith which had only this basis did not command the confidence or approbation of Jesus (2 23 f., 4 48, 20 29), yet not to be moved to faith by the wonderful works of Jesus is a sin (12 37 ff., 14 11, 6 26; cf. Mt 11 20 f.). Another peculiarity in John is that the miracles are all treated as symbols and made texts for discourses of Jesus (ch. 5, on Life and Judgment; ch. 6, on the Bread of Life; chs. 8 and 9, on the Light of the World; ch. 11, on the Resurrection and the Life).

Without attempting any chronological outline, we may now try to present the main features of the teaching of Jesus on the basis indicated above.

13. Teaching Regarding the Kingdom of God—General.

The Synoptics represent Jesus as beginning His ministry with an announcement of the Kingdom of God (Mk 1 15; Mt 4 17; Lk 4 43). He is sent to preach it as glad tidings, and its near approach (ἤγγικεν) is made the ground of appeal for repentance and faith. What is meant by the "Kingdom of God"? The expression does not occur in the O T, though the idea is common enough there that God is King and exercises sovereignty. The expression itself, however, was current among Jesus' contemporaries, and was related in some way both to their history and to the promises of God. It is from the idea of sovereignty, or reign, rather than from that of kingdom that we must start in attempting to grasp the teaching of Jesus. The exercise of royal power by God is primary, not the sphere within which it is exercised, nor the community subject to it, nor the blessings attendant on its establishment. All these are involved, but the main thing is that God takes to Himself His great power and reigns. In starting from this point Jesus started with the O T behind Him and could hope to be understood. Micaiah (I K 22 19) and Isaiah (Is ch. 6) had seen God as a King on His throne surrounded by ministering spirits. In many of the Psalms He is celebrated in this character (97 1, 103 19, 145 13). There are O T passages which present this as Israel's ideal: God its King, and no other (e.g., I S 8 7 ff.). Of all O T passages, however, the most important for the N T idea of the Kingdom is Dn ch. 7. The sovereignty had belonged to a succession of brutal powers (Dn 7 1-8), but is at last to be transferred by God to humanity. "One like unto a son of man"—that is, a human form—is brought before the Ancient of Days, and "there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all the peoples, nations, and languages should serve him; his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed" (7 14). It is the explanation of this when we read (7 27): "and the kingdom and the dominion, and the greatness of the kingdoms under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High [i.e., to the faithful Jews]: his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all nations shall serve and obey him." From this time forth, ideas connected with this passage entered into all Jewish thoughts about the Kingdom. It was a Kingdom which in some sense came from heaven; it was set up by the direct interposition and act of God. It was a Kingdom which was at once universal and everlasting. What the precise relation is between this Kingdom and the existing Jewish people is not made manifest. We are not told how the sovereignty of God is to be wielded over Israel, or through it, and in dealing with conceptions so vast and undefined there is nothing of which the human mind is so capable as inconsistency. Men did not believe in a political, or an eschatological, or a spiritual, Kingdom of God. In various moods, or at various times, they believed in varying proportions in all three. If instead of political we say historical, it may even be said that Jesus believed in all three. He was "a minister of the circumcision," in the interest of God's truth, to confirm the promises made to the fathers (Ro 15 8). Though He utterly renounced the zealot's idea of a national Kingdom of God, loyalty to which required the repudiation of allegiance to Cæsar (Mk 12 13 ff. and ‖), it was no part of His purpose to deny Israel's prerogative. The choice of Twelve as apostles, and the striking promise of Mt 19 28; Lk 22 30 preclude the thought. If Israel actually excluded itself, it was not He who questioned its historical preeminence (Mt 10 5 f., 23, 15 24-26). Excellent illustrations of the ideas which went to constitute 'the Kingdom of God' in the popular religious mind are seen in the Benedictus (Lk 1 68-79) and in the famous prophecy Is 2 2-4; Mic 4 1-5. In the last, especially, we see the mingling of what might seem inconsistent elements. There is something national, for Jerusalem and Zion are represented as the city of the Great King, to which all nations go on pilgrimage; there is something eschatological, or apocalyptic, in the supernatural elevation of the Temple hill to overtop the highest mountains in the world; but the essential thing is the universal diffusion of the true religion, and the universal peace and felicity consequent upon it. When Jesus speaks of the Kingdom, His range of utterance is not narrower. Sometimes we have the day of judgment in O T colors, the future sovereignty coming gloriously to view; sometimes the thought is that of an inner coming of the Kingdom which is already in process, and takes its start from the message of Jesus (cf. Harnack, What is Christianity? p. 34). The relation of the different views is undetermined. Just because His teaching is always practical, never abstract, Jesus speaks in all tones; in one moment possibly meeting hearers, whose minds are not open to us, half-way, using their language, and partly accepting, partly ignoring, partly enlarging or correcting their thoughts; at another giving expression intentionally to what is characteristically new and original in His own view of the Kingdom. This must be remembered in any attempt to systematize His words.

14. Teaching Regarding the Kingdom of God—Specific.

The essential truth about the Kingdom is that it is the Kingdom of God; its nature is determined by Him. The various ideas of it have the unity which belongs to the personality and life of Jesus, in whom God is revealed. Jesus did not preach a new God, but He embodied a new revelation of God, and the Kingdom which He preached is specifically the Kingdom of the Father (Mt 6 10, 13 43, 26 29). It is the Father's good pleasure to give it to His children (Lk 12 32). Those who inherit it at its consummation are the blessed of the Father (Mt 25 34). The fullest idea of what is essential to it may be derived from the study of the Beatitudes, which show the rare and difficult virtues on which its citizens are felicitated; from the Lord's Prayer, or, as it should rather be called, the disciples' prayer, which shows the spiritual aspirations of those who are to possess it; and from the healing miracles, as Jesus interprets them in words like Mt 11 5, 12 28, in which its redemptive character is declared. Proceeding empirically, we notice the following points:

(a) Jesus is sure of its coming. Now when anything is urgently needed and longed for, assurance, expressed in terms of time, becomes imminence. The Kingdom has drawn near. When Jesus speaks of it, He speaks, like all the prophets and like the seer in the Apocalypse, of things which must shortly come to pass (Rev 1 1, 22 6). The much-discussed question whether the Kingdom is present or future is another form of the question whether it is spiritual or eschatological (transcendent). The answer is that it is both, and that in the perspective of Jesus (cf. Holtzmann, Neut. Theol. I, 215) the difference tends to disappear. The end is near, the dawn is part of the morning, the present time part of the last time. It is perhaps not fanciful to say that on this question the Gospels reflect to some extent the mood of different periods in the life of Jesus. At first, there is confident hope, the Kingdom has drawn near (ἤγγικεν, Mt 4 17). This rises into assurance that the Kingdom is actually present, as in His victories over Satan Jesus realizes that the redeeming love of the Father is here and now overturning the tyranny of the devil and establishing its own sovereignty on earth (Mt 12 28; ἔφθασεν ἐφ' ὑμᾶς ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ). At a later stage, when the shadow of the Cross fell on His path, the final coming of the Kingdom withdraws into a future beyond death. The two conceptions of it as present and future, spiritual and eschatological, seem to be combined and indeed organically connected in Mk 10 15 ff., "Whosoever shall not receive the [present] kingdom of God as a little child, he shall in no wise enter therein [in its future glory]." For a consistent but paradoxical argument in favor of the exclusively eschatological view of the Kingdom, cf. Johannes Weiss, Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes.

(b) It is the supreme good, the sum of all possible blessings. Jesus shows this in various ways. Everything else is to be made secondary to it ("Seek first the Kingdom," Mt 6 33; Lk 12 31). No price is too high to pay for it (Mt 13 44-46). Though it is God's gift, we have to count the cost of accepting it, and not only to count but to pay (Lk 14 25 ff.). The salvation of the Kingdom is not only a gift but a high calling, and the ethically indispensable condition of accepting the calling may be the most painful sacrifice of nature and of natural affections (Mk 9 47; cf. vs. 43 and 45, where ζωή is synonymous with the Kingdom of God). The Kingdom is not bought with such sacrifices, as if the paying of them gave men a claim upon God; it is rather a sphere of reality of such a kind that a man must remain permanently alien to it, if he allows any natural good to rival this supernatural and Divine one. It is in this connection that we should have to appreciate the vehement words Jesus speaks about money (Mk 10 23 ff. and ||, and many more). As a permanent possibility of all kinds of power and enjoyment money is infinitely fascinating, and whether as possessed or coveted it is the great foe of the supreme good. The worth of the Kingdom is further shown by the incomparable greatness which belongs to its members. The least in it—the least who has got from God that which Jesus was conscious of possessing—is greater than the greatest outside. In some sense he is nearer and dearer to God (Mt 18 10, 11 11. The "little ones" in Mt 18 11 are the children of the Kingdom; see ver. 6).

(c) The conditions of membership in the Kingdom, or perhaps we should say the ideal of citizenship, are illustrated in all the teaching of Jesus, but especially in the Beatitudes, in such discourses as the Sermon on the Mount (Mt chs. 5–7), the teachings on humility, forgiveness, and self-denial with a view to avoiding "offense," either in self or in others (Mt ch. 18), and, by contrast, in the criticism and denunciation of spurious piety (Mt ch. 23), or of pride, ambition, and similar faults in disciples (Mt 20 25 ff.). But the great lesson is that which is given in the spirit and life of Jesus Himself. The Kingdom is here in Him, and He is not only its founder but its ideal citizen. Hence the final importance in His teaching of words like Mt 11 29; Jn 13 15. To be a genuine citizen or member of the Kingdom is to be in Him (Jn ch. 15).

(d) There are ranks, or degrees, in the Kingdom, though the principles on which they are assigned are not those that prevail in the kingdoms of this world (cf. Mt 5 19, 18 1-4, and especially 20 21 ff.). No one can enter at all except in the uncalculating spirit of the child, who, when Jesus says "Come," goes to Him with no reserve. No one can be great in it except by service. Even the Son of Man, who sits on its throne, is subject to this law. He attains to the dignity of the throne by a career of unexampled service, not stopping short of the surrender of His life for others (Mk 10 45).

(e) The mysteries of the Kingdom (i.e., the laws of God's working in it)—once hidden but now an open secret—are revealed in the parables of Jesus, and in the interpretation of them to His disciples (Mt 13 11 ff.). Thus it is like a seed, the fortune of which depends on the soil into which it is cast (Mt 13 3 ff., and ||). Like a seed, it has in it an incalculable vitality and power of expansion (Mt 13 31 ff., and ||). Further, like a seed, it has an internal law of development—"first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear"—which can not be precipitated or reversed by any effort of man (Mk 4 26 ff.). It is another mystery of the Kingdom that Jesus anticipates for it in the world a mixed and disappointing history (Mt 13 24 ff., 36 ff., 47 ff.). This, of course, is denied by those who hold an exclusively eschatological view of the Kingdom, and they accordingly assign to the Evangelist, not to Jesus, the heading of such parables as the Tares and the Drag-net. But it is impossible to carry the eschatological view of the Kingdom consistently through the Gospels; and though the Kingdom is properly an ideal state in which there are no σκάνδαλα ("things that cause stumbling," Mt 13 41), no person that works ἀνομία ("iniquity," ibid.), nothing σαπρόν ("bad," Mt 13 48), it does not exist as such in history.

Even the institutions and persons by whom God is actually represented in this world represent Him very imperfectly and ineffectually, and they get inextricably interwoven with persons and interests which do not represent Him at all. What both the parables teach is that this is not final, but that it lasts as long as time.

(f) In the consummated Kingdom Jesus anticipates reunion with His own, and the fulfilment of all longings unsatisfied here (Mt 26 29; Lk 22 16). It is in this connection that life (Mt 7 14, 18 8 f., 19 17), or eternal life (Mt 19 16, 29, 25 46; cf. Mk 10 30, "in the world to come, eternal life"), is used as a synonym for the Kingdom of God. The life of the world, or age, to come, or the life of the consummated Kingdom of God, is life in a new mode or order. It is not the restoration of nature with all the natural relations—a conception which is quite unrealizable. To assume that it is would be to discredit the idea of immortality altogether, as the Sadducees tried to do by this very plan (Mt 22 23 ff.). As Jesus argues against them, "the power of God" (Mt 22 29) is not exhausted in the natural order with which we are familiar. God can sustain being in other modes—in an order, e.g., in which men neither marry nor are given in marriage—in which all relations are spiritual, not physical, and in which the problems raised by the Sadducees simply lapse. It is into such a world that the resurrection of Jesus gives us a glimpse; and the children of God, or the children of the Kingdom, can be ultimately described as children of the resurrection (Lk 20 36).

15. Teaching Regarding Himself.

It is assumed in all Jesus' teaching about the Kingdom of God that He Himself has a relation to the Kingdom and its coming which can be shared by no other. The great cause of God is in some way identified with His personality, and men's relation to it is determined by their relation to Him. This may be said to be quite explicitly the burden of the Fourth Gospel: "If ye believe not that I am"—that is, that I am the great decisive Personality on whom everything in the relations of God and man turns—"ye shall die in your sins" (Jn 8 24); but it is implied throughout the Synoptics. Jesus' consciousness of what He is in relation to God and His Kingdom comes out, indeed, more impressively for us in words like "for my sake" (Mt 5 11), or "Many shall say unto me in that day" (Mt 7 22)—the voice of Jesus at the day of Judgment being that on which eternal destiny depends, or "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me" (Mt 10 37), than in any of the titles used to describe Him, either by Himself or others. What we overhear is more weighty even than what we hear. Yet it is necessary to pass these titles in review, and to apprehend their meaning as far as we can.

(a) All the Evangelists call Jesus the Christ (Mt 1 1; Mk 1 1; Lk 2 11; Jn 20 31). "Jesus is the Christ" was the earliest Christian confession (Ac 2 36, 17 3), and in a sense it is the Evangelist's business to prove that He is. He may appeal to prophecy, as Matthew does, or to miracles, as Mark virtually does, or he may conduct the argument in a higher sphere like John, but in any case this is his faith. But did Jesus share it? Did He claim to be the Christ, or ask men to accept Him in this character; and if so, what did the term mean for Him? It is quite true to say that Jesus was only made the Christ by His exaltation (Ac 2 36), and that, therefore, while He was on earth He was not so much the Christ as the person who was destined for that dignity; but it does not follow that He did not claim the dignity, or that it was not recognized by the disciples as inherent in Him. It is not fancy which recognizes in the day at Cæsarea Philippi a great crisis in the relation of Jesus and His disciples (Mt 16 13 ff., and ‖); and whether we say, with interpreters generally, that here the Twelve first reached and confessed the Messianic dignity of Jesus, or, with Weiss, that here the Twelve persevered in their belief in His Messianic character, when the mass of His followers gave up the hopes they once had cherished that this was the great deliverer (Jn 6 66), in either case the Messianic consciousness is revealed as present in the mind of Jesus. Not only to others, but to Himself, He bore this character. He was the Christ, the Anointed of the Lord. If the historicity of this could be regarded as doubtful, it would be quite impossible to make any use of the Gospels as historical documents. (For an elaborate attack on it see Wrede, Das Messiasgeheimniss in den Evangelien, 1902.) But it is raised beyond doubt by its association with such an unquestionable fact as Mt 16 22, by the triumphal entry in which Jesus deliberately acts in the Messianic rôle (Mk 11 9 f.), by the accusation before Pilate (Mk 15 2), by the title on the cross (Mk 15 26), and by the consent of all existing evidence. When 'the Christ' became a technical or proper name for the expected deliverer of Israel we do not know. It seems to occur first in Psalms of Solomon, 17 36. The essential element in the meaning is that the person so designated is God's King. He has a place in the Kingdom and in relation to its establishment into which no other can intrude. To call Jesus the Christ is to recognize His unique and incomparable significance in religion. It is to declare that through Him God's sovereignty is to be realized, and all God's promises fulfilled (II Co 1 20). No doubt men might have wrong conceptions of the Kingdom and of the King. They might try to take Jesus by force and make Him a king after their own ideas (Jn 6 15), compelling Him to enlist under their banner, instead of enlisting under His. Such possibilities constrained Jesus to reserve in the use of this title. He did not go about proclaiming Himself the promised King. He silenced the possessed whom Mk represents as knowing Him to be the Christ (1 34, 3 12). He straitly charged the disciples, even after the confession at Cæsarea Philippi, to tell no one of Him (8 30). The sense in which He is the Christ is apprehended only when God reveals it (Mt 16 17) or—which is the same thing—when it is experimentally discovered through intercourse with Jesus. It only leads to confusion to snatch at the word, and suppose that we can fill it with the proper meaning from prejudices or hopes of our own, or even from the letter of the O T. It was to prevent such misconceptions and interruptions of His work by false hopes that Jesus, till close upon the end of His life, avoided Messianic claims. It does not follow, of course, that He was not conscious of His Messianic Kingship from the first. The very reverse was the case (see § 5, above). It was for pedagogic reasons that He revealed the nature of the Kingdom before He explicitly put Himself forward as King.

(b) Closely connected with the title Christ is that of Son of God. Here it is necessary to distinguish between the direct use of this title by others and the virtual use of it by Jesus. It throws no light on His mind to observe that He is spoken of as Son of God by the demoniacs (Mk 3 11, 5 7; Mt 8 29), or by the men in the boat when He stilled the storm (Mt 14 33), or by the centurion who saw Him die (27 54). In this last passage, where the speaker may be a pagan, the meaning is indeterminate; in the first, "Son of God" is probably equivalent to 'Messiah,' as in Mt 26 63; Jn 1 49. In Mk 1 1, "Son of God"—if the reading is correct—may be used in this Messianic or, as it is sometimes called, 'official' sense, or it may be used in the full Pauline sense; in Mt and Lk (cf. Mt 1 22 f. and Lk 1 34 f.) the Divine sonship is regarded by the Evangelists as dependent on the supernatural birth. But what Jesus meant by the Divine sonship which was attested at His baptism, and in the consciousness of which He lived and died, is another matter. That it included the Messianic vocation is certain from the baptism narrative, but is that all? The present writer can not think so. There are various ways in which Jesus brings out what is involved in His relation to God, and they all point to something more profound, and, if it may be so expressed, more essential. (1) There is the parable in Mt 21 33-46, and ‖. Here, all God's previous messengers to Israel are represented as δοῦλοι ("servants"), while Jesus is υἱός ("Son") and κληρονόμος ("heir"). This generalizes, so to speak, the earlier saying, "A greater than Jonah, than Solomon, than the Temple, is here" (Mt 12 6, 41 f.). As Son—i.e., as one whose relation to God was distinct from that of all others—Jesus was greater than all. (2) There is the striking saying, "Of that day and that hour knoweth no one, not even the angels in heaven, neither the Son but the Father" (Mk 13 32; Mt 24 36). The limit here put on the knowledge of Jesus shows that this is a genuine word. A later generation would rather have expunged than invented it. It gives Jesus a place above both men and angels, a place in which "the Father" and "the Son" are used in absolute correspondence with each other. We see that there could no more be another who was "the Son" than another who was "the Father." This is the truth which is covered and secured in the Fourth Gospel, when it calls Jesus the "only begotten Son" (Jn 1 14, 18, 3 16, 18; cf. I Jn 4 9). (3) There is the passage Mt 11 25 ff., with the ‖ in Lk 10 21 ff. Here an important light is thrown on the contents of the relation of the Son to the Father. According to Harnack, what this passage teaches is that the Sonship of Jesus consists in His knowledge of the Father. It is as the person who perfectly knows the Father that He is the Son (What is Christianity? p. 128). But there is more than this. First, there is the idea that sonship implies absolute dependence. "All things have been delivered to me of my Father." This is the idea which pervades the Fourth Gospel: "The Son can do nothing of Himself," "My teaching is not mine," etc. (Jn 5 19, 7 16, etc.). Further, there is the idea that as Son Jesus has absolute competence in His vocation, the power to make all men His debtors for the knowledge of God. The "all things" which have been delivered to Him must, in agreement with the context, refer to the whole contents and administering of God's revelation; in this work of self-revelation the Father has no organ but Jesus, and in Jesus He has an adequate organ. This is an anticipation of Jn 14 6; but even when we have grasped it, a mystery remains. For Jesus goes on to declare that in His own relation to God there is something which has no parallel elsewhere: "No one knoweth the Son save the Father; neither doth any know the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him." He is so far from standing on a level with all men as a son or child of God—an expression never applied to Him—that as "the Son" He stands between God and all others, and they can not know God as Father without coming under obligations to Him. (4) One other passage is of importance for the light it casts on the consciousness of Jesus as Son of God, Mt 17 24-27. Here we see that to know God as Father is to be emancipated from the obligations of the ritual law: the Son is not bound to pay a Temple tax. The filial spirit is in such things a law to itself. The Pauline conception of Christianity is here traced to its source in the mind of the Son, and the Pauline idea that liberty is to be used only in accordance with a law of love is in harmony with the fact that out of consideration for others ("Lest we cause them to stumble," ver. 27) Jesus did not exercise the liberty which He claimed. For the connection of sonship and liberty in His thoughts, see also Jn 8 32-36. If we take these passages together, we conclude that, in the mind of Jesus, to be the Christ and to be the Son of God were not identical. The Divine sonship was His nature; it was primary and essential; the consciousness of it stirred in Him (Lk 2 49) long before He entered on His public work; it was the basis on which His unique vocation to be the Christ—i.e., to be the Son of God in the historical sense suggested by Ps 2 7, 89 26; II S 7 14—rested; but it was not exhausted in this. Messiahship was the form which Divine sonship naturally took in the historical situation; but both in Himself and for us Jesus is something more and greater than the Messiah. It should be noted that the Synoptics give no instance in which Jesus expressly calls Himself Son of God (yet see Mt 27 43, and the narratives of the Baptism, Temptation, and Transfiguration). He, however, speaks of God as the Father, where the correlative is not sons, but the Son; He says "my" Father and "your" Father, but never unites with others (not even in the Lord's Prayer, which is indeed rather the disciples' prayer) to say "our" Father; and He speaks of Himself as "the Son," simpliciter. This last use—which is found in Mt 11 27, 24 16; Mk 13 32—becomes predominant in Jn.

(c) To judge from the Gospel record, the mind of Christ about Himself is expressed most characteristically in the title the Son of Man (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου). This is found in all the Gospels, and practically from beginning to end (Mt 8 20, 26 64; Mk 2 10, 14 62; Lk 5 24, 22 69; Jn 1 51, 13 31). In all, it is used by Jesus alone. Except in Ac 7 56, it is not found elsewhere in the N T. In Rev 1 13, 14 14 the reference is not to the Gospels, but to Dn 7 13. Obviously, in the Gospels it is a technical or proper name, and a Greek reader could not without guidance discover what it meant. The catechists, or Evangelists, who coined the Gr. phrase ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου and gave it currency must at the same time have explained the sense in which they used it. No doubt it represented something in Aramaic, but the fact that Aramaic scholars find it difficult or impossible to conjecture what the Aramaic original can have been is not a sufficient reason for concluding that Jesus did not and could not have used any such title at all. For this paradoxical view, see Lietzmann, Der Menschensohn (1896); Wellhausen, Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, VI, 187. Against it, Fiebig, Der Menschensohn (1901); Dalman, The Words of Jesus (1902), pp. 234 ff.; Driver, "Son of Man" in HBD. Assuming that Jesus did use, as a designation of Himself in the third person, Aramaic words which were represented in Gr. by ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, the question remains: What did He mean by this title, and how did it originate? It is natural to think of O T antecedents for this as well as for "Son of God" or "the Anointed"; and three O T sources have been suggested for it. First, there is the frequent use of "son of man" in Ezk (2 1, 3, 8, etc.; ninety times in all), where it contrasts the prophet as a frail human creature with God. But there is no indication in the Gospels that Ezekiel was ever in the Speaker's mind in His use of the term. Second, there is the notable passage in Ps 8 4, "What is man that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man that thou visitest him"? This passage is messianically interpreted in He 2 6, and the application of words from Ps 8 to Christ in I Co 15 27 is evidence that Paul knew of this interpretation, and probably, therefore, of "the Son of Man" as a designation of Jesus. But neither is there anything in the Gospels to suggest that Jesus ever thought of the Psalm in using it. The third possible source has already been referred to in speaking of the Kingdom of God (see above, § 9). It is Dn 7 13 f.: "There came with the clouds of heaven one like unto a son of man . . and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom." There is undoubtedly an allusion to this in passages like Mk 14 62; Mt 16 28, 24 30. The difference is that the indefinite "one like unto a son of man"—that is, 'a human form,' as contrasted with the brute forms in the earlier visions—has become definite. The description has become a title, the significant common noun—to use the grammatical distinction—has become a meaningless proper noun, and we are left to discover its import as we can. In Dn, the 'human form' represents the people of the saints of the most high; it is a symbol of the faithful Jews, God's people, as the beasts are of the pagan empires; but in the mind of Jesus it is individualized and definitely identified with Himself. Probably the individualizing interpretation had become current in the interval between the writing of Dn and the ministry of Jesus; at all events, in that part of the apocalyptic Book of Enoch called "The Book of Similitudes," which most scholars allow to be pre-Christian, this change has been effected. There we find a Son of Man, a person existing with God, a person who sits on the throne of glory and has the sum of judgment committed to him. If the Jude who wrote the Ep. of Jude is the same as the Lord's brother of that name (Mk 6 3), then Jesus may have known the Book of Enoch, for Jude quotes it (ver. 14 f.; see JUDE, EPISTLE OF, § 7). But whether or not, it is clear that He individualized the human form to which the everlasting Kingdom is to be given, and that He identified Himself with it (cf. Charles, The Book of Enoch, 1893).

In this sense, "The Son of Man" may be said to be a Messianic title. When Jesus used it, He meant to convey the idea that in spite of appearances He was the person who was yet to come in that heavenly glory. It is to be defined by relation to "the Kingdom of God" just as clearly as "the Son" alone is to be defined by relation to "the Father." It is natural to argue that, if it is a Messianic title, Jesus could use it only after He had been acknowledged as Messiah—i.e., after the day at Cæsarea Philippi—and among those whom He allowed to speak of Him in this character—i.e., among the Twelve. This, of course, is not what the Gospels represent. He seems to use it all along, and in any audience. How is this to be explained? We may say either (1) that the term is not so unambiguously Messianic as has been suggested, and that Jesus, using it to veil as well as to reveal His thought, might employ it freely under any circumstances. To the present writer, this seems hardly intelligible. Or (2) we may say that some of the passages have been chronologically displaced, and, though they come early in our Gospels, are really late in the life of Jesus—e.g., Mt 10 23. Or (3) we may say that in some passages Jesus has been misunderstood by a translator from the Aramaic, and is represented as saying the "Son of Man," and speaking of Himself, when He really said "man" and meant something of universal application. This last explanation has been given of the two passages Mk 2 10, 28, where it is said logic requires 'man' generically, not the individual 'the Son of Man'; and it is pointed out that when these two are disposed of, there are no others in Mk till after Cæsarea Philippi. For the application of (2) and (3) with a view to getting rid of all the passages in which the Gospels present the title prematurely, see Wellhausen, as above. To investigate the literary question here is impossible, but the elements of meaning associated with the title must be indicated. (1) It always includes the idea of ultimate triumph. The Son of Man, as reminiscent of Dn 7 13, is never anything less than the destined King in the coming Kingdom of God. It is this which gives the power and pathos to words like Mt 8 20, 20 28. (2) In the express teaching of Jesus, it always includes the idea of the path of suffering which leads to that triumph. After the confession at Cæsarea Philippi Jesus began to teach the Twelve that the Son of Man must suffer many things (Mk 8 3 and ‖, 9 31, 10 33, 14 21, 41). To represent His sufferings and death as those of the Son of Man is to bring them within His vocation as founder of the Kingdom of God, and to give them an essential place in His work. It is to carry through in His mind and life the fusion of the ideals of Ps 2 and Is ch. 42—the Messianic King and the suffering Servant of the Lord—announced at His baptism: the suffering of the Son of Man, so repellent and unintelligible to the disciples, is a summary formula for this fusion. (3) In the title "Son of Man," as used in the Synoptics, we may fairly emphasize the idea of humanity, as it is emphasized in Dn 7 13. It is humanity, however, in the ethical, not metaphysical sense—humanity, not as contrasted with divinity, but as opposed to brutality. The Kingdom which comes with the triumph of Jesus is at the same time the Kingdom in which humanity attains its rights. The reign of inhumanity, of violence and wrong, comes to an end. Hence everything in the work of Jesus which is congruous with this—all that is human, sympathetic, redemptive, emancipating — is ascribed to Him as the "Son of Man." See especially Lk 19 10; Mk 10 45; Mt 8 20, and even Mt 11 18 f., where Jesus contrasts Himself with the less human Baptist, who had in a way renounced the society of his kind. But the supreme proof of this is Mt 25 31 ff. When the Son of Man sits on the throne of His glory to judge all nations, the principle of His judgment is humanity. It is by this men stand or fall before Him. Inhumanity is to Him the unpardonable sin. "I was an hungered and ye gave me no meat" is the damning accusation. There seems some echo of this in Jn 5 27, but the peculiarity of the Fourth Gospel is that it associates the title with the preexistence of Jesus in a way to which we have no analogy in the other three (Jn 3 13, 6 27, 62). Apart from this, John throws no further light on Jesus' consciousness of Himself as thus expressed. But it is clear from all that has been said that Jesus is not merely a son of man, a human being simpliciter, any more than He is only a child of God, a creature with our common relation to the Father. Just as in relation to God He calls himself absolutely the Son, so in relation to the Kingdom of God, which is at the same time the Kingdom of humanity, He is not merely one of our race, but the Son of Man who has the unique vocation of establishing the Kingdom of God through His ministry, His sufferings, and His glory. Both titles, the "Son of God" and the "Son of Man," have this incomparable character. If we think of Jesus as Jesus thought of Himself, we can not think of anybody else in His place, or fulfilling His function. The titles, however, are not to be contrasted, nor interpreted of a human and a Divine nature. There is no suggestion of such a contrast in the Gospels, not even where some have found it, in Mt 16 13, 16 ("the Son of Man the Son of the living God"). To say that He gives us the knowledge of the Father and makes us sons of God, and to say that He makes us men and partakers in the triumph of humanity in His everlasting Kingdom, is not to say two things, but one and the same. On the Incarnation cf. § 18, below.

(d) In comparison with the "Christ," the "Son of God," and the "Son of Man," small importance attaches to the title the "Son of David." It was a designation for the Messiah as at once descendant and representative of the great King. The Evangelists and the scribes agreed in regarding Davidic descent as a mark of the Christ (Mt 1 1, 22 42 f.; Ro 1 4; II Ti 2 8), and Jesus was hailed as Messiah under this title at the triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Mt 21 9, 15), and by various persons who sought His help, or saw it rendered (Mt 9 27, 12 23, 15 22, 20 30 f.). It has been argued that in Mt 22 42 f. and ‖ He disclaims Davidic descent, but this is more than doubtful. Probably His descent from David was taken for granted by Himself, as it is throughout the N T, and the aim of His appeal to the Scribes is to show that it is not a relation to David—a relation no doubt shared with others—which is the essential thing in Messiahship, but a relation to God. Not any son of David is Messiah, but only that greater than David to whom the Lord has said, "Sit on my right hand." The Davidic title, as the one which most easily attracted those political associations of Messiahship which Jesus utterly rejected, would inevitably be attractive to the people, and as inevitably appeal less to Him than "Son of God" or "Son of Man."

(e) The only other title of Jesus found in the Gospels is Savior, and this not in His own words. It occurs in the angelic annunciation of His birth to the shepherds (Lk 2 11), where the meaning is undetermined, and it is implied in Mt 1 21, "Thou shalt call his name Jesus, for it is he that shall save his people from their sins." The phrase "his people" here probably means Israel, and the salvation is probably conceived of in that half-spiritual, half-national fashion which is so vividly illustrated in Lk 1 68-79. Throughout the ministry of Jesus, σώζειν ('to save') is mostly used of miracles of healing, or deliverance from bodily danger (e.g., Mt 9 21 f., 8 25, 14 30); but, as these were conditioned by faith, which involved a personal and spiritual relation to Jesus, blessings of a higher order were involved, and these are no doubt often included in such expressions as, "Thy faith hath saved thee." When we read that the Son of Man came "to save that which was lost" (Lk 19 10), it is the profounder spiritual sense which is in view, and in the Fourth Gospel this preponderates to the practical exclusion of the other (Jn 3 17, 5 34, 10 9, 12 47). Here also Jesus is expressly characterized as "the Savior of the world" (Jn 4 42). It is His vocation to bring eternal life to all men.

(f) In close connection with the revelation of the self-consciousness of Jesus stands His teaching on His death. All the Evangelists represent Him as devoting much attention to this—indeed, making it the main subject on which He instructed the Twelve—during the last period of His life (Mk 8 31, 9 31, 10 33 ff., and ‖s). It does not follow that He Himself first thought of it or realized it then. The allusion to the suffering Servant of the Lord in the voice at the Baptism, the spiritual conflict in the Temptation in which He renounced all compromise and defied evil to do its worst, beatitudes like Mt 5 10 f., the fate of the prophets and the forerunner, and the sense of antagonism in the world around Him, must have suggested the actual issue of His career; and the beautiful and ominous word in Mk 2 19, which evidently belongs to the earlier and more radiant period of the ministry, proves that it was habitually latent in His thoughts long before He spoke of it. The one idea on which stress is laid in the reiterated teaching referred to is the necessity of His death. That it was historically necessary was apparent, if Jesus remained true to God and to Himself; He had irreconcilable enemies who would scruple at nothing to put Him out of the way; the forces were actually at work around Him which could and would kill Him. The problem, humanly speaking, presented to Him was to discern in this historical necessity a Divine necessity; to see that what came upon Him as an inevitable fate was also the will of the Father, to which it was indispensable that He should submit in order to the fulfilment of His vocation. If His death was to be interpreted as a part of His work, it must be not merely endured, but accepted; His passion must become a great action, in which something infinitely important is done for the establishment of the Kingdom of God. That this was the conviction of Jesus, the whole Christian faith of the N T is the proof, and it is fair to infer from all the evidence at our disposal that He was assisted in giving shape to it by the prophecies of the O T and especially of Is ch. 53 (cf. Lk 22 37; Mk 10 45), where the peculiar expression "for many," in connection with the idea of 'giving the life' or 'the soul,' is an allusion to Is 53 10-12, where both ideas occur in combination. The two notable sayings of Jesus on the significance of His death (Mk 10 45, and ||, 14 22 ff., and ||) can not be fully discussed here. Briefly, it may be said that, according to the first saying, His death is conceived of as having a liberative power; it is at the cost of it that many are set free; He could not render them the service essential to them at a lesser cost. How the figure here is to be reduced to terms of thought is not expressly said; the circle of ideas in which the mind of Jesus moves is the same which is represented in Ps 49 7-9; Job 33 22-24; Mk 8 36 f. In the second saying, His death is represented as the basis of a new covenant, i.e., a new religious relation between God and man. In virtue of that death, somehow, men can enter into this new relation—the new relation, undoubtedly, which is predicted in Jer 31 31-34—a relation in which the law is written on the heart, and all men know God, because He has forgiven their iniquities and remembers their sins no more. Here, again, it may be said, problems are stated rather than solved; but it is important to notice that the connection of the death of Christ with the forgiveness of sins, which is central in apostolic teaching, is explicitly covered by the word of Jesus, in which He describes His blood as covenant blood. In no single utterance is the unique self-consciousness of Jesus more amazingly revealed than in that in which He bases on His own death the establishment for sinful men of the perfect and final relation to God. Within the covenant, God and men form one community; they have a common life and common aims; God enters into the life of men, men are partakers in the eternal life of God, and all this has been made possible through the death of Jesus. For fuller examination of this see the writer's Death of Christ (1902), pp. 36–60.

16. Prophetic Teaching of Jesus.

By this we understand the teaching of Jesus about what lay beyond His death. It is impossible to be certain here that in no respect has the teaching of Jesus been misapprehended by those who reported it, or unconsciously colored by hopes which they did not directly owe to Him, or by ideas and expectations to which His teaching only indirectly gave birth in their minds. But the following points may be regarded as certain: (1) Jesus foretold His own resurrection. All the three predictions of the passion (see foregoing) end with "and after three days"—or "on the third day"—"rise again." "After three days" and "on the third day" are in meaning exactly the same (cf. Mt 27 63, 64). Jesus' prediction of His resurrection was as special as that of His death. Any Jew then could predict His own death and resurrection, as any Christian can now; but it was the resurrection not at the last day (Jn 11 24), but after so brief an interval, that was as incomprehensible to the disciples as the death (Mk 9 10). (2) Jesus taught that the prophecy of Dn 7 13 would be fulfilled in Him; i.e., He would come again in glory, bringing in the perfected Kingdom of God and humanity (see §§ 13–15, above, on Kingdom of God and on Son of Man). The N T Church certainly held this coming to be one in visible splendor, in the clouds of heaven, and quite distinct from the resurrection. (3) Of the time of this coming Jesus expressly declared Himself ignorant (Mt 24 36; Mk 13 32), yet He is often represented as speaking of it as certain to occur within the lifetime of those He addressed (Mt 10 23, 16 28; Mk 9 1). This is not open to question, even if we admit that passages like Mk 13 30 refer not to the Advent, but to the destruction of Jerusalem, and it has caused much difficulty. Jesus has not come as the N T Church believed He had promised to do. Was He mistaken, or was He misunderstood? In answering these questions we must remember that almost all the language of Jesus which has given rise to them is apocalyptic, and that it is not quite plain how much in such language is literal, and how much has to be spiritualized. If no one takes the four great beasts and the sea literally in Dn ch. 7, is it certain that "coming on [or with] the clouds of heaven" is to be taken literally? Peter saw at Pentecost (Ac 2 16-21) the fulfilment of Jl 2 30, though at Pentecost there was no "blood and fire and vapor of smoke." Is it not possible that the Early Church took Jesus' words too prosaically, and cherished and transmitted hopes not really to be traced to Him? We are the more led to ask such questions because in Mt 26 64 and || the final word of Jesus to His accusers represents the exaltation of the Son of Man and His coming on the clouds of heaven as something of which they could be conscious from the moment of His condemnation on. He did come in Divine power, and fill Jerusalem with His presence as it had never been filled while He lived. This, too, in spite of occasional references to "the last day" (Jn 6 39, 44, 54, 11 24, 12 48), and to the Judgment (5 28), seems to have been the ultimate deposit of truth and meaning which the prophetic teaching of Jesus left with the Apostle John. In his Gospel there is no reference whatever to the coming of the Son of Man on the clouds of heaven; the place of this is taken by the coming of the Spirit, which is the same as the coming of Jesus in the Spirit, to dwell with His people and to be in them forever (Jn chs. 14–16). The tension of perpetual watchfulness (Mt 24 42, 25 13) finds a moral equivalent in the sense of the perpetual presence of Jesus. The idea of a final Parousia and a spectacular consummation of all things is not excluded by Mt 18 20, 28 20; Jn 14 23; but it is in some sense held in abeyance, while yet its motive power is not lost. It is in this way also that we must appreciate much of what is said in pictorial forms about the Judgment accompanying the Parousia (Mt 16 27, 25 31 ff.). Wherever Christ is, men are judged by Him; they gather to His side or are repelled from Him, and a day is coming in which it will be apparent that this is so, and that it is final. All the most solemn and inexorable words about judgment and its finality are from the lips of Jesus; it is almost as though no lips but those of love incarnate were at liberty to say things so tremendous.

III. Closing Scenes.

Reverting from the teaching of Jesus to the outline of His life (cf. § 7 ff., above), we come now to the closing scenes—the Passion week.

17. The Last Days. For all the Evangelists, this begins with the processional entry into Jerusalem, in which Jesus deliberately acts in the Messianic character. We can not be sure that the controversies and parables with which the week is filled in the Gospels all belong to this visit to Jerusalem, or even to this environment. The important events are the Last Supper, the prophetic discourses of Jesus as recorded in the Synoptics and John respectively, the Agony in the Garden, the Betrayal, Trial, Crucifixion, and Resurrection.

All Gospel Harmonies and Lives of Jesus show a distribution of the events according to days from Palm Sunday to Easter Sunday. For an examination of the chronological difficulties see Sanday in HDB, II, 633 ff.; Gilbert, Student's Life, 311 ff.; Andrews, Life of Our Lord, 447 ff. The chief difficulty is that arising out of the fact that Mk, Mt, and Lk clearly regard the Last Supper of Jesus with the Twelve as a passover, while in John the passover as obviously is not celebrated till the next day; cf. Mk 14 14; Lk 22 15; Jn 13 29, 18 28. In other words, John puts the Last Supper and the Crucifixion a day earlier in the month than the synoptists. Yet all four agree in putting the Crucifixion on the same day of the week—Friday (Mk 15 42; Mt 27 62; Lk 23 54; Jn 19 14, 31, 42: "preparation" [παρασκευή] = Friday). Of these perplexing phenomena, which may be due conceivably either to some confusion in the synoptic tradition—which is virtually only one witness—or to some modification of the history in Jn under the influence of a theological motive (e.g., to make Jesus, as our Paschal Lamb, die at the very hour when the Passover was slain), no satisfying, harmonizing explanation has ever been offered. The best, as resting on the fullest knowledge of Jewish customs and possibilities at the time, is that of Chwolson in Das letzte Passahmahl Christi, 1892; see also § 11, above.

When Jesus left the upper room, He went to the Mount of Olives and there, in Gethsemane, after the Agony, He was betrayed to His enemies by Judas. According to Jn (18 12) 'the (Roman) cohort and the tribune' took part with 'the servants of the Jews' in the arrest; but this can hardly be historical. What follows, on to the sentence of Pilate, is usually described as the Trial of Jesus. It has been minutely scrutinized in the light of legal and historical knowledge. For a critical examination of it, see, besides the Lives of Jesus, and Commentaries on the Gospels, Brandt, Kritik der evangelischen Geschichte (1893); Taylor Innes, The Trial of Jesus Christ (1899); Rosadi, Trial and Death of Jesus Christ (Eng. trans., 1905). Jesus was taken first before Annas, the ex-high priest, who retained great influence, and there in the early hours of morning subjected to some informal questioning (Jn 18 19) and insult (ver. 22). A little later He was passed on to the legal high priest, Caiaphas. So John records, while the other evangelists bring Him straight from Gethsemane to the high priest's (Caiaphas', Mt 26 57) house. As John connects Peter's denial with both scenes (18 17 is in Annas' house, 18 25—after ver. 24—in Caiaphas'), it would seem that the two residences were contiguous, and had a court in common. What took place before Caiaphas and such members of the Sanhedrin as could be gathered together so early (Mk 14 53; Mt 26 57) is usually called the Jewish trial. It ended in the condemnation of Jesus to death for blasphemy (Mk 14 63 f.; Mt 26 65 f.). But what was the blasphemy? According to Mk and Mt, it was the claim to be the Christ, and especially to be the Son of Man who should come in the clouds of heaven. This also is all that is alluded to by Luke, though he does not call it blasphemy (22 66-71). Many authorities hold that it was not blasphemy, and that the real blasphemy for which Jesus could be and was condemned was that of saying He would destroy the Temple and replace it in three days (Mk 14 58; Mt 26 61; cf. Ac 6 11-14). This is the view, e.g., of Wellhausen. But it is impossible to set aside the direct evidence of the synoptic tradition (Mt 26 64 and ||). There were many ways in which the memorable words of Jesus to the high priest could become known to Christians, and there is no difficulty in believing that it was some assertion of His personal claims which His unscrupulous enemies construed as blasphemy (cf. Mt 9 3 and ||). A claim to Messiahship is not in itself blasphemy, for there must be one true claim; but such a claim by such a person as Jesus was constructively blasphemy to all whose Messianic hopes were irreconcilable with calling Him King. But those who condemned Him as worthy of death could not carry out their sentence. The Roman governor had the power of life and death in his own hands, and there had to be a further consultation or conspiracy (Mk 15 1; Mt 27 1) to secure his support. This leads to the Roman trial. The charge of threatening to destroy and rebuild the Temple would have been vain here, and it is certain that in substance the charge made was political. This is apparent from the title on the cross, and from Pilate's question, "Art thou the King of the Jews"? which appears in all the Evangelists (Mk 15 2; Mt 27 11; Lk 23 3; Jn 18 33). In a sense it was the same charge—that of claiming to be Messiah—on which they themselves had condemned Him, but with a difference. In reality, Jesus was rejected by His nation and condemned by the Sanhedrin because, though avowing Himself Messiah in some sublime sense, He refused to do anything for the national and political ideals which they called Messianic; whereas Pilate was asked to condemn Him on the ground that, as a claimant of the Messianic dignity, He was inevitably a public danger (Lk 23 2; Jn 19 12). Nothing could have been more unscrupulous or insincere, and Pilate saw through it all; but he dreaded an accusation at Rome, and after repeated attempts to get rid of Jesus—by sending Him to Herod (Lk 23 7), by trying to shame the mob into accepting Him, instead of Barabbas, as the subject of amnesty at the feast (Mt 27 15 and ‖), by emphatically asserting His innocence (Lk 23 22), and even, after the scourging and the mockery by the soldiers, appealing to their compassion (Jn 19 5)—he finally gave way, and delivered Jesus up to their will (Lk 23 25). The execution followed immediately upon the sentence of Pilate. It is told with most tragic simplicity in Mk, which has only one word uttered on the cross (15 34 = Ps 22 1), no accompanying marvel but the three hours' darkness (ver. 33), and no incident of purely spiritual meaning except the rending of the Temple veil (ver. 38). In Mt the desire to see prophecy fulfilled has modified a historical detail (cf. 27 34; Ps 69 22, with the fact in Mk 15 23), and it is difficult to believe that in 27 52 ff. we are not in the domain of legend. Luke's Gospel, as usual, has preserved all that was touching and pathetic in the tradition: the daughters of Jerusalem (23 27 ff.), the penitent robber and the royal promise of Jesus to him (ver. 39 ff.), and the prayers of Jesus Himself (vs. 34, 46), not to mention the impression made on the multitude (ver. 48). John claims for one incident connected with the death of Jesus, to which he attached great importance (cf. I Jn 5 6), the authority of an eye-witness (19 35), and possibly this extends to his whole narrative here. He seems to have attached special significance to fulfilments of prophecy at the cross (19 23 f., 28, 36, 37), and perhaps to correspondences between the death of Jesus and that of the Paschal Lamb; so that 19 36 = Ex 12 36, rather than Ps 34 21. All the Evangelists record the burial of Jesus by Joseph of Arimathæa, a member of the Sanhedrin, who had not shared in the responsibility for His death. With him John associates Nicodemus (19 39), combining at the same time embalming and entombment (ver. 40).

IV The Resurrection.

18. The Resurrection.

On the third day after He was buried—on the Sunday after the Friday—Jesus appeared to His own, and the Christian Church was born in faith in His Resurrection. The Evangelists are not the oldest nor the most important witnesses for the Resurrection, nor is the evidence for it sensibly affected by the difficulty of combining their accounts. An older and fuller tradition than they yield is preserved in I Co 15 3-8, and the essential evidence for the Resurrection must always consist of this, and of that which is pointed to by Peter in Ac 2 33: "He hath poured forth this, which ye see and hear." On the one hand, the historical testimony of the Apostles—whose function was to be witnesses to the Resurrection (Ac 1 22), as their qualification was to have seen the Lord (I Co 9 1)—and, on the other hand, the new life, Spirit-quickened, both of which are still with us in the N T as a whole and in the specifically Christian life of the Church, are our assurance that Christ has risen. This assurance is quite independent of any perplexities which may arise from the study of the Gospel narratives.

These narratives were composed at a time when it was no longer possible to recover exactly the notes of place or sequences of time which would have enabled the writers to present a story concordant in all its details; and it may not have been their intention to present such a story at all. Their literary or practical purpose may have been quite different. The following points should be noted: (1) All the evangelists represent Jesus as foretelling His Resurrection (see §16 (1), above). (2) Mk and Mt agree verbally (Mk 14 27 f.; Mt 26 31 f.) in what is virtually a program of the Passion and its sequel: "All ye shall be offended in me [this night]; for it is written, I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered abroad. Howbeit [but], after I am raised up I will go before you (προάξω ὑμᾶς, as the shepherd goes before his flock) into Galilee." (3) In Mt this program is carried out. The risen Jesus does not appear to His disciples in Jerusalem; on the contrary, first the angel at the tomb (28 7) and then Jesus Himself (28 10) intimates to them through the women that Galilee is the rendezvous. There eventually they do see Him and receive the great commission (28 16). Appearance to the Eleven in Jerusalem is clearly and intentionally excluded. (4) Mk also, it can hardly be doubted, carried out, like Mt, the program announced in 14 28. It is expressly referred to in 16 7, and it is to the present writer inconceivable that Mk 16 7 was not—in the original conclusion of the Gospel—carried out as in Mt ch. 28. The present conclusion of Mk (16 9-20) is secondary, and is based on various passages in Mt ch. 28, Lk ch. 24, Jn ch 20, and Ac (passim). (5) While Mk and Mt were originally at one in recording only an appearance of Jesus to the Eleven in Galilee, Lk proceeds on quite another line. He omits the Passion and the Resurrection program of Mk 14 27 f.; Mt 23 31 f. He changes the words spoken to the women at the tomb. Though Galilee is mentioned, it is not as the place where Jesus has appointed to meet His disciples, but as the place where He was when He spoke of His Death and Resurrection (Lk 24 6 f.). In conformity with this, Jesus, who has already appeared to Peter and to two disciples on the way to Emmaus, appears also on the Resurrection Day to the Eleven and their company in Jerusalem (24 36), and after reassuring them as to His identity by such material proofs as Lk is partial to (vs. 39-43, cf. 3 22; Ac 10 41), forbids them to leave the city till they are endued with power from on high. Here appearances in Galilee are clearly and intentionally excluded. The most natural explanation of the differences between Mk and Mt on the one hand and Lk on the other is that it was no part of an Evangelist's conception of his duty to give all the appearances of Jesus, with details of time and place. All the Evangelists must have been familiar with the tradition summarized in I Co 15 3-8, yet all of them ignore it. The idea was rather to give one appearance only of Jesus to the Eleven, and to impart to that one a representative or universal character, by connecting with it, through a great commission, the whole significance of the Resurrection for the apostolic Church. This is what Mk, Mt, and Lk alike do—in substance it is what Jn does also in ch. 20—and the key to their treatment of the Resurrection is, therefore, theological, or literary, rather than historical. As for the divergence between Lk and the other Synoptics as to the scene of this representative appearance, it is clear that, if Jesus appeared in different places—as John shows—the scene must be arbitrarily chosen. The Petrine tradition in Mk and Mt makes it Galilee, as was natural to one who had chiefly associated with Jesus there; Lk as naturally makes it Jerusalem, for to him, a Gentile believer, Jerusalem, and not Galilee, was the native seat of the Christian faith. The literature on this subject is inexhaustible, but not very profitable. When the possibility of the Resurrection is denied, and it is assumed that apologetic and other impulses produced all that is put forward as fact in the Gospels, from the empty tomb to the Ascension, in which Jesus withdrew in a kind of solemn pomp from His post-resurrection intercourse with His disciples, and when attempts are made to show how this production of facts actually proceeded, the mind has entered a region practically without law, in which its operations cease to interest. For criticism of this whole area cf. Schmiedel in EB, cols. 4039 ff., and the list of English books and articles appended by Moffatt, ib. col. 4086 f. Add Meyer, Die Auferstehung Christi (1905); Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus (1908), and the admirable summary by Chase in Cambridge Theological Essays (1905), pp. 393 ff.

IV. Appended Discussion.

19. The Birth of Jesus.

The Christian religion rests on the testimony of the Apostles to Jesus, and the area covered by that testimony is that of the foregoing paragraphs—"from the baptism of John unto the day that he was received up" (Ac 1 22). Into this testimony the birth of Jesus, His childhood and youth, His years as the carpenter of Nazareth, do not enter. They are not part of the Gospel which the Apostles preached; it is not in them that the revelation is made which brings redemption to mankind. To say this is not to set aside what is properly called the Incarnation. The Incarnation means the presence of the Divine in the human, and to base our faith in it on the apostolic testimony means that to become conscious of this presence of the Divine in Christ we must look at Christ where, through the apostolic testimony, He offers Himself to our eyes—that is, in the life which He lived among men, and in which He revealed Himself as Son of God, Son of Man, and Savior. The Life, Death, and Resurrection of Jesus, as covered by the apostolic testimony, and in particular the mind of Jesus Himself—His consciousness of His own unique relation to God and to the human race—are the original and sufficient basis of Christianity, whether we are, or are not, able to answer questions as to the mode in which this Jesus, the Person in whom we recognize that God is with us, actually came to be—a man among men. Apart from the Gospels of Mt and Lk the N T does not raise such questions. Mt and Lk do, and they agree in representing Jesus as supernaturally born of a virgin. The personality of which they speak owes its origin to an immediate act of God, an act of which we must conceive, not as sexual but as creative. It is this act in virtue of which Jesus is to the Evangelist "Son of God" (Lk 1 34 f.). God makes the second Adam as truly as He made the first; only, not of the dust of the ground, but of the common stock of humanity already existing. The new humanity, so to speak, is engrafted on the old by the direct interposition of God. The way in which this is put in Mt and Lk is that Jesus had no human father. In the nature of the case there can be no question of historical evidence here, as for the events of Jesus' life. The impression such a conception as that of the supernatural birth makes on us depends on the impression which has already been made by the life and especially by the self-consciousness of Jesus. If we are sensible to something in Him of which we are compelled to say, "It was not nature nor humanity which produced this from its own resources; this is Divine, it is of God and of God only," the idea may carry evidence of its truth along with it, otherwise it will fail to impress. The witness of the Evangelists is complicated by the fact that, while both teach a supernatural birth, both give genealogies of Jesus which connect Him with David and Abraham, not through Mary—though Weiss and others interpret Lk's genealogy in this sense—but through Joseph. However, with Joseph He has no connection whatever, and hence the genealogies are quite unreal. It is not unnatural to suppose that they were drawn up by people who wished to demonstrate the Davidic descent of Jesus, and were in the habit of thinking of Him, as His contemporaries did, as the son of Joseph (Mt 13 55; Lk 4 22), and that they were adapted by our Evangelists to their use by the modifications in Mt 1 16; Lk 3 23. It readily occurs to one that N T writers, like Paul and John, who believed in the preexistence of Christ, and thought of His coming from heaven and earth, must have conceived of this coming as supernaturally mediated (I Co 8 6; II Co 8 9; Ro 8 3; Ph 2 5; Jn 8 58, 17 5). The second Adam, the Eternal Word, can not have come into the world in the ordinary course of nature. But two considerations make us pause in appealing to these Apostles to support Mt and Lk. The first is their silence on the subject. John believed in Jesus as the Word Incarnate. But, though he had seen the Father in the Son—and it is in words like Jn 14 9 that the true meaning of the incarnation is expressed—he raised, so far as appears, no physical and no metaphysical question as to the mode of His coming. He knew only that we are from beneath, and He is from above; that we are in the world and in our sins, and that He confronts us in the light and life of God for our salvation. How He came to be here in this character he never seems to ask. It is the same with Paul—though one may wonder whether an intimate friend of Luke could be ignorant of, or indifferent to, Lk chs 1 and 2. He is interested in the motive of Christ's coming to earth, not in its method (Gore on II Co 8 9). The second consideration is that Mt and Lk do not at all, like Paul and John, conceive of a preexistent Divine person coming into the world. Their Gospels contain no hint of a preexistence of Jesus; His supernatural birth is for them the origination of His personality. In this respect the Evangelists have no contact with the Apostles. The most we can say is that as their genealogies connect Jesus with O T history, in Lk with universal human history, and with the Divine purpose in process of achievement there, so the story of the virgin birth connects Him with the creative power of God. In both connections there is a great truth. He does fulfil the Divine purpose in Hebrew and in human history, and He does in some peculiar way come from God; but whether the genealogies are accurate, and whether the peculiar relation to God involves a virgin birth, are questions on which Christian faith is not dependent. One of the weightiest arguments for the virgin birth is found in the difficulty of explaining the existence of the story except on the assumption of its truth. It can not have been produced in the interest of asceticism, to glorify virginity as opposed to marriage. There is no trace of this in Mt or Lk, and Mary had other children (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD). It can not have been invented in view of Ps 51 5 to assert the sinlessness of Jesus. Sinlessness is not physical but moral, and there can be no physical guaranty of it. The purity and beauty of the narrative, also, as contrasted with the mythological stories of antiquity, where the gods are invested with the passions of men—stories which have their real parallel in the fall of the angels (Gn 6 1), not in Mt and Lk—argue for its truth. In particular, the primitive Palestinian character of the hymns, and of the whole scenery, characters, and language in Lk chs. 1 and 2, is in favor of historicity. It seems to exclude Greek influence entirely, and as the idea of a Son of God in the physical sense is as repellent to the Hebrew as to the Moslem mind, and can not have originated spontaneously, the inference is that the narrative is based on fact. It is not against this that it provides a way of expressing the assurance that the life of Christ is throughout Divine. If He was Son of God at all, He did not begin to be so at any given age—at twelve (Lk 2 49), or at the Baptism (Mk 1 11), or at the Transfiguration (9 7), or at the Resurrection (Ac 13 33; Ro 1 4). He never was anything else. This is the truth guarded by the virgin birth. It is in harmony with that unique relation to God and man which is of the essence of His consciousness, that there should be something unique in the mode of His entrance into the world as well as in that of His leaving it. The possible points in a line of transmission for Lk's narrative are suggested by Sanday, Expository Times, vol. xiv (1902–3), pp. 296 ff. See also Box in Preuschen's Zeitschrift (1905); Gore's Essay in his Dissertations (1895); Orr, The Virgin Birth of Christ (1907).

LITERATURE: For the literary and historical criticism of the Gospels, the primary works are Holtzmann, Die synopt. Evangelien, 1863; Weiss, Das Marcus-evangelium u. seine synopt. Parallelen, 1872; and Weizsäcker, Untersuchungen über die evang. Geschichte, 1901². Excellent summary of the whole discussion may be found in Wernle's Die synoptische Frage, 1899. For the latest aspects of the discussion, see Wellhausen, Einleitung in d. drei ersten Evangelien, 1905, and Jülicher's Einleitung in d. N T 1906⁵ (Eng. transl., 1904); Zahn, Einleitung in d. N T 1907³ (Eng. transl., 1908). Shorter introductions are: Wright, The Composition of the Four Gospels, 1890; J. Armitage Robinson, The Study of the Gospels, 1902; J. Estlin Carpenter, The First Three Gospels, 1904³; Wernle, Quellen des Lebens Jesu, 1904; Burton, A Short Introduction to the Gospels, 1904.

Lives of Christ: Historically the most influential has been Strauss's Leben Jesu kritisch bearbeitet, 1835. Neander's, 1837, was the best answer to Strauss, and retains its value. The richest German Life is Keim's Jesus von Nazara, 3 vols., 1867–72. On a sounder critical basis, but often perverse and unequal to the greatness of the subject, is Weiss's Leben Jesu, 1902⁴. O. Holtzmann's Leben Jesu, 1901, is thorough in its rejection of the supernatural, but gives little help toward understanding the Jesus of the Gospels. All these works have been translated into English. On a smaller scale may be mentioned P. W. Schmidt, Die Geschichte Jesu, 1900, and Bousset, Jesus, 1904 (Eng. transl., 1906). Renan's Vie de Jésus, 1863, needs no description; Réville's Jésus de Nazareth, 1897, is an ambitious work, least successful where it is original.

Of English Lives of Christ, the most useful to a student is Edersheim's Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, 1900¹⁰; it illustrates the Gospels copiously from Jewish sources, yet is not indispensable to a reader who has access to Schürer's History of the Jewish People in the Time of Christ, 1898–1901²; Farrar's Life of Christ, 1874¹⁰, is well known, and Stalker's, 1880, is unsurpassed as an introduction. Special mention should be made of Andrews' The Life of Our Lord, 1892²; Gilbert's The Student's Life of Jesus, 1896; and Rush Rhees' The Life of Jesus of Nazareth, 1900. All three are designed for students and are very serviceable. The same holds of Sanday's article, Jesus Christ, in HDB (since reprinted separately). On the teaching of Jesus, the most elaborate book is Wendt's Die Lehre Jesu, 2 vols. (vol. i, 1886; vol. ii, 1890). The second volume of the first edition has been translated as The Teaching of Jesus, 2 vols., 1892. Most New Testament Theologies cover the ground and refer to the literature on special subjects: Holtzmann's Lehrbuch der neut. Theologie, 1897, contains most matter; the relevant sections in Stevens' New Test. Theology, 1899, are clear and good. Cf. also A. B. Bruce, The Kingdom of God, 1899, and The Training of the Twelve (this last, the first edition of which appeared in 1871, is one of the best books ever written on the teaching of Jesus). The most inspiring book in English is Ecce Homo, 1865. The critical books on the subject are emphatically not inspired. One of the freshest is Johannes Weiss, Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes, 1900². For students may be mentioned the short and compact presentation in Gilbert's The Revelation of Jesus, 1899. J. JETHER, jî'thẹr (יֶתֶר, yether), 'abundance': 1. In Ex 4 18 for Jethro, father-in-law of Moses (see RVmg.). 2. The first-born son of Gideon, a youth. He feared to draw his sword to slay Zebah and Zalmunna (Jg 8 20). 3. The Ishmaelite husband of Abigail, David's sister (I Ch 2 17; in II S 17 25, called "Ithra the Israelite") and father of Amasa (I K 2 5, 32). 4, 5. Two men of Judah (I Ch 2 32, 4 17). 6. A man of Asher (I Ch 7 38). C. S. T.

JETHLAH, jeth'lā. See ITHLAH.

JETHRO, jeth'rō or jî'thrō (יִתְרוֹ, yithrō): A sheik and priest of the Kenites (Jg 1 16), a Midianitish tribe. There is considerable confusion as to his name in the O T narrative. In Ex 2 18 he is called Reuel, and in Nu 10 29, Jg 4 11 Hobab, son of Reuel (see HOBAB). That Jethro and Reuel are names of the same person is an explanation as old as the LXX., the latter being regarded as an official title.

The Targums and many modern scholars look upon Jethro and Hobab as two sons of Reuel. It is preferable to regard Reuel as a clan-name, and Jethro (J) and Hobab (E) as identical. Raguel (Nu 10 29 AV) is an incorrect spelling of Reuel. Jethro is represented as counseling the great lawgiver, as assisting him in organizing a judicial system, and as acting as guide (Ex 3 1, 18 1 ff.; Nu 10 29 ff.). From these meager data of the O T it has been inferred that J″ was originally the tribal god of the Kenites, and that the religion of Israel, as taught by Moses, was learned by him at the feet of Jethro. A more probable interpretation of the O T narrative is that Jethro, the worshiper of the ancient Semitic god El, as the clan-name Reuel indicates, recognized J″, the Hebrew God, as a superior deity, because of the deliverance of His people from Egypt, and consequently offered sacrifices to J″ (Ex 18 9 ff.). In the pre-Mosaic age the closely related Kenites and Hebrews possessed the same customs and religion. This bond led Moses to seek an asylum with Jethro, and later brought that leader into the camp of Israel. J. A. K.

JEUEL, je-ū'el, jiū'el, or jî'u-el (יְעוּאֵל, y'ū'ēl): 1. The ancestral head of a clan of Judah (I Ch 9 6). 2. A Levite (II Ch 29 13). 3. A leader of Ezra's company (Ezr 8 13). 2 and 3 = Jeiel AV E. E. N.

JEUSH, jî'ush (יְעוּשׁ, y'ūsh), 'he comes to help': 1. A son of Esau by Oholibamah (Gn 36 5, 14 [Kethibh, y'ish], 36 18; I Ch 1 35). 2. A Benjamite (I Ch 7 10 [Kethibh, y'ish]). 3. A Levitical family (I Ch 23 10, 11). 4. A son of Rehoboam (II Ch 11 19). 5. A Benjamite of the family of Saul (I Ch 8 39, Jehush AV). C. S. T.

JEUZ, jî'uz (יְעוּץ, y'ūts), 'He counsels': A Benjamite (I Ch 8 10). E. E. N.

JEW (יְהוּדִי, y'hūdhī, Gr. Ἰουδαῖος): This word does not occur in O T literature earlier than the period of Jeremiah. It then meant a citizen, or subject, of the kingdom of Judah (II K 25 25; Jer 32 12, 34 9, etc.). In II K 16 6 it means Judæans in contrast to Syrians (or Edomites?). As early as the days of Hezekiah the language of Judah was called Jewish (יְהוּדִית, y'hūdhīth). The exiles were called Jews because they came from Judah. As these exiles from Judah became the main historical representatives of ancient Israel, the term 'Jew' became equivalent to 'Israelite,' and this is its general sense in the later literature (cf. its usage in Ezr–Neh, Est, Dn, the N T, Josephus, etc.). In the N T there is a contrast at times between the Jew (Israelite) and the Gentile (Mk 7 3; Jn 2 6; Ac 10 28, etc.; cf. also Jewess, Ac 16 1, 24 24), or the Samaritan (Jn 4 9), and at other times between the Jews and Christ, or Christianity (Jn 2 18; II Co 11 24, etc.). E. E. N.

JEWEL. See STONES, PRECIOUS, and also DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II.

JEWESS, THE (יְהוּדִיָּה, y'hūdhīyāh, Jehudijah AV): The wife of Mered, the Calebite (I Ch 4 18). Her name was Bithiah. She is called "the Jewess," possibly because of the foreign extraction implied in her designation "daughter of Pharaoh." E. E. N.

JEWRY. See JUDEA.

JEZANIAH, jez″a-nai'ā. See JAAZANIAH.

JEZEBEL, jez e-bel (אִיזֶבֶל, 'īzebhel): The daughter of Ethbaal, King of Tyre, and the wife of Ahab. In her own home, she had been educated as a zealous Baal-worshiper. As the queen of Ahab she not only claimed the right of continuing in her ancestral religion, but tried to impose the same upon the people of Israel. She succeeded so far as to induce Ahab to erect a temple to Baal, and import a large retinue of Baal priests (I K 16 32). The movement was unflinchingly resisted by the prophets of J″, headed by Elijah. When the latter prevailed in the test at Mt. Carmel, she threatened him with death, and thus caused his flight and temporary retirement from public life. Later, she secured Naboth's vineyard for Ahab by causing its owner to be judicially murdered, and confiscating his property (I K 21 13). This brought Elijah once more to the front to denounce the crime and predict the speedy punishment both of Jezebel and Ahab. The prediction was fulfilled when Ahab died from wounds received in battle, and Jehu, after his encounter with Joram and Ahaziah, came to Jezreel and demanded the life of Jezebel (II K 9 30 ff.). The name of Jezebel became in later times the apocalyptic symbol of seduction to idolatry (Rev 2 20). A. C. Z.

JEZREEL, jez're-el (יִזְרְעֶאל, yizr'e'l), 'God soweth,' or if formed like the word Carmel, 'sown land': 1. A place in Judah, near Carmel (Jos 15 56; I S 25 43; probably also I Ch 4 3). David's wife Ahinoam, the Jezreelitess, probably came from this place (I S 27 3, 30 5; II S 2 2, etc.). Map II, E 3. 2. A town E. of the great plain of Esdraelon, now Zer'in. Map IV, C 8. The deep vale (valley of Jezreel) that leads down from Jezreel to the Jordan was the gateway for the tribes of the desert, attracted by the rich harvests of the plain. Upon such a motley horde, Gideon's little band fell like a thunderbolt from the heights above Jezreel (Jg 7 1 ff.), and drove them in panic down the valley. There are no certain references to Jezreel as a fortress until Ahab's day, when with Samaria it was made a royal residence with a palace and strong towers (I K 18 45 f., 21 1 ff.). From the E. tower Jehu was seen coming up from the Jordan, and here Jehoram and his mother, Jezebel, met their death (II K 8 29, 9 10–10 11). The horror at Jehu's bloody deed was echoed later in the prediction of judgment to come on Jehu's house (Hos 1 4). A. S. C.

JOAB, jō'ab (יוֹאָב, yō'ābh), 'J" is father': 1. The son of David's sister Zeruiah and general-in-chief of David's armies (II S 20 23). His appearance in public life coincides with David's struggle for the throne against Abner and the forces of Ishbosheth. When Abner transferred his allegiance to David, J. murdered him with his own hand, taking vengeance for the death of his brother Asahel (II S 3 27). J. had charge of David's military operations and conquered the Syrians (II S 10 13) and the Ammonites (II S 11 1), whose capital, Rabbah, he besieged, but refrained from taking the citadel, in order to afford David himself the glory of storming it. He also conquered the Edomites (1 K 11 25). J. was thus one of the chief factors in the creation of David's empire. When David wished to have Uriah out of the way, that he might marry Bathsheba, it was J. who was entrusted with the task (II S 11 14). In the affair of Absalom's rebellion, J., although previously kindly disposed toward Absalom, was loyal to David, and afterward dealt with the rebellious son with a strong hand (II S 13 1–18 33). He also took charge of the revolt of Sheba (although the command in this case had been given to Amasa, whom J. treacherously murdered), and promptly put it down. At the end of David's reign, J. espoused the cause of Adonijah, who claimed the succession, and was slain by Benaiah at the command of Solomon (I K 2 34). 2. A Judahite, descendant of Caleb (I Ch 2 54). 3. The son of Seraiah (I Ch 4 14). 4. The founder of a family, names of members of which occur in the list of the returned exiles (Ezr 2 6, 8 9; Neh 7 11). A. C. Z.

JOAH, jō'ā (יוֹאָח, yō'āh), "J" is brother': 1. An officer under Hezekiah (II K 18 18, 26; Is 36 3 ff.). 2. A Levite (I Ch 6 21; II Ch 29 12). 3. A doorkeeper (I Ch 26 4). 4. An officer under Josiah (II Ch 34 8). E. E. N.

JOANAN, jo-an'an (Ἰωανάν, Joanna AV): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 27). E. E. N.

JOANNA, jō-an'a (Ἰωάννα): The wife of Chuza, superintendent of the estates and household affairs of Herod Antipas. She became a faithful disciple of Jesus, helped Him with her means, and accompanied Him from Galilee to Jerusalem. She was also one of the women who went to the tomb intending to embalm the body of Jesus, and there received the message of His resurrection (Lk 8 3, 24 10). E. E. N.

JOASH, jō'ash (יוֹאָשׁ, יֹאָשׁ, yō'āsh): 1. The father of Gideon (Jg 6 11). The narratives in Jg chs. 6–8 represent J. as a man of rank and influence notwithstanding Gideon's words (Jg 6 15). He was of the Abiezrite clan of Manasseh, the owner of a holy tree (Jg 6 11) and proprietor of the altar of Baal in Ophrah (Jg 6 29-31). Jg 6 31 represents him as giving Gideon the name of Jerubbaal. 2. A son of King Ahab, who perhaps represented the king in Samaria, during his absence on the field of battle. Ahab sent the prophet Micaiah, after he had prophesied unfavorably, to J. to be put in prison (I K 22 26 f.; II Ch 18 25). Some are of the opinion that "king's son" is a title. 3. A descendant of Judah (I Ch 4 22). 4. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (I Ch 12 3). 5. A King of Judah; see JEHOASH. C. S. T.

JOASH (יוֹעָשׁ, yō'āsh), 'J" hath aided' (?): 1. A Benjamite, son of Becher (I Ch 7 8). 2. A man in charge of David's oil-cellars (I Ch 27 28). C. S. T.

ANALYSIS OF CONTENTS

3. The Speech of Elihu
4. The Problem of the Book
5. Date

The Book of Job is highly composite, and can be most intelligibly handled by tracing historically its probable origin and growth. (1) The Hebrews had a story of a Job, righteous and holding by God in an evil generation (Ezk 14 14, 20), a prophet (probably) and upright (Sir 49 9), and patient (Ja 5 11). Later still in legend and comment the same ideas are found attaching to the name. (2) On the evidence of the book itself there existed a prose story of Job, the beginning and end of which were the present Prologue (chs. 1, 2) and Epilogue (42 7, end); the middle has been removed. This story told of Job's trial by God at the instance of the Satan ('the Accuser')—how he was tempted by his wife and withstood her—how his friends spoke unseemly things of God, but he did not, remaining patient and upright—how the Lord appeared and rebuked the friends, praised Job for his constancy, and restored unto him double. It had been shown that Job would serve God for naught, and it was suggested that the apparently unmerited afflictions of the righteous might all be such trials as this. The evidence for this is in the Epilogue with its blame of the friends and praise of Job and its crude restitution, and in the current Hebrew views of Job in (1) above. Of the source of this story there are two possibilities: one that it was a pure folk-tale, of popular origin, for edifying amusement; the other that it was a bit of the Wisdom literature, carefully told by a wise man for a purpose, i.e., to explain the misfortunes of the righteous. On the first hypothesis it was like the stories of Elijah and Elisha; on the second, like the Book of Jonah. The probabilities are with the second, and it may even have been constructed to suggest an explanation to the people of their misfortunes.

2. The Use Made of This Story by the Poet. Chs. 3-31.

But the Job of this story was a quite impossibly stolid and wooden figure. No real man could have behaved so. A poet then appeared who took this figure and situation and humanized them. We are no longer to have a puppet representative of the oppressed righteous but a great living tragic figure. The change begins with the friends of Job. They sit now in silent sympathy, but thinking their own thoughts, which are thereafter to make them the 'Job's comforters' of all time. Under their eyes Job, now human, breaks down and curses the day of his birth which brought him to this pass (ch. 3). He is conscious of no sin meriting such punishment, and would have recoiled in horror from a God who made such a bargain in flesh and blood with the Satan as had passed in heaven. The God he had known was not such a God, and thus he could not explain what had befallen him. The tragedy is to be his awakening to the real God, and to an independent sense of right within himself to which he must hold. This is developed in the colloquies with his friends which follow in three cycles, the last incomplete, of six speeches each, one by each friend with a reply from Job (chs. 4–27). In these the friends, too, develop. Their first view is that Job's suffering is intended to awaken him and lead him away from sin; soon, however, they conclude that it is absolute punishment for gross sin. In Job himself two ideas war—and if the book is a drama this is its action—the remembrance of his past loving intercourse with God and his idea of justice. He is led to look around on the world, and he sees that there injustice seems to triumph even as in his case. He is driven to the conclusion that the rule of the world is non-moral. If God would only appear and explain; but let Him not come in awful might and in a whirlwind to crush him (9 17). So he tries to divide God into Him of the past and Him of the present, and to the first he makes appeal. The details of the long discussion we need not follow. There is much repetition, but also a steady development. We can see two sides to the artist. He was creating a great tragic character and in so doing was working out one of the greatest human problems. But he was a Semitic artist also, and loved brilliant words and pictures for themselves. These, often, are wearisome and do not appeal to us. His problem he did not solve; his tragedy did not reach 'reconciliation.' Perhaps he could not; certainly the defective sense of structure in the Semitic mind stood in his way. Ch. 24 is very disjointed; ch. 25 is a very short speech by Bildad; ch. 26 an equally short reply by Job; 27 1-6, a continuation by Job; 27 8, end, is in the tone of the friends, and may be Zophar's last speech; ch. 28 is a poem apart, telling that man can reach anything in the earth except Wisdom—this God has kept for Himself; chs. 29–31 are a final clearing of himself by Job. So far certainly, except for ch. 28 and stray verses interpolated, we have the great unknown poet.

3. The Speech of Elihu (Chs. 32-37) and Chs. 38-42.

Chs. 32–37 are the speech of Elihu, an undoubted interpolation to supplement the supposedly imperfect defense of God by the friends. In reality it repeats, and adds nothing. Artistically, too, it is inferior. Then, chs. 38–41 give a long and disjointed speech by God out of a whirlwind, broken (40 3-5) and followed (42 1-6) by a very humble withdrawal of everything by Job. Finally, we have the Epilogue referred to above.

4. The Problem of the Book.

The problem is the relation of these parts. This problem is twofold: (a) Is this dénouement the work of the Poet? If so, it is the most terrific irony and puts the author in the position of the author of Ec, only in open revolt. God crushes Job with His wisdom and might, but does not solve his moral problem. At most, He exhibits to him the esthetic anodyne of nature. God's attitude here is much the same as in ch. 28. Beyond this, His position is essentially that of the friends; but they had no whirlwind and storm. A comparison of this with 9 17 suggests that the speech may be by the Poet. If not, it must have been written, and by some other great poet, to make a suitable transition to the Epilogue—a theory beset by difficulties. But (b) the problem of the Elihu speech may suggest a different result. The author of this speech certainly expresses his own mind. He does not create Elihu; he speaks through him. Also he fits him to the patriarchal scheme; Job is from Uz; Elihu is from Buz; both sons of Nahor, brother of Abraham (Gn 22 21). All the names in the book, apart from Job, belong to side-lines of the patriarchal genealogies, except Barachel ('God ['El] blesses') and Elihu ('He is my God'). These meanings indicate an attitude and can not be accidental. 'Elihu,' then, considered that Job was wrong, but that the friends had failed to answer him. He tries, and practically repeats them; his position and theirs are one. But this is also the same as the position taken in the speech of the Lord. In what condition, then, did the book lie before 'Elihu'? It is hard to think that he would have written as he did, if it had been complete except for his speech. The Lord's condemnation of the friends and praise of Job would have prevented. His position would have been to condemn the whole book as profane. And even if the book had ended for him with 42 6, i.e., had only contained the speech of the Lord and Job's submission, but no condemnation of the friends, the speech of the Lord would have satisfied him that he could not write anything further. Apparently, then, he added his protest to a copy which ended with "The words of Job are ended" (31 40). This means that the speech of the Lord is not by the Poet of the colloquies. These critical results (a and b) can only be left face to face: the problem is still unsolved.

Another question may be raised. Could the Poet of the colloquies have reached a 'reconciliation,' starting as he did? (a) If the Lord had appeared, not in storm but calmly, and had said to Job, "What you have said is true, and what your friends have said is not true. But you knew me as your friend in the past; can you not trust me now? Consider this sense of justice in yourself which you say I violate. Did I not make you and it? Must it not be in me also?" Strangely, no Hebrew writer seeks refuge in this last idea, neither the Preacher of Ec nor this Poet. But the latter could not. The Prologue stood there with the story of the Satan, and how Job was being sacrificed for naught. (b) Would a vision of spiritual immortality and recompense have satisfied Job? Almost certainly such a thought was current in his time, but could not help him in the position he ultimately reached. The burden of the painful earth, full of wrong and injustice, was on him and could not be lifted by such a bribe. Also, it was vindication here that he demanded. It is hard to see, then, how the Poet could have loosed his knot; the prose tale had tied it too hard. Finally, if we imagine that Goethe had died before finishing his "Faust," leaving the first part published, the second part unarranged, with the parallel passages uncanceled, and the dénouement unwritten, and then that some mechanical editor had taken it all, strung it together and ended it with the end of the Volksbuch of Faust, we shall have a rough external parallel to the present state of the Book of Job. Whether this parallel will lead or mislead us as to its origin is still the question.

5. Date.

The date obviously can not be fixed. The separate elements may scatter anywhere from the late 7th to the 4th cent. B.C. Job himself, probably, is a figure from the earliest popular legend and, whether historical or not, well served the purpose of the author.

LITERATURE: None of the English versions is even remotely adequate. The best guide, in exegesis, for the English reader is Davidson in the Cambridge Bible. ANALYSIS OF CONTENTS

1. The Prophet
2. Contents of the Book
3. The Locusts
4. Date: Early?
5. Date: Post-Exilic?
6. Religious Thought

1. The Prophet.

Son of Pethuel, a prophet, whose book stands second among the twelve minor prophets. Of his personality nothing is known beyond what is revealed in the book. It is not questioned that his ministry was exercised in Judæa, and more particularly in Jerusalem. It is clear also that he was a man of great moral force and insight.

2. Contents of the Book.

The Book of Joel consists of three discourses. The first two are addressed to the people by the prophet himself (1 2–2 17); the third is represented as spoken by J" (2 18–3 2). The first two discourses (1 2-20 and 2 1-17) are upon the same subject—the invasion of the country by a plague of locusts. But the first, after the announcement of the calamity, calls for the recognition of God's judgment, whereas the second enters into a highly picturesque description of the army of locusts. The third discourse in the book presents J" as giving His word of promise that His blessing would yet be bestowed upon the distressed land (2 17–3 21).

3. The Locusts.

The occasion of the prophecy is given at the outset. It is the plague of locusts. Whether this means literal locusts or must be figuratively taken, and if figuratively, whether it is an allegory or an apocalyptic description have been much-mooted questions. If the representation is an allegory, the locusts stand for hordes of enemies overrunning the country and leaving ruin and devastation all along their track. If it is an apocalyptic vision, they are the emblems of world-forces which would appear in the last days. But neither of these interpretations is satisfactory. They create more difficulties than they explain. All the conditions of the prophet's description are best met by the assumption of a plain, matter-of-fact agricultural pest.

4. Date: Early?

The historical situation portrayed is so void of the coloring, either of the Assyrian period (c. 800–650 B.C.) or the Babylonian (c. 650–538) that it is necessary to locate Joel's ministry either in the 9th cent. B.C. or in the 4th (possibly later). In favor of the former date, the place of the book in the Canon certainly reflects an ancient opinion that Joel was one of the earlier prophets of Israel, approximately of the same date as Hosea and Amos. All the other considerations, however, adduced for the earlier date are of the nature of efforts to remove difficulties and objections in the way of this view, or to combat the alternative view of a post-exilic date.

In favor of the post-exilic date stand the following considerations: (1) The kingdom of the Ten Tribes is not within the prophet's horizon.

5. Date: Post-Exilic?

Whenever he uses the name Israel, he means Judah (cf. 2 27, 3 2, 16). (2) The people are scattered among the nations (3 2). (3) Jerusalem was not to be molested by strangers any more (3 17); which indicates that at the time of the writing it was, or had been, subject to such molestation. (4) On the other hand, the city was not in the hands of strangers, for the Temple service was in active observance. This is evident from the numerous allusions to priests and sacrifices (1 9, 13, 2 14, 17), which, however, are interrupted, because of the ravages of the locust plague. Even the house of J″ is specifically mentioned (1 14). (5) The walls of the city were either standing, as before the capture by Nebuchadrezzar in 586, or as rebuilt by Nehemiah, preferably the latter (2 9). (6) Although the allusion to the Grecians (3 6) may be a reference to sporadic cases of the subjection of Hebrews to bondage and their sale as slaves, it is not likely that such individual occurrences could have attracted attention and been made the subject of public discussion, except as the Jews came to realize the important menace to their national life in the growth of the Macedonian power. (7) The style and diction of Joel presuppose the earlier prophets. His language is smooth as if the use of centuries had had its effect upon literary expression. It also contains some echoes of the earlier prophets (Am 1 2 = Jl 3 16; Am 9 13 = Jl 3 18; Ob 17 = Jos 2 32; Ezk 47 1 = Jl 3 18). Accordingly, the most recent scholarship is almost unanimous in assigning Joel a post-exilic date (an exception to this is the effort of Baudissin to rehabilitate the earlier date), and most especially the 4th cent. B.C.

6. Religious Thought.

The religious thought of Joel centers very largely around the idea of the visitation of judgment by J″ From this general thesis suggested by the calamity of the locusts, the prophet rises to the portraiture of the Great Day of J″, and in order not to show a special phase of the thought but its full-rounded orb, he dwells on the judgment of the heathen, the redemption of Jerusalem, the outpouring of the Spirit, the fruitfulness of the land, and J″'s taking his residence permanently on Mount Zion.

JOHN (of the Sanhedrin): The John mentioned in Ac 4 6, as being in the gathering of the Sanhedrin hurriedly summoned to take action against the rapid influence among the people of the teachings of the disciples of Jesus. Nothing is known regarding him. Lightfoot's attempt to identify him with the famous Johanan ben Zacchai, president of the Great Synagogue at Jamnia, is not convincing. M. W. J.

JOHN (the father of Simon Peter): The name is variously spelled in different MSS. and VV. In Mt 16 17 the undisputed reading is [Βαρ]ιωνᾶ, rendered Jona (AV) and Jonah (RV). But in Jn 1 43 (ℵ B*L) and in Jn 21 15 ff. (ℵ BD) the best attested reading is Ἰωάννης (Jonas AV). While it is possible, as Chase suggests (HBD, vol. II, p. 677a), that the father of Simon had a double name, Jona-Jochanon or Jona-Johannes, the variation is more likely to be due to the freedom with which Gr. writers rendered the Heb. Yōḥānān. The LXX., e.g., in II K 25 23, has Ἰωνά; in Jer 47 (= ch. 40 in Heb.) 8, Ἰωαννάν; and in II Ch 28 12, Ἰωάνης. Nothing is known of this John beyond his relationship to Simon and Andrew. J. M. T.

JOHN THE APOSTLE (Ἰωάννης): The son of Zebedee (Mk 1 19) and Salome (cf. Mt 27 56 with Mk 15 40), the brother of James, and, with him, cousin of Jesus (see last references), and one of the Apostles (Mk 3 17 and ‖s). The first distinct mention of him is in Jesus' call of the four fishermen at the Sea of Galilee to His discipleship (Mk 1 16-20 and ‖s). His home was most likely in Capernaum, and his family perhaps one of means (see JAMES, 1).

Throughout the Synoptic narrative J. appears as one of the intimate disciples of Jesus (at the raising of Jairus' daughter, Mk 5 37 and ‖s; at the Transfiguration, Mk 9 2 and ‖s; at the agony in Gethsemane, Mk 14 33 and ‖s; with Andrew also, at the last teaching before the Passion, Mk 13 3, and with Peter alone in the preparation for the Last Supper, Lk 22 8), and was doubtless, with his brother, prominent among those whom Jesus chose specially for his service (see JAMES, 1). The name "Boanerges"

(q.v.), referred to by Mark in his list of the Apostles as given to the brothers by Jesus (3 17), was doubtless suggested later by some such incident as that referred to in Lk 9 51 ff., in agreement with which is the spirit of John's action in the case of the man, outside the discipleship, who was casting out demons in Jesus' name (Mk 9 38 f. and ||s). Perhaps it was because of the relationship of these brothers to Jesus and their acknowledged intimacy with Him that their mother requested special honors for them in the coming Messianic Kingdom (Mt 20 20 ff.); though it is not impossible that their impetuous character was largely responsible for the request, if it did not lead them to present it first themselves (cf. Mk 10 35 ff.).

Though J. seems in the Synoptic narrative to have been equally pronounced with his brother in impetuous and ambitious characteristics, he does not appear from the record of Ac to have developed into the same aggressiveness in the propaganda of the new religion; for when Herod laid his persecuting hand on the Church James was the first object of his cruelty. At the same time, he is mentioned with Peter twice in the public life of the Jerusalem Church (the healing of the lame man, Ac ch. 3, with the resultant hearing before the Sanhedrin, ch. 4; and the commission to the newly established community in Samaria, ch. 8), though in each case Peter precedes him in word and action. Furthermore, Paul refers to him in his account of the Council as, along with Peter and James, one of the "pillars" of Jewish Christendom, though his name is the last of the three (Gal 2 9).

If to this record in Ac and the Synoptics there be added the references to himself by the author of the Fourth Gospel as applying to this Apostle, as we believe they do (see JOHN, GOSPEL OF, §§ 2–4), these milder characteristics of the man are more fully brought to light. In this Gospel he is first mentioned in connection with the coming to Jesus of disciples of the Baptist for personal acquaintance (1 35-40). At the close of Jesus' ministry, at the Last Supper, he reclined at the table in front of the Master and, at Peter's suggestion, asked Him who it was that should betray Him (13 23-25). It is he also through whose acquaintance with the high priest Peter was admitted to the court of Caiaphas' house (18 16), and to whom at the cross Jesus committed the care of His mother (19 26). He and Peter were the first of the disciple band to receive the announcement from the women of the open tomb and to investigate the facts (20 1-10). In the closing chapter of the Gospel he figures prominently in Jesus' revelation of Himself at the Sea of Galilee. He was the first to recognize the Master (ver. 7), and received from Him an intimation of the long-continued service he was to render to His cause (vs. 20-23).

The tradition which attaches itself to the name of the Apostle John is considerable in extent. In brief, it gives us to understand that his later life was passed in missionary activity in Ephesus and the surrounding region; that in the persecution of Domitian (81–96 A.D.) he suffered banishment to the island of Patmos, from which exile, on the accession of Nerva (96 A.D.), he returned to Ephesus, where he continued to live and work until his death in the reign of Trajan (98–117 A.D.). The chief witnesses for this tradition are Irenæus, Polycrates of Ephesus, and Clement of Alexandria. In their corroborative support of one another they would appear to furnish us reliable facts. The credibility of their statements has been assailed, however, on the basis that they confuse the Apostle John with another John, known as the Presbyter John, whose existence and importance are claimed to be proved by the statement of Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, in the prologue to his expository work on the Oracles of the Lord, preserved by Eusebius (HE, III, 39). In this statement Papias clearly distinguishes between two Johns, one of whom he classes with the Apostles, Andrew, Peter, Philip, Thomas, James, and Matthew, and the other with the disciple Aristion. That this clear distinction between these same named and yet differently classed men is lost sight of by these other witnesses calls for better proof than has so far been furnished. If it was from Polycarp that Irenæus derived his information as to the Apostle's residence and work in Ephesus, as would seem clear from Adv. Hær. iii, 34, it would seem an almost desperate assertion that he could not have understood whether Polycarp meant the Apostle or the Presbyter John; for whether in the strict sense of the word he was a pupil of Polycarp or not, he lived at the time when Polycarp was carrying on his work and related his experience of his preaching in terms which can not be understood of anything less than an intimate personal knowledge of what he said (cf. Eus. HE, V, 20). As to Polycrates, he was not only Bishop of Ephesus, but was old enough to have been living at the time of Polycarp. When, therefore, in his letter to Victor, Bishop of Rome (Eus. HE, V, 24), he refers for authority as to the Gospel observance of the Passover on the fourteenth day of the month among other witnesses to "John, who was both a witness and a teacher, who reclined upon the bosom of the Lord and being a priest wore the sacerdotal plate," and adds that "he fell asleep at Ephesus," he can hardly be accused of failing to identify this John with the John of Polycarp, or of confusing Polycarp's John with the otherwise unknown Presbyter of Papias. His reference to the priesthood of John may not be clear, but it can not disturb the identity of the John he has in mind. Clement tells of John's residence in Ephesus, where he carried on among the churches a work of episcopal authority (Quis Divis Salv. xlii). That in this statement he referred, after all, to the Presbyter and not to the Apostle seems to be beyond all likelihood. It is indeed somewhat surprising (1) that there is no reference to this Ephesian residence of John by such older fathers as Ignatius and Polycarp, especially by the former in his Epistle to the Ephesians, and (2) that we have a definite statement of Papias presented (a) in the Chronicle of Georgius Harmartolos (9th cent.) and (b) in the Fragment from Philippus Sidetes (5th cent.) to the effect that John suffered martyrdom along with his brother James at the hands of the Jews. That these are possible of explanation, however, and afford no evidence against the common tradition is clear from the argument of Drummond, Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, pp. 214–219, 228–234.

In view of such testimony there does not appear to be justifiable reason for doubting at least the main facts which tradition has handed down as to the later life and activity of the Apostle John. As to the bearing of this tradition on the authorship of the Fourth Gospel see JOHN, GOSPEL OF, § 4.

The material for a consideration of the religious thought of John lies so exclusively within the contents of the Fourth Gospel and the First Epistle that the reader is referred to these articles for its presentation.

(Ἰωάννης ὁ βαπτιστής, Mt 3 1; Ἰ. ὁ βαπτίζων, 'J. the baptizer,' Mk 1 4): The son of the aged priest Zachariah and his wife Elizabeth, and the forerunner of Jesus Christ.

1. The Sources.

The sources on which we are dependent for our knowledge of John the Baptist are: (1) The references to him in the Synoptics, with which we may also place those in Ac; (2) the references in the Fourth Gospel; and (3) the brief account in Josephus. It may be helpful to note at the outset the general character of these somewhat different representations, beginning with the one mentioned last.

In speaking of the defeat of the forces of Herod Antipas by Aretas, King of Arabia Petra, Josephus turns aside to say that some of the Jews looked upon this defeat as a Divine judgment on Herod for his treatment of "John who was called the Baptist, for Herod slew him who was a good man and had commanded the Jews that they should practise virtue, both in respect to righteousness toward one another and piety toward God, and that they should come together in a baptism. For baptism would thus appear acceptable to him, not when they used it as a request for the forgiveness of certain sins, but as a purification of the body after the soul had been thoroughly cleansed by righteousness." And he goes on to say that Herod feared lest John's popularity might lead to some political disturbance and so he thought it best to forestall any such thing by putting John out of the way. He therefore sent him to the castle of Machærus, where he was executed. This notice in Josephus is of great importance, for back of the somewhat vague generalities of the Jewish historian must have been facts substantially the same as we have recorded, more in detail, in the Synoptics. The great popularity of John, the appellation "the Baptist," his insistence upon righteousness, the relatively great importance attached to the rite of baptism, the unrest that might easily flame into political disturbance, the fact that it was Herod Antipas who put John to death—these all constitute chief points in the Synoptic account also. On the other hand, the differences are such as throw the balance in favor of the accuracy of the Synoptics. For Josephus' superficial explanation of the purpose or character of the baptism of John is hardly adequate, and is even inconsistent with the earnest insistence on righteousness he justly ascribes to him. Furthermore, that Herod Antipas put John to death merely to forestall the possibility of his heading a revolution is altogether vague and improbable. Something more definite must have been the reason for Herod's hostility. Whether Josephus knew of Herodias' hatred of John is, of course, not certain. That Josephus either did not know or, if he did know, did not care to say anything about the 'Messianic' element in John's preaching is not at all unlikely.

The references to John in the Synoptics center, in the main, about one point, i.e., the relation of the work of John to that of Jesus. This work is viewed as a preparatory work, to "make ready the way of the Lord." His was thus essentially a prophet's work, and John is viewed as the last of the prophets, the one who closed the succession by ushering in the new Messianic Age. The Synoptic account is fragmentary. Only scraps of what must have been once a large amount of information have been preserved. The broken character of these notices, the disagreement between John's proclamation and the actual course of events that followed it, the remarkable strictures uttered by Jesus on the man He so highly honored—all make strongly in favor of the genuineness of the Synoptic account. The story of John's birth in Lk ch. 1 is not, of course, a part of the common Synoptic tradition. Except to those who are consistently skeptical of nearly everything in the Gospels, there is little, however, in Luke's account of the birth of John that should occasion serious difficulty. The beauty and simplicity of the narrative; the 'Hebraistic' style, indicating that his information was drawn from an Aramaic source; the type of thought, which is that of the pre-Christian Messianic expectations rather than what became current in the Apostolic Age—all tell strongly in favor of the historicity of Luke's account (cf. Plummer in Int. Crit. Com., Luke, p. 6, and see also LUKE, GOSPEL OF).

The references to the Baptist in the Fourth Gospel share the peculiarity of that Gospel's account of the teachings of Jesus. At times it is difficult to draw the line between the words of the Baptist and those of the Evangelist, his reporter (e.g., 3 30 f.), and at others between what the Baptist himself may have said or meant and the interpretation put upon his words by the Evangelist after years of meditation on the significance of John's appearance (e.g., 1 29). To the author of the Fourth Gospel this significance was that of a "witness" (1 8, etc.; cf. 5 33). The baptism of Jesus by John is not expressly alluded to, although such statements as we find in 1 31 f. imply it, and indicate the importance attached to it by the Evangelist. If this Gospel was written by one of the disciples of the Baptist whose "witness" to Jesus led him to that One in whom he found life eternal, it is not surprising that this testimony to Jesus was so important in his eyes.

2. Life of John Previous to His Public Ministry.

The parents of John were of priestly lineage (Lk 1 5) and he was the child of their old age (1 7). Though a priest, Zachariah, his father, had little sympathy with the worldly and corrupt Sadducee class in Jerusalem. His home in the "hill-country" of Judæa (exact location unknown) was characterized by the best type of Jewish piety, in which the ardent hope of the speedy fulfilment of Messianic prophecy was no insignificant element. In this home John passed his childhood. As the son of a priest he must have been well versed in the traditional learning and, especially, well acquainted with the Scriptures. The portentous expectations awakened by his birth were probably not unknown to him, and must have driven him to profound meditation upon the problem of Israel's "salvation" (1 15 ff., 68 ff.). The death of his parents when he was still a youth may have been the occasion of his withdrawal into "the deserts" (1 80) instead of taking up the active work of a priest. In these solitudes he reflected and pondered over the problem of the age, feeding his soul on the sterner aspects of the messages of O T Prophecy, giving less attention to those of a different cast. That he had any direct communications with the Essenes is improbable, though he must have known of them. John was sui generis, he learned his lesson at the feet of no human teacher. His doctrine was formulated by himself in the years of solitary communion with God and the message of Scripture in the wilderness.

3. John's Mission.

At last he broke his silence. Coming forth from his retirement he began to preach (for the date see Chronology of the N T). He came forth, not for self-aggrandizement, not to organize a new sect, or to inaugurate a new political movement, but to proclaim a great message and issue a great summons. It was at "the word of the Lord" that he appeared (Lk 3 3) like one of the prophets of old. Clad in simplest garb, itself suggestive of the prophetic order (Mk 1 6; Mt 3 4; cf. II K 1 8 RVmg.; Zec 13 4), using the plainest speech, with no fear of man before his eyes, his strong, earnest words soon created a profound impression. No such voice had been heard in Israel for centuries. The crowds came from near and far, and the excitement was intense.

And no wonder. For the main burden of John's message was something to which no Israelite could be indifferent. That the long-looked-for era, so often foretold in Prophecy, was at last at hand was a startling message (Mk 1 2 f.; Mt 3 2). But no less startling was the announcement of the way in which this age was to be ushered in. Not by an immediate and glorious victory over Israel's enemies (John was not a zealot), but by a judgment on Israel herself, searching and thorough, in which every unworthy, unrepentant Israelite should be destroyed. So John's message became virtually a great summons to repentance, in view of the speedy appearance of Another, through or by whom the judgment should be executed (Mk 1 7 f.). The moral earnestness of the man is seen in the scathing rebuke he administered to the hypocritical religious authorities (Mt 3 7-10; Lk 3 7-9), and the absence of everything savoring of a merely formal or momentary repentance is seen in the common-sense advice he gave to those who inquired of him "what shall we do?" (Lk 3 10-14). The common people and even those who were viewed as openly sinful were deeply moved and gave a heartier response to John than did the religious leaders (Mk 11 29-33 and ||s; Lk 7 29 f.).

In view of these considerations it is easy to understand the significance of baptism as administered by John. Like all else that John did, this was but a preparatory step. It is called "a baptism of repentance unto remission of sins" (Mk 1 4). Both the repentance and the remission found their reason solely in the expected ushering in of the Kingdom by a great judgment. John called upon all to repent and upon those who repented to confess their sins and lead a better life and to symbolize and seal this new purpose by a baptism. It was all temporary, in the sense that it all looked forward to being completed in or through the new developments to follow. Thus John's baptism, though having the same moral end as Christian baptism, can never be identified with it. So well expressed is this difference in Ac 19 4 that further comment is unnecessary (see also Baptism).

4. John and Jesus.

While John referred most positively to One who was to follow him, he refrained from describing Him except in most general terms. He was "mightier" than he, and His sandals John was not worthy even to unloose; and while John baptized with water, that One was to baptize with the Holy Spirit and with fire (Mk 1 7 f.). The way in which He was to execute the judgment was also described in figurative language (Mt 3 10, 12; Lk 3 17). All this would seem to indicate that John, like the prophets of old, spoke out of a general inspiration which left him free to construct the details of his representation according to his best judgment. Whatever the degree of acquaintanceship between the families of John and Jesus, it is evident, apart from Jn 1 31, 33, that the divergence between the views of John and Jesus makes it impossible that the two could not have met and talked over their respective missions until Jesus presented Himself to John for baptism. Each went through his own peculiar preparatory experience without holding any communication with the other. And yet it can scarcely be doubted that it was John's proclamation that gave Jesus to understand that His time also had come.

The significance for Jesus of His baptism by John is discussed in the article Baptism. Here we consider only the effect of this meeting on John. This seems to have been twofold: (a) On the one hand, John was profoundly impressed by the personality of Jesus. He drew back from Him, instinctively feeling his unworthiness to baptize Him, and in the profound experiences of those few moments John was given to know more of the Divine perfection of that Sinless One than he had known before. It was not the awful visage of a terrible judge that he looked upon then, but of One willing humbly to "fulfil all righteousness," and who was also the beloved Son of God (Mt 3 13-17). This brief interview with Jesus must have suggested to John that some of his conceptions of the appearance of the Coming One needed revision. (b) Consequently, we find, in the second place, that John's view of the Messiah's work underwent some modification. Only thus can we account for his words to his disciples, "Behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world" (Jn 1 29). If we bear in mind that these words were spoken after his meeting with Jesus, the contrast between them and the report in the Synoptics will be less surprising. John had been led by that meeting to reexamine his views of the Messiah and his work. He had built his views on O T prophecy. Had he included all that prophecy taught? What of the great passage on the Suffering Servant in Is ch. 53? The sight of Jesus might easily have led him to ponder over that prophecy, and while still under the spell of that impression he again saw Jesus once or twice and pointed Him out as "the Lamb of God." In the Evangelist's report, the words "that taketh away" (αἴρων; instead of 'beareth,' as in Is) probably belong to him rather than to John. For John could not have had that full light on the person and work of Christ which the Fourth Gospel imparts to him, and still have been subject to the limitations Jesus assigns him (Mt 11 11 =Lk 7 28; cf. Mk 2 18-22), or have sent from prison to ask Jesus whether He were really the One who was to come (Mt 11 7 ff. = Lk 7 24 ff.). Thus the meeting with Jesus and observance of His work had a rather perplexing effect on John. He certainly did not revise at once or altogether his Messianic program, and he could not easily adjust it to the facts as they actually transpired. On the whole, the conviction that the Messiah must sooner or later bring matters to a great crisis and execute the Divine judgment on the sinful nation remained fundamental with John. It was not given to him to see that the fundamental note of the Messianic era was love, not wrath.

5. John's Further Ministry, Imprisonment, and Death.

Thus awaiting some definite, signal manifestation on the part of Jesus, John continued his ministry even after he had baptized Him. He could not see his way clear to lay it down before the judgment had begun. For his bold rebuke of Herod Antipas for his unrighteous union with Herodias, he was imprisoned. According to Mk 6 19 ff. it was Herodias rather than Herod who was angered at John. And it was her relentless hate that at last was gratified by gaining Herod's consent to the execution of the fearless preacher of righteousness (Mk 6 17-29 = Mt 14 3-12). John's influence did not die with him. Some of his disciples betook themselves to Jesus. Others probably sought to perpetuate his work independently of Jesus, and traces of their influence we meet with, twenty-five years later, in Asia Minor (Ac 18 25, 19 1 ff.). A superstitious feeling that John might rise from the dead and reappear, or that he might be reincarnated seems to have been prevalent for a time (Mk 6 14-16; cf. Lk 9 7-9; Mk 8 28 and ||s).

The significance of John can not be a matter of doubt to one who takes Jesus' words as authoritative. He was a prophet, the last and greatest of the prophetic succession under the old dispensation (Mt 11 9, 12; Lk 16 16). His personal righteousness and integrity were unquestioned (Mt 11 7 f. =Lk 7 24 f.). To him was granted an honor greater than ever befell any other man, that of being the forerunner to prepare the way of the Lord (Mt 11 10 f. = Lk 7 27 f.). He was in truth the Elijah who was to come (Mk 9 12 f. = Mt 17 11 f.; Mt 11 14). He was the herald of a new age, through whom many had been stirred up to press into the Kingdom of God (Mt 11 12; Lk 16 16). And yet John did not belong to the new era. Incidentally, the rules of fasting he laid upon his disciples showed this (Mk 2 18-22 and ||s). But it was in his whole view of the Messianic Age, in which judgment, not mercy, was uppermost, and in his altogether one-sided view of the Messiah's work that he was not one of the great ones in the (new) Kingdom of God according to Jesus (Mt 11 11 =Lk 7 28). This was not a judgment on John's personal character, or a dictum regarding his final salvation. It had to do altogether with the value of John's view of the Kingdom. And it was out of His loving wisdom that Jesus sent John's messengers back, not with a categorical answer to his question, but with one well calculated to give John the clue to the truth he was seeking. Three N T writings belonging to the group of the so-called Catholic Epistles (q.v.).

I. First Epistle.

1. Authorship.

The First Epistle, in spite of its anonymous character, is generally recognized as being so similar to the Fourth Gospel in its language and thought as to have been from the same author. If, therefore, the Gospel is from the Apostle John (John, Gospel of, § 2a), the Epistle also is to be considered as from him.

2. Literary Relation to Fourth Gospel.

The fact, however, that the Epistle is not addressed to any one church, or to any particular group of readers, and the peculiar form of its opening verses, in which a reference to the facts of the historical Gospel as in some way underlying the Epistle's message is so evident, raise the question of the literary relation between these two writings of the Apostle.

This question can be answered only by a consideration of the contents of the Epistle and the situation which these contents present.

The Epistle opens with a preliminary statement in which is given the basis of its message, viz.: the historical fact of the Word of life and the Apostle's personal relation to it—a fact already announced to the readers with a view to their spiritual fellowship with him. On the basis of this historical fact the Apostle states his purpose in writing the letter, in order that his joy may be fulfilled (1 1-4).

(a) Contents.

There follows then a summation of the truth heard from the Word of life, viz.: that God is light and is without darkness, with its bearing upon the readers' fellowship with one another, their common relationship to Jesus Christ and to God (1 5-10). This constitutes the introductory part of the Epistles.

The message proper is then begun with a further statement of the purpose of its sending—that the readers may not sin (2 1a), accompanying which is a pastoral reminder of their privileges and obligations in the matter of sin (2 1b-11), bringing the Apostle to a restatement both of the present and of a previous message, from the point of view of the younger and the older classes among his readers (2 12-14).

This is followed by an exhortation against a love of the world, with reasons for the urging (2 15-17) and a statement in general of the fact of Antichrist (2 18-29), accompanied by assurances of the fact of their spiritual life (2 20 f., 29), which brings him to a presentation of the theme of the love of God, exhibited in the Christian's relation of spiritual sonship to Him, with what this relationship involved for the future (3 1 f.) and its practical bearing upon the present life (3 3-12).

This leads the Apostle to a statement and discussion of the main theme of the Epistle, viz.: the love of the brethren. This theme is taken up by calling attention (1) to the naturalness of the world's hatred of the Christian (3 13) and (2) to the evidential nature of a love of the brethren (3 14 f.), with a statement of the necessary reason for the having of such love (3 16) and the necessary inference from its non-possession (3 17), closing with an exhortation to the possessing of it in its reality (3 18), with the reasons which lie in its contribution to an assurance of the spiritual life (3 19-24).

After a short digression (4 1-6), there is given an exhortation to brotherly love, with reasons for the exhorting (4 7-11), followed by a more formal discussion of its bearing upon (1) God's relation to us (4 12-16) and (2) our confidence in the future (4 17 f.), leading to a statement (a) of the reason of such love (4 19), (b) of what it involves in confession of love to God (4 20), and (c) of its basis in the command of God (4 21).

There follows then a discussion of the allied theme of faith in Jesus as the Christ (5 1-12), consisting of a statement (1) of the relation of such belief to spiritual sonship with God (5 1a), together with the consequences which follow as to love of the brethren (5 1b); (2) of the relation which love to God and obedience to His command have to love of the brethren (5 2); (3) of the relation which love to God and faith in Jesus as the Christ have to obedience to God's commands (5 3-5); (4) of the fact of Christ's mission in the world and the witness to it of the Spirit (5 6-8), together with the obligation which rests upon us of receiving such witness (5 9-12).

This brings the Apostle to his conclusion, which consists in a restatement of the purpose of his writing, from the point of view of the readers' assurance of eternal life (5 13), followed by a statement of varied spiritual results which issue from such assurance (5 14-20), closing with an exhortation to the guarding of the spiritual life (5 21).

The situation disclosed by this review of the Epistle's contents is evidently one in which the spiritual life of the readers was in need of stimulating in the direction of its holiness, its brotherly fellowship, and its assurance of the facts which were basal to it. At the same time, it is clear from the polemic tone of certain passages (e.g., 2 18 ff., 3 7 ff., 4 1 ff.) that this need was due to false teachings which were dulling the readers' spiritual perception and leading them into false views of the truth.

(b) Situation.

When we come to study the Epistle closely it is apparent from such passages as 2 20, 4 6-8, 5 13, 19 f., where the question of real spiritual knowledge is claimed, 4 2 (cf. 1 2), where the fact of Christ's coming in the flesh is emphasized, 4 10, 14, 5 10 f. (cf. 2 1 f.), which accent Christ's redemptive functions as Son of God, especially 5 5 f., which claims deity for Christ at His death as well as at His baptism, that the Epistle moved in very much the same Gnostic surroundings as the Gospel[1] (cf. in the Gospel such passages as 14 7-9, 17, 20, 17 3, 25, which assert this spiritual knowing; 1 14, which declares this fact of Christ in the flesh; 6 50-58, 16 15, 17 f., 12 27, 16 28, 32, 17 1, 11, 18 11, which show Christ as Son of God in His death for the world's salvation); cf. the announced purpose of the Gospel's writing (20 30 f.) that the readers might have a more abundant spiritual life through their faith in Jesus as the Son of God.

This similarity in the surroundings is made more evident by the fact that both Gospel and Epistle have in view a tendency among their readers to ignore the commands of God, especially at the point of love—not only to God, but to one another (cf. Gospel 14 15, 21, 23 f., 15 9 f., 12-14, 17-19; Ep 3 7-12, 21-23, 4 20 f.)—a tendency with which we are made familiar in the later stages of Paul's ministry, especially in the Ephesian region (see EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO, § 4).

If then both writings disclose the same general conditions in their surroundings, we have not only an idea of the time and the place of the Epistles' origin (see JOHN, GOSPEL OF, §§ 2b, 2c), but more particularly some hint at the relation which the Epistle sustained to the Gospel; for if, as we have seen, the Epistle takes up these points brought out in the Gospel's presentation of Jesus and develops them in their bearing upon the practical life, then it would seem that the Epistle was written either to introduce to more careful attention the Gospel which was to follow it (Lightfoot), or—which is much more likely—that it was written to follow the Gospel and make effective on these practical lines the historical facts of the Divine Personality which it presented. This would serve to explain the unique beginning of the Epistle, basing as it does the message that follows on the historical facts which already had been announced to the readers.[2] What was the occasion of the Epistle's writing and how soon it followed upon the Gospel, if it was not sent along with it, it is impossible to say. All that seems clear is that the specific message of the Gospel was in the Apostle's mind when he wrote and that it was his purpose to apply its great truths to the practical living of his readers.

(c) Place, Date, and Occasion.

The consideration of this question of relationship between the Epistle and the Gospel gives a special

[1] Cerinthus, whose teaching that only the human Jesus suffered on the Cross seems specially referred to in 5 5 f., as also indirectly in 2 1 f., 4 10, 14, 5 10 f., was a contemporary of the Apostle in Ephesus—also Docetism, which held that the Jesus who appeared on the earth was not possessed of a real physical nature and which is clearly opposed in 1 2, 4 2, 5 20, was an element in Gnostic thinking long before it became a distinct heresy in the teachings of Valentinus (c. 150 A.D.), while the boast of Gnosticism that it alone possessed knowledge of spiritual things, which obviously is denied in 2 20, 4 6-8, 5 13, 19 f., was the fundamental claim of this way of thinking from its beginning. See GNOSTICISM, §§ 4–6.

[2] It is interesting to note the acceptance of some such relationship between these two writings by Schmiedel, who opposes the genuineness of both (Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher, I. Reihe 12, Heft II, 1906, pp. 28–32).

interest to the Epistle's theology. In general, it is apparent that, while the Epistle's thought does not, as the Gospel's, gather around

3. Theology. the personality of Christ, yet it is Christ not simply in His redemptive relations to us but in Himself that forms its background. He is never called the Son of Man, yet not only is the fact of His incarnation asserted (4 2; cf. 1 2), but His nature as the Son of God is constantly kept at the front. It is as the Son that He manifests the eternal life, which was with the Father (1 2; cf. 5 20), so that it is with Him, the Son, as well as with the Father, that we have our spiritual fellowship (1 3, 2 24). It is the confession of Him as Son that constitutes this fellowship (4 15), and it is the denial of the Son, as well as of the Father, that constitutes the Spirit of Antichrist (2 22b, 23). It is thus as Son that He has come into the world in His redemptive mission (4 9 f., 14, 3 8), and through Him as Son that God has given us eternal life (5 10-12). As Son, therefore, He cleanses us from sin through His death (1 7). At the same time, He is the Christ. As such He came into the world and accomplished His mission (5 6). As such He is the propitiation for sin (2 2, 4 10) and the Advocate with the Father in the sinner's behalf (2 1). With Him both as Christ and as Son is our fellowship (5 20). The denial of Him as Christ is, therefore, of the same Antichrist spirit as the denial of Him as Son (2 22 f., 4 2 f.), and belief in Him as Christ is of the same Divine spirit as belief in Him as Son (3 23, 4 2; cf. ver. 15, 5 1; cf. ver. 5). He is termed also in one passage the Word (Λόγος) of life (1 1).

God is represented as Spirit, apprehensible only by the spiritual attitude of life (4 12; cf. 3 23). It is to this spiritual sense that God reveals Himself in His relations to us (4 7 f.). He alone is the true God and the only source of spiritual life (5 20; cf. 2 29, 3 10). He is presented to us as the Father (2 1; 3 1); He is also presented to us under the figure of love (4 8, 16), which is viewed not simply as an attribute, but as an energizing activity, imparting itself to us and in us, not only evidencing our possession of the Divine nature and fellowship (4 7, 12, 16), but perfecting itself in our obedience to God's commands (2 5; cf. vs. 15-17, 3 14), especially in that command which brings us into love of one another (3 23, 4 12). This love has prompted God to send His Son for the saving of the world (4 9 f.) and to bring us into filial relations with Himself (3 1). Further, He is presented under the figure of light (1 5), which is viewed specifically as an energizing activity. In fact, since this statement is presented as summing up the message of the Epistle and since the theme of this message is brotherly love, which is born of the love God has imparted to us, it would seem that this figure of light was an emphatic way of bringing out the energizing power of love, since the characteristic element in light is its pervading, infusing power (cf. Gospel 1 4, 9, 3 20 f., 11 9 f., 12 35 f.; cf. also Lk 11 33-36). This would seem to be evident from the fact that this Divine light is represented as producing practically the same results in us as those produced by love (cf. 1 6 f., 2 8-11, where walking in the light, as a sphere of activity to whose influences we are open, is evidence not only of fellowship with God but of the outgoing of our love in fellowship with one another). So the Holy Spirit is presented as given us by God not only to inform us of truth (as Gospel 14 26, 16 13 f.), but by His energizing within us to produce in us an assurance of our relation to God (3 24, 4 13) and to bring us to a living confession of Christ (4 2). Over against this is the energizing of the spirit of Antichrist (4 3).

As a consequence of all this, eternal life is presented not as a future possession but as a present activity. It is the Christian's present spiritual living. The world lies in the power of the Evil One (5 19; cf. 3 8-10); consequently, sin is not simply unrighteousness (1 9, 3 6 f., 5 17) and lawlessness (3 4), it is also hatred (3 10-13, 15), and darkness (1 6, 2 9-11), and death (3 14), and it can not escape our notice how these qualities of sin are interwoven to make up the general idea of sin as a resultant force, contrasted with the composite resultants of God's Divine energizing in the life of the soul. The forces of sin are gathered up in the term Antichrist, which is not necessarily an individual (in spite of the personal cast of 2 18 f.), but simply the personification of the principles of evil (2 22, 4 3), a persistent yielding to which may result in the hopelessness of spiritual life (5 16 f.). As a remnant of the the old dominant forces of the evil life sin is still in the Christian (1 8-10, 2 1b) but no longer as the habit of life—as such it is impossible in one begotten of God (3 6, 9). Consistently with this idea of the energizing of God in the spiritual life the Christian is the product of the life of God (2 29, 3 9, 4 7, 5 1, 4, 18), and faith is distinctively the overcoming by Him of the evil influences of the world (5 4 f.).

II. Second and Third Epistles.

The point of chief interest in the study of these Epistles is the question of their authorship. They both claim as author one who desig-

4. Writer's Designation of Himself. nates himself "the Elder" (ὁ πρεσβύτερος), the question being who is to be understood by this name.

The likelihood of a satisfactory answer to this question lies naturally along the line of an induction of the contents of these letters though such induction can not promise much because of the restricted form of the writings.

The situation presented by the letters is briefly as follows:

5. Situation. (1) The Second Epistle was written to the mother of a household, certain members of which were walking in the truth, presumably certain others not so walking (ver. 4). It was written to urge three things: (a) The following out of the command already given and known, viz., brotherly love (ver. 5 f.); (b) the careful preserving of faith already possessed and the preventing of its further loss (ver. 8 f.); (c) the non-receiving of false teachers already among them (ver. 10 f.)—all these things being urged until the author might personally come to them and restore their joy (ver. 12). (2) The Third Epistle was written to a certain Gaius, a prominent member, if not an officer, in one of the churches over which the author was in charge. It was written (a) to commend him for his reception of certain brethren who had come to him on their journey (vs. 5-8); (b) to inform him of a letter which they bore from the author to the church, and of a contrary attitude toward himself on the part of a certain Diotrephes, another prominent member, perhaps an officer of the church in question (ver. 9); (c) to announce his plan personally to come and rebuke this attitude (ver. 10); (d) it the meanwhile to warn Gaius against following this example of Diotrephes, and to encourage him in his good conduct until they should see each other (vs. 11, 13, 14).

From this it is clear: (1) That these were purely personal letters. (2) That the II Ep. moves in a surrounding which reminds us of that of the I Ep., which is confirmed by a closer study of the false teachers referred to in the former, showing them to have been (a) of the same Cerinthian class, denying the Divine Sonship of Jesus (vs. 3, 9; cf. I Ep. 4 10, 14, 5 10 f.); (b) of the same Docetic class, denying that Jesus is come in the flesh (ver. 7; cf. I Ep. 4 2 f.); (c) of the same Antinomian class, ignoring the commands of God (vs. 4, 6, 9; cf. I Ep. 3 7-12). (3) That the III Ep. shows the author to be in responsible charge of a certain church, or churches, with confidence enough in his influence to quell by his personal presence ambitious opposition to his authority when absent.

Nothing definite is disclosed in the letters as to the time and place of their composition, though the similarity of conditions between II Ep. and I Ep. would seem to associate them in the Ephesian region and at the time of the labors of the Apostle John.

6. Time and Place.

The persons to whom the letters are sent seem distinctly enough designated, at least in the case of the III Ep.; yet nothing can be determined as to their identity. The phrase of address in the II Ep. ("the elect lady," ἐκλεκτῇ κυρίᾳ) has been variously interpreted, but obviously is nothing more than an indefinite term for the individual to whom the letter is sent.[1] The Gaius of the III Ep. may be any one of those of the same name mentioned in the N T (Ac 19 29, 20 4; I Co 1 14 and Ro 16 23), or may be another person. The name was a common one. The Diotrephes of the III Ep. is mentioned nowhere else in the N T, while the Demetrius is not likely to be identified with the Demetrius of Ac 19 23 ff.

7. Readers.

This all comes to the general result that while the Epistles disclose nothing which definitely decides their authorship, such indications as they give are in the direction of an authorship by the Apostle John. The only question is whether the author's peculiar designation of himself as "the elder" is one which the Apostle could and naturally might in the circumstances of these letters use of himself.

8. Authorship.

In answering this question we must remember that the only testimony we have as to the existence of a so-called Presbyter (Elder) John is that of Papias, and that there is absolutely no proof of his residence and work in Asia and the Ephesian region (cf. Drummond, Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, pp. 194–235, and JOHN, GOSPEL OF, § 3). When we recognize, however, that in Papias' statement the Apostles, including John, as well as this unknown disciple John, are designated elders (πρεσβύτεροι), and when we consider the fact that in the N T this term is not used exclusively in an official sense (cf. Ac 14 23, where it refers evidently to a class of mature men, appointed to the general oversight of the community [cf. I Th 5 12]; I Ti 5 1, where obviously age is meant [cf. Tit 2 2-8]. See APOSTLE), it is clear that the author may have used the term here of himself, as Papias may have used it of the Apostles in his statement, to designate one who belonged to the older generation which was passing away.

Such a term would be quite in accord with the situation presented in these letters. To this Christian mother, in trouble about her household, to this Christian Gaius in the emergency of his church administration, it would give his encouragement and warning a peculiar appeal, through this relationship which he held to the venerated past. If Paul could use a similar term ("the aged," πρεσβύτης) in his personal letter to his friend Philemon (ver. 9), John might with even greater propriety use this term in his personal letters to these friends.

If it be contended (Ebrard, Com. on the Epistles of John, p. 370) that the opposition to the author of the III Ep. is not supposable in the case of an Apostle—the opposition to Paul being based on the fact that he was not one of the Twelve—we must remember that if the situation presented to us in Rev is in any way historical, we have evidences of a hostility to the Apostolic claims of John himself, especially in the case of the Ephesian Church, which make the opposition of Diotrephes perfectly possible (cf. Rev 2 1-3; cf. also 2 8 ff., 18 ff., 3 7 ff.).

These letters came to be fully accepted by the Church only at a relatively late date. For a considerable while they were placed in the class of Antilegomena, and in Jerome's day were generally denied Apostolic origin and assigned to authorship by the Presbyter. The earlier tradition, however, and that held by prominent Fathers such as Irenæus and Clement of Alexandria, was that they came from the Apostle, the Presbyter tradition arising later. This may be accounted for by the fact that as private letters they would be relatively slow in coming to light and when known would be naturally questioned as to their Apostolic credentials, especially as they did not contain an Apostolic name (as Philemon did). This would tend to confirm such doubt as might arise from the slowness of their appearance and formulate it into an assignment of them to the otherwise unknown Presbyter of Papias. The fact, however, that when they first appeared they were held to have come from the Apostle by persons who in those times were the best informed and that this view persisted even when the suspicion regarding them formulated itself into the other view shows that the evidence for the earlier opinion must have been peculiarly strong, while the later opinion is more of the character of a suggestion of ignorance than of a statement of fact.

9. External Evidence.

LITERATURE: Among Introductions, those of Jülicher (Eng. transl. 1904) and Zahn (Eng. transl. 1908) will best present the opposite positions of modern German scholarship. Among Commentaries, the following will be found most helpful: Ebrard (Eng. transl. 1860); Haupt (Eng. transl. 1879); Wolf (1887); Westcott (1886); Huther (1869³); and Weiss (1899) in Meyer Krit.-exeget. Kom. üb. d. N T; Holtzmann in Hand-Com. z. N T (1892). Also art. by Salmond in HDB.

[1] If the term be taken as a mystical designation of the church addressed, it may be that this II Ep. is the letter to the local church referred to in III Ep. ver. 9 (cf. Zahn, Introd., § 71).

The fourth of the N T Gospel Writings, commonly known as the Fourth Gospel, because of its distinctive difference in contents and character from the other three (see GOSPEL, § 3).

This difference has always been recognized, but it was not until the end of the 18th cent., during the Deistic movement in England, that it was made the reason for a definite attack against the Gospel's genuineness (Evanson, 1792)—an attack which was repeated on broader grounds (Eckermann, 1796; Vogel, 1801) during the similar movement in Germany. Though no lasting impression was made by these attacks, hostility against the Gospel was renewed a quarter of a century later (Bretschneider, 1820) with particular emphasis upon the differences in form and contents between the discourses of the Fourth Gospel and those of the Synoptics. Because of the critical uncertainty, if not weakness, with which it was met by the spiritual school of Schleiermacher (1825), this hostility grew until the purely mystical character of the Gospel was asserted (Strauss, 1835) and it was relegated to the category of fanciful productions (Bruno Bauer, 1850).

1. Criticism of the Gospel.

In the meanwhile the Tübingen School (1835) strengthened the unfavorable position in which the Gospel had been placed by returning to the differences which the Gospel presented to the Synoptic narratives and disclosing the historical situation by which they claimed these differences were accounted for. This situation they held to be that of the 2d cent. and the Gospel to be the natural product of the theological controversies of that age.

In proportion as this criticism was positive and constructive it appealed to the judgment of scholars, though its essential ignoring of the field of external evidence opened the way for a vigorous opposition, which was carried on until the fundamental principles of Tübingen criticism in general were shown to be unfounded in fact (Ritschl, 1857) and the reaction against the claims and the conclusions of the School began. In this reaction the Gospel returned to a relatively favorable position, opponents and defenders drawing appreciably nearer together in the admission, on the one side, that much of its material was of actual Apostolic date, if not of Apostolic origin, and, on the other side, that there was a subjective element in the writing which had molded in form and substance much, if not all, of its narrative and its discourses.

Recently, however, this middle position has given way to one of distinct antagonism, the question as to contents being not whether the record is more or less historical, but whether it is actually historical or purely fictional, and the question as to the author being not whether it was the Apostle himself, or one of his disciples or contemporaries, but whether it was a writer of the Apostolic Age or one who lived and wrote after that age had passed away and thus had no personal contact with it whatever. The problem of the Gospel's credibility is thus really before us again in all its significance—enhanced, if anything, by the fact that this Gospel gives us, in a way and to an extent the others do not, the teachings of Jesus with reference to Himself and His relation to the redemption of man. If these have been preserved for us by one who was in personal contact with Him who uttered them, and who gives us the substance of them as they were uttered, they are of importance as material for Christian faith, as they could not be if they are the product of one who lived a century after they were spoken and who fabricated them out of the developed theology of the Church (see GOSPEL, §§ 2, 3).

We come, then, to the disclosures which the Gospel itself makes as to its origin.

It presents to us, in spite of the deeply doctrinal character of its contents, a relatively simple plan of narrative which gathers around a framework of visits to Jerusalem (cf. Sanday, Criticism, p. 117) that extend from the beginning of the ministry to its end, though as will be seen later (note, p. 438, and § 4), all but one occur after the close of the Galilean work.

2. Relation of Contents to Origin of Gospel: Outline.

After the Prologue (1 1-18)—whose opening statements regarding the preexistence of the Logos (1 1 f.), His creative relation to the Universe (1 3), and His spiritually vital and illuminative relations to the soul of man (1 4 f.) are among the most profound utterances of Scripture, and whose following statements regarding the relation of this incarnate Word to the spiritual faith and life of men (1 9-14, 16-18) give an inspiring insight into the thought of all the Gospel—the narrative (1 18–20 31) begins.

It opens with the Baptist's confession to the Jerusalem delegation which came to inquire as to the authority of his work (1 19-28)—a confession prepared for in the Prologue itself (1 6-8, 15) and followed by the Baptist's testimony to his own disciples (1 29-36), which issues in the first disciple adherence to Jesus (vs. 37-51).

This occurring at Jordan, there are then related events which presuppose a return of Jesus and His new-found disciples to Galilee (2 1-12), from which region He makes the first visit of His ministry to Jerusalem (2 13–3 36).

This visit, which is at the time of Passover (2 13), is evidently undertaken in the spirit of reform, the corruptions of the national worship being attacked in the cleansing of the Temple (2 14-16—Evangelist's comment 2 17). It is so understood by the religious leaders of the people (2 18-20—Evangelist's explanation 2 21 f.).

The effect of this opening ministry is then given (2 23—Evangelist's additional remark 2 24 f.), an illustration being added in the visit of Nicodemus (3 1-15—Evangelist's amplification 3 16-21).

From Jerusalem there is a departure of Jesus and His disciples into Judæa (3 22), issuing in a ministry in the neighborhood of the Baptist's work (3 23 f.). A dispute between the Baptist's disciples and the Jews about purifying introduces a further testimony of the Baptist to Jesus (3 25-30—Evangelist's amplification 3 31-36) and leads the way to a statement of the reasons for Jesus' final return again into Galilee (4 1-3—Evangelist's explanation ver. 2). Events on the journey through Samaria are given (4 4-42—Evangelist's explanations ver. 8) and His reception in Galilee (4 43-45) with miracles at Cana and Capernaum (4 46-53—Evangelist's comment 4 54).

There is then narrated a second visit to Jerusalem (ch. 5), the main incident in which is the healing of the impotent man at the Pool of Bethesda (5 2-9—excise vs. 3b, 4), which develops a strenuous opposition on the part of the Jews to Jesus' disregard of the Sabbath laws and an open vindication by Jesus of His position (5 10-47).

Ch. 6 furnishes the one point of detailed contact with the Synoptic narrative, presenting to the readers the feeding of the multitude with which Jesus' Galilean ministry was brought to its close (cf. Mk 6 32-44 and ||s). It gives in addition, however, the subsequent address of Jesus in the synagogue at Capernaum before the crowd which had followed Him back to the other side of the lake (6 25-58—Ev's explanation 6 59), with its effect on the people (6 60-64a—Ev's explanation 6 64b, 65) and on the Twelve (6 66-71—Ev's addition as to effect on Jesus of the hostility of the Jews 7 1).

There then follows Jesus' final departure from Galilee at the time of the Feast of Tabernacles, for His closing ministry in Jerusalem (7 2-10), the state of feeling in the city concerning Him (7 11-13) with His teaching in the Temple and its effect upon the people (7 14-31); the effort of the Pharisees and chief priests to arrest Him, with Jesus' reply and its popular effect (7 32-36), and finally His appeal on the last day of the Feast and its effect (7 37-44—Ev's explanation 7 39), closing with the report of the officers to the Pharisees and chief priests and the effort of Nicodemus to stay action (7 45-53—Ev's explanation 7 50).

Then is given Jesus' further public teaching—probably in connection with this same Feast—with the Pharisaic hostility which it developed and Jesus' escape from the city (8 12-59—excise episode of the woman taken in adultery, 8 1-11), Jesus' return to the city and His healing of the blind man with the hostility it aroused (9 1-38) and Jesus' discourse (9 39–10 21), finally Jesus' presence at the Feast of Dedication, with the Jews' demands on Him for a plain statement of His Messiahship and Jesus' answering discourse (10 22-38), its irritating effect upon the Jews, and Jesus' escape to the other side of the Jordan, followed by a sympathetic multitude (10 39-42).

Ch. 11 presents Jesus' return from the east of the Jordan to Bethany upon announcement of the sickness of Lazarus (11 1-16—Ev's explanation 11 2 and reserving statement ver. 5), whom He raises from the dead (11 17-44), the effect of the miracle upon the Jews who were present (11 45 f.) and upon the Pharisees and chief priests (11 47-53), with the departure of Jesus and His disciples to Ephraim (11 54).

There then is presented Jesus' last visit to Jerusalem—closing the main narrative of the book (11 55–20 31). This large section opens with a statement of the coming Passover Feast, the curiosity of the people, and the command of the Pharisees for Jesus' arrest (11 55-57). Following this come Jesus' arrival at Bethany and the Supper given Him in Lazarus' home (12 1-8—Ev's explanation 12 6 and additional statement 12 9), the council of the Jews against Lazarus (12 10 f.), Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem, with its effect on the Pharisees (12 12-19—Ev's comment 12 16-18), the desire of certain Greeks to see Him, with His remarks, His withdrawal from publicity (12 20-36—Ev's statement as to the persistent unbelief of the Jews, with confirmation from prophecy, 12 37-43), and His further remarks (12 44-50).

This brings the narrative to the Passover Meal of Jesus with His disciples (13 1), which is given in detail, with the preceding controversy among the disciples (13 2-20), the disclosure of the betrayer during its course (13 21-35), and the questions of the disciples (13 36-38), leading up to His consolatory discourse (chs. 14–16), and valedictory prayer (ch. 17).

There then follow the departure of Jesus and His disciples from the room and their arrival in Gethsemane (18 1), with the narrative of the betrayal (18 2-12), the taking of Jesus to Annas (18 13a—Ev's explanation 13b), the trial before Caiaphas (18 19-24), and the presentation of Jesus before Pilate for judgment (18 28), with the details of His examination by that official (18 28–19 12), and the final surrender to the demand of the crowd for His Crucifixion (19 13-16).

This is followed by a narrative of the Crucifixion (19 17-37—Ev's explanation 19 31m and self-testimony vs. 35-37), the burial (19 38-42), and the Resurrection, with its accompanying appearances to the disciples (20 1-29), closing with the Ev's statement as to the motive of the narrative (20 30 f.).

Ch. 21 is added evidently by way of supplement or epilogue, giving an appearance of Jesus to His disciples at the Sea of Tiberias (21 1-6), with its effect upon the disciples (21 7 f.—Ev's explanation 21 7b, 8), the following meal upon the shore (21 9-14—Ev's explanation 21 8m and statement 21 14), Jesus' questions to Peter, with Peter's responses and the commissions given him (21 15-17), and finally Jesus' prophecy regarding Peter, with Peter's query and Jesus' response (21 18-23—Ev's explanation 21 19 and statement 21 28).

This is closed with a formal assurance by those who published the Gospel as to the reliability of the record, with the impression of the writer representing them as to its relation in extent to the whole of Jesus' life (21 24 f.).

When we come to study the material covered by this outline we find at the outset that while the author is not named there is used an expression in referring to one of the disciples which is significant as appearing to be the author's designation of himself ("the disciple whom Jesus loved," 13 23, 19 26, 20 2, 21 7, 20).

Naturally such a phrase turns us to one of the three disciples—Peter, James, and John—who were on terms of intimate fellowship with Jesus. Of these three, however, Peter is excluded, because of his definite naming along with this peculiarly described disciple (13 23 f., 18 15 f., 20 2-10, 21 7, 20-23). James is also excluded because of his early martyrdom (Ac 12 2, 44 A.D.). John alone remains, and while he is not described elsewhere by this phrase, he is found in such companionship with Peter in the Jerusalem Church life (Ac 3 1-11, 4 1-22, 8 14; cf. also Gal 2 9) as would correspond with the companionship of Peter and his peculiarly described disciple in the Gospel narrative (see passages above; cf. also Lk 22 8). Assuming that the Apostle John is thus referred to, is he to be identified with the author of the Gospel? In answer to this question there are certain things which a more detailed study of the Gospel renders quite evident.

(1) Such study shows that whoever the author may have been he was a Jew. The evidence for this is briefly: (a) His familiarity with the situation of Jewish national affairs—e.g., (α) the loss by the Jews of the legal right to put to death (18 31, 19 7); (β) the function of the high priest in the trial of a prisoner (18 19, 24, as compared with 18 13). (b) His familiarity with the Jewish parties—e.g., (α) the party composition of the Sanhedrin (7 45-52); (β) the identification of the chief priests with the Sadducees, as in their subordination to the popular leadership of the Pharisees (passim), and their haughty aristocracy of manner (11 49). (c) His familiarity with Jewish customs—e.g., (α) the minor feasts—as Dedication (10 22; cf. I Mac 4 59); (β) the custom of attending the feasts in Jerusalem (7 2-13), the habit of the Galileans in particular (4 45), as well as the ceremonial details during their observance—as those of the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles (7 37); (γ) the necessity which controlled the Sabbath of the Passover (19 31, 42); (δ) the law of defilement during the feast (18 28) and of purification before the feast (11 55-57); (ε) the marriage customs (2 1 ff.; cf. 3 29) and the manner of burying (11 44, 19 39 f.). (d) His familiarity with ideas and conceptions peculiarly Jewish—e.g., (α) the relations between the Samaritans and the Jews (4 9); (β) the Rabbinic avoidance of conversation with a woman (4 27); (γ) the importance attached to education in the Rabbinic schools (7 15, 49); (δ) the Messianic expectations among the people (ch. 7). (e) The fact that he was acquainted with the Hebrew text sufficiently to correct the LXX. rendering of his quotations by the original reading—e.g., the citation from Zec 12 10 (19 37), and that from Ps 41 9 (13 18). Finally (f) the fact that his style bears a Hebrew stamp and betrays a Hebrew influence—e.g., (α) the repetition of phrase with advancement of thought in 1 1-5, 10 11-16, 15 1-10, 17 2-5, 9 f., 15-17); (β) the parallelism of ideas with contrasted juxtaposition of words in 6 35, 12 44 f., 13 20; (γ) the symbolic tendency of thought in 1 4 f., 5 25, 6 55 f., 12 32, 14 19.

(2) It shows the author was a Palestinian Jew—i.e., a Jew who knew the land through a personal acquaintance which came from living in it. From the frequency and detail of geographical and topographical reference in Mt and Mk, as over against Lk, it would seem that such a characteristic agreed with the Palestinian residence of the first two writers. But this characteristic is more marked in the Fourth Gospel than in either Mt or Mk, and it is often of a peculiarly detailed and descriptive kind—e.g., (a) a distinguishing of places from others of similar name (1 28, 2 1, 11), (b) a definiteness regarding out-of-the way places (3 23, 11 54), (c) a descriptiveness regarding well-known places (4 5 f., 11, 20, 6 19, 22-25), (d) a familiarity of detail regarding Jerusalem and the Temple (2 20, 5 2, 8 20, 10 23, 18 1, 19 13, 41). The significance of these references is evident in the fact that several of them are to places destroyed or lost sight of in the fall of Jerusalem and consequently which could only with difficulty have been known of in the 2d cent.

(3) It shows the author was an eye-witness of the events which he describes. Obviously, in proportion as the foregoing points have to do with the occurrences in Jesus' ministry, the familiarity which they disclose is that which goes most naturally with an actual participation of the narrator in what occurred. Obviously also, as this familiarity discloses itself to be the characteristic of the narrative in general, the inference of personal contact with the events recorded is strongly confirmed. Now, as a matter of fact, Matthew and Mark display this characteristic in their general narrative, as over against Luke, whose versatility would have enabled him easily to crowd his record with the marks of personal participation in its events if he had had it. This participation, however, Matthew did personally have (see MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF, § 1j), while Mark had it through Peter—from whom he got his material and who was one of Jesus' most intimate and perhaps most impressionable disciples. It is interesting, therefore, to note that this familiarity is characteristic of the Fourth Evangelist's narrative to a greater degree than it is even of Matthew's or Mark's. It is not a mere definiteness of statement that is displayed, since this is possible where there has been no personal presence (cf. Mt 4 13, before Matthew's call); much less is it mere length of statement, for this is even more possible without a personal presence (cf. Mt 4 24 f., before Matthew's call); but a familiarity of touch which gives to the narrative a personal cast that most naturally involves a personal contact with the events (cf., e.g., 1 35-52, 4 4-42, 6 1-14, 11 1-46, 19 25-27. Notably in comparison with Synoptic parallels 7 2-10 [cf. Lk 9 51-56], 12 1-8 [cf. Mk 14 3-9; Mt 26 6-13], 13 1-20 [cf. Lk 22 24-30], 18 2-12 [cf. Mk 14 43-52; Mt 26 47-56; Lk 22 47-53]).

This personal cast comes to its finest expression in the passages where the author gives the character of the disciples and some of the followers of Jesus (e.g., Philip, 6 7, 14 8; Thomas, 11 16, 14 5, 20 24-29; Peter, 13 6-9, 20 3-10, 21 3-22 [cf. the bold statement of Mt 14 28-31]; Martha and Mary, 11 20-32, 39, 12 2). There is an intimacy of knowledge in what is said, as though the subjects had been studied not only at close range, but from the view-point of Jesus' own knowledge of them. In fact, there is a frequent appreciation of Jesus' own less evident intimations and allusions and a profound entrance into His action and thought which would most naturally accord not simply with a personal participation in His ministry, but with a peculiar closeness of companionship in all the life he was privileged to live with the Master (cf. 4 34-38, 6 6, 64 f., 71, 11 5, 13 11, 28 f.). If it be said that this, after all, might be the result of a native power of vision into the self of Jesus and of a keenness in the reading of the disciples' character exercised by some spiritual genius a hundred years after the earthly ministry had been finished, the question immediately arises whether such vision and insight would not have been immeasurably more possible under the stimulus of a personal contact with Jesus and His disciples in the actual events which that ministry produced. Altogether the author's narrative has nothing in it of the artificial. The statements of fact are not forced. The reproductions of impressions are not labored. The undesigned way in which they appear bears the stamp of naturalness. The very frankness with which sometimes the impressions of the event are corrected by the better understanding of later years (2 22, 12 16), and the independency with which in essential matters the Synoptic point of view—which by the 2d cent. had attained a position of authority in the Church—is handled (e.g., as to the scene of the ministry, the duration of the ministry, the cleansing of the Temple, the date of the Last Supper, and the Crucifixion) betray a first-hand knowledge of the facts. In view, then, of this indirect testimony as to the eye-witness character of the record, such passages as 19 35, where the author calls upon Christ Himself (ἐκεῖνος; cf. Zahn, Introd., § 65) to witness to the truth of what he says, and 21 24, where those who publish the Gospel indorse the truthfulness of its contents, are most significant. The first is the outpouring of the author's own soul in memory of the closing scene of the great tragedy on Calvary; the other is the deliberate assurance of those who knew him and his personal contact with the history which he gives.[1]

[1] That the Gospel shows signs of editorial work is, of course, to be frankly admitted, in view of such a statement as this in 21 24 f. In fact, it may be that the designation of the author as "the disciple whom Jesus loved" (13 23, 19 26, 20 2, 20) is more likely to have come from those who knew the author's relationship to Jesus than from this self-eliminating author himself; while the Baptist's designation of Jesus as "the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world" (1 29) is so different from his conception of the Coming One as given us in the Synoptics as to suggest a development of his spiritual ideas by others (see JOHN THE BAPTIST, § 4). Obviously, the displaced arrangement of the Gospel's material (e.g., ch. 5 before ch. 6, though directly connected with 7 15-24; 7 1-14 before vs. 15-24, though they stand rightly before vs. 25-36; 7 45-52 after vs. 37-44, though they properly precede them; chs. 15, 16 after 14 31, which is clearly the close of the discourse, instead of after 13 20, or the "Jesus saith" of 13 31; 18 19-24 between vs. 18 and 25, which properly belong together, instead of after ver. 13, to which they clearly relate)—all this displacement is most naturally accounted for by editorial manipulation of the original material (see Burton, Short Introduction to the Gospels, pp. 117-129). Such editing, however, does not affect the bearing of the general material of the Gospel upon its authorship as presented in the foregoing section.

As to the time when the Gospel was written, on the supposition that ch. 21 is by the author, ver. 18 f. would seem to indicate that Peter's death had taken place, while vs. 20-23 would seem to imply that the author's life was well advanced and for that reason the tradition that he was not to die was being revived. On the supposition that ch. 21 is by another hand, or hands, it would have no bearing on the question save that ver. 24 would show by its use of the present tense that the editors were contemporary with the author. Apart, however, from any testimony in this ch. the lateness of the Gospel's writing is evident from the maturity which pervades the Gospel's thought, as seen in the principle which apparently controls the selection of material—e.g., (a) the production of Jesus' profound discourses (chs. 2–8, 10–17), (b) the development of thoughts present germinally in the Synoptics (cf. Mt 11 4-6 with Jn 5 36, 10 25, 38, 14 11, 15 24; Mt 9 15, 26 11 with Jn 13 1-3, 33, 36, 7 34, 8 21, 14 2 f., 12, 19, 28, 16 5, 10, 16, 17 11). But this maturity of the Apostle's thought is due to a lateness in the Apostolic Age; since it is difficult to understand where the reason for such selection would be—even with a mature mind—unless it was in the author's times. His advance upon the synoptists finds its natural explanation in the advance of the thought of the Church, which must have progressed with an advance in the age.

(b) Bearing upon Date.

As to the place of writing, there is nothing in the Gospel to determine it; although from what has been shown as to the lateness of its date it is not likely that it was written in Palestine.

(c) Bearing upon Place.

As to the readers, it is clear from 20 30 f. that they were already Christians — evidently those with whom the author had come in contact in his work and whom he sought by this presentation of Christ's life to win to a more vital faith in Him.

(d) Bearing upon Readers.

As to the purpose of the writing, it is clear the author was not aiming at producing a history; the narrative is too meager for that. Nor did he have in mind the writing of a biography; there are only glimpses of the life which are given to us. His object was religious, as 20 30 f. makes plain and clear. And if it be said that all the synoptists had a similar object (GOSPEL, GOSPELS, §3), it is apparent that the religious object of this Fourth Gospel in a unique way centered itself on bringing out the personality of Christ as it had impressed itself upon the author's own spiritual life—not by a display of His miraculous deeds, for the miracles given are few; nor by a disclosure of the people's enthusiasm for Him, for it is the popular coldness and hostility to Him which characterize the record, but by a presentation of Jesus' own consciousness of His divinely human self. This constitutes the internal evidence. It would seem to establish the identity of the author referred to in § 2a, above.[1]

(e) Bearing upon Purpose.

External evidence is practically at one in ascribing to the Gospel a 1st-cent. origin and an authorship by a John whose contact with the Gospel history is of first-hand character. In fact, it is so clear that by this John external evidence understands the Apostle that such scholars as Drummond (Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, pp. 346–351), Stanton (The Gospels as Historical Documents, pp. 232–238), Sanday (Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, pp. 238–248), Ezra Abbot (The Fourth Gospel, pp. 75 f., 84 f.), and Harnack (Chronologie d. altchrist. Literatur, I, p. 677) on careful and painstaking investigation frankly admit it. This evidence is, in brief, that at the close of the 2d cent. the Gospel was universally accepted throughout the Church as the Apostle John's. From this date its acceptance as John's can be traced back to Irenæus, the significance of whose assignment of it to this source lies in the fact that he was a pupil of Polycarp, who was himself a pupil of the Apostle John (see JOHN THE APOSTLE).[1] At the same time its use, independent of assignment to Apostolic authorship, can be traced to the first decade of the 2d cent., showing it thus to be a product of the Apostolic Age. That external evidence, therefore, unchallenged at the time as it was by those whose every interest would have been to dispute it, confirms the evidence from the Gospel itself as to the identity of the author not only with a John of Jesus' disciple band, but with the John of His Apostolic circle, is too strong to be successfully controverted.

3. External Evidence.

This John external evidence locates at Ephesus, from which place he carried on his later work throughout the surrounding region, until his death in the reign of Trajan (see JOHN THE APOSTLE). The importance of this testimony in connection with the character of the Gospel's contents is obvious; for Western Asia was a field of speculative thought even in the Apostolic Age (see COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE, § 4), and developed along lines which bear significantly upon the so-called philosophical element in the Gospel. This fact has been used, consequently, to show that the Gospel is the product of its environment, and thus, after all, a philosophical treatise, and not a record of historical fact. To this end the Ephesian residence of the Apostle is disputed and the authorship of the Gospel assigned to another John of Ephesus—the Presbyter—with whom it is claimed the Fathers have confused the Apostle, who lived and died in Palestine and who had neither the ability nor the quality which would produce such a speculative work. This is one of the points of the revived attack upon the Gospel to-day (Harnack, Chronologie, I, pp. 675–680; Jülicher, Introduction, pp. 402–429; Schmiedel in EB, II, cols. 2506–2514; see also Wernle, Beginnings of Chris- tianity, II, p. 275). It has secured naturally considerable weight through the confirmation given by the De Boor fragment (Texte und Untersuch., V, 2, pp. 170, 177) to the theory of the Apostle's martyrdom in 44 A.D. (see note 1, col. 1, p. 439). The effort, however, to sweep away the evidence for the Asian residence of the Apostle John must be considered a failure. There is no confusion in the minds of the Fathers as to the John whose life and work in Ephesus they assert. He is clearly the John of the Apostolic circle. In fact, for the residence in Asia of another so-called Presbyter John we have absolutely no proof. (Drummond's Character and Authorship of Fourth Gospel, pp. 194–235.)

[1] For a discussion of the theory that the Apostle was martyred with his brother James in 44 A.D., see Drummond, Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, pp. 228–235, and for a discussion of the theory of Delff, which would supplement it, that the author was a younger disciple attached to the circle of the Twelve, see Sanday, Criticism of Fourth Gospel, pp. 19, 99–108.

[1] In explanation of the failure of Irenæus distinctly to identify this John with the Apostle (Bacon, in Hibbert Journal, April, 1903), see Drummond (Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, pp. 241–245).

It would seem, therefore, that external evidence confirms the conclusions reached from internal evidence that the author of the Gospel was the Apostle John. With all this, however, there remains a very definite and pronounced difference between the Fourth Gospel and the Synoptics. It lies in the contents of the respective Gospels and centers itself in the discourses of Jesus. This has been a point of objection against the Fourth Gospel from the beginning of the criticism of the book and constitutes to-day perhaps the main point of attack upon its credibility. As stated, the objection is not that there is a mere difference between the discourses of Jesus given in the Fourth Gospel and those given in the Synoptics, but that the difference is of such a peculiar kind that the same person could not have delivered both sets of discourses.

4. Objections to the Discourses.

In proof of this position it is held that the Fourth Gospel presents us not simply with a more elevated form of discourse in place of the simple talks of the Synoptics—nor simply with an allegorical form of statement in the place of the parabolic form of the Synoptics, but rather that the Fourth Gospel almost exclusively substitutes Jesus Himself as the subject of the discourses in place of the varied and practical topics of the Synoptic talks (cf. Mt chs. 5–7, 11–13, 18, 20–23, 25; Mk chs. 6, 7, 10, 13; Lk chs. 10–13, 15–18); while it treats this self-subject of Jesus almost exclusively at the point of His Divinity and His relation to the Unseen World (cf. chs. 1–3, 5–8, 10–16).

In considering this objection we must remember that these differences are not absolute. There are traces of Fourth Gospel peculiarities in the Synoptics (cf. Mt 11 25-30; Lk 4 16-30) and traces of Synoptic peculiarities in the Fourth Gospel (cf. 4 35-38); while certain expressions of Jesus have entered commonly into both sets of discourses and entered so naturally as to make it plain that in neither case are they artificial (cf. 2 19 with Mk 14 58, 15 29; 4 44 with Mk 6 4; 6 20 with Mt 14 27; 6 35 with Mt 5 6, etc.).

When, however, apart from these similarities we ask a reason for the differences, the question arises whether they are not accounted for (a) by the difference in the surroundings in which they were delivered, (b) by the difference in the audiences to which they were spoken, and (c) by the difference in the narrators by whom they were reported. Had the Synoptics reported Jesus as delivering to the country folk of Galilee, who were largely loyal to Him, and during the early practical period of His work, when He was gathering around Himself a discipleship from the people, the same sorts of discourses, on the same sorts of themes as the Fourth Gospel reports Him as delivering to the speculative Scribes and Pharisees of Jerusalem, who were largely hostile to Him and during the later theological part of His work, when He came to present His Messianic claims to the leaders of the Nation, the credibility of the Synoptics would have been justly called in question. On the other hand, had the Fourth Gospel reported Him as delivering the same sorts of discourses to the Scribes and Pharisees in Jerusalem, largely at the close of His ministry, as the Synoptics reported Him as delivering to the Galilean peasants at His ministry's beginning, the credibility of the Fourth Gospel would have been more doubted than it is now. In proportion as the discourses of the Synoptics are suited to the people and circumstances of Galilee and the early Galilean work and those of the Fourth Gospel to the people and circumstances of Jerusalem and the later controversial stage of the ministry—in that proportion are both sets of discourses supposable.

This is confirmed by the significant fact that the only discourse delivered outside of Jerusalem and to a Galilean audience so effectually confused and confounded those who heard it that it practically ended Jesus' successful work in this region. Such discourses could not have been delivered to the Galileans from the beginning of the ministry and the ministry have accomplished what it did. This becomes all the more evident when it is remembered that through dislocations of the original order of the Gospel's narrative (see note 1, p. 438, above), among other changes, ch. 5 follows ch. 6—as must be obvious from a study of the connections between these chs. and ch. 7. This change, however, places the discourse of ch. 5 along with the other controversial discourses in the later Jerusalem ministry and adds to the isolated character of the discourse of ch. 6.

If it be claimed, that however illumining this may be, it does not adequately explain the differences in the discourses—that Mt and Lk give a record of the later Jerusalem ministry and yet do not present Jesus as discoursing in the way characteristic of the Fourth Gospel—it is to be remembered that while this is so they do not, on the other hand, present Jesus as speaking in the same way as in His early Galilean work. There is a tone of judgment in Jesus' later discourses as given by them which does not appear in His earlier talks on practical everyday themes.

If it be further queried—on the basis that both kinds of discourses were actually delivered by Jesus in His later work—why should one kind be so markedly confined to the Synoptics and the other kind with equal exclusiveness limited to the Fourth Gospel, it must be remembered that we have to deal not only with differences in surroundings and in audience, but with differences in narrators as well, and that it is not impossible that the Fourth Evangelist saw a different side of Jesus from that which the synoptists saw and in these discourses has given us that different side, which, as a matter of fact, must have disclosed itself in largest measure in Jesus' later ministry. If it be demurred finally that it is unthinkable that a Galilean peasant, such as the son of Zebedee, should have been capable of seeing such a side of Jesus if it did exist, and capable of giving it to us if he saw it, we must not forget that if John belonged to the intimate circle of Jesus' disciples, and if, in this circle, he could be designated as the disciple whom Jesus specially loved, then there must have been in the relation of the disciple to Jesus that personality of acquaintance with the Master which could have formed the foundation of such a knowledge of the deeper and more thoughtful side of Jesus which would have made possible an attention to and a reproduction of just such discourses as this Fourth Gospel characteristically gives. If it is natural for the more pragmatic Matthew and Peter to have caught the more practical side of Jesus' ministry and reproduced it in their narratives, is it beyond all naturalness that the more mystical John could have caught the more thoughtful side of Jesus' ministry and reproduced it in his narrative—especially when the manifestation of that side must have been so largely confined to the later Jerusalem ministry which he makes substantially the contents of his record? Much is and ought to be made of the subjective element disclosed in the author's handling of his material. On this very basis, however, if the Gospel was written when and where tradition places it, the environment of thought and life in which the author found himself must have stimulated him to just such a deeper recollection and profounder presentation of the life which he had witnessed and the personality with which he had come in contact. Such a character as is here presented may not have been created by the philosophical and theological atmosphere of Western Asia at the close of the 1st cent., but the deeper appreciation of it as it had actually shown itself and the more thoughtful disclosure of it as it had come to be appreciated must have been influenced by such surroundings, as they could not have been by the simpler life and thought of the early years of the Apostolic Age. It is, of course, urged that in the criticism of the Epistle to the Hebrews it is claimed that a man like Paul could not possibly have written in such an elevated style and with such strange philosophical ideas as the writer of this Epistle, which is all that is claimed against the Fourth Gospel. This ignores, however, the important fact that the cases are not similar. Paul has given us an established character of style and views in his accepted Epistles. Disagreement with these on the part of the author of Hebrews is so great that there can be no identity of authorship. On the other hand, John has given us no such standard. In fact, we get a picture of the man from the Synoptic history and from the Book of Acts and from acknowledged tradition which shows him to have been in the direction of just such a writing. The question is simply whether he could have grown, not changed, to it. As a matter of fact, the whole problem reduces itself to the query whether it is easier to understand the Apostle as reproducing Christ's own expression of His personality, as he had come spiritually to appreciate it under the pressure of his environment, or as creating this personality itself as a product of his own idealizing through the suggestion of his surroundings. We do not believe we overstate it when we say that the hostility to the Fourth Gospel does not come from an impartial historical criticism of the document as literature, but from a fundamental prejudice to the Divine personality which it presents.

5. The Theology of the Gospel.

I. The thought of the Gospel gathers around the Person of Christ. By this is meant not merely that the Evangelist makes Jesus' discourses the contents of his Gospel, but that Jesus makes the contents of His discourses Himself (see preceding §). This is their characteristic; their subject is the self of Jesus. That personality of whose presence we are so conscious in the Synoptic narrative is presented to us here with a directness and a fulness that have made these discourses the storm-center of the Gospel's criticism. If it can be gathered from the Synoptics that Jesus' consciousness of His self was the source of His consciousness of His Messiahship and created not only the spirit in which, but the view-point from which, all His Messianic work was done, then from these discourses it must be convincingly clear that this self-consciousness of Jesus was the ever-present fact of His life, the eternal conviction in all that He said, and the undying motive and reason in all that He did. Jesus' teaching regarding Himself is thus naturally the heart of the Fourth Gospel's theology (see GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 6).

In this teaching Jesus speaks of Himself in three ways: (1) As the Christ, (2) as the Son of Man, (3) as the Son of God. (1) As the Christ, Jesus came necessarily face to face with the traditional nationalism of the Jews, especially in the later controversial stage of His ministry. Over against their conception of what the Messiah should be stood the spiritual conception with which He informed the title. As Messiah He was not a politieal revolutionist (6 14 f.), not even the king who should fulfil the theocratic ideal (1 41, 49-51); He was the representative of a new spiritual order which, apart from all theocratic conditions, was to establish the will of God in the hearts and lives of men (cf. the talk with the Samaritan woman, leading up to His acknowledgment of Messiahship, 4 7-26). Naturally, therefore, He does not enter into the political debates of the people regarding His Messiahship (ch. 7), nor answer their request for a plain announeement of His Messianic claims (10 24). What He was as Messiah was so far above what they thought the Messiah to be that He could not use the title with any hope of being understood. It is only with the Samaritan woman at the beginning (4 26) and with the disciples at the end (17 3) that the title is assumed; but the conception of the spiritual opposite to their ideas is always present. When we examine this conception we find that Jesus practically identifies it with His conception of Himself as the Son of Man (cf. 7 31-34 with 12 34-36) and as the Son of God (cf. 9 22 with ver. 35; 10 24 with vs. 25-38; cf. also Martha's unrebuked identification, 11 27).

(2) As Son of Man, Jesus came again in confliet with traditional Messianic conceptions, though at a farther remove from popular ideas; for whatever the people may have known of it from its usage in the O T (Dn ch. 7), they had no distinct understanding of it (12 34). Jesus was, therefore, more free to use it and to put into it His consciousness of His relationship to man. As He presents it, this relationship is that of One who had descended from Heaven as His abode (3 13) and was, therefore, to ascend again into Heaven (6 62), and who was thus to establish in Himself communication between Heaven and Earth (1 51). Because of this heavenly origin and consummation, He was the dispenser of eternal life to men (6 27, 33, 51-54) and, at the same time, the executor of judgment among them (5 27). In this mission, however, He was to be lifted up upon the Cross (3 14, 8 28, 12 32), and through this Cross to be glorified (12 23 f., 13 31). This title designates thus the unique character of His personality as the Founder and Head of the Kingdom of God, and in proportion as it resolves into itself the title of Messiah shows His conception of His Messiahship to involve in itself a nature beyond that of man.

(3) This is brought out distinctly in His use of the title Son of God; for through this title Jesus presents His more intimate relationship to God in His origin with God (8 42), whom He knows thus in a primary way (8 55) and whose heavenly glory He possessed before His coming into the world (17 5), in the character of His work as perfectly representing the will of God (5 30, 6 38, 8 29, 46), and thus as perfectly revealing God's truth (8 40-46, 14 6 f., 18 37; cf. 8 26 with vs. 31 f. and 36; cf. 17 4, 6-8 with vs. 14-17), and in the character of His own self, as one with God not only morally (17 21-23), but actually (10 38, 14 9, 11) and essentially (10 30, 17 5). Such a title, whether understood by the people in a Messianic sense or not (1 49; cf. Mt 26 63), was certain to arouse the fiercest resentment from their monotheism (5 18, 8 58 f., 10 30-39), and we might have thought that for this reason it would have been declined by Jesus. Its use is, therefore, all the more significant as showing that, while Jesus avoided the political controversy into which the title of Messiah would have inevitably brought Him, He did not hesitate to face the people with the title which expressed the fundamental claim on which He was conscious the whole character of His work for the salvation of the world depended. At the same time, it is evident that with Jesus these two titles, Son of Man and Son of God, involve much of the same idea. In His discourse at the unnamed Feast (ch. 5) He speaks of His work as the Son, asserting the power which He possessed as Son of God to raise the dead (vs. 25-29) and at the same time the judgment He was to execute as Son of Man (ver. 27). So in His discourse after the feeding of the multitude (ch. 6) He declares that through acceptance of the Son men were to have eternal life and be raised at the last day (ver. 40), and along with this asserts that it is His prerogative as Son of Man to give to men eternal life (ver. 27); in fact, that eternal life and resurrection at the last day are possible only through acceptance of this Son of Man (ver. 53 f.), and that spiritual life is to be found only in His words, who as Son of Man is to ascend where He was before (ver. 62 f.; cf. ver. 68). Again, in the discourse following the Feast of Tabernacles (ch. 8), He speaks of the accord of His words as the Son of Man with what had been taught Him by His Father (ver. 28). It is plain, therefore, that in a real sense His prerogatives as Son of God, His origin as Son of God, His character as Son of God, belong to Him also as Son of Man and so, in fact, as Messiah. In other words, Jesus' whole presentation of Himself rests upon and is derived from the unity of His consciousness of the unique relation which He sustained to God.

When we come to study the Evangelist's own conception of Jesus as apart from Jesus' conception of Himself, we find that, while he does not use the term Son of Man, he speaks of Jesus as the Messiah through whom has come into the world the revelation of God and spiritual life (1 17; cf. ver. 18), and as the Son of God whose origin was with God (13 3) and with whom He is in unique relations (1 18)—involving, according to 1 1-3, 10, a fellowship with God and an instrumentality in His creative activity before the world was—who was commissioned by God to the redemption of the world (3 16 f., 34 f.; cf. 1 9-14), and through whom alone this redemption is possible (3 18, 36). These titles he unites in his declaration of the purpose for which his Gospel was written (20 31).

That he uses such Philonic terms as ὁ λόγος (1 1, 14) and ὁ μονογενής (1 14, 18, 3 16, 18) to express his conception of the person of Christ shows that he is interpreting his idea for the Hellenic world around him. But there is no evidence that this interpretation goes so far as a misrepresentation of Jesus Himself, in which the author struggled unsuccessfully to fuse the actual statements of Jesus with the philosophy of his day (as maintained by Scott, The Fourth Gospel, 1906, ch. xii). For in the first place, it is to be noted that these terms are rigidly excluded from the discourses.[1] They appear only in those passages which represent the Evangelist's own interpretation of this Personality; in fact, they stand conspicuously as the expression of his own ideas. Furthermore, it is clear that the discourses themselves show nothing short of a perfect consistency between Jesus' statements regarding Himself and that fundamental consciousness of His separate relationship to God which He possessed in virtue of a sinlessness it was not possible for humanity to posit of itself, and of functions humanity itself could not exercise. This is all the more significant when we realize that this consciousness is disclosed in the Synoptic record which is claimed as the standard of Jesus' thought and life (see GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 6). This being, then, the teaching of Jesus and of the Evangelist on the doctrine whose presentation is characteristic of the Gospel, the remaining points in its theology can be briefly stated.

II. The idea of God. The statements of Jesus and of the Evangelist regarding the nature of God and His relationship to the world do not differ essentially from the presentation given us by the synoptists. There is the same monotheism (5 44, 17 3), the same Fatherhood—in a general way toward all men (3 16, 4 23), and in a unique way toward Jesus Himself (3 35, 5 20, 10 17, 15 9, 17 24) and through Him toward His disciples (14 23, 16 27, 17 23). His commission of Jesus is the supreme evidence of His love to the world (3 16), which He desires not to condemn but to save (3 17, 5 22), though judgment, in the sense of testing, is essentially involved in the revelation of Jesus' mission (12 47-50). At the same time, God is in His nature Spirit (4 24), and so can be apprehended only by spiritual vision (6 46, 14 9), and, though the giver of spiritual life to the world (5 26, 6 57; cf. 1 12 f.), can in this giving be appropriated only by a spiritual attitude (5 40, 6 37-39, 14 21-23).

III. The idea of the world. As the physical universe, it has come into being through the instrumentality of Jesus in His preexistent relationship with God (1 3, 10); as the world of human life, it was entered by Jesus as its spiritual light (3 19, 8 12, 9 5, 12 35 f., 46); as the human world alienated from God—which is the characteristic idea of the world in this Gospel (8 23, 12 31, 14 17, 30, 17 14, 25, 18 36)—it was the object of God's redeeming love (3 16) and of Jesus' redeeming mission (12 46 f.). Its sin is represented as a darkness, which is complacent with itself and hates to subject itself to the light (3 19-21), is of misleading influence (12 35) and of enslaving power (8 34), is a state and condition of the soul, whose sinful acts are simply manifestations of itself (8 24, 34), and has its source and impersonation in the devil (8 44).

IV. The idea of the Holy Spirit. As distinct in His personality from Jesus (14 16, 26, 15 26, 16 7, 14 f.), He is a teacher of the truth which Jesus Himself revealed (14 26, 16 13 f.) and thus the glorifying witness to Him (15 26, 16 14), dwelling within His disciples and inspiring them to an understanding of His words (14 26) and transforming them in character and life (7 38 f.). In relation to the world, He convicts it of its sin, convincing it of the righteousness of Jesus and bringing it to realize the judgment which rests upon it (16 8-11). The Spirit thus continues Jesus' redemptive work, fostering the spiritual life of the disciples and giving effectiveness to His message of truth to the world.

V. The idea of eternal life. It is a condition of the soul, the opposite of its condemned alienation from God (3 16-21, 36, 10 28). It is made possible by the death of Jesus (3 14 f., 10 10-18, 12 32 f., 15 13), through faith in whom it is made effective (3 16-18, 6 40, 47, 11 25). This faith is a personal relation to Jesus, in which one is united spiritually to Him as the branch is united to the vine (15 1-8). It is called by Jesus a knowing of God and Himself (17 3), which is that conscious attitude of the soul in which it not only spiritually apprehends God, as revealed in Christ, but so opens itself to Christ's incoming that He becomes the ruling power of its life. It is—as is its opposite—a present spiritual state and condition, though—as is also its opposite—it is to be consummated in the future world (6 54).

6. Personality of John.

From the facts of the Apostle's life (see JOHN THE APOSTLE) and from the thought of his Gospel (see preceding §) and of his Epistles (see preceding art., § 3), it is plain that he presents to us a personality which commands our attention.

Such impetuousness as he showed in his early discipleship seems to have been the outcome of a nature whose strength lay in the intensity of its affections. He was not a 'Son of Thunder' in the same way as was his brother. Herod did not find in him the aggressive propagandist he did in James (Ac 12 1 f.); the Master did not find in James the devoted 'son' He did in him (Jn 19 26 f.). The stories told us by tradition of his rushing from the public bath when he knew the heretic Cerinthus was under the same roof, and of his allowing himself to be taken captive by a robber band in order to reclaim a youth whom he had converted and who had fallen again into evil life, if they are to be accepted as true, show, after all, the man of intense emotions rather than the man of aggressive action. This was really at the heart of what in the Gospel story he did with the exorcist (Mk 9 38 f.) and what with his brother he proposed to do with the Samaritans (Lk 9 51-54). From the day of that first acquaintance with Jesus at the Jordan to the morning of the Resurrection Day at the empty tomb, he loved. Peter outran him to the sepulcher and pushed ahead of him into the darkened place, but he was the first to understand and to believe.

The influence of this character upon John's thinking is evident. It is not so much that he has flung his faith against the error with which he was surrounded, but rather that he has taken the greatest truth of that faith—the person of his Lord—and made it his message to his day This it would not have been possible to do had he not first thrown himself into that truth and been mastered by it. John is not speculative in his presentation of Christ. He is not a dialectician like Paul. The words of Jesus, as he heard them in those Gospel days, disclosed to him the unfathomable truth of that Divine life, and he meditated upon them in all the experience of his after-life, but with a profoundness of spiritual vigor he could never have possessed had he surrendered himself less intensely to Him who spoke them. The wondrous vision of that Divine personality burned itself into his soul and he contemplated it, but with the open eye of spiritual strength impossible in one who loved less passionately than did he. John is a mystic, but not a weak one. His thought is strong, because his nature was intense. His truth is profound, because his love of Him who incarnated it and revealed it in Himself was the passion of his life.

LITERATURE: Among Introductions those of Jülicher (Eng. transl. 1904) and Zahn (Eng. transl. 1908) are the best representatives respectively of the liberal and conservative tendencies of modern German scholarship. Perhaps the most complete introductory work on this Gospel representing present English scholarship is Drummond's Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel (1904). Among the Commentaries those of B. Weiss in Meyer's Krit.-exeget. Kom. über d. N T (1902⁹) and Zahn in Kom. z. N T (1908) are conspicuous for their exegetical insight, that of Holtzmann in Hand-Com. z. N T (1891) for its critical refinement. The comprehensive Commentary of Godet (Eng. transl. 1887) is in critical and exegetical protest against the liberal tendencies of his day. The English works of Dods, in Expositor's Greek Test. (1897) and Westcott (1902¹⁴) are scholarly and thorough. Of the New Testament Theologies, including the German works of Weiss (Eng. transl. 1888), Beyschlag (Eng. transl. 1895), and Holtzmann (1897), that of Stevens, in the International Theological Library (1899), is the best. His single work on the Johannine Theology (1894) fails to distinguish in the Gospel between the teaching of Jesus and the conceptions of the Evangelist. Lowrie, The Doctrine of St. John (1899), is most suggestive. Of special critical works those to be recommended are Lightfoot, Essays on Supernatural Religion (1889); Ezra Abbot, External Evidence of the Fourth Gospel (1891); Sanday, The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel (1905); Scott, The Fourth Gospel, in Literature of the New Test. Series (1906); Stanton, The Gospels as Historical Documents (1904); Harnack, Chronologie der Altchrist. Lit. (1897–1904), also article by Reynolds in HDB. The volume of Addresses on the Gospel of St. John, published by the St. John Conference Committee, Providence, R. I., 1905, will be found comprehensive in contents.

According to its place in the O T, counted as one of the twelve minor prophets. But whereas the other books in this group contain for the most part prophetic discourses with just enough narrative material at intervals to show the occasion upon which these were delivered, the Book of Jonah is occupied mainly with a story, and the prophetic message in it is put as briefly as possible.

1. General Nature.

Ch. 1 begins with the account of Jonah's receiving the commission to preach at Nineveh, though what his message was to be is not yet stated (ver. 1 f.). To avoid obedience to this command he takes passage on a ship for Tarshish (ver. 3). On the way a storm imperils the safety of the vessel with all on aboard, and the crew, on the assumption that their danger is due to the anger of the god of some one on the vessel, cast lots to find out who this may be, and Jonah is taken (vs. 4-7). This leads to their ascertaining his identity and the cause of the wrath of his god (vs. 8-10). A consultation on what should be done results in his being cast into the sea; but a monster especially prepared by J" swallows and holds him for three days and three nights (vs. 11-17). Ch. 2 gives the prayer of Jonah "out of the fish's belly." The language of the prayer, however, is that of one who speaks as if surrounded by waters and sea vegetation rather than of one imprisoned in the body of a living monster (vs. 1-10). Ch. 3 tells of the recommissioning of Jonah and specifies his message (vs. 1-4). The people of Nineveh listen to the message, repent and are saved from the destruction predicted by the prophet (vs. 5-10). In ch. 4 Jonah is represented as grieving because his prediction of wrath had not been realized (vs. 1-5). But J" teaches him, through his regret at the withering of a gourd plant grown in the night, that he Himself could not easily consign to perdition such a large city as Nineveh, full of His own living, feeling, creatures (vs. 6-11).

2. Contents.

The identity of the Jonah of this book with the prophet of that name who lived in the days of Jeroboam II (782–740), and predicted the restoration of "the border of Israel from the entrance of Hamath unto the sea of the Arabah" (II K 14 25) can not reasonably be doubted. The question is whether the book was written by this prophet, and designed to be a record of his own experiences or a work of fiction with a moral lesson at the center of it, composed by some anonymous prophet of a much later date. The prophetical teaching of the book will depend on a correct answer to this question.

3. Jonah the Prophet.

One view of the book is that it contains a plain statement of facts. The reasons for this view are primarily the traditional acceptance of the book as true history, as far back as its existence can be traced. References to it are to be found in the Apocrypha (II Es 1 40; To 14 4, 8; III Mac 6 8; cf. also Jos. Ant. IX, 10 2). Moreover, it is to all appearances used in the N T as reliable history. Objections to its historicity drawn from the predominance of the prodigious element in the story are answered by the counter-proposition that similar objections would hold against the acceptance of all accounts of miracles, that there is nothing impossible in the miracles narrated, and that these are indeed on a level with those ascribed to Jonah's earlier contemporaries, Elijah and Elisha, in the Books of Kings.

4. Miraculous Element.

On the other side, it is alleged that the appeal to tradition is ineffective. Tradition expresses the mind of witnesses quite remote from the time of the composition of the book. The earliest point to which it can be traced is at least 200 years short of the latest date assigned to the writing, and more than 600 years after the date claimed by the historical view, and within this period a false conception of it was, in the circumstances, bound to grow. The use of the book as history in the N T is only apparent. The N T does not commit Jesus Christ or its own authors to one or the other of the contending theories. If the understanding of these N T men was that the book is an allegory, a parable, a legendary story, or any other form of fiction, they could not have used it in any other way than they do, and if so, the method of its use does not indicate what their view of it was.

5. Historicity of Contents.

On the use made of the book in the N T, especially by Jesus, it may even be argued that it is inconsistent with the conception of it as a narrative of facts. Jesus refers to the story of the Ninevites as a great moral fact, which would put to confusion the men of His own generation at the Day of Judgment (cf. Lk 11 29 ff.; Mt 12 39 ff.). This, however, is quite different from His considering it historical in the strict sense of the word. For if the repentance had actually occurred, He must have viewed it either as transient or as permanent. He could not have viewed it as transient and deduced from it the argument He did. On the other hand, He could not have viewed it as permanent in face of the silence of the Books of Kings, and the still more significant silence of the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, Nahum, and Zephaniah. He must, therefore, have used the book as a prophecy or, better, as a prophetic parable, in which the repentant Ninevites represent those Gentiles who saw the excellency of the religion of J" (Cf. C. H. H. Wright, Essays, 1886, The Book of Jonah, etc.)

6. N T Does Not Support Historicity.

The grounds upon which criticism builds a conclusion opposed to that of tradition are: (1) The impossibility of harmonizing the contents of the book with the setting within which it must have arisen, if it is to be taken as history. In the days of Jonah, "the son of Ammittai," Nineveh did not possess the magnitude and importance assigned to it in the book. This feature of it is easily understood and appreciated as a skilful, artistic touch in a work of imagination, but it becomes gross misrepresentation if the work is to be judged strictly as history. It is clearly settled from the well-attested evidence in the case that the city of Nineveh was enlarged, embellished, and fortified by Sennacherib (701–687 B.C.), who also made it the capital of his empire. It had indeed served as such before the year 880, when Asshurnazirpal, on ascending the throne, made Calah the seat of government and royal residence. Calah remained the capital between 880 and 701 B.C. Precisely in the days of Jonah, therefore (c. 781–741), Nineveh had fallen into a secondary place. Sennacherib found it "a wretched poor place." No matter how one may interpret the description of it as "an exceeding great city of three days' journey" (Jon 3 3), it is impossible to take the description literally, in view of the testimony of the monuments. (2) The silence of the Hebrew records with reference to such a signal triumph of the religion of J", as the acceptance of it by the king of Assyria, is unaccountable. (3) At the time the book was written the greatness of Nineveh was a thing of the past ("Nineveh was an exceeding great city"). This fixes the date of its production to later than 606 B.C., when Nineveh was destroyed. (4) From ch. 2 it appears that the author was acquainted with and used several of the later Psalms in composing the prayer of Jonah. (5) The character of the language of the book is that of the post-exilic period, not that of the 8th cent. Its affinities relate it with Ezra-Nehemiah. It contains Aramaic elements and the grammatical constructions, which in the O T are found in the latest books (cf. G. A. Smith in Expositor's Bible). (6) The book does not claim to be a work of Jonah, but one about Jonah. If it were by a contemporary, or even by an immediate follower, it might still be regarded as a true account of the prophet's experiences, but since it is a late production, it can only be considered a work in which Jonah figures as the central person of a story. Upon these grounds, especially the affinity with Ezra–Nehemiah in language, and an allusion to Joel, the date of the book is fixed at some year not much earlier than 300 B.C. Its acceptance in the Canon in this case as one of the twelve minor prophets becomes perfectly natural.

7. Positive Proof Against Historicity. Date.

The conclusion to which these considerations point is that the Book of Jonah was produced as a protest against the extreme form of Jewish nationalism in the latter half of the 4th cent. B.C., that in literary form it is an imaginative work with a moral lesson, and that the ancient prophet is chosen as its hero for his known anti-Assyrian bias.

8. Jonah a Parable.

It is no valid objection against this view to say that the prophet Jonah is a historical character and the weaving of his personality into a work of the imagination is improper, for that is precisely what all historical fiction has been doing through the history of literature. The lesson of the story is that J″ is the God not of the Jew only, but also of the Gentile; that He is patient and merciful; that His love extends far beyond the limits of the Jewish world into the remoteness where Nineveh lies; that it includes not only the Ninevites, but the heathen sailors whose prayers He hears; that He cares even for the cattle (4 11). Contrasted with the true breadth of God's love stands the narrowness of Jonah's own view of the heathen world. Rather than carry a message to Nineveh, he tries to escape in an opposite direction. He has no desire to share the favor of God with others, and would even rejoice at their destruction. His attitude of mind, however, is the correct one from the point of view of the later Judaism; for this included, as a counterpart of the exaltation of Israel, the doctrine of the subjection of the nations or their annihilation. Jesus fixed on this as the central theme of the book, and used it as a means toward arousing greater zeal for the Kingdom of God among the Jews of His own day. In one word the lesson of the Book of Jonah is analogous to the foreign-mission idea of developed Christianity.

JONATHAN, jon'a-than (יְהוֹנָתָן, yōnāthān, and יְהוֹנָתָן, yᵉhōnāthān), 'J″ has given,' also Jehonathan:

1. A son of Saul (I S 14 6, 8), and one of the most attractive figures in the early period of the monarchy. He appears first as an officer in his father's army (I S 13 3) during the war with the Philistines, and wins the love of the whole nation through the exploit at Michmash, through which he secured a decisive victory for Israel (I S 14 1 ff.). His friendship for and loyalty to David furnished a theme for one of the most touching passages in Hebrew literature (I S chs. 18–20). The genuineness, disinterestedness, and constancy of this affection were displayed in the way in which he effaced himself in the effort first to save David from his father's jealousy and then to promote his interests. The manly courage of Jonathan led him to lay down his life in the battle of Mount Gilboa, in the hope of saving Israel from the general wreck accompanying Saul's downfall (I S 31 2). David's appreciation of Jonathan's friendship is embodied in a beautiful elegy, composed on the occasion of the latter's death (II S 1 17 ff.). 2. A son of Gershom, therefore a descendant of Moses (Jg 18 30). The AV reading "Manasseh" is based upon a correction of the text by the insertion of an "n" into the Heb. word for Moses, probably to obviate the supposed difficulty of a descendant of Moses becoming the priest of an idol. The old tradition represents him as a Levite engaged to be his priest by Micah in Ephraim, but carried away by the Danites to their city, where he became the founder of a priestly family (Jg ch. 17 f.) 3. A son of Abiathar, the high priest in the time of David (II S 15 27). 4. A son of Shimea, a nephew of David (II S 21 21; in I Ch 27 32, David's uncle RV, but brother's son RVmg.). 5. One of David's heroes (II S 23 32; I Ch 11 34). 6. A son of Uzziah, one of David's treasurers (I Ch 27 25). 7. A son of Jada (I Ch 2 32). 8. The father of Ebed (Ezr 8 6). 9. A son of Asahel (Ezr 10 15). 10. A Levite (II Ch 17 8). 11. A son of Joiada of the house of Jeshua (Neh 12 11). 12. A priest (Neh 12 14). 13. A son of Shemaiah, a Levite (Neh 12 18, 35). 14. A scribe in whose house Jeremiah was imprisoned (Jer 37 15). 15. A son of Kareah, probably same as 14 (Jer 40 8). JOPPA, jop'a (יָפוֹא, yāphō', Gr. Ἰόππη): The modern Jaffa, on the Mediterranean, 34 m. NW. of Jerusalem, the scene of the ancient legend of Andromache and Perseus. It was not conquered by the Israelites, nor mentioned as one of their cities till late (Jos 19 46; II Ch 2 16; Ezr 3 7; Jon 1 3), remaining in the possession of the Philistines, or possibly the Phœnicians, down to the Persian period. After the fall of the Persian Empire, it passed under the control first of the Ptolemies, then of the Seleucids. It was taken by Jonathan the Maccabee in 146 B.C. Six years later Simon, Jonathan's successor, fortified it, enlarged its harbor, and attempted to make it a Jewish town by driving out many of the heathen population and planting therein a strong Jewish colony. Pompey, in 63 B.C., made it a free city, but Cæsar sixteen years later restored it to the Jews. From the time of Herod the Great it formed a part of Judæa and was intensely Jewish in spirit. In the Jewish war of 66 A.D., because of its fanatical opposition, the Romans, under Cestius Gallus, massacred 8,400 of its inhabitants. It recovered, but was reconquered and destroyed soon after by Vespasian. As the only harbor on the Palestinian coast between Egypt and Carmel, Joppa was of great commercial importance, being the one port of Judæa and Jerusalem, just as to-day it is the terminus of the railway from Jerusalem to the Sea. Christianity early found its way to Joppa (Ac 9 36–ch. 10), and in this exclusive Jewish city Peter had his vision with its lesson of the universality of the Gospel. The modern town with a population of about 40,000, built on a rocky ridge and surrounded by fruit gardens, is quite picturesque. R. A. F.

JORDAN, jōr'dan (יַרְדֵּן, yardēn; in prose usually with the article, Gn 13 10, etc.): The great river of Palestine. The name is sup-

1. Name. posed by some to be derived from yāradh, 'to go down,' with the ending ēn for an, i.e., 'the descender' (Olshausen, Heb. Gr. 215 c). Others, however, regard it as a name borrowed from a non-Semitic stock. The ancient derivation given by Jerome (on Mt 16 13), which makes it a compound from y'or and Dan, 'river of Dan,' or 'the river with the two sources, Jor and Dan,' is no longer entertained as probable.

The Jordan springs from four sources in the foothills of Mount Hermon. The first is a small stream,

2. The Sources. Nahr Bareight ('Flea River'); the second, and most northerly, is the modern Nahr el Hasbany, springing out of a basalt cliff on the W. side of the base of Hermon, 12 m. N. of Tell el-Kadi, near Hasbeiya. The third is the Nahr el-Leddan, which issues out of Tell-el-Kadi (the ancient Dan). The fourth is the Nahr Banias, which gushes out of a cavern in a rocky ledge at Cæsarea Philippi (modern Banias). The final confluence of these streams takes place about 5 m. S. of Tell el-Kadi, at which point the course of the Jordan strictly begins.

The entire length of the river is, however, generally reckoned from Hasbeiya to the Dead Sea, and in a straight line measures 135 m., but the

3. General Course. windings of the channel lengthen this line to about 250 m. In its progress it falls 3,000 ft., or an average of 22 ft. to the mile. Its width varies from 80 to 180 ft. and its depth from 5 to 12 ft. except at the fords, where it runs shallower. Beginning at a point on Lake Huleh, it runs below the sea-level through the remainder of its course, the only stream in the world, so far as is known, to do this. Between the Hasbany source, however, and Lake Huleh, it falls nearly 1,200 ft., while from Lake Huleh it drops 690 ft. to the Sea of Galilee (682 ft. below the Sea), and thence another descent of 610 ft. brings it into the Dead Sea, so that at its mouth it is 1,292 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean. Its course is interrupted by the two lakes just named (Merom, or Huleh, and the Sea of Galilee, or Tiberias). This breaks the Valley of the Jordan into three natural divisions.

The northernmost section is known as the Upper Jordan Valley, and runs through a rich grazing

4. The Upper Jordan. district, the plain of Huleh (the Οὐλάθα of Josephus, Ant. XV, 10 3; XVII, 2 1), sinking, however, at its lower end into a morass overgrown with reeds and papyrus rushes, and offering a favorite resort to a large variety of water-fowl.

Four m. S. of Lake Huleh the river strikes a channel running comparatively straight N. and S. with a stony bed and basalt cliffs on each side. Between these the water runs for 10

5. Middle Jordan. m. almost in the form of continuous whirling rapids. It is arrested and slackened by a bar of sediment, entirely the result of its own activity, a short distance from the Sea of Galilee, into which it finds its way. It reappears at the SW. end of the lake, apparently directed toward the W., but soon turns S. and, in spite of many turns, keeps this course until it reaches the Dead Sea.

This portion of the river's course is quite different from either of the preceding. The valley, called el Ghor ('the deep,' in the O T "the

6. Lower Jordan. Arabah"), is 3 m. wide at the N. end, but spreads into a plain 12 m. in width in the neighborhood of Jericho. Within this valley the river has worn out for itself a bed (called Zor) 20 ft. wide at the N. extremity, and 200 ft. at the S. The Ghor is very fertile, and nearest the river banks it becomes a thick jungle, consisting of semitropical vegetation. In modern times these woods furnish a home for wild boars, gazels, and other similar fauna (see PALESTINE, §§ 24-26); but in the ancient period leopards and lions were known to haunt it (Jer 49 19, 50 44; cf. 12 5).

The tributaries of the Jordan from the W. are not significant. They include the Wâdy Feggas, the Wâdy el-Bireh, the Nahr Jalud, the

7. The Tributaries. Wâdy el-Gozeleh (Wâdy Fara), and the Wâdy Kelt (the brook Cherith?). Of these the Jalud, flowing from Beisan, and the Fara, rising near Shechem, are the most important. From the E. the Jordan is fed by the Jarmūk (Nahr Yarmûk) and the Jabbok (Nahr ez-Zerka). Besides these, the Wâdy Jabis, the Wâdy Ajlûn, the Wâdy Nimrin, and the Wâdy el-Kefren also join the Jordan from the E.

The Jordan was the 'great divider' between E. and W. Palestine. It is not, however, the stream itself that constitutes the greatest barrier;

8. The Fords. for to pass from one bank to the other is no serious task, except in times of flood; it is rather the generally precipitous aspect of the banks, with their steep bluffs on each side. The crossing of the Jordan is effected either at certain places where it runs shallower—fords—or over bridges. Of the fords there appear to have been a large number. Five are known to exist between Lake Huleh and the Sea of Galilee, and fifty-four between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. The latter are unequally distributed. Above the juncture with the Jabbok they are numerous; but from that point to Jericho they cease and recur in the neighborhood of Jericho to the number of five. These last are probably those mentioned in Jos 2 7; Jg 3 28. Of these fords perhaps a dozen are passable ordinarily, but they are at the present day known only to those who dwell in their immediate neighborhood. One of the most famous is that of Adama (mod. Tell ed-Damiyeh), believed by some to be the spot at which the hosts of Israel crossed under Joshua (Jos 3 4). Another is Beth-Barah (Jg 7 24; Bethabarah in Jn 3 26; see § 12, below).

In the Biblical period bridges over the Jordan were unknown. The word does not occur in the O T.

9. Bridges. It was only after the Roman conquest that any were built, and of these all the earlier ones have been washed away by the annual floods, some possibly by waterspouts. The ruins of five or six may be seen just below the Sea of Galilee. Three comparatively modern ones are still standing. The Jisr Benat Yakub ('bridge of Jacob's daughters'), between Lake Huleh and the Sea of Galilee, has probably been in existence for 500 years at least. Another is to be found about two hours' ride S. of the Sea of Galilee, and a third at Jericho.

10. Jordan in History. Political Significance. From the nature of the case, it was to be expected that such a feature as the J. should play a very important part in the history of Palestine. Accordingly, it is met at the very beginning as a boundary and division line. As a boundary it figures in Jacob's retrospect of his experiences (Gn 32 10), in the definition of the relations of the nine and one-half tribes to the two and a half (Dt 3 30, 27 4; Nu 34 10-12), and in the prospective view just before the conquest (Jos 1 2). It is also given as the ideal boundary-line of the land by Ezekiel (47 48). But as such it seems, with a single exception, never to have served as the scene of armed conflict. That exception is the case of an attack by Jonathan Maccabæus against the tyrant Bacchides (I Mac 9 45 ff.). Nevertheless, it was always recognized as a natural line of separation between the two sides of the land through which it flowed.

11. Historical Associations. Besides its political meaning, the Jordan providentially acquired also a spiritual significance, through the associations created about it by the great figures of Elijah, Elisha, and John the Baptist. Elijah made his appearance in Israel from some point on the E. side, and when he felt the approaching end of his earthly career (II K 2 7) he turned toward the river. Here, by the wonderful occurrences through which the transmission of his spiritual power and work to his successor was signified, the river seemed to be consecrated to spiritual ends. Elisha's bidding Naaman to wash in the Jordan (II K 5 10) was in perfect harmony with his new and sacramental view of the waters of the river. Whether or not John the Baptist was moved by its associations with the ministry of Elijah and Elisha in selecting it as the scene for his own work, he certainly found in its waters a convenient emblem of the purifying spiritual power of righteousness, which he so emphatically preached.

12. Special Sites. Places specially noted along the Jordan are: (1) the "plain," kikkār, i.e., 'round,' or rather more properly 'oval' (district) (Gn 13 10 f.; I K 7 46; II Ch 4 17; II S 18 23, etc.), which consists of the broad valley spreading out from the confluence with the Jabbok as far S. as the lost cities of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn 19 24, 28, 13 12). The term, however, is especially applied to the environs of Jericho (Dt 34 3; Neh 3 22, 12 28). The name is also used in various senses (cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex.). (2) The name "great valley" is applied in I Mac 5 52 to the region W. of the Jordan, in the vicinity of Bethshean. (3) The scene of the baptism of John is laid at "Bethany (Bethabarah, or Betharabah AV) beyond Jordan" (Jn 1 28, 3 26), a much-disputed site, but as 'ăbhārāh is in II S 19 18 rendered "ferry-boat" ("convoy" mg.) and in II S 15 28, 17 16 "fords of the wilderness" ("plains" AV), the term indicates the existence of a resting-place ('house of the ford') on the E. side, and a suitable locality for John's work. 1. Joseph (יוֹסֵף, yōṣēph), 'may he add' (according to Gn 30 24, but in 30 23 derived apparently from 'āṣaph, 'to take away,' i.e., the reproach of barrenness): The eldest son of Jacob and Rachel. The account of his birth is given briefly in Gn 30 22-24, while Gn chs. 37–50 are occupied with the details of his career.

1. General Characteristics of the Narrative. Of all the patriarchal stories this is the most artistic, its composition showing a high development of the literary faculty. A striking peculiarity of the story is the individuality and marked personality of the hero. The typical element prevails in the case of Abraham, Isaac, and even of Jacob. They are presented as examples of the life of faith, or as expressions of national ideals. But Joseph is many-sided, he is a man whose life displays the noblest traits, not in one direction only, but in all. As his character presented itself to the minds of the narrator and his hearers, there was in it no flaw of passion or prejudice. As slave, prisoner, interpreter of dreams, grand vizier, he passed through every phase of life unscathed and unsullied. Furthermore, the story is remarkable for the vividness of its local color. The dreams have a detail that is unlike anything else in Genesis, the harvest picture (Gn 37 7) and the sheaves forming a circle in the field; the vine with its processes of growth from budding leaf to perfect fruit (Gn 40 10); the white bread different from the common food of the country (Gn 40 16); the sedge of the Nile on which the cattle feed, and the blighting east wind (Gn 41 2-6) are literary touches most lifelike, to which may be added the account of Joseph's preparation to go to Pharaoh (41 14) and his courtly response (41 16), the particulars of his agrarian policy (41 33 ff., 48 ff., 56, 47 13-26), the allusion to the interpreter (42 23), and to the table customs (43 32). Very interesting is the picture of the nomads, entirely out of their element in the cultured life of Egypt, and haunted with the feeling that they are surrounded with strange supernatural powers in the mysterious land of the Nile.

There is no particular Palestinian habitat for the story. Hebron, Shechem, and Dothan (Gn 37 12, 14, 17) are mentioned, but the narrative does not find its locus in any of them. The climactic form is rather that of the novel than of the sanctuary story, told to explain the origin of altar or of cultus. It is a task quite apart to determine the actual historicity of the narrative itself, but to the narrator it is evident that Joseph was as real a character as Samuel, or Saul, or David, and it is probably vain to seek an origin for the main outlines of his story in the migrations and mutations of tribal life.

2. Analysis of the Narrative.

Gn chs. 37–50 have been divided into thirteen sections by a recent commentator (Gunkel). Most of the sections have each its special climax and crisis. (1) Ch. 37. Joseph's preference by his father, his brother's consequent jealousy, his sale into Egypt, and complete disappearance from the homeland. (2) Ch. 38 accomplishes two purposes: first, it serves to intensify the sense of Joseph's loss by the picture of the life in Canaan going on without him. He has vanished completely, and while Judah's story is being told, the mind of the reader is held in suspense. But, secondly, the conduct of Judah and his sons forms a sharp antithesis to Joseph's (ch. 39). (3) Ch. 39 1-20a. Joseph though a slave is in high favor with his master, but at the moment of prosperity the sinful passion of his master's wife is turned to hate by his resistance to her advances, and to the humiliation of slavery is added that of imprisonment. (4) Chs. 39 20b–40. In prison he grows in favor and is able to interpret the dreams of officers near to Pharaoh, but they leave the prison and he is forgotten. (5) Ch. 41. Pharaoh dreams, and when all others have failed to interpret, the butler remembers Joseph, who, as the result, is suddenly exalted to power and influence. (6) Chs. 42–45 24 (sections VI, VII, VIII of Gunkel's division) are better treated as one—Joseph's power and the way he used it. The crisis of the story is reached in these chapters, and two delicate touches appear. First, it is Judah who stirs Joseph so deeply. The two representatives of the great division of the Hebrew race are brought face to face, one as suppliant, the other as superior, yet both are dignified, there is no cringing on the one side nor haughtiness on the other. The one is ready to sacrifice himself for the good of all, the other acts, not from the privileges of his station, but from the impulses of his heart. There seems to be an echo of this in Dt 33 7. It is as if the writer, weary of the division of the two kingdoms, pictured the union that might come through noble self-renunciation wherein neither thought of himself, but only of his brethren's welfare. Again, it is a fine sense of art which makes Joseph conceal his identity until the last. His severe dealings are all in the character of the ruler of Egypt. When he reveals himself, the princely disguise is thrown aside entirely. A less artistic narrator, or a less magnanimous brother, would have terrified the brethren at the outset with the fact that they were in the power of one whom they had cruelly wronged, but no such bitter memory is left to rankle in their hearts. (7) Chs. 45 25–47 12, 27. The journey of Jacob to Egypt and the settlement in Goshen, illustrating Joseph's forethought and care. (8) Ch. 47 13-26. Joseph's agrarian policy, an episode illustrating his statesmanship. (9) Chs. 47 28-31, 48 1-22. Jacob's last will and testament. (10) Chs. 49–50. Jacob's blessing and death. This is really the close of the entire Patriarchal Epos, which begins with Gn ch. 12. (11) Ch. 50 4-26. Jacob's burial and Joseph's death.

3. Critical Analysis.

With the exception of 37 1, 2a, 41 46, 46 6-27, 47 5, 6a, 7-11, 27b, 28, 48 3-6, 49 1a, 28b-33, 50 12, 13, which are extracts from P, and carry along the chronological and genealogical threads of the narrative, chs. 37–50 belong to JE. The documents are closely interwoven and the same essential elements are behind each source. See GENESIS, § 4.

4. Egyptian Analogues.

The "Tale of the Two Brothers" (cf. Petrie, Anc. Egyptian Tales) is frequently cited as the parallel, if not the original, of Gn 39 1-20. It would be difficult to deny the dependence of the one upon the other, though the conclusions of the two are different. Both reflect the same conditions of life, and the Egyptian background is, therefore, consistent and authentic. The gold collar and the garment of byssus (Gn 41 42) were parts of the regular investiture of a high court official. Abrech (q.v.), 'abhrēkh (41 43 mg.), may be the Assyrian word abarakku, the title of a dignitary, such terms readily passing from land to land. The names (Gn 41 45) have been variously identified, but they have an undoubted Egyptian stamp, though they have undergone considerable phonetic change in becoming Hebraized. The famine, whose length is remarkable, finds two or three parallels in Egyptian history, and one which occurred in the XVII dynasty has been by some identified with the Biblical account. The crown ownership of the land, together with the rate of taxation and the exemption of the territory of the priests, recorded and explained (Gn 47 13-26), are well-evidenced economic conditions.

It is difficult to determine under what Pharaoh Joseph flourished. The best evidence locates him at the end of the Hyksos period, perhaps under Apepi II. All such calculations must, however, be received with great caution (see Driver in HDB, art. Joseph).

5. Purpose and Teaching.

The story has been read as if intended merely to glorify the progenitor of the leading tribes of the Northern Kingdom and to answer questions about the origins of tribal life. We need not reject such theories altogether, but we should miss much if we took the tale simply for an attempt to minister to ancestral pride. As in all O T stories the ethical element predominates, but there is more in it than virtue triumphant. Joseph presents a noble ideal of character, remarkable as so many O T representations are, because the features most exalted are those least often seen, such as faithfulness in public and in private, and gentleness where harshness might be condoned, with no trace of rancor for injuries most deep. In the speech of Judah (44 18 ff.) the grand note of self-sacrifice is struck, which glorifies the narrative and reads almost like a foregleam of the Suffering Servant. Of what is called theology there seems to be little, yet that little is like a deep undertone. "How then can I do this great wickedness and sin against God" (39 9), he exclaims in the stress of temptation. And after keeping his brethren in ward for three days he says, "This do and live; for I fear God" (42 18). Such passages reveal the appreciation of the fact that morality is not a convention, but the consequence of a true knowledge of God. The miraculous appears only in dreams and their interpretation, which are narrated as signs that an unseen God is shaping events for His children. The relation of Joseph to God differs much from that of other O T characters; there is a modernness to the picture which is noteworthy, God's dealings being providential and not apparitional (Gn 50 20).

'Joseph' is frequently used to denote the combined tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh or the N. Kingdom as a whole (Gn 49 22 ff.; Dt 33 13 ff.; Nu 1 32; Jos 16 1, 4; Jg 1 22; I Ch 5 1; Ps 78 67, 80 1, 81 5 [Asaphite]; I K 11 28).

6. The Tribe.

An interesting problem is presented by the possibility of early settlements by this tribe in Canaan before the Exodus. The probable occurrence of the place-name Joseph-el in the lists of Thothmes III suggests this, and I Ch 7 21 ff. seems to refer to an old invasion by the way of Philistine territory and to the establishment of Joseph clans on the slopes of the mountains of Ephraim. The early alliance of Gibeon with Israel and the decisive battle of Beth-horon, fought on adjacent territory, the close connection of Joshua with the region, the age-long holdings at Shechem, where the first (Manassite) king held sway (Jg 9 6), and the appropriation by the Northern Kingdom of the name Israel, indicate that Mt. Ephraim was very early a center of national life. 'Joseph' is equivalent to the people as a whole in Ps 80. The Song of Deborah (Jg ch. 5) places the Joseph tribes in the forefront of the muster, while Judah does not appear at all. It must also be noted that of all the twelve sons of Jacob, Joseph alone is given a position in the Genesis narrative alongside of the great fathers of the race. These facts can best be accounted for on the theory that the national life attained in Joseph its highest development and argues strongly for an early and long-continued hegemony of the tribe. In the Blessings of Jacob (Gn 49 22) and of Moses (Dt 33 13 ff.) the chief glories of the Hebrew race are made to cluster around the head of him who was separate from his brethren, and, in spite of all the vicissitudes of the ages, the overthrow and the defeat, the ruthless destruction by foreign invaders, in spite of all attempts to crush and annihilate every vestige of national life, in spite of scorn and repudiation by his brethren to the South, though the archers have sorely grieved him and shot at him and persecuted him, it is at Shechem and upon the heights of Gerizim alone—the hard-won inheritance of Joseph (Gn 48 22)—that the light of early Hebrew faith continues to burn and to shed its poor flickering rays over the mountains and valleys, where dwelt the ten thousands of Ephraim and the thousands of Manasseh (see SAMARITANS; FASTS AND FEASTS, § 7).

soon as Moses died, Joshua took charge of the people and led them across the Jordan.

The story of his public life from this point onward is given in the book that bears his name. In a quick succession of campaigns he attacked and took Jericho and Ai (Jos chs. 1–8). Being then confronted with the alliance of the five kings, which was headed by Adonizedek of Jerusalem, he waged a warfare of conquest against these, and practically broke all opposition to the entrance of the Hebrews into the land (ch. 10). The resistance made by Jabin, King of Hazor, with his allies on the plain beside Lake Merom was not vigorous enough to turn the tide backward (ch. 11). There remained the task of distributing the conquered territory among the tribes of Israel, which occupied Joshua during the remainder of his career (chs. 13–19). Meanwhile he did much to strengthen and complete the worship of J″ and nationalize the religion. But to what extent his activities in this direction reached, and what their success was, the working over of the sources by later hands does not permit us to say. He is represented as closing his career with two impressive addresses, in which he put high ideals of a national life controlled by the religion of J″ before the people, and induced them to establish a covenant upon this basis (ch. 23 f.). In Zechariah's third vision, he was chosen as the representative of the Jewish people, and through the taking off of his filthy garments and the putting on him of clean ones, the expiation of the sins of the people through the sufferings of the Captivity was symbolized. As the representative of the people he also received the announcement of the coming of the Messiah under the name of the Branch (Zec 3 1-8). A. C. Z.

JOSHUA, BOOK OF

1. Name
2. Contents
3. Contents Not Homogeneous
4. Explanation of This Lack of Unity
5. Process of Composition
6. Historical Value

1. Name.

The sixth book of the O T, constituting the last portion of the Hexateuch (q.v.). The book was named from Joshua, the leader of Israel in the conquest of Canaan, narrated in the book, perhaps because he was considered the author of most of its contents. According to the later Jewish scholars, Jos was the first of the four "former Prophets" (Jos, Jg, S, K. See O T CANON, § 8).

2. Contents.

The contents of Jos may be analyzed as follows:

I. THE CROSSING OF THE JORDAN AND ESTABLISHMENT OF THE CAMP AT GILGAL (chs. 1–6)
1. Preparations for the crossing (1 1–3 13)
2. The crossing of the Jordan (3 14–4 18)
3. The camp at Gilgal (4 19–5 12)
4. The capture of Jericho (5 13–6 27)
II. THE CONQUEST OF THE INTERIOR HIGHLAND (chs. 7–12)
1. Conquest of Ai (and Bethel), etc. (7 1–8 29)
2. Law read on Mts. Ebal and Gerizim (8 30-35)
3. Defeat of the confederacy against Gibeon (9 1–10 27)
4. Other conquests in the W. and S. (10 28–43)
5. Defeat of the Canaanites in the N. (11 1-15)
6. Summary of conquests under Joshua (11 16–12 24)
III. THE FIRST ALLOTMENT OF TERRITORY (chs. 13–17)
1. The earlier allotment by Moses to the E. Jordan tribes (ch. 13)
2. The allotment by Eleazar at Gilgal (chs. 14–17)
(1) Of Judah (chs. 14–15)
(2) Of the House of Joseph (chs. 16–17)
IV. THE SECOND ALLOTMENT, AT SHILOH (chs. 18–21)
1. Of seven tribes (chs. 18–19)
2. Of the cities of refuge (ch. 20)
3. Of the Levitical cities (ch. 21)
V. DISMISSAL OF E. JORDAN WARRIORS (ch. 22)
VI. JOSHUA'S LAST DAYS (ch. 23 f.)
1. A farewell address (ch. 23)
2. The farewell address at Shechem (24 1-28)
3. Joshua's death, etc. (24 29-33)

3. Contents Not Homogeneous.

A close examination of Jos will reveal the fact that the narrative is not homogeneous, and is also in some instances inconsistent, either with itself or with statements in other O T books. Some of the more significant inconsistencies may be cited as examples of many others of like character. In 2 15 Rahab's house is on the wall of Jericho, but in 6 22, after the wall has fallen down flat, Joshua sends men into the city to find the house and bring out the woman. In 4 2 ff. twelve stones from Jordan are to be set up as a memorial on the bank (at Gilgal, ver. 19), but in ver. 9 they are set up in the bed of the river. In 8 3 ff. an ambushment of 30,000 men is placed near Ai, while in ver. 12 an ambushment of 5,000 men is placed in exactly the same spot for the same purpose. The section 8 30-35 demands a much longer time and a more complete work of conquest than is suggested in the preceding account. In 10 29-43 J. is represented as completely conquering all S. Canaan, including the towns of Hebron and Debir, but in 14 6 ff. this same region is asked for by Caleb, given to him, and in 15 13 ff. conquered by Caleb as a part of the inheritance of Judah (cf. also Jg 1 2-20). In 13 1-7 J. is an old man, and, the main work of the conquest being over, he is directed to allot the land to the nine and one-half tribes, but in 14 6 ff. the hill-country of Judah is not yet conquered, and in chs. 14–17, instead of nine tribes, only Judah and the house of Joseph get their allotment at this time; 13 1-7 is, therefore, no suitable caption for what follows. In the story of the second allotment (ch. 18 f.) the introductory statement, 18 1-2, has no connection with, nor does it find any explanation in, the preceding narrative. Finally, that two farewell addresses should have been delivered by Joshua (chs. 23 and 24) is in itself remarkable, and the more so when we compare them and find them so different in style and point of view. See also HEXATEUCH, § 20.

4. Explanation of This Lack of Unity.

The only satisfactory explanation of such inconsistencies is to be found in the theory that in Jos several originally separate narratives have been combined into one somewhat incoherent whole. The main thread of the narrative in chs. 1–12 (Div. I and II) is probably that of JE, 1 10-11a, 2 (all but 9b-11 and 24b), 3 1-3, 5 f., 9-10a, 11-14, 17a, 4 1b-7a, 8b, 10b-11, 18, 20, 5 2-3, 9, 13-15, 6 (all but 18-19 and 27), 7 (except ver. 1), 8 (all but 1b-2a, 8b, 27 f., 30-35), 9 3-9a, 11-16, 22 f., 26 f., 10 1-7a, 9-14, 16-24, 26-27, 11 1, 4-9, may with reason be assigned to this source. In chs. 13–24 (Div. III–VI) the later Deuteronomic and Priestly elements predominate, especially the latter. Only 13 1, 7, 13, 15 14-19, 63 (cf. Jg. 1 10-15, 21), 16 1-3, 10 (cf. Jg. 1 29), 17 11-18 (cf. Jg 1 27b), 18 2-6, 8-10a, 19 47, and ch. 24 (except vs. 13 and 31) seem to belong to the ancient JE narrative.

For the passages that seem to have belonged to the Priestly narrative see HEXATEUCH, § 28 (end). The remainder of the material is 'Deuteronomic,' that is, it was written under the influence of the great ideas of Dt in which Israel's history is viewed almost exclusively on its religious side (see DEUTERONOMY, § 6).

5. Process of Composition.

The problem of the process of composition of Jos is a complex one. The following view, it is believed, will be found to satisfy the main conditions. The original combined JE narrative probably included an account of the conquest of Canaan, ending with Joshua's farewell and death (see HEXATEUCH, §§ 12 and 20). In consequence of the combination of JE with Dt, the connection of the material in JE relating to the conquest with the rest became looser. This part of JE was worked over in the spirit of the Deuteronomic school more extensively than were the preceding portions (see HEXATEUCH, § 20). Later, these older portions of the Hexateuch were combined with the Priestly narrative, and either then, or not long after, all this material relating to the conquest was separated from the preceding, resulting in the formation of the Pentateuch (as the Law) and the present Book of Joshua (see HEXATEUCH, § 30).

6. Historical Value.

Notwithstanding the late character of much of its material, Jos contains historical information of the highest value. With Jg ch. 1 the JE portions of Jos give us practically the only connected account we possess of the conquest of Canaan by Israel. While a complete account of the conquest is not given, the main outline of the movement is both clear and self-consistent. It is in the Deuteronomic and Priestly parts that the most glaring historical inconsistencies are found. The Deuteronomic writers failed to remember that the actual work of conquest was difficult and gradual, and accomplished largely by the different tribal elements of Israel, each working out its problem largely by itself; hence the résumé of Joshua's work in 10 28 ff. and ch. 12, so contrary to the older notices in JE, in Jg 1, and in other early accounts. Ch. 23 reveals the "Deuteronomic" point of view perfectly. It was forgotten by both the Deuteronomic and Priestly schools that the work of conquest broke Israel into a number of separate, detached elements, and that the unity under one military leader (Joshua) and one priestly head (the high priest) never really existed. That was an ideal of post-exilic days projected back into the remote past. It is only in the ideals they set forth, not in their actual historical characters, that such elements are of value to the historian of Israel to-day. The geographical notices giving the tribal boundaries and the cities belonging to each tribe (chs. 13–19) contain valuable information on the historical geography of Palestine.

JOSIAH, jo-sai'ā (יֹאשִׁיָּהוּ, yōshiyyāhū), 'J" supports': 1. The son of Amon and Jedidah, the daughter of Adaiah, and king of Judah (638–609). He was raised to the throne at the age of eight, upon the assassination of his father (II K 21 23, 25). It was in the eighteenth year of his reign that his distinctive policy was inaugurated. In that year he sent Shaphan, the scribe, to superintend some repairs in the Temple. While engaged in this work, Shaphan was given a copy of the Law by the high priest, Hilkiah, which the latter said he had found in the Temple. The book was read to the king and by him recognized as the ideal national constitution of Israel. Upon its basis, Josiah instituted thoroughgoing religious reforms, centralizing all the worship of the land in the Jerusalem Temple (II K 22 1-20). It is generally agreed that this book was Dt, but that it was forged for the purpose of furnishing the king with the instrument of his reformation is not to be thought of. It is probable that it had taken form gradually as an ideal around a nucleus of Mosaic prescriptions. But it can hardly be questioned that in Josiah's reformation the Deuteronomic legislation for the first time became operative as the national constitution (see also DEUTERONOMY). In 609 Pharaoh Necho made an invasion into Palestine which Josiah undertook to resist, and in doing so lost his life in the battle of Megiddo. 2. A son of Zephaniah, contemporary of the prophet Zechariah (Zec 6 10). JOTHAM, jō'tham (יוֹתָם, yōthām), 'J" is perfect': 1. The youngest of the seventy sons of Gideon, who alone of all his brothers escaped the murderous designs of Abimelech. Through the parable of the trees selecting the bramble to be their king he warned the Shechemites against Abimelech (Jg 9 5, 7, etc.). 2. A son of Uzziah (Joatham in Mt 1 9) and king of Judah (c. 750–734 B.C.). He began his reign as coregent, when leprosy appeared upon the person of his father (II K 15 5). He is said to have fortified and extended the dominion of Judah over the Ammonites (II Ch 27 3-6), and to have built the upper gate of the Temple. 3. A son of Jehdai (I Ch 2 47). A. C. Z.

It was known to the ancients and medieval Christian writers under the name of the Little Genesis, but having disappeared in the 14th cent., it was forgotten until the middle of the 19th. The missionary Krapf brought an Ethiopic MS. of it to Europe in 1848, which was published by Dillmann. It reproduces the contents of Genesis and of Exodus as far as ch. 14, with many additions and embellishments of a legendary nature. It appears to have been composed by a Pharisee between 100 B.C. and 100 A.D. A. C. Z.

JUDAS, jū'das (Ἰούδας): The Gr. form of the Heb. name Judah, a common one among the Jews (Mt 10 4, 13 55; Lk 6 16, etc.). It was possibly endeared to late Judaism by the heroism of Judas Maccabæus (I Mac 2 4). R. A. F.

JUDAS, THE LORD'S BROTHER: One of the younger sons of Mary, the mother of Jesus (Mk 6 3; Mt 13 55). With his other brothers he evidently misunderstood Jesus until after the Resurrection (Mk 3 31; Jn 7 5, 19 26, 27; Ac 1 14). Later, he seems to have been known in Paul's circle as engaged in the work of the Gospel (I Co 9 5), though never as prominent as his brother James (Gal 2 9, 12; Ac 15 13-21, 21 17-25). If, as may well be, he wrote the Epistle of Jude (q.v.), he shrank from calling himself "the brother of the Lord," desiring to be identified as the brother of the well-known James. Hegesippus says that his grandsons, arrested for claiming descent from David, though they were poor peasants, were scornfully discharged from custody by Domitian. (See BRETHREN OF THE LORD.) R. A. JUDAS BARSABBAS. See BARSABBAS.

JUDAS OF DAMASCUS: The person in whose home the converted Saul of Tarsus was found by Ananias (Ac 9 11). Otherwise unknown. R. A. F.

JUDAS OF GALILEE: So called, though a native of Gamala in Gaulonitis. Together with a Pharisee, Sadduk, he led an agitation against the Roman authority when Quirinius undertook a census for the purpose of taxation—probably in 7 A.D., after the deposition of Archelaus (Ac 5 37). It was essentially a religious movement, based on the belief that God alone was to be their ruler, and from it sprang the Zealots (q.v.), who became a distinctively political party over against the more or less religious sects of Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. Josephus says nothing about the death of Judas and his followers, but his sons perished in later revolts. R. A. F.

JUDAS ISCARIOT, is-car'i-ot

One of the twelve disciples, the betrayer of Jesus. In each of the three lists of the Twelve (Mk 3 19 and ||s) he stands last—a position

1. Origin. suggestive of his tragic failure (cf. Jn 6 70 f.). In the Synoptics he is called "Iscariot," but in the Fourth Gospel his father, Simon, is also so named (6 71, 13 26), and evidently the term means "man of Kerioth." Kerioth is either the modern Karjetan, S. of Hebron, Map II, E 3 (cf. Jos 15 25), or Kuriut, Map III, G 4 (Koreæ, Jos. Ant. XIV, 3 4), on the extreme northeastern border of Judæa. Judas was, perhaps, the only Judæan in the circle.

From Mk 3 14 f.; Jn 6 70, it would seem that Jesus selected those to whom He was to entrust His gospel with the greatest care, but in view of Jn

2. Call. 6 64 the choice of Judas is very perplexing. Attempts have been made to explain it as a conscious submission by Jesus to the Divine plan for effecting His redeeming death, but the Synoptics require a different solution. Judas must have promised well, and Jesus with His insight into character saw that in the Messianic enthusiasm of this Judæan there were great possibilities for good —or evil; and out of His loving heart He took the risk and gave him his chance. If any of the band should prove disloyal, Jesus knew from the beginning who it was that should betray Him. Judas shared all the poverty and hardship of the itinerant discipleship without suspicion on the part of his comrades, for they made him their steward (Jn 12 6).

The crisis was probably brought on through the announcement in Jesus' Capernaum address of the spiritual character of His mission (Jn ch 6) involving the necessity of His death (Mk 8 31). Upon this announcement the enthusiasm of the Galileans died out, and whereas in the other disciples their love for Jesus struggles victoriously with their disappointment, in Judas it settles into demonic hatred (Jn 6 70), and at last utterly ruins his soul (17 12). Possibly the evil showed itself in pilfering from the common fund, and he may have been detected by John, who of all the Evangelists has the most aversion for him (Jn 12 6). The actual betrayal (Mk 14 10 f., 18-21, 42-46; Mt 26 14-16, 21-25, 46-50; Lk 22 3-6, 21-23, 47, 48; Jn 13 2, 10 f., 18 f., 21-30, 18 2-9) presents difficulties, but we infer—(a) Jesus knew that Judas was betraying Him, and Judas was conscious of this knowledge at the Last Supper, which he seems to have left before the Eucharist was instituted; (b) the disciples, shocked at the possibility of such treachery, do not suspect Judas, for Jesus simply says that one of those in table fellowship with Him will betray Him. (c) Avarice was a partial motive (Mt 26 15; Jn 12 6), but Judas also was a tool of Satan (Lk 22 3; Jn 13 2, 27). (d) Judas knew the resort of Jesus and took every precaution to avoid miscarriage of his plans, but at the garden seems to have been disconcerted by the Master's self-possession. It is not quite clear how the kiss of the traitor can be adjusted to the Johannine account.

3. Betrayal of Jesus.

The two narratives of Judas' death (Mt 27 3-10; Ac 1 18 f.) present serious discrepancies, which can only be reconciled with much ingenuity. Mt emphasizes the traitor's remorse, while Ac brings into prominence his fate. The attempt to interpret the conduct of Judas favorably, as, e.g., that he wished to force Jesus to lead a popular movement, is inconsistent with the narratives. His remorse shows that he was not wholly bad. Avarice, desire to save himself since the death of Jesus was inevitable, despair at being involved in a spiritual movement which was issuing in a Messianic fulfilment wholly different from what he had hoped for, intolerance of the constant rebuke of his selfish nature by the penetrating insight of Jesus, all contributed to the awful ruin.

ANALYSIS OF CONTENTS

5. Errors Combated
6. Relation to Other Literature

The Epistle purports to be from "Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James." The writer does not claim to be an apostle (cf. ver. 17). For his identification he thinks it enough to indicate his relation to "James," who must, therefore, be a well-known person, almost certainly the Lord's brother (Mk 6 3; Mt 13 55). The writer, then, is not an ambitious forger, but a man conscious of his own obscurity and content to be known through his greater brother. An early date is indicated by the simple term "James," which in post-apostolic days might not be a sufficient identification. He does not call himself ἀδελφόθεος, as James was called by Theophylact and frequently by the Greek fathers (cf. Suicer's Thesaurus). He knew that so far as regards "the common salvation" he stood in the same relation to Jesus as did other men. Eusebius (HE, iii, 19 f.) quotes from Hegesippus "an ancient tradition" that two of Jude's grandsons, who had survived him, were brought before Domitian (81–96 A.D.), who had been informed that they belonged to the royal house of David and were establishing a kingdom in Palestine. But when the emperor found that they owned but 39 acres of land between them, and when he saw their rustic dress and their hands horny with manual labor, he dismissed them with contempt. This makes it necessary to date the Epistle prior to or early in the reign of Domitian; but it does not justify Professor Bacon's inference (N T Introd. p. 166): "What there is of history relating to Judas is, therefore, unfavorable to the idea that he issued an encyclical in the Greek language to the universal Church, at a time when the warnings of the Apostles were a thing of the past [ver. 17 f.], and the predicted heresies of the last times were, in this writer's judgment, already corrupting the Church." The mention of "the last times" is more appropriate to the Apostolic Age than to any other.

1. Authorship.

Considering the obscurity of the writer and the brevity of the letter, the external attestation is as strong as could reasonably be expected.[1] It is included in the Muratorian Canon ("Epistola sane Judæ et superscriptæ Johannis duæ in catholica habentur," cf. Hilgenfeld, Einleitung, p. 94). It is also included in the Old Latin and the Peshitto versions. Clement of Alexandria in both of his great works (Pæd. iii, 8; Strom. iii, 2) quotes it as Jude's. Tertullian (De Cult. Fem. 1 3) refers to it under the name of Jude. Origen again and again cites it as Jude's and in terms of laudation (see full quotations in Kirchhofer's Quellensammlung, or Charteris' Canonicity).

2. External Attestation.

Though the address mentions no special church or country, and although all salutations are wanting, "yet in itself there is nothing impossible in the theory that it was addressed to a single church, or group of churches" (Jülicher, Introduction, p. 229). Chase thinks it probable that it was addressed to the church of Syrian Antioch. This would agree well with the allusion to "the common salvation," common to the Jewish writer and his Gentile readers.

3. Destination.

This short Epistle consists of only 25 vs., or, if we deduct the address and the conclusion, of only 20.

[1] On the absence of traces of its employment in the sub-apostolic age Von Soden remarks that this "freilich bei seiner Kürze keine Instanz gegen seine Bekanntschaft bilden kann" ("to be sure, in view of its brevity, this can not count for anything against its being known"). Eusebius, though placing it among the Antilegomena, states that it was used in most of the churches (HE, ii, 23). Jerome (De Vir. Ill. 4) ascribes its occasional rejection to its citation of apocryphal books, but says that both by its antiquity and its use it has won a place for itself and is reckoned among the sacred Scriptures.

The address ("to them that are called, beloved in God the Father, and kept for Jesus Christ") is sufficiently general to justify its being classed with the Catholic Epistles. The writer explains that he had intended "to write of our common salvation," but was induced to restrict this purpose to an exhortation "to contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints." In ver. 4 he describes the danger to which his readers were exposed and which caused him anxiety: "Ungodly men, turning the grace of God into lasciviousness," had crept in. The letter describes and denounces these men. In vs. 5-7 three instances of judgment falling upon persons of a similar type are adduced: Israel destroyed in the wilderness, the angels who fell kept in bonds for the judgment of the great day, and Sodom and Gomorrah suffering the punishment of eternal fire. Vs. 8-10 exhibit the similarity in certain particulars: they resemble Sodom in defiling the flesh, the angels in setting at naught dominion, and Israel in railing at dignities; while in ver. 11 fresh analogies are introduced in the persons of Cain, Balaam, and Korah. In the remainder of the Epistle a still more detailed threefold description is given of these immoral persons. The key to the order of this second half of the Epistle (vs. 12-23) is found in its division into three paragraphs, each beginning with οὗτοι εἰσιν, vs. 12, 16, 19, balanced in each instance by the action of the godly party, ἐπροφήτευσεν δέ, ver. 14; ὑμεῖς δέ, ver. 17; ὑμεῖς δέ, ver. 20. This triple arrangement dominates the Epistle to an extraordinary extent.

4. Contents.

Here, then, we have one of the urgent emergencies, which frequently alarmed the leaders of the primitive Church. It is difficult, however, to locate the disturbance. The persons alluded to probably belonged to the class of itinerants mentioned in the Didachē. They had "crept in." They were members of the Christian Church. Otherwise they could not have partaken of the "love-feasts" (ver. 12). Neither could they have been spoken of as "twice-dead"; nor could they have been compared to the angels that fell (ver. 6), or to Israel delivered from Egypt (ver. 5). The comparison to Korah indicates that they had revolted from the recognized ecclesiastical authority, while themselves claiming to be "shepherds" of the people (ver. 12 f.). But, especially, they were immoral and licentious, "sensual," "walking after their ungodly lusts," "defiling the flesh," comparable to the fallen angels and to Sodom and Gomorrah. They were also "mockers," "denying our only Lord and Master Jesus Christ." These characteristics induced Clement of Alexandria to believe that Jude was prophetically alluding to the followers of Carpocrates, who, as he says, would have been an excellent legislator for dogs and swine and goats. Grotius also, influenced by these resemblances, supposes that the Epistle was written not prophetically but directly against the Carpocratians, and ascribes it to Jude, the last Jewish bishop of Jerusalem, and, therefore, in the reign of Hadrian. In this he is followed by Pfleiderer and Holtzmann. But any allusion in the letter to doctrinal teaching must be owned to be very indistinct; and, though Jülicher speaks of "the distinctively Gnostic type of their 'defilements'" (cf. also Von Soden, Hand-Commentar), it is more in accordance with the writer's statements to consider his invective as uttered against some inchoate and undeveloped heresy, which as yet only manifested itself in the common Antinomianism and immorality. Von Soden declines to identify whatever Gnostic teaching may have underlain this immoral outburst with any definite known heretical tendency. And Professor Bacon says (Introduction, p. 169) that "accurate location in time and place of the special Gnostic sect here antagonized is impracticable."

A striking peculiarity of the Epistle is the use it makes of apocalytic literature. Not only is ver. 14 f. quoted from the Book of Enoch 1 9, 5 4 (written before 170 B.C.), but several of the ideas and expressions bear traces of familiarity with other parts of the same composite apocryphon. In ver. 14 Enoch is called "the seventh from Adam," as in Enoch 60 8. The first part of Enoch is entirely occupied with the sin of angels in intercourse with women (Gn 6 1-4), and emphasis is laid on their having left their own habitation, "the high, holy, eternal heaven" (15 3, 7-10), while in Jude (ver. 6) it is also this aspect of their sin which is marked in the words ἀπολιπόντας τὸ ἴδιον οἰκητήριον. Again, their reservation to "the judgment of the great day" (18 14-16, 22 4, 10 5, 12 f.) is spoken of in similar terms in both writings. The contention of the devil with Michael the Archangel for the body of Moses (ver. 9) is also derived from an apocryphal source, the Assumption of Moses. Professor Charles, who dates this apocryphon between 7 and 30 A.D., has collected the allusions to it in Clement, Origen, Didymus, and others. From the fragments thus preserved it would appear that when, on Moses' death, Michael was sent to remove his body, the devil, as lord of the material world, claimed the body as that of a murderer (through his slaying of the Egyptian φονέα . διὰ τὸ πατάξαι τὸν Αἰγύπτιον), thus "blaspheming" Moses. In reply, Michael uttered no railing accusation, but simply said, "The Lord rebuke thee." Even this does not complete the indebtedness of Jude. Along with the Assumption must be reckoned The Testament of Moses, of which a Latin version discovered by Ceriani has been edited by Professor Charles. From this also Jude borrows some of his invective. The "murmurers, complainers" of Jude ver. 16 are the "quærulosi" of the Test. 7 7; they "walk after their lusts and their mouth speaketh great swelling words," representing Test. 7 9, "et manus eorum et mentes immunda tractantes, et os eorum loquetur ingentia"; while "showing respect of persons for the sake of advantage" finds its parallel and source in Test. 5 5, "mirantes personas locupletum et accipientes munera."

6. Relation to Other Literature.

The resemblance is only apparent, not real, between Jude ver. 22 f. and the Didachē 2 7: οὓς μὲν ἐλέγξεις περὶ δὲ ὧν προσεύξῃ, οὓς δὲ ἀγαπήσεις. The relation of Jude to II P is discussed in connection with the latter. See PETER, EPISTLES OF. The influence of Paul is traceable in the use of ἅγιος, ver. 3; κλητός, ver. 1; ψυχικοί, πνεῦμα μὴ ἔχοντες, ver. 19; τῇ πίστει ἐποικοδομοῦντες ἑαυτούς, ver. 20.

LITERATURE: Among Introductions there need only be mentioned those of Jülicher (1904), Zahn (1908), and Bacon (1900). Much may also be learned from Plummer in the Expositor's Bible (1891), and from Bigg, in the Inter. Crit. Com., as well as from Farrar's Early Days of Christianity (1882). Professor Charles's editions of The Book of Enoch (1893); and the Assumption of Moses (1897) should also be consulted. Burton's Bampton Lectures (1829) and Mansel's Gnostic Heresies (1875) give ample details regarding the erroneous teachings of the apostolic and subapostolic ages. Von Soden's three pages of exposition with introduction in the Hand-Commentar (1890) are all that can be desired.

1. Name
2. Contents
3. Unity
4. Composition
5. Chronology
6. Historical Value

The eighth book of the O T. The name "Judges" was given to it because the main portion of the book relates the deeds of leaders who

1. Name. are said to have "judged" Israel. The Heb. term shōphēṭ, translated "judge," must not be understood in an exclusively judicial sense. As used in this book it is practically equivalent to 'ruler.'

The analysis of Jg is simple. The book consists of three main divisions.

2. Contents.

I. A FRAGMENTARY ACCOUNT OF THE CONQUEST OF CANAAN BY THE DIFFERENT TRIBES (1 1–2 5)
  1. The movements of Judah and Simeon (1 1-21)
  2. The conquest of Bethel by the House of Joseph (1 22-26)
  3. The unsubdued Canaanite cities in various tribes (1 27-36)
  4. The rebuke by the angel at Bochim (2 1-6)
II. ISRAEL UNDER THE "JUDGES" (2 6–16 31)
  1. Introductory, giving the religious significance of the history of the judges (2 6–3 6)
  2. The deeds of the judges (3 7–16 31)
III. AN APPENDIX, CONTAINING TWO STORIES OF THE TIMES OF THE JUDGES (chs. 17–21)
  1. The migration of the Danites, and the establishment of the Sanctuary at Dan (chs. 17–18)
  2. The outrage at Gibeah, and the vengeance visited on the tribe of Benjamin (chs. 19–21)

The unity of Jg is only superficial. The three main divisions have no real internal connection. They do not form, taken together, a

3. Unity. progressive, self-consistent narrative. The introductory statement, "And it came to pass after the death of Joshua," prefaces a narrative that deals with events which took place while Joshua was yet alive. Much of the material in ch. 1 is found also in Jos, partly in identically the same words (cf. 1 10-15 with Jos 15 13-19; 1 21 with Jos 15 63), and relating to Joshua and his contemporaries. The question (ver. 1b), "who shall go up for us first against the Canaanites," plainly refers to the beginning of the conquest, and can not be applied to a time after Joshua's death. The next notice of Joshua's death in 2 8 is in perfect order, for there it serves to introduce the history of the age succeeding Joshua. The first words of Jg are then either out of their original place (2 11?), or are merely a late editorial addition to connect the book with the preceding Book of Joshua.

In the second main division a distinct difference is to be observed between the introductory section (2 6–3 6, with the setting, e.g., 3 7 f., 12 f., 4 1, etc., given to the separate stories of the judges) and the stories themselves. The stories themselves say little about the religious situation, but in the long introductory section and in the shorter interspersed comments this is the aspect on which all the emphasis is laid. The stories were, therefore, not composed by the author of the context in which we now find them, but were already at hand and used by him to point out the religious lessons of Israel's early history. The two stories in the third division are likewise in no close logical or chronological connection with the rest of the book. Neither of them relates to the deeds of a judge, and both concern events that were thought to have taken place very soon after the Conquest.

The critical problem presented by Jg is complex. Two features stand out clearly: (1) the abundance of very old material in the book and

4. Composition of Judges. (2) the use made of this material by later writers, who belonged to an entirely different age, and whose main interest was not historical but religious. The oldest material in Jg is to be found in the stories of the deeds of deliverance wrought by heroes of the olden time, and in the poem in ch. 5. Such material was preserved, doubtless, in the various localities where the valiant deeds were performed, and was available for a later collector. In some cases, as the account of Gideon's defeat of the Midianites, the present story may be the result either of weaving together two separate versions of the event, or of the working over of an old narrative by the collector. That fragments of the J and E documents are to be found in Jg chs. 3–21 does not seem probable.

The collector of these stories was interested mainly in the religious significance of Israel's early history. It is a disputed question, however, whether it was he who wrote the introductory passage (2 6–3 6) and the related paragraphs interspersed between the stories. One theory is that there was an early pre-Deuteronomic Book of Judges (to which portions of the stories of Eli and Samuel [in I S] also may have belonged), the work of the collector, who provided the stories with a general introduction and a setting, but whose religious pragmatism was not so pronounced as that of the later Deuteronomic school. This pre-Deuteronomic Judges was then revised by a later writer of the Deuteronomic school, who omitted the Eli and Samuel parts (probably also chs. 9 and 17–21), added the story of Othniel (3 7-11), and worked over the introduction (2 6–3 6) and similar passages, in the spirit of the rigid pragmatism of the Deuteronomic writers. At a still later date this Deuteronomic Judges was enlarged by the addition of 1 1–2 5, and the restoration of chs. 9 and 17–21, thus producing the book in its present form. Another theory (that of Kittel) is that the original collection, made by a writer of the Deuteronomic school (who wrote the introduction and gave the stories their setting) was later revised by another, who put the book in its present form by adding 1 1–2 5 and chs. 17–19, and by revising it slightly here and there.

Either of these theories gives an adequate explanation of the facts discoverable on close study. The second is the more simple and is, in the judgment of the writer of this article, more satisfactory.

5. The Chronology of the Judges.

In Jg the periods covered by the different oppressions, the careers of the various judges, and the eras of peace are given in great detail. The total amounts to 410 years. If we add to this sum the years of the wandering (40), of Joshua's life (30?), of Eli (40), and Samuel (40?), Saul (20?), David (40), we have a total of over 600 years between the Exodus and the building of Solomon's Temple. But this figure is altogether too high. It contradicts the statement in I K 6 1 that the Temple was begun 480 years after the Exodus, which is itself an excessive estimate, probably based on an artificial scheme of twelve 40-year periods from Moses to Solomon. Since the Exodus could not have taken place much before 1250 B.C. and David's accession must be placed circa 1000 B.C., only about 150 years can be assigned to the period of the judges. The simplest solution of the problem is that the stories of the various judges were originally independent of one another and that the judges themselves were really local heroes, whose authority was in most cases limited to the tribe to which they belonged. Many of them were probably contemporaries. It was through the later arrangement of the stories in a chronological succession that the excessively long sum total was obtained. If we assign 50 years to the era of Deborah (including Othniel, Ehud, and Shamgar), 50 more to the era of Gideon (including Abimelech, Tolah, and Jair), and 50 more to the era of Jephthah and Samson (with the rest of the 'minor' judges), we shall have an approximately correct chronological distribution of the material in the book. (See also CHRONOLOGY OF THE O T.)

6. The Historical Value of Judges.

In estimating the historical value of Judges a distinction must be drawn between the statements made by the editors of the old stories and the stories themselves. The editors belonged to the Deuteronomic school and viewed the early history almost entirely from a religious standpoint. The reverses and misfortunes narrated in the old stories were, therefore, interpreted as indisputable evidence of religious defection, which was thus punished by J″, who also in His gracious forbearance took pity and raised up deliverers. That there is a certain amount of truth in this 'pragmatic' view of the history no one would care to deny, but it is nevertheless a late interpretation by writers who failed to see the real character of Israel's early life in Canaan as revealed in the old stories and poems (see HEXATEUCH, § 14 f.). Apart from its Deuteronomic sections Jg must be considered of great historical value. The first part (1 1–2 5) was drawn largely from the old JE history and contains just the information needed to supplement and correct the narrative in Jos (see JOSHUA, §§ 3–5). In the second part (2 6–16 31) the stories of Deborah, Gideon, etc., well reveal the character of the struggles and problems of the pre-kingdom period. The loose tribal organization, the jealousy and strife between different tribes and clans, the great degree of intermixture (both social and religious) with the Canaanites, the conflicts with invading barbarians, the beginnings of the long contest for supremacy with the Philistines (Samson stories) and with the Ammonites (Jephthah story), the generally rude and rough character of the age, and the fundamental religious basis of the unity of Israel (loyalty to J″)—all are well reflected in these ancient stories. The Ode of Deborah in Jg ch. 5 is one of the most important historical documents in the O T. Evidently composed on the occasion of the great victory over Sisera, it gives us a view of the times of the greatest value, both for what it tells us of the conditions in Israel in that day, and for the historical presuppositions as to the preceding Mosaic period. No theory of Israel's early history that is inconsistent with the Ode of Deborah can be accepted as correct. The two stories in the Appendix (chs. 17–21) differ in historical worth. The first one (ch. 17 f.) is full of most reliable and valuable information regarding early religious conditions in Israel. The second story as it stands is less trustworthy. The account in ch. 19 is in the main old and historical. But this was used by a later writer as a basis for a narrative, which is artificial and contains many historical improbabilities. While some early disaster may have befallen Benjamin, and while very probably the maidens of Shiloh were accustomed to dance at the annual feast of J″, the main narrative, which thinks of all the tribes of Israel as acting in that early period as a religious unit, is contradicted by all that we know of those times, which were characterized by anything but unity.

JUDGMENT. See ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 29, 36, 39, 41, 46–49.

JUDGMENT HALL. See PRÆTORIUM.

JUDGMENT SEAT: In ancient Israel the judge was accustomed to sit in giving judgment (Ex 18 13), and the royal throne was preeminently a seat of judgment (I K 7 7; Is 16 5; Pr 20 8). It was thus natural that J″'s throne should be thought of as a judgment seat (Ps 9 7; Jl 3 12; Dn 7 9 ff.). The N T speaks not only of the throne of God (Rev chs 4–5, etc.), but of the judgment seat of Christ (Ro 14 10; II Co 5 10) as the bar before which all men must appear (cf. Mt 25 31). In a figurative sense, Jesus told His disciples that they also should sit on thrones to judge Israel (Mt 19 28; Lk 22 30).

The term βῆμα is used in a strictly technical sense in Mt 27 19; Jn 19 13; Ac 18 12-17, etc., of the judgment seat of the Roman governor, and in Ac 25 19 of the tribunal of the emperor himself at Rome.

JUDITH, BOOK OF: One of the O T Apocrypha. It is a romance written with the purpose of encouraging the people in their fidelity to the God of Israel, and stimulating them to a careful observance of the precepts of the Law. Under names that belong to a much earlier time than that from which the book dates, it veils situations which are the reasons for its religious exhortations. There is a difference of opinion among scholars as to just the time of the situations thus veiled, whether they belong to the period of the approach of Pompey to Jerusalem (Gaster), or to the days of Trajan (Volkmar), or to the Maccabæan era (Schürer). Each supposition has had strong support, but the last seems most probable.

1. General Character.

Nebuchadrezzar, King of the Assyrians, in the 12th year of his reign, made war with Arphaxad, King of the Medes, and defeated him. To help him in this undertaking he had summoned many peoples far and wide, among them the Jews. They, as well as others, refused to go to the help of Nebuchadrezzar, and he determined to punish them. Holofernes, one of his great generals, was sent westward for this purpose. The Jews fortified themselves as best they could, and prayed earnestly for the help of the Lord. Holofernes blockaded Bethulia (Shechem), and cut off the water-supply. The situation was becoming desperate when Judith, a widow, rich, beautiful, and devout, offered to try to save her people.

2. The Story of the Book.

Arraying herself in her most beautiful garments and accompanied by her maid, she found her way to the tent of Holofernes, professing to all who met her that she wished to help the Assyrians to victory. Holofernes himself, greatly pleased with her beauty and apparent sincerity, provided for her sojourn in his camp. On the fourth day, he invited her to a banquet in his tent. The unwary general gave himself up to the merriment of the hour, and stupefied himself with wine. This was Judith's opportunity. With his own sword she cut off the head of the drunken sleeper, and, putting it into a sack, hurried back to Bethulia. Great was the rejoicing in Israel, and equally great was the consternation among the Assyrians, so great, indeed, that they fled before the attack of the Jews, and the land was saved.

The original language of the book was Hebrew, the standard Greek text being a translation from this. Three Greek recensions have been preserved: (1) the standard text, as given in most MSS. (including BAℵ); (2) a text found in Codex 58 (Holmes and Parsons); (3) a text closely related to (2), found in codices 19 and 108. The story is also extant in several Hebrew versions. Ancient versions of it are in Old Latin, Syriac, and Ethiopic. Jerome prepared the Vulgate with the help of an Aramaic version.

3. Texts and Versions.

A definite, fixed date is impossible. In what is said above regarding the situations revealed in the story itself must be found the means for estimating the time of writing. The author was undoubtedly a Jew. J. S. R.

4. Date and Author.

JULIA, jū'li-a (Ἰουλία): One of a group of persons greeted in Ro 16 15. Probably the group represents a Christian household (cf. Ro 16 3), in which case Julia was the wife of Philologus, and the mother of Nereus and his sister. The name was a common feminine one, occurring frequently among slaves and freedmen (cf. CIL, VI, 20416). J. M. T.

JULIUS, jū'li-us (Ἰούλιος): The name of the centurion of the Augustan band (q.v.) into whose keeping Paul and other prisoners were committed on their journey to Rome (Ac 27 1). He treated the Apostle with considerate kindness, permitting him to go ashore at Sidon to visit his friends (ver. 3), and, though ignoring his warnings in the earlier part of the voyage (ver. 10 f.), followed his counsel later (ver. 31 f.), and in order to save Paul's life prevented the soldiers from following the Roman custom of killing the prisoners lest they should escape (ver. 42 f.). It is not unlikely that the privilege of separate residence which Paul enjoyed on his arrival at Rome (28 16), besides the favorable elogium from Festus, was due to Julius' report of the voyage. M. W J.

JUNIA, jū'ni-a, or JUNIAS, jū'ni-as: Only the acc. form Ἰουνίαν is found in Ro 16 7, which may represent either the fem. Junia, or a contraction of a masc. name Junianus. In view of the large number of names of women and of Christian households in this ch. (cf. vs. 3, 6, 13, and 15), the former seems not improbable. Probably Junia was the wife of Andronicus. The expression τοὺς συγγενεῖς, "kinsmen," merely implies that they were of the writer's race (cf. Ro 9 3), while συναιχμαλώτους, "fellow prisoners," may be used either literally or figuratively. Junia and Andronicus are said to have been among the very early converts to Christianity. J. M. T.

JUPITER. See GREEK AND ROMAN IDOLATRY, § 6.

JUSHAB-HESED, jū"shab-hî'sed (יוּשַׁב חֶסֶד, yūshabh ḥeṣedh): A descendant of David (I Ch 3 20). E. E. N.

JUSTICE: In the Eng. Bible the word "justice" is used in an intermediary sense between the two (much more frequent) terms "judgment" and "righteousness." The word mishpāṭ, 'judgment' (primarily the decision of a judge), is sometimes, especially in RV, rendered "justice" (Job 29 14, 36 17; Am 5 24, etc.). On the other hand, tsedheq and tsᵉdhāqāh, 'righteousness,' or 'the right,' are also frequently rendered "justice" (Dt 16 20 [RV]; Ps 89 14; Jer 31 23, etc.). See JUDGMENT and RIGHTEOUSNESS. In Ac 28 4 ἡ δίκη ("vengeance" AV) means the divine nemesis, which was popularly supposed to pursue a criminal until it was satisfied by his punishment. E. E. N.

JUSTIFICATION: This word is used to describe the act of God in which a sinful man is forgiven and received into the fellowship of God through his faith in Jesus Christ. (1) Literally, the verb (δικαιοῦν) means 'to pronounce righteous'; in other words, it affirms that, in spite of past sin, an accused person now stands in right relations. It does not mean that he has become a righteous character (see SANCTIFICATION), nor that he has not sinned in the past (see CONDEMN, CONDEMNATION), but that now God, his holy judge, treats him as righteous. This is the righteousness or justification (δικαιοσύνη) of God (Ro 1 17, 3 21-26), which makes the fundamental difference between the Jew and Gentile and the Christian man. It is made the subject of full and explicit diseussion in Paul's letters to the Galatians and the Romans. His argument has its force in the fact that it brings to light the inner meaning of the Divine forgiveness and the human responsive faith, which form for all N T writers the kernel of the Gospel, and of the new experiences which it has created (on the significance of the term "sanctification" in the Ep. to the Hebrews, see A. B. Davidson's Commentary, in Handbooks for Bible Classes, pp. 203–209). (2) This act of God stands in contrast (a) with the ideal of law, according to which God's approval depends on man's independent achievement of personal righteousness (good works, or works of the law, Gal 3 10-12); and (b) with the state of condemnation ("cursed") in which every man, because guilty of sin, must find himself, apart from God (Jews, Gal 3 10; Gentiles, 3 8, 13 f.; Ro 1 18-32; all men, Ro 3 9). (3) This act of God has been made possible (a) by the death of Christ, who assumed the curse (Gal 3 13), and became propitiatory, through the shedding of His blood (Ro 3 25, 8 3; cf. I Jn 2 2, 4 10; He 9 11-14; I P 1 19, 3 18; Mk 10 45, 14 24) (see ATONEMENT). The man who sees in this death the atoning act of God will see in it the offer of mercy to himself; but (b) to see this, with inward trust, is for a sinner the supreme act of faith in God. The awakened conscience can not accept an easy immunity. The dream of immunity is the worst defiance of God. But in the cross of Christ God is revealed as at once righteous and merciful (Ro 3 26, 5 8-11). Consequently, our trust for the removal of guilt is fixed on that holy will, so rich in mercy (Eph 1 6 f., 2 4 f.), which was once for all revealed on that cross of His Son. (4) This act must be distinguished from the process of sanctification. It conditions, underlies, and makes possible that process, but its power lies in its being directly apprehended in its own meaning and glory. On the other hand, too many, to escape the Roman Catholic view, have described it as if it were, for experience, a complete and separate system of facts and relations. It is what birth is to life. To be real it must be realized, and that can only be in a life which is its confirmation and its fruit (Ro 5 17, 21 [δικαιοσύνη]; Gal 5 2-6). (5) Dr. Sanday says, "The Christian life is made to have its beginning in a fiction" (Int. Crit. Com., Romans, p. 36). Not so; the Apostle says explicitly "faith is reckoned for righteousness." We must remember that faith, while it is a human act, is viewed by the N T as unique in its kind. It is the act in which the fundamental right relation with God is really established. The man who trusts in God is righteous. Without that no man can be righteous toward God, since it is faith that creates the base and quality of all action. The fear that thus a doctrine of works is reestablished and that this view of faith would imply that man is saved by his own merit is groundless. For (a) faith is the response of man's soul to the revealed and realized grace of God. His redeeming love in Christ and that alone made faith possible. Faith is not the result of man's age-long prowess in the search for God; it is the response to God's mercy. And (b) faith is thus in its very spring and essence the denial of personal merit, the acceptance of Divine mercy. To claim merit for it would be to stifle its very life. To class it with "works" because we call it a human righteous act would be to ignore its fundamental difference from all "works." When, therefore, God reckons the believing man as righteous there is no fiction on God's part and no merit on man's part. And yet he is righteous.

The principle of justification by faith is implicit in the teaching of Jesus, as in the prayer of the Publican (Lk 18 19 ff.), the reception of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15 11 ff.), the treatment of the Sinful Woman (Lk 7 31-50), and throughout His teaching about forgiveness at the hands of the Father.

W D. M.

JUSTUS, jŭs'tŭs (Ἰοῦστος): The surname of three persons mentioned in the N T. 1. Joseph, called Barsabbas, who was one of the two from whom the disciples chose the successor of Judas, the lot falling upon his colleague Matthias (Ac 1 23 ff.). 2. Titus (Τίτιος, WH), a proselyte whose house Paul made his home and doubtless the center of his mission, when the opposition of the Jews in Corinth compelled him to abandon his teaching in the Synagogue and give himself to work among the Gentiles (Ac 18 7 f.). 3. Jesus, who was one of the fellow workers of the Apostle who proved a comfort to him in his first Roman imprisonment, and from whom he sent greetings to the Church at Colossæ (4 11). In the case of 1 and 3, 'Justus' is a Gentile surname assumed by a Jew; in the case of 2, it is the surname of a Roman, who had associated himself with the worship of the Synagogue (σεβόμενος τὸν θεόν). M. W. J.

JUTAH, jŭt'ā, JUTTAH, jŭt'tā (יַטָּה, yūṭāh [Jos 15 55], יַטָּה, yuṭṭāh [Jos 21 16]): A town in the hill-country of Judah, S. of Hebron, which was given to the priests for a city of refuge. It is the modern Yuttâ, a large Moslem village standing on a high ridge, with stone houses, cisterns, rock-tombs, and rock wine-presses. The inhabitants are rich in flocks. Map II, E 3. C. S. T.

K

KABZEEL, kab'zē-el (קַבְצְאֵל, qabhtsᵉ'ēl): A town in the extreme S. of Judah (Jos 15 21), the home of Benaiah, captain of David's guard (II S 23 20). It was reinhabited by the Jews in post-exilic times (Neh 11 25; here called Jekabzeel). Site unknown. E. E. N.

KADESH, kē'desh (קָדֵשׁ, qādhēsh), 'holy': A name which occurs in the LXX. as that of a Hittite city (possibly a royal residence, II S 24 6). It was situated N. of Damascus toward Hamath on the Orontes river. The Heb. text reads "Tahtim-hodshi" (q.v.). A. C. Z.

KADESH-BARNEA, -bār'nē-a (קָדֵשׁ בַּרְנֵעַ, qādhēsh-barnēa'), 'the holy place of Barnea': A city located at the S. end of the Israelite territory, according to Ezk 47 19 ("Meriboth-kadesh") between Tamar and the river of Egypt, but according to Nu 34 4 between the latter point and Akrabbim. According to Gn 20 1 it was near Gerar. It was for a long time the site of the camp of the tribes of Israel (Nu 20 1 [J]; Dt 1 46; Jg ch. 6 f.). The modern site has been made the subject of dispute, but it is more than probable that Trumbull was right in identifying it with Ain Kadîs in the plateau between Nakb es Safat and E. of Wâdy Gerûr, where a rich spring with several wells and pools contribute toward rendering the place an oasis. It was also called En Mishpat, 'fountain of judgment' (Gn 14 7), evidently because the locality served as a seat of judgment for a time (cf. H. C. Trumbull, Kadesh Barnea, 1884, pp. 238–332). A. C. Z.

KADMIEL, kad'mi-el (קַדְמִיאֵל, qadhmī'ēl), 'El is the ancient one': 1. The ancestral head of a Levitical family which returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 40; Neh 7 43, 12 8, 24). 2. One or more individual Levites of this name and family may have assisted in rebuilding the Temple (Ezr 3 9), in the services of the day of humiliation (Neh 9 4, 5), and in sealing the covenant (Neh 10 10). C. S. T.

KADMONITE, kad'mon-ait (קַדְמֹנִי, qadhmōnī): The Heb. word signifies a dweller in the East, and is synonymous with 'sons of the East.' It refers to the Arabs of the Syrian desert (Gn 15 19). J. A. K.

KAIN, kên (קַיִן, qayin): I. Another term for the Kenites (Nu 24 22, RVmg.; "the Kenite" AV); see KENITE.

II. A town in the mountains of Hebron (Jos 15 57; Cain AV), more correctly Hakkain, probably an old Kenite settlement, traditionally the tomb of Cain. Supposed to be identified with the modern Yukin, near Hebron (Buhl, Pal. p. 162). Map II, E 3. A. C. Z.

KALLAI, kal'la-ai (קַלַּי, qallay): A priest (Neh 12 20). E. E. N.

KAMON, kē'mon (קָמוֹן, qāmōn, Camon AV): The burial-place of Jair, one of the Judges (Jg 10 5). Map II, F 8. E. E. N.

KANAH, kē'nā (קָנָה, qānāh), 'reed': 1. A brook forming the boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh (Jos 16 8, 17 9). Map III, E 4. 2. A city of Asher (Jos 19 28). The identification is not certain. Both the modern Kanah near Tyre (Map IV, C 4) and Kh. Kana in Galilee (Map IV, C 7) have been suggested. E. E. N.

KAREAH, ka-rī'ā (קָרֵחַ, qārēaḥ), 'bald': The father of Jonathan, a leader of the remnant of the Jews (II K 25 23, Careah AV; Jer 40 8 ff.). E. E. N.

KARKA, kār'ka (קַרְקָעָה, qarqā'āh, Karkaa AV): A town on the S. border of Judah (Jos 15 3). Site unknown. E. E. N.

KARKOR, kār'kōr (קַרְקֹר, qarqōr): The place where Gideon overthrew Zeba and Zalmunna (Jg 8 10). It lay E. of Jogbehah, but its site is unknown. E. E. N.

KARTAH, kār'tā (קַרְתָּה, qartāh): A city of Zebulun assigned to the Levites (Jos 21 34). It may be the same as Kattath (19 15). E. E. N.

KARTAN, kār'tan (קַרְתָּן, qartān): A city of Naphtali, assigned to the Levites (Jos 21 32), called Kiriathaim (Kirjathaim AV) in I Ch 6 76. Site unknown. E. E. N.

KATTATH, kat'tath (קַטָּת, qaṭṭāth): A city of Zebulun (Jos 19 15). Perhaps the same as Kartah (21 34), and Kitron (Jg 1 30). Site unknown. E. E. N.

KEDAR, kī'dār (קֵדָר, qēdhār): One of the sons of Ishmael (Gn 25 13; I Ch 1 29) and the eponym of an important tribe of nomads of Arabian origin (Jer 2 10). Their flocks and tents were famous (Ezk 27 21; Jer 49 28 f.), and served as familiar embellishments of poetic speech (Ps 120 5; Song 1 5). But in Is 42 11 they are said to inhabit "villages," and in Is 21 16 f. to furnish mighty "archers," which may mean either that a portion of the people had settled down to agriculture and military life, or that the "villages" were simply encampments and the warriors only such as a nomad people might develop. There seems to be no doubt, however, that the name did not always indicate the small section of Ishmael alluded to in Gn. In the Assyrian records K. is placed in juxtaposition with Nebaioth, as it is also in Is 60 7 (cf. COT, I, p. 133 f.; II, p. 107 f.), and its religion is said to be the worship of Syrian deities. See also ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11. A. C. Z.

KEDEMAH, ked'ē-mā (קֶדְמָה, qēdhᵉmāh), 'east': An Ishmaelite tribe (Gn 25 15; I Ch 1 31). See ISHMAEL. E. E. N.

KEDEMOTH, ked'ē-moth (קְדֵמוֹת, qᵉdhēmōth), 'east (regions)': 1. The wilderness of K. was near the upper waters of the Arnon on the E. of Moab (Dt 2 26). 2. The city K. assigned to Reuben (Jos 13 18, 21 37) was probably in the same locality, some miles E. of Dibon. Map I, G 10. E. E. N.

KEDESH, kî'desh (קֶדֶשׁ, qedhesh), 'holy place': 1. A city in Naphtali, often mentioned. It was an old Canaanitish city with a king (Jos 12 22) and fortified (19 37), more definitely designated as "K.-naphtali" (Jg 4 6) and "K. in Galilee" (Jos 20 7, 21 32) in the hill-country of Naphtali. It was a city of refuge and a Gershonite Levitical city (I Ch 6 76 [61]). In Jg it is mentioned as the home of Barak, where he and Deborah gathered their forces to fight against Sisera (4 6, 9 f.). It was taken by Tiglath-pileser (II K 15 29). Jonathan Maccabæus defeated Demetrius, King of Syria, at this place (I Mac 11 63, 73), and Josephus (BJ, IV, 2 3, etc.) mentions that it lay between Galilee and Tyre, to which it belonged, and was hostile to the Jews. It is the modern Kedeš, on the E. slope of a hill, NW of Lake Hūle, in a fruitful country with spring and cistern, and many Roman ruins. Map IV, E 5. 2. A Gershonite Levitical city in Issachar (I Ch 6 72 [57]), probably a mistake for "Kishion" (Jos 19 20, 21 28). 3. A place in the S. of Judah (Jos 15 23), to be distinguished from Kadesh-barnea. C. S. T.

KEEPERS: In Ec 12 3 "keepers of the house" refers primarily to the watchmen, or porters, who guarded the entrance to the houses of the well-to-do. It is perhaps applied figuratively here to the arms as the guardians of the body. In all other cases in the Bible "keeper" means 'watchman,' 'guard,' or 'caretaker.' E. E. N.

KEILAH, kę-ai'lā (קְעִילָה, qe'īlāh): 1. A walled city in the lowland of Judah, which David protected against Philistine raiders (Jos 15 44; I S 23 1-13). It is mentioned in the Tell-el-Amarna tablets as Kilta. In Nehemiah's time it was a double district (Neh 3 17 f.). This once important city is probably to be identified with Khurbet Kîla, a ruined village on a terraced hill 7 m. E. of Eleutheropolis. Map II, D 2. 2. "Keilah the Garmite" (I Ch 4 19). Many of the names in this chapter refer to localities, and Keilah is apparently the same as 1 above. The meaning of "Garmite" is unknown. L. G. L.

KELAIAH, kę-lê'yā (קְלָיָה, qēlāyāh): A Levite who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 23). In the same passage his name is given also as Kelita (קְלִיטָא, qelīṭā'). Under the latter name he is mentioned among the expounders of the law as read by Ezra (Neh 8 7), and among the signers of the Covenant (Neh 10 10). A. C. Z.

KELITA, kel'i-ta. See KELAIAH.

KEMUEL, kę-miū'el (קְמוּאֵל, qemū'ēl): 1. The ancestral head of the Nahorites, from whom Aram was descended (Gn 22 21; but cf. 10 22). 2. A prince of Ephraim (Nu 34 24). 3. A Levite (I Ch 27 17). E. E. N.

KENAN, kî'nan (קֵינָן, qēnān, Cainan AV): The son of Enoch in the Sethite genealogy (Gn 5 9; I Ch 1 2), the equivalent of Cain in the genealogy of 4 1, 17 ff. E. E. N.

KENATH, kî'nath (קְנָת, qenāth): A city in E. Gilead (I Ch 2 23). In Nu 32 42 it is said to have been taken by Nobah (a Manassite clan?) and called Nobah. Though there was a Nobah near Jogbehah (q.v.) (Jg 8 11), there may also have been another. If so, K. may possibly be identified with Kanawât in the Hauran, far beyond the NE. border of Gilead, though this is not probable. E. E. N.

KENAZ, kî'naz (קְנַז, qenaz), also KENEZ: The ancestral head of an Edomite clan of the same name (Gn 36 11, 15, 42; I Ch 1 36, 53). K. (Kenizzite RV, Kenezite AV) is also named as the clan to which Caleb (Nu 32 12; Jos 14 6, 14) and Othniel (Jos 15 17; Jg 1 13, etc.) belonged. K. (Gn 15 19) thus appears to have been either an Edomite clan, a part of which was absorbed into Judah, or an independent clan, one portion of which became Edomite, while the other united with Judah. Its seat was in S. Judah in the neighborhood of Hebron. E. E. N.

KENITE, kî'nait (קֵינִי, qēnī, Gentilic of קַיִן, qayin, Kain [found in Nu 24 22; Jg 4 11]): The Kenites were a nomadic people whose original home lay in the region S. of Palestine. Moses' father-in-law, Hobab, was a Kenite (Jg 1 16, 4 11), and hence we may infer that they were originally counted with the Midianites. The Kenite clan of which Hobab was chief threw in its lot with Israel on the march from Horeb to Canaan, and later joined Judah when that tribe undertook to conquer S. Palestine (Jg 1 16 ff.). The Kenites took possession of a district to the S. of Judah proper, and there became closely identified with the Amalekites (in Jg 1 16 read "and they went and dwelt with the Amalekites"; cf. Moore in Int. Crit. Com., ad loc.). A small clan led by Heber afterward moved to N. Palestine (Jg 4 11). When Saul marched against Amalek he warned the Kenites to save themselves by separating from the Amalekites (I S 15 6). They occupied a distinct part of the Negeb near the Jerahmeelites (I S 27 10, 30 29). Later they were reckoned as an integral part of Judah (I Ch 2 55), and it was the Kenite Hammath who was considered the ancestor of the Rechabites (q.v.). The Kenites are mentioned in the enigmatic oracle ascribed to Baalam (Nu 24 21 f.). Many recent writers have advocated the theory that the Kenites were originally worshipers of J", and that it was from them that Moses derived his knowledge of J", but this theory is beset with many difficulties. E. E. N.

KENIZZITE, kę-niz'zait. See KENAZ.

KERCHIEF: The rendering of the Heb. miṣpāḥōth (Ezk 13 18, 21), a head-covering or veil of some sort, the exact nature of which is unknown. See also DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8. E. E. N.

KEREN-HAPPUCH, kî"ren-hap'uc (קֶרֶן הַפּוּךְ, qeren happūkh): One of Job's daughters (Job 42 14). The name means 'horn of eye-paint,' the reference being to the black antimony dye used for the eyebrows and eyelashes. E. E. N.

KERIOTH, kĭ'ri-ŏth (קְרִיּוֹת, qᵉriyyōth, in Jer 48 41 with the article), the pl. of qiryāh, 'city': A place in Moab (Jer 48 24) with royal palaces (Am 2 2), perhaps the capital city. On the Moabite Stone (see MESHA) it is mentioned as containing a principal sanctuary of Chemosh. Buhl (GAP) identifies it with Rabbath Moab, the capital city of the district 'Ār, S. of the Arnon. C. S. T.

KEROS, kĭ'rŏs (קֵרוֹס, qērōs): The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 44 =Neh 7 47). E. E. N.

KETTLE: The rendering of dūdh (II S 2 14). See FOOD, § 11.

KETURAH, kĕ-tū'rā (קְטוּרָה, qᵉṭūrāh), 'frankincense': The wife or concubine of Abraham, perhaps like Hagar taken during Sarah's lifetime. She was the mother of six sons, representing Arab tribes S. and E. of Palestine. But the episodical nature of the passage (Gn 25 1-6), the plurals in ver. 3, and the broad geographical distribution of her descendants argue strongly for a tribal interpretation of Keturah's personality. A. S. C.

KEY. See HOUSE, § 6 (l), and LOCK.

KEZIZ, kĭ'ziz. See EMEK-KEZIZ.

KEZZIZ, VALLEY OF. See EMEK-KEZIZ.

KIBROTH-HATTAAVAH, kĭb''rŏth-hăt-tê'a-vā (קִבְרוֹת הַתַּאֲוָה, qibhrōth hatta'ăwāh, 'graves of lust': A station on the wilderness journey from Horeb to Kadesh (Nu 11 34 f., 33 16 f.; Dt 9 22). It was the scene of the wonderful supply of quail, the greedy eating of which brought on a plague causing the death of many in the camp. Site unknown. E. E. N.

KIBZAIM, kĭb-zê'im (קִבְצַיִם, qibhtsayim): A Levitical city of Ephraim named in connection with Gezer and Beth-horon (Jos 21 22), called Jokmeam (q.v.) in I Ch 6 68. E. E. N.

KID. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 5; FOOD, § 10.

KIDNEYS: In the O T the Heb. kᵉlāyōth is used in two senses. (1) Literal—of the kidneys with their fat. In one passage the term is used to indicate the choicest part of the wheat (Dt 32 14). See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 10. (2) By metonymy—for the emotional nature of man with its impulses and affections. In such passages it was rendered in AV by reins, for which RV substitutes "heart" (cf. also Rev 2 23). E. E. N.

KIDRON, kĭd'rŏn (קִדְרוֹן, qidhrōn): The name of the valley E. of Jerusalem, the stream of which is dry during the greater part of the year. Originally the spring Gihon (see JERUSALEM, § 11) emptied its waters into this part of the valley. The Valley of Jehoshaphat (Jl 3 12) is not to be identified with the Kidron, at least that portion of it near Jerusalem. See also JERUSALEM, § 5. E. E. N.

KINDRED: The translation of a number of Heb. and Gr. terms in AV, most of which have been more correctly rendered by other words in RV. Attention may be called to the following: 1. In the O T. (1) In Ezk 11 15, the term rendered "kindred" means 'redemption.' This gives no good sense, and it is probable that the original reading was 'captivity,' or 'exile,' giving the meaning 'fellow exiles.' (2) In Ru 3 2, the Heb. means literally 'acquaintance.' (3) In Gn 24 7, etc., the Heb. word (rendered "nativity" in RV) is the same as that rendered "kindred" in 12 1, etc. It is derived from the verb meaning 'to give birth to,' and both senses are correct. In Est 2 10, 20, 8 6 it is rendered "race." (4) The Heb. word for 'family' is sometimes used in a broad sense for "kindred" (Gn 24 38; Ps 22 27, etc.). 2. In the N T. (1) In Ac 4 6 γένος means 'family,' while in 7 13, 19 it has its usual meaning of 'race.' (2) In Ac 3 25 πατριά, 'family,' is used in a very broad sense, almost equivalent to 'race,' or 'nation.' (3) In Rev 1 7, 5 9, etc., the RV "tribe" is the literal meaning of the Gr. φυλή. E. E. N.

KING: The Heb. word melekh, 'king,' appears to be derived from a root, mlkh, meaning 'to decide' or 'to give counsel,' which reminds us of the status of the chief, or sheik, of a tribe, whose main function was to give counsel rather than to rule absolutely. The verb mālakh, 'to rule,' or 'to reign,' is denominative from melekh. The original constitution of Israel was patriarchal (see FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, §§ 2, 4) and tribal. There was no central authority, even in religion. Leadership in war or in time of peace was due to individual prowess or abilities, was not hereditary, and was, after all, subordinate to the government of the tribes through their "elders." As Israel became more firmly established in Canaan and entered more fully into the experiences of a settled, instead of a nomadic, life, the essential weakness of the tribal constitution became only too evident. Such experiences as the invasion by the Midianites (Jg chs. 6–8) and the conquest of central Israel by the Philistines (I S chs. 4–6) showed the need of union under one capable head. Gideon refused the offer of a crown (Jg 8 22 f.), although he exercised great authority in his own locality until his death. The attempt to found a kingdom by Gideon's incapable son Abimelech was abortive (Jg ch. 9). It was in the days of Samuel, a seer of great influence in central Israel, that the desire for a king came to be generally prevalent. See ISRAEL, HISTORY OF, § 2 (2). The oldest narrative (I S 9 1–10 16, 11 1-13) represents Samuel as at one with the people in this matter, and gives as the motive the desire for a leader to save Israel from the Philistines. Saul was the choice of the people, consequent on his leadership of the volunteers of central Israel in a successful campaign against the Ammonites. As king, Saul's status was midway between that of the chief of a tribe and the more fully developed regal state exhibited by David. Saul was the war leader of all Israel, and in war his authority was supreme. But in other respects his court and the organization of his government were crude and primitive. It was otherwise with David (q.v.), in whom Israel found a man of truly regal character. David was chosen king by the tribal "elders," first of Judah (II S 2 4), then, seven years later, by those of all Israel (II S 5 3). As king, David was the military head, the supreme judge, and the religious head of all Israel. His authority was not absolute, for there were many ancient customs and rights which he was expected to uphold, not to annul (cf. the later case of Ahab and Naboth, I K ch. 21); still, in many respects his will was the supreme law of the land, and in the selection of his officials, both military and civil, less attention was paid to the local tribal nobles and more to persons who would be directly dependent upon the king himself. As the supreme court of appeal, this king and his officials practically supplanted the old tribal courts in matters of great importance. In these and other respects the tendency of the kingdom was to break down the old tribal system. Under David the kingly government took on a dignity that it had not at all possessed under Saul. It was organized, and there was a real court and cabinet (II S 8 15-18, 20 23-26). Under Solomon, this organization was extended to cover a larger field, especially in connection with the economic measures for the maintenance of the royal establishment (I K 4 1-28). Under Solomon also the royal prerogatives were insisted upon in an autocratic spirit (cf. I K 12 8-11) unknown in earlier days, and exceedingly distasteful to the majority of his subjects, especially those outside of Judah (I S 8 10-18; I K 12 4-7). The northern tribes remembered that the house of David held its power only by their free consent, and at the death of Solomon refused their allegiance to his son, who declined to renounce the autocratic policy of his father. The Northern Kingdom thus originated in a protest against absolutism, and it is likely that the first kings were somewhat cautious about interfering with time-honored customs. Omri was the real organizer of the Northern Kingdom. Being the choice of the army, he had the power to enforce his authority. His centralizing policy sought to diminish the independent power and significance of the old local and tribal constituencies, and to make the throne supreme, and under the Omri dynasty the Northern Kingdom came to be as closely organized about and dependent on the throne as was that of Judah. Under ordinary circumstances the kingdom was hereditary, but the many changes of dynasty show that this was no unchangeable law. Primogeniture was also recognized, but not as an essential condition.

There was something ideal in the conception of a king to the mind of the ancient Israelite. The limits of the royal authority were somewhat vague, and hence there was all the greater need that, as the final court of appeal and the fountainhead of justice, the king be perfectly just and impartial. As the head of the state, he was to be the successful leader of its armies, the wise provider of all things conducive to public welfare, having at heart his people's interests, quick to detect and punish the evil and reward the good (Dt 17 14-20; I K 12 7). As the chief of his people, he was also their representative before God. He was really their high priest. He officiated at the national sacrifices, prayed for his people, and blessed them in the name of J" (I S 14 33 f.; II S 6 18 f.; I K 8 12 ff., 13 4, etc.). It was easy, therefore, for the Messianic thought at times to conceive of the ideal future as the time when a perfect king should reign as God's own representative, and his kingdom be the realization of the rule of God in Israel and on earth (Is 9 6-7, 11 1-5, 32 1 ff.; Jer 23 5; Ezk 32 22-24, etc.).

E. E. N.

KINGDOM OF GOD: A N T phrase based upon O T antecedents, used with various shades of meaning centering in the idea of the spiritual reign of God among men. The phrase "kingdom of heaven" (βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν) is used in the N T by Mt only, and is an exact equivalent of the phrase "kingdom of God" (βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ). The expression is based on the popular substitution in later Judaism, under stress of superstitious feeling, of the word "heaven" for the name of God, wherever it occurred. Outside of the N T, it was in use as the Targumic name of the Messianic empire (malkhūthā' dhishmayyā'), an alternate form of the older phrase, which, however, it never completely displaced. Which of the two expressions Jesus Himself adopted, and whether He limited Himself to one or the other are open questions. (Cf. Stanton, The Jewish and Christian Messiah [1886], pp. 209–210; Dalman, Words of Jesus [1902], pp. 91 ff.). Less technical and formal expressions denoting the same idea are, "kingdom of their [my, Mt 26 29] father" (Mt 13 43), "thy kingdom" (in the Lord's Prayer, Mt 6 10), "the kingdom," without qualification (Mt 8 12); and, after the recognition of Jesus as the Messiah, "kingdom of Christ" (Pauline usage, I Co 6 9 f.; Gal 5 21).

1. Usage of Terms.

The root of the conception of the kingdom of God is to be found in the O T. In one of the earlier passages of the Hexateuch (Ex 19 5 f.), Moses is represented as bringing the promise of J" to the people of Israel that they should be "a kingdom of priests and a holy nation." This was distinctly assumed as the case realized in the last stages of the period of Judges. Gideon refuses the throne offered him upon the ground that J" only must rule over Israel (Jg 8 23). When the people demanded a king from Samuel and he took the matter to J", he received the answer that it was not himself that the people had rejected but J" (I S 8 7; cf. 12 12). In its simplest form, the idea current in this period may be put in the proposition: Israel's government is ideally a theocracy, i.e., the reign of God, and Israel, accordingly, the kingdom of God. With the establishment of this monarchy the idea naturally receded into the background, but the thought that God was the true king of Israel was never completely lost sight of. When Israel's need became great, the prophets foresaw the reestablishment of the reign of J" in the future as the only effective remedy of the ills from which the nation was suffering. This lies at the root of the Messianic idea, which culminates in the apocalyptic conception of Daniel.

2. Antecedents in the O T.

What the notion of the kingdom of God is in Dn appears plainly from its coordination with the other kingdoms. Just as Assyria and Babylonia became great world-empires, and controlled the whole known world, and were followed by Medo-Persia and the Macedonian rule of Alexander and his successors, so the people of God's choice would supplant the last of these and grow into a power which would hold perpetual sway, or dominion (sholtān), over the world (Dn chs. 3, 7, 11). But there were hindrances delaying this consummation, in particular the heathen nations, hostile preternatural powers (Satan, stars, demons), and the alien dynasty of the Herods. This conception was the current one in N T times, being given a central and regulative place. The phrase "kingdom of God" ["kingdom of heaven"] assumed a very clear and definite sense as the realm over which God rules (cf. Targum, Is 40 9; Mic 4 7; also Targ. Jon. Is 53 10, "The kingdom of the Messiah"; see also Cremer, Bibl. Theol. Lex., βασιλεύς; Schürer, HJP, II, ii, 170).

3. Apocalyptic Ideal: A Divine World-Empire.

The Targumic is evidently the usage which served as the starting-point for the development of the conception in the N T. John the Baptist took the imminence of the kingdom as the occasion and motive of his preaching of repentance (Mt 3 2). In the teaching of Jesus the conception became primary, and at the same time received a new moral and spiritual significance.

4. Teaching of Jesus.

The usage of Jesus represents the kingdom (1) figuratively, under the form of a place. This is the case in all expressions involving the act of entering into the kingdom (Mt 7 21, 18 3; Mk 10 15, 23; Lk 18 24 f.). Sometimes, the place is more narrowly presented as an enclosure, or walled territory, or city with gates that can be closed (Mt 23 14). It is better to enter into the kingdom of heaven with one eye than, having two, to be cast out (Mk 9 47). Men are said to be "near" or "far" from the kingdom (Mk 12 34). It requires effort to enter (Mt 11 12). But the difference between those who enter and those who do not is not the difference between the Jew and the Gentile, but that between those who possess a certain fitness for it and those who do not (Lk 9 62). But after entrance has been secured, it is a place of enjoyment, a place where even Jesus Himself shall eat and drink (Mt 26 29; Mk 14 25; Lk 22 16, 18). (2) In a second class of passages, the kingdom is represented as a possession. Of the poor in spirit and of those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake it is said, "theirs is the kingdom of heaven" (Mt 5 3, 10; Lk 18 16 f.). It is something that can be given and taken away. It will be taken from the Jews and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof (Mt 21 43). It is promised to the little flock (Lk 12 32). The parables of the treasure hidden in the field and the merchantman seeking goodly pearls (Mt 13 44-46) give this view of it. It is the most valuable of possessions, and it is the height of wisdom to seek for it and the summit of prosperity to secure it (Mt 6 33; Lk 12 31). (3) A third class of passages represents the kingdom of God as an organization, constituted of a certain class of men. It is a body politic, growing from small beginnings into large proportions and power (Mt 13 31; Mk 4 26). Its members are the children of the kingdom (Mt 13 38). Like every human organization this, too, must have its offices and officers; but to suppose that these are to be appointed without reference to their character and on the same principle as in the political sphere—in order to lord it over their fellow members—is a grievous error. They that rule shall be they that serve. They shall rule in the very act of serving their brethren (Mt 20 21 ff.). (4) A fourth class of passages designates the kingdom as an order of things, or a dispensation. In the vision of Daniel, it had been foreshadowed that with the coming of the fifth kingdom a revolution would occur in the affairs of Israel and, in fact, of the whole world. And it was the nearness of this new order of things that John the Baptist had preached. Jesus came with the same message, and taught His disciples to announce the coming of the kingdom, to pray for it, and to prepare for it (Mt 6 10-13; Lk 9 2, 11). The new feature of the dispensation thus announced is its spirituality. Its laws are essentially ethical. It is an order of things in which humility and purity count for more than self-assertion and outward conformity to standards (Mt 11 11; Lk 7 28). It is an administration of justice and equity. Faithfulness and diligence are rewarded in it and sloth and unbrotherliness are punished (Mt 21 43; cf. 25 1 ff.).

The thought of Jesus regarding the kingdom of God may be gathered also from His use of other parallel expressions. After His answer to the rich young man who asked Him what he must do to inherit eternal life, Jesus turned to His disciples and said, "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God" (Lk 18 24), and His disciples asked Him, "Then who can be saved?" (Lk 18 26). The three phrases "kingdom of God," "eternal life," and "be saved" are in this passage applied to the same thing. Whether the conversation is reported verbatim or through the mediation of later developments, it is certain that it indicates at least the understanding which prevailed of the kingdom of God before the Synoptic Gospels were cast into their present form from their sources. The identity of the two phrases "kingdom of God" and "eternal life" is still further illustrated by the fact that the Fourth Gospel uniformly presents the latter as the great theme of Christ's teaching, thus putting it in the place occupied by the idea of the kingdom in the Synoptic account. The expression "kingdom" occurs in the Fourth Gospel only in two reports of conversations by Jesus, viz., those with Nicodemus and with Pilate (Jn 3 3, 18 36 ff.). In the case of the conversation with Pilate the expression was forced into the narrative by the circumstances. Being charged with assuming the title of king, Jesus could not avoid referring to the idea.

5. Parallel and Contrasted Conceptions.

Further, additional light is thrown on the notion of the kingdom of God by the occurrence of contrasted notions, such as that of the kingdom of Satan (Mt 12 26; Mk 3 24; Lk 11 18). This kingdom involves an organization controlled by one dominating power, and it is necessary that its law should be harmoniously observed by its subjects, else its integrity disappears and it collapses (Mt 12 25 f.; Lk 11 18). The kingdom of God is finally identified with the 'coming age' of the apocalyptic literature (Lk 18 30; Mk 10 30), and the 'present age,' being the obverse of the coming, falls into the place of opposition to the kingdom of God.

6. Realm and Reign.

The two aspects of a kingdom, that of a reign and that of a realm, are in this teaching both present, but indistinguishably interwoven. As a matter of fact, they could not exist apart from each other. Where there is an actual reign there must be realm, and where there is a realm there is also a reign. But though the two aspects of reign and realm are not to be separated from each other, the usage of the time laid the emphasis on the former, permitting the idea of realm to appear as a corollary (cf. Schürer, HJP, II, 539, n. 43; Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 94 f.).

7. The Coming of the Kingdom.

What Jesus says as to the time and method of the establishment of the kingdom of God has given rise to difference of opinion. On the one side, it is claimed that His thought on this point coalesces with that of the Apocalyptists (apocalyptic-eschatological view), and that, like them, He looks upon the coming of the kingdom as a future event to be ushered in with a unique display of supernatural power (J. Weiss, Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes[2] [1906]; Schmoller, Die Lehre v. Reiche Gottes [1891]; Issel, Reich Gottes [1891]; Cone, Rich and Poor in the N T [1902]; Baldensperger, Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu[3] [1903]; Bousset, Die Predigt Jesu in ihren Gegensatz zum Judenthum [1892]). On the other side, His utterances are interpreted as representing the kingdom as a present evolving organism (ethico-religious view). Exclusively taken, either one of these views fails to account for all the facts in the case, some of which seem to support one and some the other of the alternative views. There is no doubt that here there is a problem which might be solved by denying the genuineness of either class of utterances attributed to Jesus. The eschatological discourses may have been incorporated into the ethico-religious teaching of the Master by His reporters, because these were unable to fully appreciate His pure religious thought; or, less probably, the ethico-religious elements may have been read back into His speeches, though developed later in the course of Apostolic activities; or the eschatological may have been but the form current in His day which Jesus used as a medium for His ethico-religious ideals; or, again, the eschatological may have formed the chief content of His teachings, and those instances of His usage in which the kingdom appears as a present reality may be proleptical. All these methods of dealing with the data do more or less critical and exegetical violence to them. The truth is that the primary element in Jesus' conception is the ethico-religious, and the eschatological is used, partly as a vehicle for conveying this, and partly as a possible culmination and expression outwardly of the inner reality. The kingdom is then a present and growing power, whose final triumph might be conceived as taking place in the form ordinarily represented in the Apocalyptic writings.

8. The Kingdom in Apostolic Teaching.

Both the foregoing conceptions persist throughout the Apostolic teaching, and run parallel without any tendency either toward the absorption or toward the expulsion of the one by the other. In the Epistles of Peter, the eschatological idea prevails. The kingdom is a future manifestation (I P 1 7 f., 4 13); Christ Himself would come in glory and establish it (I P 4 5 f.). In the Epistle of James, it is a privilege to be enjoyed by those who love Jesus as Christ that they shall inherit the kingdom (Ja 2 5). On the other hand, in Revelation, it is more than a future reign of God. With the ascension of Jesus, Satan has been overthrown, and the kingdom has come (12 10). Believers are already rulers in it (1 6, 5 10). The Seven Churches are in the domain of Christ. In the Johannine writings, the conception and phraseology of the kingdom yield to those of eternal life, which is represented as a present good secured by faith in Christ (Jn 3 36, 6 54; I Jn 5 11, 13). But most clearly does this alternation of the idea from a present to a future reality appear in Paul's system of thought. Here the two advents of Christ mark the developments. The first coming has already resulted in the establishment of a kingdom of which His disciples are fellow citizens, Eph 2 19; a dispensation of the fulness of the times, Eph 1 10; the body of Christ, Eph 1 23, 4 12, etc., constituted by the predominance of certain inner realities (Ro 14 17; I Co 4 20). Men are transferred into it ("the kingdom of the Son") by faith in God through Jesus Christ (Col 1 13). Yet this kingdom is associated with the future coming of Christ (II Ti 4 1), and is to be inherited (Gal 5 21; I Co 6 9 f.). Paul also distinguishes between the kingdom of God, pure and simple, and the kingdom of Christ; but the difference is simply that the former represents an earlier stage in the Apostle's thought and the latter a later one. Yet the kingdom of Christ is the means of furthering the kingdom of God (I Co 15 24-27). It was only after the close of the Apostolic period that the identification of the kingdom of God with the Church of Christ began to be made.

9. The Kingdom and the Individual.

The new meaning thus imparted to the conception of the kingdom of God broke down the older barriers of mere national and racial privilege about it. Both in the teaching of Jesus and still more clearly in the system of Paul, the kingdom was to extend over the great heathen world (cf. Eph 3 6, where Gentiles are referred to as fellow heirs, fellow members of the body, and fellow partakers of the promise), and even possibly leave out some of the old Jewish communities (Ro 9 31 f.). From being the commonwealth of Israel, it came to be regarded as the community of the righteous within Israel, and, finally, as the righteous among all nations. The conditions of membership are, accordingly, placed within the reach of the world at large, and consist in repentance from sin and trustful acceptance of the Christ as Savior (Mt 16 16; Ac 13 39, 3 19, 17 30; Ro 1 16). The privileges of such membership are correspondingly lifted out of a material sphere (currently expressed in such phrases as 'eating bread in the kingdom of God' [Lk 14 15], 'partaking in a banquet of manna,' or 'of the flesh of leviathan,' or 'Behemoth') into the more spiritual one of the vision of God, the recognition of sonship, the satisfaction with righteousness, the communion with the devout of past ages, and the completion of communion with God already begun. But on their part, the members of the kingdom must maintain a Christian character. As such, they are to be distinguished by humility, meekness, a forgiving spirit, a devout and prayerful attitude toward God, earnest aggressiveness in extending the kingdom, and a fraternal loving attitude toward their fellow members. Over one another they are to watch with care (Mt 18 15-20), and serve one another with devotion.

10. Summary. The Biblical idea of the kingdom of God may then be said to center about the thought of a special order of things or dispensation, the chief characteristic of which is that men recognize God as absolute sovereign. But they do so because, in the person and teaching of Jesus Christ, He is revealed to them as their Father. The relation of the individual to the kingdom is thus established by faith, i.e., by the acceptance of the revelation made by Jesus; but those who accept Him irrespective of previous station in life or nationality are banded together as His new people. The order of things thus begun is to be completed in the future. Yet its complete manifestation at the last will not bring a new reality into existence, but will only fill out and reveal its outline.

1. Name and Place in the O T Canon. In the Heb. Canon Jos, Jg, I and II S (as one book), and I and II K (as one) form a group called the 'Early (or Former) Prophets.' How old this grouping is can not now be ascertained, but it antedates the LXX. and persisted (in Heb. MSS.) until the age of printing. Both Origen and Jerome speak of the difference between the LXX. division into two books (Third and Fourth 'Kingdoms') and the Heb. designation of the whole as one book of 'Kings.' Our subdivision of S and K into two books each, based as it is on the LXX., is of no special significance, and is purely arbitrary, having no basis in the text. The dividing line between K and S has also been drawn somewhat arbitrarily, since I K chs. 1 and 2 are really the conclusion of the history of David narrated in II S. Lucian, in his recension of the LXX., made a much more natural division between II S and I K at I K 2 12, perhaps following ancient Heb. authorities in so doing. The exact relation of the original Heb. book of 'Kings' to the preceding historical books is obscure. It is certain that the older material in them all has been edited by compilers in the same spirit, and that together they form a closely connected series. But whether they were originally planned as such a series, and were once but four parts of one large work all edited by the same hand, are questions that can not be answered definitely.

2. General Structure and Purpose. Disregarding the artificial subdivision into two books, the entire work consists of three main parts: (1) The history of Solomon's reign (I K chs. 1–11). (2) A synchronous history of the two kingdoms (I K ch. 12–II K ch. 17). (3) The history of Judah from the fall of the Northern Kingdom to the Exile (II K ch. 17, end). Throughout each of these three parts we find evidence of the use by the editor, or compiler, of a variety of sources, sometimes quoted verbatim in longer and shorter excerpts, at other times used more indirectly, but always in accord with one ruling purpose, to set forth the history from a religious rather than from a political point of view, and to show what lessons were to be learned from it regarding J"'s dealings with His people. In political events or measures, as such, the compiler took little interest. Of the careers of some of the most important kings (e.g., Omri and Jeroboam II) he gives only the briefest notices. The record of a half-century is compressed into a few lines (e.g., the reign of Manasseh). This was due simply to the 'pragmatic' or didactic aim of the historian. He selected from his sources only those things that seemed best suited to his main purpose. The signs of the compiler's hand are manifold. (1) He makes definite reference to three works as authorities (cf. I K 11 41, 14 19, 29, and see below, § 4). (2) The constant recurrence of certain favorite formulas, which form the framework, as it were, of the whole. (a) Those by which a reign is introduced, which include, when complete, the synchronism with the contemporaneous reign in the other kingdom, the name of the king, his age, length of reign, name of queen-mother, and a statement as to his character (I K 14 21, 22 41 f., etc.). (b) Those by which the account of a reign is closed, which include a reference to the editor's authority, a notice of the king's death and burial, and the name of his successor (I K 11 41 ff., 14 19 f., 29, 31, 15 7 f., etc.). (3) The synchronistic scheme, according to which the accession of a king in one kingdom is dated according to the regnal year of the contemporaneous king in the other. This appears as a regular element of the formula (2) (a) just noted, and is carried through the entire period of the divided kingdom. It is not likely that these synchronisms were in the original authorities; they were probably computed by the editor on the basis of figures found in his sources. (4) The presence of a large number of passages, scattered through the work, all revealing the same religious point of view and holding a most important place in the general composition of the work. Some of them appear conspicuously in the framework (cf. (2) above) as judgments on the character of the individual kings, while others of more extended character seek to show why misfortunes came upon different kings or the nation (e.g., I K 11 1-13, 32-39, 15 4 f., 29-31; II K 17 18-23, etc.). The standpoint from which these are written is the 'Deuteronomic.' Kings are condemned for worshiping at the high places, a practise clearly contrary to the Deuteronomic theory of one only legitimate sanctuary. The sins of Solomon, of Jeroboam, of N. Israel in general, and of Manasseh are all of just the kind that are especially condemned in Dt. The doctrine that the national prosperity was directly dependent upon its loyalty to J", and that disloyalty would surely be visited with heavy retribution is also a cardinal doctrine of Dt (see DEUTERONOMY, § 8). Along with such passages as these, a number of others, which are similar in literary style and mode of thought, will naturally be classed as from the compiler rather than from his sources.

The narrative of K is carried down to the time when Evil-merodach, King of Babylon (562–560 B.C.), released the captive Jehoiachin, of Judah, from prison, i.e., some time later than 561. This makes the book, as it stands, of exilic (or possibly post-exilic) date. There are also a number of editorial sections, such as II K 17 19 f., 21 10-15, 23 26 f., possibly also I K 9 6-9, where an exilic point of view seems presupposed. But over against these indications of exilic date there are others which imply an earlier date for large portions of the work. (1) The frequently recurring expression "unto this day" can be assigned often only to the editor (not to his source), and refers to conditions that passed away with the Exile (cf. I K 8 8, 9 21, 12 19; II K 8 22, 16 6). In other instances, as I K 10 12; II K 17 23, 41, a pre-exilic date for the phrase is not certain, but it is probable, while in others, as II K 10 27, it may belong to the source used by the compiler. (2) The presence of two separate strata in the editorial matter. One such stratum has just been referred to as evidence of exilic, or post-exilic, date. The other, however, seems to demand a pre-exilic date—that is, there seems to be no consciousness, on the part of the writer, of the fall of Jerusalem, or of the cessation of the rule of David's line, or of the captivity of Judah (e.g., I K 8 22-43, 11 29-39; II K 8 19, 17 18-23, in which vs. 19 f. are a later insertion). The conclusion, therefore, to which the evidence seems to point is that the work was composed before the fall of Jerusalem (586 B.C.), and that during or shortly after the Exile it was revised, and also supplemented by the addition of the account of the downfall of the Judæan kingdom, all in the same spirit as that in which the original book had been written. The work as we have it is thus, in the main, the work of two editors, whom we may call R^1 and R^2.

The date of the first draft of the work by R^1 can not well have been earlier than the publication and adoption of the book of Deuteronomy as the standard exposition of Israel's religious constitution in 621 B.C. (see DEUTERONOMY, § 5). The influence of Dt is evident in all parts of the work. It extends even to minute points of phraseology (cf. the long lists of identical, or similar, expressions in K and Dt collected by Driver, LOT, pp. 200–203, and by Burney in HDB, II, pp. 859–861). The probability is, therefore, that some one, profoundly influenced by Dt and the reformation of Josiah's time, also perhaps by the earnest appeals and denunciations of Jeremiah, undertook to compile a history of the kingdom in which the great religious and moral teachings of Dt would be seen to be illustrated and enforced in the actual course of events. The exact date of R^1 can not be fixed. In view of his reference in II K 24 5 to one of his sources as containing a full account of Jehoiakim's reign (608–597), it is probable that he wrote in Zedekiah's reign (597–586), on the eve of the fall of the kingdom. The date of the second revision by R^2 does not need to be placed later than the Return (536). Somewhere between 561 and 536 satisfies all conditions, as the few passages that seem to show acquaintance with the Priests' Code (I K 6 1a, "most holy place" 6 16, "the golden altar" 7 48, a few expressions in 8 1-7, and II K 18 31b) can easily be accounted for as late glosses.

The compiler R^1 had at his disposal a number of sources, some of which he names, while others can be detected by close study of the work. The sources named are "the book of the acts of Solomon" (I K 11 41), "the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah" (I K 14 29, etc., cited for all reigns except those of Ahaziah, Athaliah, Jehoahaz, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah), and "the book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel" (I K 14 19, etc., cited for all reigns except those of Jehoram and Hoshea). (1) The "book of the acts of Solomon" must have been one of the main sources used by R^1 for his history of Solomon's reign (I K chs. 1–11). But he did not draw all his information from this work. The introductory part of the account of Solomon (I K chs. 1–2) was, in the main, taken from the history of David's reign in Jerusalem (see DAVID, § 2 (3), and SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. The remainder of the account of Solomon's reign (chs. 3–11) comprises three main kinds of material: (a) Annalistic and statistical notices, such as we find in 3 1, 4 1-28, 9 10-28, 10 14-20, 26, 28 f.; (b) an extended account of the building of the Temple and of its furnishings in 6 2–7 51; (c) a series of notices, all serving to show Solomon's great wisdom and glory (3 6a, 7-13, 16-28, 5 1 f., 6-11, 13-18, 8 1-13, 62-66 [?], 10 1-10, 13), with which 11 14-25 may be connected. Of these three groups it is likely that (b) was taken by R^1 from a larger description of the Temple, perhaps preserved in its archives; (c) comprises just the kind of material we should expect to find in a "book of the acts of Solomon," while (a) was probably derived ultimately from the royal annals of Solomon's reign. Whether (a) was found by R^1 in the "book of the acts of Solomon," or was gathered by him directly from the royal archives or through some intermediate source is difficult to decide. It is more probable that (a) was not a part of the "acts." (2) The exact nature of the two books "of the chronicles of the kings" of Judah and Israel is difficult to determine. The designation 'book of the words (i. e., deeds or affairs) of the days' is the technical term for official records (i.e., chronicles) such as would be kept by one of the court officials (I K 4 3; cf. Ezr 4 15, 19, 5 17, 6 1 f.; Neh 12 23; Est 2 23, etc.). And as these works are referred to as sources of information for only such things as would naturally have a place in official records, it is natural to infer that such records are meant by this term. Modern scholars generally, but for no cogent reasons, reject this view, and think that two comprehensive historical works (perhaps based largely on the archives) were meant. In any case, much of the precise detailed information in K regarding the two kingdoms, such as the length of the different reigns, the specific events of these reigns, etc., must have been derived primarily from official records. But there is also much in K that may well have been drawn by R^1 from other sources. The story of Elijah, especially in I K chs. 17–19 and 21, and most of the story of Elisha in II K chs. 2–8 were derived probably from written 'prophetic' histories of these men. There are also accounts too extended and of too general a character to have been drawn immediately from official annals, though largely political in character, and not marked by that specifically religious tone that distinguishes the 'prophetic' stories. These may well have been taken from written narratives of a popular nature, dealing with important events of both kingdoms. Another special source seems to have been a biography of Isaiah, used for certain events of Hezekiah's reign. The following tabular presentation of the distribution of the sources (with the symbols by which they are frequently designated by modern scholars) used by R^1 may be found useful:

A. (Annals, or official records including the "books of the chronicles of the kings"), I K $3^{1\,f.}$, $4^{1\text{-}19,\ 22\,f.,\ 26\text{-}28}$, $9^{10\text{-}14,\ 23\text{-}28}$, $10^{11\,f.}$ (?), $^{16\text{-}20,\ 26,\ 28\,f.}$, $11^{26\text{-}31,\ 40}$, $12^{1\text{-}16,\ 18\,f.}$, $14^{1\text{-}6,\ 12,\ 18,\ 25\text{-}28}$, $15^{16\text{-}22,\ 27\text{-}29}$, $16^{9\text{-}11,\ 15a\text{-}18,\ 21\,f.,\ 23b\text{-}24,\ 34}$; $22^{49\,f.}$; II K 1^{1} $8^{20\text{-}22}$, $10^{32\,f.}$, $11^{1\text{-}12,\ 18b\text{-}20}$, $12^{18\,f.}$, $13^{3,\ 7,\ 22,\ 24\,f.}$, $14^{5\text{-}6a,\ 7\text{-}14,\ 19\text{-}22,\ 25}$, $15^{5,\ 10,\ 14,\ 16,\ 19\,f.,\ 25,\ 29\,f.}$, $16^{5\text{-}9,\ 17\,f.}$, $17^{3\text{-}6,\ 24\text{-}28}$(?), 18^{4} (?), ^{8} (?), ^{10} (in part), $^{13b\text{-}16}$, $21^{23\,f.}$, $22^{3\text{-}15,\ 20\,b}$, $23^{1\text{-}4a,\ 6\text{-}15,\ 21\text{-}24,\ 29\text{-}30,\ 33\text{-}35}$, $24^{1,\ 7}$.

S. (Acts of Solomon), I K $3^{4\text{-}13,\ 15\text{-}28}$, $5^{1,\ 10\,f.}$ (?), $^{12\text{-}18}$, $8^{1\text{-}9}$ (nearly all), $^{10\text{-}13}$, $10^{1\text{-}10,\ 13}$, $11^{14\text{-}25}$.

T. (History of the building of the Temple and Palace), $6^{2\text{-}6,\ 8\text{-}10,\ 15\text{-}21,\ 23\text{-}28,\ 31\text{-}7\ 51}$.

Ej. (Stories of Elijah), I K $17^{1\text{-}18\ 30,\ 32b\text{-}19\ 9a,\ 11b\text{-}21}$, $21^{1\text{-}20a,\ 27\text{-}29}$; II K $1^{2\text{-}8}$.

Es. (Stories of Elisha), II K $2^{1\text{-}24}$, $4^{1\text{-}6\ 23}$, $8^{1\text{-}15}$, $13^{14\text{-}21}$.

N. (Stories of the Northern Kingdom), I K $20^{1\text{-}34}$, $22^{1\text{-}37}$, II K $3^{4\text{-}27}$, $6^{24\text{-}7\ 20}$, $9^{1\text{-}6,\ 11\text{-}28,\ 30\text{-}10\ 27}$.

Jud. (Judæan stories), II K $12^{5\text{-}17}$, $16^{10\text{-}16}$.

Is. (Biography of Isaiah), II K $18^{17\text{-}20\ 19}$.

The remainder of the work, not covered by these references, can be considered as editorial, belonging either to the main editor (R^1), or to his later reviser (R^2), or to later hands (R^1). Sections that may be assigned to R^2 or R^1 are: I K $4^{20f.,\ 24\,f.}$, $8^{44\text{-}61}$, $9^{6\text{-}9}$, $13^{1\text{-}33a}$, 15^{6}, 16^{7}, 18^{31}, $19^{9b\text{-}11a}$, $20^{35\text{-}43}$, 22^{38}; II K $1^{9\text{-}17a}$, $13^{4\text{-}6,\ 12\,f.,\ 23}$, $14^{17,\ 26\,f.}$, $17^{7\text{-}17,\ 19,\ 29\text{-}40}$, $21^{7\text{-}15}$, $23^{16\text{-}20,\ 26\,f.}$, $24^{2\,f.,\ 8\text{-}25\ 30}$.

5. Chronological Scheme.

In K there are two separate sets of chronological data. (1) The length of each reign in both kingdoms. (2) The synchronism of each reign with that of the contemporary king in the sister kingdom. Theoretically, these two ought to harmonize perfectly, and ought to agree also with the well-established data of contemporary Assyrian chronology. But this is not the case, nor do the two parallel lists of figures for the separate reigns of the two kingdoms for a given period, when added, give the same total. Thus for the period from the disruption to the contemporaneous accession of Jehu in Israel and usurpation of Athaliah in Judah we have these figures:

Judah.		Israel.
Rehoboam	17 years (16)	Jeroboam	22 years (21)
Abijam	3 " (2)	Nadab	2 " (1)
Asa	41 " (40)	Baasha	24 " (23)
Jehoshaphat	25 " (24)	Elah	2 " (1)
Jehoram	8 " (7)	Zimri	(7 days)
Ahaziah	1 " (1)	Omri	12 years (11)
		Ahab	22 " (21)
		Ahaziah	2 " (1)
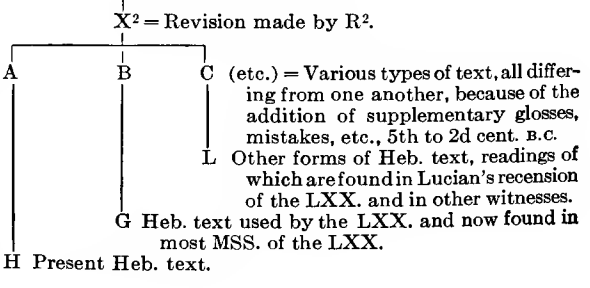
	95 years (90)		98 years (90)

Here is an apparent discrepancy of 3 years. But the length of each reign is evidently only approximate. Rehoboam's reign, e.g., was not exactly 17 years to a day, but probably 16+ or possibly even 16−, the year to which the last part of one reign and the first part of the next belonged is counted twice, and in the case of short reigns (1 year or 2 years) even a few months might be reckoned as 2 years. Consequently, there is probably no real discrepancy between these two lists. But if, on the basis of these figures, one attempts to construct a synchronistic table, he will find that it will not agree with the synchronisms given in K and supposedly constructed from the same figures. In most instances, in the synchronism, 1 year is deducted from the figures given for the separate reigns, but this is not always the case. For the next period, from the accessions of Athaliah and Jehu to the fall of Samaria, the difference between the totals of the two lists is about 20 years—about 160 years for Judah and 144 years for Israel—and as the actual length of the period was only about 120 years (842–722 B.C.), it is evident that serious errors must be charged to the text as we now find it. For the next period, from 722 to 586 (the fall of Jerusalem) the (single) list of figures for the kings of Judah is approximately accurate. The necessary corrections to be made in the figures of the second period can be seen in the article Chronology of the O T.

6. Text.

The Heb. text of K as now found in MSS. presents serious difficulties, and in many places the difference between it and the ancient versions, especially the LXX., is very considerable. Furthermore, MSS. of the LXX. reveal the presence of at least two different types of text as known to these translators. For details, reference must be made to the literature noted below. The textual history of K may be roughly represented thus:



In spite of the fact that K is a didactic or 'pragmatic' historical work, there is no sufficient ground for charging the compiler (R[1]) with wilfully distorting or suppressing the truth. He gave the facts as he found them in his sources, although he selected only such facts as he thought useful for his general purpose. His interpretation of the facts was also dictated by an earnest and high-minded motive. That he took Dt as a standard was due to the commanding influence that book had attained in his day. The legendary character of a part of his material, e.g., some of the stories told of Elijah and Elisha, can not be laid to his charge. It was a most important task to which he addressed himself, and it is due to him alone that we of to-day possess a working outline of the history of Israel during its most important period.

7. Historical Value.

LITERATURE: The commentaries of Benzinger (1899), Kittel (1900), and Skinner (New Century Bible, 1905); Driver, LOT; Burney, Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Books of Kings (1903), also his article on Kings in HDB. E. E. N.

KING'S DALE (in Gn 14 17 referred to as "the vale of Shaveh, the same is the King's Vale" ["dale" AV]): The place where Abraham was met by the King of Sodom and Melchizedek on returning from his victory over Chedorlaomer. It is also mentioned as the place where Absalom erected a memorial to himself (II S 18 18). It was probably near Jerusalem. The word rendered "vale" means 'valley land,' or a 'low lying plain,' in distinction from hilly land. See also JERUSALEM, § 8. E. E. N.

KING'S POOL. See JERUSALEM, § 10.

KINSMAN: (1) In the majority of the occurrences of this term in the O T, it is the rendering of gō'ēl, 'redeemer,' 'avenger,' ptcpl. of gā'al, 'to redeem,' 'to avenge.' It referred originally to the duty of every tribesman, or clansman, to support or avenge the cause of his tribe, clan, or family, and thus easily became the term whereby to designate one's nearest relatives. (2) In Ru 2 1, II K 10 11 (cf. RV), and Pr 7 4 the Heb. term means literally 'acquaintance.' (3) In Job 19 14 and Ps 38 11 (cf. RV) the Heb. means 'one who is near.' (4) In Lv 18 12 f., 17 and Nu 27 11 it means 'flesh,' i.e., 'blood relation.' (5) In the N T the one term is συγγενής, i.e., 'relative' (in various degrees: Mk 6 4; Lk 1 36, 58, 2 44, 14 12, 21 16; Jn 18 26; Ac 10 24; Ro 9 3, 16 7, 11, 21 when 'fellow Jew' is perhaps meant). See also FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 8. E. E. N.

KIR, kẹr (קִיר, qīr), 'wall': 1. A land and a people under Assyrian rule. According to Am 9 7 it was the original home of the Aramæans (i.e., those of Damascus) and the country to which they were deported (Am 1 5; II K 16 9) by Tiglath-pileser. The LXX., however, omits Kir in II K 16 9, and it may have been inserted from Am 1 5. This people served in the Assyrian army (Is 22 6). No mention of the place has been found in inscriptions. The more common identification of Kir has been with the river Kur in N. Armenia. A comparison of Is 21 2 and 22 6 suggests that it was in the far East, as in 21 2 Media and Elam appear, and in 22 6 Kir and Elam. 2. 'Kir' is also used as the first part of the names of Moabite cities (see next article). C. S. T.

KIR (of) MOAB (קִיר־מוֹאָב, qīr-mō'ābh): The name of an important city of Moab, and connected with Ar (of) Moab (Is 15 1). Some consider the two places identical. Buhl (Geog. des alten Palästina, p. 269 f.) suggests that Ar of Moab is the name of a district S. of the Arnon, of which Kir Moab, the modern Rabba (Rabbath Moab), was the chief city. Others identify it with Kir-hareseth (q.v.). C. S. T.

KIR-HARASETH, kẹr''-hạ-rê'seth, -HARESETH, -hạ-rî'seth, -HARESH, -hê'resh, -HERES, -hî-res (קִיר חֲרֶשֶׂת, qīr-ḥărāseth [II K 3 25], ק' חֲרֶשֶׂת, -ḥăreseth [Is 16 7], ק' חָרֶשׂ, -ḥāres [Is 16 11; Jer 48 31]; ק' חֶרֶשׂ, -ḥeres [Jer 48 36]): The Targum has Kerak in all five passages, and "Kerak in Moab" for "Kir Moab" in Is 15 1. It is the modern El-kerak, fortress, on the wâdi of the same name, E. of the Dead Sea, above the peninsula, Lisân. From II K 3 21, 24 f. it was evidently not far from the southern boundary of Moab and was a fortified city. It lies on a precipitous hill, only slightly connected on the eastern side with the highlands. Its summit was originally accessible only through two rock tunnels. The present walls are largely medieval; only the lower portions are ancient. Water was provided for by means of deep wells, cisterns, and tanks. To-day the population is 20,000, among them 2,500 Greek Christians. They are half nomadic, rough, and hostile. Buhl identifies Kir-haraseth with Kerak, but not with Kir Moab (Is 15 1), which he places farther to the north. C. S. T.

KIRIATH, kẹr'i-ath (קִרְיַת, qiryath, Kirjath AV), 'city of': K. is the construct form of qiryāh, 'city,' and forms the first element in a number of compound city-names. 1. K. is found alone once (Jos 18 28) for K-jearim (see 5 below). 2. K.-arba, 'city of Arba,' an ancient name for Hebron (Gn 23 2; Jos 14 15, etc. See HEBRON). 3. K.-arim and K.-baal, see 5 below. 4. K.-huzzoth (K-ḥūtsōth), 'city of streets' (though the LXX. favors 'city of sheepfolds'), a city of Moab (Nu 22 39). Site unknown. 5. K.-jearim, 'city of forests (or thickets).' An important town of Judah, on the W. boundary-line of Benjamin (Jos 15 9, 60, 18 14 f.). Once it is called Kiriath (Jos 18 28), also Baalah (Jos 15 9; I Ch 13 6), K.-baal (Jos 15 60, 18 14), and Baale-judah (II S 6 2). It was an ancient Canaanite city, one of the league to which Gibeon belonged (Jos 9 17), and was doubtless once a seat of Baal worship. It was here that the Ark of J" rested, after the Philistines returned it to Israel, until David removed it thence to Jerusalem (I S 6 21, 7 1 f.; II S 6 2 f.; I Ch 13 5 f.; II Ch 1 4; cf. Ps 132 6). K. was the home of the prophet Urijah, who was put to death by Jehoiakim (Jer 26 20 ff.). The town was reoccupied in post-exilic times (Ezr 2 25; Neh 7 29). At some time during its history it seems to have received a contingent of Calebites from Hebron (I Ch 2 50-53). In spite of its importance and the many references to it, the site of K. is uncertain. It was near Mt. Jearim (Jos 15 10), and according to Eusebius (Onom.) 9 Rom. m. from Jerusalem on the way to Lydda (Map II, E 1). 6. K.-sannah and K.-sepher, two names for the town otherwise known as Debir (q.v.) (Jos 15 49, 15 15 f.; Jg 1 11 f.). E. E. N.

KIRIATHAIM, kĭr''i-a-thê'im (קִרְיָתַיִם, qiryāthayīm), 'double city': 1. A city in the old Moabite territory assigned to Reuben (Nu 32 37; Jos 13 19), and afterward reoccupied by Moab (Jer 48 1, 23; Ezk 25 9). Shaveh-Kiriathaim, i.e., 'the plain of K.' (Gn 14 5), was probably the level highland around K. Map II, J 2. See also Moabite Stone, line 10, under MESHA. 2. See KARTAN. E. E. N.

KIRIATH-ARIM, -ê'rim. See KIRIATH (5).

KIRIATH-BAAL, kĭr''i-ath-bê'al (קִרְיַת-בַּעַל, qiryath ba'al), 'city of Baal.' See KIRIATH (5).

KIRIATH-HUZOTH, -hiū'zŏth (קִרְיַת-חֻצוֹת, qiryath hūtsōth), 'city of streets': A city of Moab (Nu 22 39). Site unknown. E. E. N.

KISH (קִישׁ, qīsh; Cis in N T, Ac 13 21 AV), probably the name of an old Semitic deity (cf. Wellhausen, *Reste arab. Heidenthums*², p. 67): 1. A wealthy man of the tribe of Benjamin. He was the father of Saul, the first king of Israel (I S 9 1 ff., 10 11; I Ch 8 33, etc.). A variant genealogy appears to be given in I Ch 8 30, but the notices here (in vs. 29-32) are fragmentary, and some other Kish may be meant. 2. A Levite (I Ch 23 21 f., 24 29). 3. Another Levite (II Ch 29 12). 4. An ancestor of Mordecai (Est 2 5). E. E. N.

KISHI, kish'ai (קִישִׁי, qīshī): A Levite (I Ch 6 44; called Kushaiah in I Ch 15 17). E. E. N.

KISHION, kish'i-ŏn (קִשְׁיוֹן, qishyōn): A city of Issachar (Jos 19 20) assigned to the Levites (21 28). Map III, F 1. E. E. N.

KISHON, kish'ŏn, and KISON, kis'ŏn (קִישׁוֹן, qīshōn, always with nāḥāl, river), 'stream of (the god) Kish'?: The name of a river watering the Plain of Esdraelon or Megiddo, the modern Nahr el-muqaṭṭa. Map IV, B 7, C 8. Its N. arm rises in springs (el-Mezra'ah) W of Tabor, its S. arm near Mt. Gilboa (Jelbōn), which meet in the plain under Megiddo (called the "waters of Megiddo," Jg 5 19). The river then flows between Carmel (I K 18 40) and the southern Galilean hills, across the plain of Acre, emptying into the bay of Acre N. of Ḥaifa. Water is found in its bed during the whole year only in the last 7 m. of its course, in which it receives an abundant supply from springs in Mt. Carmel, and from two streams from the NE. emptying into it in the plain of Acre. In the rainy season, however, the streams from the hills of Galilee and Ephraim become rushing torrents, dangerous to chariots and horsemen (Jg 4 7, 13, 5 21; Ps 83 9 [10]), and overflow the whole plain, which is settled only on the higher ground about it (cf. G. A. Smith's instructive description of the campaign against Sisera in HGHL, pp. 391 ff.). There are always deep and treacherous pools along its course, and in the plain of Acre it seems to lose itself in marshes E. of Ḥaifa. It is probably "the brook before Jokneam" (Jos 19 11). C. S. T.

KISS: The kiss was the expressive token of a variety of sentiments: (1) Friendship, especially in greeting among equals (Ex 4 27). The abuse of it constituted the aggravation of the treachery of Judas (Mt 26 49). (2) Good will at parting (Gn 31 28; Ru 1 14). (3) Submission, or reverence (Job 31 27; Ps 2 12). (4) Worship, especially in idolatrous practise (I K 19 18; Hos 13 2). A. C. Z.

KITHLISH, kith'lish. See CHITHLISH.

KITRON, kit'ron. See KATTAH.

KITTIM, kit'im (כִּתִּים, kittīm; frequently Chittim AV): According to the table of nations (Gn 10 4), Kittim, with Elishah, Tarshish, and Dodanim, are the "sons" of Javan, i.e., they are the Ionian Greeks. In Phœnician inscriptions Cyprus is known as Kition (kty). Originally this was the name of a town on the S. coast of the island, now known as Larnaka. This place was of such importance that the Hebrews applied the name to the inhabitants of the entire island. The exclusive application of the term Kittim to the Greek inhabitants of Cyprus (Gn 10 4) is based upon the knowledge that there was a Greek population before the Phœnician immigration, but in Is 23 1, 12 the prophet uses this name for the Phœnicians who had colonized the island. The "isles of Kittim," the antipodes of Kedar (Jer 2 10), form a comprehensive geographical term, in all probability including the coasts of Greece and Asia Minor, as well as the islands of the E. Mediterranean. In Dn 11 30 it is predicted that the ships of Kittim will come against one of the kings of "the North," i.e., Antiochus Epiphanes. In this instance the reference is to the Romans, as the LXX. clearly proves. According to I Mac 1 1, Alexander the Great came from the land of Kittim; here it is equivalent to Greece. The last two passages, together with Nu 24 24, point to the conclusion that Kittim was used as a comprehensive geographical designation, including Italy and Sicily, as well as Greece and her islands. In Ezk 27 6 Kittim is spoken of as a source of boxwood for the Tyrians. See also ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11. J. A. K.

KNEADING-TROUGH. See FOOD, § 2.

KNEEL: This term renders the Heb. b'ārakh, literally 'to bless,' 'to pray (for blessing),' and the Gr. γονυπετεῖν, 'to fall on the knees,' also the nouns berekh and γόνυ, 'knee,' in construction with such verbs as 'to bend,' 'bow,' etc. A man knelt to show homage or reverence to God (Is 45 23; Ro 14 11; Ph 2 10) or Baal (I K 19 18; Ro 11 4), and to worship and pray, usually with the hands stretched out, as if before an idol (I K 8 54; II Ch 6 13; Ezr 9 5; Dn 6 10; Lk 22 41; Ac 7 60, 9 40, 20 36, 21 5). By kneeling as well as by prostration (Ru 2 10; Lk 17 16), a man did homage to his king or superior (Lk 5 8); in mockery Mk 15 19). This homage he showed often when presenting a petition (II K 1 13; Mt 17 14; Mk 1 40, 10 17). C. S. T.

KNIFE: The earliest knives were of flint (Jos 5 2 f.; cf. RV), which were gradually displaced by those of bronze or iron. The shape of an ordinary knife was that of a dagger or dirk. The words used are not especially distinctive. In Gn 22 6, 10; Jg 19 29, and Pr 30 14, the Heb. term ma'kheleth signifies the large knife used for slaying animals. In Jos 5 2 f., I K 18 28, and Ezk 5 1 f., the term herebh is that usually rendered "sword." In Pr 23 2 and Ezr 1 9 the text is perhaps corrupt, originally not reading "knife." See also ARMS AND ARMOR, § 2, and FOOD, § 11. E. E. N.

KNOP. See TEMPLE, § 13.

KNOW, KNOWLEDGE: The several Heb. and Gr. terms rendered "know" (yādha', the most comprehensive term in Heb.; nākhar, 'to scrutinize carefully,' and then 'to know'; γιγνώσκειν and compounds; οἶδα, ἐπίσταμαι, and their derived nouns) are used to express many shades of meaning, too numerous to be discussed at length here. These meanings vary from the simplest kind of objective perception to the more subtle processes of moral and religious understanding. The Biblical writers had no philosophic theories of knowledge, and no abstruse metaphysical meanings should be read into their words, which are always to be taken in the sense naturally suggested by their contexts.

God's knowledge is not specifically differentiated from man's. The distinction drawn by the Biblical writers is one of degree rather than of kind. Whereas man's knowledge is limited and also seriously impaired by his moral imperfection, God's knowledge, not subject to such limitations, is all-comprehensive and perfect. The deep-seated reverence of the Semitic mind tended to check undue curiosity in prying into such secrets. The Hebrew was content to say "such knowledge is too wonderful for me" (Ps 139 9). The skepticism which carelessly said "What doth God know?" (Job 22 13; Ps 73 11; Is 5 19 ff.; cf. 22 13 f., 29 15) was utterly revolting to the devout Hebrew. The primitive anthropomorphic mode of thought shows itself occasionally, as in the old narratives in Gn ch. 3 f., 11 1-9, etc., where God's ability to know or discover all things—e.g., human actions—is not viewed as immediate omniscience, but as dependent partly upon investigation. However, as time passed the sense of His omniscience impressed itself ever more strongly, and was expressed most significantly in passages like Job 21 22, 23 10, 28 23, chs. 38–40; Is chs. 40–48, etc. Especial emphasis was laid upon God's knowledge of the human heart, and in this fact the devout Israelite found great comfort (cf. Pss 1 6, 37 18, 44 21, 69 5, 94 11, 103 14, 139 1 ff., etc.). Naturally, this conviction of the all-knowing and all-directing wisdom of God was a fundamental postulate of Hebrew prophecy.

As to man's knowledge, that on which the Bible lays especial emphasis are its religious and moral aspects. In the O T knowledge of God is the essence of religion, and while God is held to be infinite and surrounded by mystery and so, in a sense, unknowable (cf Job 36 24 ff.), this was not allowed to interfere with religion or ethics, both of which, in Hebrew thought, rested on a knowledge of God. Even the strong sense of the limitations of human knowledge did not drive the author of Ec to atheism, irreligion, or immorality. It was all-important that the Israelite should know that "J" is God" (Ex 7 17, 16 12, 31 13; Ezk 6 7, etc.). But such knowledge, which might be purely theoretical or formal, or might be taught by the severe discipline of events, still lacked something. Not simply to know "that J" is God," but to "know him" as God personally, experientially is the supreme demand of the religious teachers of the O T, especially the prophets (e.g., Hos 4 6, 6 6; Mic 6 8; Jer 31 34, etc.). That this involved necessarily a moral surrender on man's part, and was thus very different from speculative intellectualism, or from mere formalism, should need no proof to any reader of the O T. It is the "fear" (i.e., reverence) of J" that is the "beginning" of knowledge (Pr 1 7).

In the N T it is the knowledge of God in or through Christ that is set forth as the climax of spiritual as well as moral attainment (Mt 11 27; Jn 17 3; Ph 3 8-10, etc.). Christ Himself alone knows God the Father fully (Mt 11 27; cf. Jn 7 29, 8 55, etc.) as well as knowing all that is in man (Jn 2 24). Consequently, through Him alone man can come to the highest knowledge of God. But both in the Fourth Gospel and in Paul, this knowledge is never allowed to pass over into intellectual speculation or to become mere theory. It is always held to consist in the highest and fullest development of the moral nature. It always necessarily includes the surrender of the will to, and the bestowal of the affections upon, Jesus Christ in a personal, not theoretical, act which is to be completed in a life full of good and loving service to God and man (cf. Jn 7 17, 8 31 f., 10 14, 14 7 ff.; Ro 1 21; I Co 13 2, 8 3; I Jn 2 3, etc.). And while Paul sometimes finds it hard to choose words adequate to express his rapture as he thinks what it means to "know" God in Christ, it is very instructive to note how he always holds himself and his readers down to the fundamental personal, ethical, experiential elements of this knowledge (e.g., in I Co ch. 13 f.).

KOA, kō'a (קוֹעַ, qōa'): A term mentioned only in Ezk 23 23 ("Pekod and Shoa and Koa and all the Assyrians"). Shoa and Koa are often coupled in the Assyrian inscriptions, however, where they appear as the Sutû and Kutû (or Guti; cf. "Goiim," Gn 14 1), peoples dwelling E. of the Tigris on the steppes between the upper courses of the Adhem and Diyaleh rivers. L. G. L.

KOHATH, kō'hath (קְהָת, qᵉhāth): One of the sons of Levi (Gn 46 11; Ex 6 16-18; Nu 3 17) and the reputed ancestor of one of the great divisions of the Levites, the Kohathites. See PRIESTHOOD, § 9 d.

KOLAIAH, ko-lê'yā (קוֹלָיָה, qōlāyāh): 1. The father of the false prophet Ahab (Jer 29 21). 2. The head of a Benjamite family (Neh 11 7).

E. E. N.

KORAH, kō'rā (קֹרַח, qōraḥ), 'baldness': 1. A son of Esau (Gn 36 5, 14, 18; I Ch 1 35). 2. One of the "dukes" of Esau =Edom, perhaps a mere duplication of 1 (Gn 36 16). 3. A "son" of Hebron (I Ch 2 43; cf. 12 6, Korhite AV), probably a clan of Judah. 4. A Levite and the ancestral head of one of the gilds of Temple musicians, the Korahites (Ex 6 21, 24, Korhite AV; Nu 26 58, Korathite AV; I Ch 6 22; II Ch 20 19, Korhite AV; cf. the titles of Pss. 42, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 84, 85, 87, 88), also of a body of doorkeepers and assistants (I Ch 6 37, 9 19 [here the name is spelled Kore, קֹרֵא, qōrē'], 31, 26 1, Korhite AV, 19). It was this K. who rebelled against Moses in the desert (Nu 16 1-49, 26 9-11, 27 3). On the significance of this story see PRIESTHOOD, § 9a. E. E. N.

KORE, kō'rę (קֹרֵא, qōrē'): 1. A Korahite clan (I Ch 9 19, 26 1; on 26 19 cf. RV). 2. A Levite under Hezekiah (II Ch 31 14). E. E. N.

LAADAH, lê'a-dā (לַעְדָה, la'dāh): Probably a late clan of Judah, inhabiting Maresha (I Ch 4 21). E. E. N.

LAADAN, lê'a-dan. See LADAN.

LABAN, lê'ban (לָבָן, lābhān), 'white'; perhaps named from the Moon-god, who was worshiped at Haran, and of whom 'white' is an epithet: A descendant of Nahor, and brother of Rebekah. His covetousness is well characterized in Gn 24 30, where the sight of the presents sent by Abraham makes him obsequious in his courtesy. He is no more attractive on his next appearance, and his attempt to overreach Jacob by giving him Leah instead of Rachel (Gn 29 23) receives its reward in more than one stroke of poetic justice. The bargain which he makes with Jacob (Gn 30 31 ff.), laughing in his sleeve the while at Jacob's simplicity, leaves him unexpectedly with a dwindling flock (Gn ch. 31), while Jacob drives his sheep to a safe distance, providing beforehand for a three days' start when the time should be ripe for flight (Gn 30 36, 31 25). But the most unexpected blow of all was that Rachel should steal his teraphim (Gn 31 19). His story carries with it a satire upon the Aramæans, who had to be watched lest they fleeced their own kin, but whose cleverness often overshot itself. Laban and his sons left behind on the hither side of Galeed (Gn 31 48) are like a racial vestige, sloughed off as the Jacob-Israel nation developed into its larger heritage. A. S. C.

LACE: This word is the rendering of pāthīl (in Ex 28 28; etc.), which means the 'thread,' or 'string,' by which the rings of the breastplate were joined (laced) to the rings of the ephod. E. E. N.

LACHISH, lê'kish (לָכִישׁ, lākhīsh): A royal Canaanite city captured by Joshua (Jos 10 3, 31 f., 12 11, 15 39) and assigned to Judah. It was made a fortress for the defense of Judah (II Ch 11 9). It was to L. that Amaziah fled, but in vain, when he discovered that a conspiracy had been formed against him (II K 14 19; II Ch 25 27). Later (701 B.C.) Sennacherib besieged it (II K 18 17), and from his camp sent messengers to Hezekiah summoning him to yield to Assyrian suzerainty (see p. 94). It was to L., therefore, that Hezekiah sent the tribute required and made his submission (II K 18 14). Nebuchadrezzar also laid siege to the city (Jer 34 7). In the Amarna letters L. is represented as under Egyptian control. Until the excavations conducted in behalf of the PEF by Flinders Petrie (Tell el-Ḥesy, 1891) and F. J. Bliss (A Mound of Many Cities, 1893) the modern site was supposed to be Umm Lakis. These excavations have shown that Tell el-Ḥesy is the real site. Map II, C 2. Cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 234. A. C. Z.

LADAN, lê'dan (לַעְדָן, la'dān, Laadan AV): 1. An Ephraimite (I Ch 7 26; cf. Eleadah, ver. 20). 2. The ancestral head of a division of the Gershonite Levites (I Ch 23 7-9, 26 21). See also LIBNI. E. E. N.

LADDER: The translation of the Heb. ṣullām, which occurs only in Gn 28 12. A better rendering from the root-meaning would be 'a flight of steps.' The figure was suggested by the conformation of the mountains near Bethel, and was used to signify the communication between heaven and earth. Cf. ver. 17, "the gate of heaven." C. S. T.

LADY: In Is 47 5, 7 the RV gives the more correct rendering "mistress." In Jg 5 29 and Est 1 18 the Heb. sārāh means a 'princess,' or woman of rank. On II Jn 1 5 see JOHN, EPISTLES OF. E. E. N.

LAEL, lê'el (לָאֵל, lā'ēl), [belonging] 'to God': A Gershonite Levite, father of the "prince" of the family (Nu 3 24), to which was entrusted the care of the tabernacle and tent (Nu 3 25 f.). It is one of the many names in Nu in which 'ēl appears as a suffix. C. S. T.

LAHAD, lê'had (לָהַד, laḥadh): The ancestral head of a Zorahite family in Judah (I Ch 4 2). E. E. N.

LAHAI-ROI, la-hai'-rei. See BEER-LAHAI-ROI.

LAHMAM, lā'mam (לַחְמָם, laḥmām, in some MSS. laḥmās): A city of Judah (Jos 15 40). Map II, D 2. E. E. N.

LAHMI, lā'mai: In I Ch 20 5 we read, "Elhanan slew Lahmi brother of Goliath." In the ‖, II S 21 19, we read "Elhanan the Beth-lehemite slew Goliath." In the Heb. 'Beth-lehem' and '[the] Lahmi' are almost identical in appearance, and might easily be confused. But it is more likely that in Ch the text of II S has been altered to avoid contradicting I S ch. 17. E. E. N.

LAISH, lê'ish (לַיִשׁ, layish): I. The original name of the city Dan in the extreme N. of Israel (Jg 18 7 ff.), also called Leshem (Jos 19 47). See DAN. On Is 10 30 see LAISHAH. II. A Benjamite (I S 25 44; II S 3 15). E. E. N.

LAISHAH, la-ai'shā (לַיְשָׁה, layīshāh): A city of Benjamin, not far from Anathoth (Is 10 30). E. E. N.

LAKE OF FIRE. See ESCHATOLOGY, § 48.

LAKKUM, lak'kum (לַקּוּם, laqqūm, Lakum AV): A city of Naphtali (Jos 19 33). Site unknown. E. E. N.

LAMB: This term is in the Bible used in different senses: (1) In the literal sense, as the name of the young of the sheep, either male or female. As this animal was common in Palestine (see PALESTINE, § 24), there are many Heb. terms rendered "lamb." These are: (a) kebhes, kibhsāh, and kabhsāh (Ex 29 38; Gn 21 28; Lv 14 10). (b) kesebh, kisbhāh (Gn 30 40; Lv 5 6). (c) ṭāleh (I S 7 9; Is 65 25), also ṭela'īm (Is 40 11). (d) kar, especially of a half-grown ram (Dt 32 14; Am 6 4; Ps 37 20). (e) tsōn, 'flock' (Ex 12 21), also ben tsōn, 'a son of the flock' (Ps 114 4, 6). (f) seh (Gn 22 7; I S 17 34). (g) 'immᵉrīm (Ezr 6 9). (h) ἀμνός (Jn 1 29). (i) ἀρνός (Lk 10 3). (j) ἀρνίον (Jn 21 15; Rev 5 6, etc.). The place of the lamb in the sacrificial system was a conspicuous and important one (see SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, 5 ff.). In common life, its flesh furnished a delicate article of food (Am 6 4). It was not lawful to slaughter a lamb before it was eight days old (Lv 22 27). (2) Metaphorically, the figure of the lamb appears in poetic phraseology designed to convey the idea of harmlessness as contrasted with ferocity (Is 11 6), of guilelessness as contrasted with cunning (II S 12 3 ff.; Jer 11 19; Is 53 7), and of playfulness (Ps 114 4, 6). (3) Symbolically, the "Lamb" was a designation of Christ, with a twofold reference to the O T. In the testimony of John the Baptist (Jn 1 29, 36) to Jesus, the ἀμνός is evidently the lamb of Is 53 7, but in Rev 5 6 and passim the meaning is undoubtedly sacrificial, and Christ is viewed as the antetype of the pasehal lamb. A. C. Z.

LAME, LAMENESS. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (8).

LAMECH, lê'mec (לֶמֶךְ, lemekh): This name occurs in both of the genealogies of the antediluvian patriarchs (Gn 4 1-24 [J]; Gn ch. 5 [P]). In the former list, known as the Cainite genealogy, Lamech appears as the son of Methushael, and is represented as introducing polygamy into human society by marrying two wives — Adah and Zillah. The latter is the mother of Jabal, who is the father of tent-dwellers and herdsmen. The former bears Jubal, the ancestor of musicians, and Tubal-cain, the founder of metal industries. Thus the sons of L. are looked upon as the founders of civilization and the originators of the arts. The song of L. is a sword-lay, the boasting of an Arab sheik after the slaughter of his enemies (Gn 4 23-24 [J]). The ninth member of the second, or Sethite, genealogy also (Gn 5 26-29 [P]; cf. Lk 3 36) is Lameeh, a man of exemplary piety and father of Noah. The latter, like the sons of L. in the first list, figures as the promoter of civilization by being the first to introduce the culture of the vine (Gn 9 20). If the two genealogies are different Heb. versions of the same prehistorie Semitic tradition, as is now usually held, then instead of two patriarchs we have one. The Babylonian counterpart of L. (2) is Otiartes, or Ardates, the ninth of the antediluvian kings, who, according to Berossus, reigned for 12 sars, or 432,000 years. As L. is the father of Noah, so Otiartes is the father of Xisuthros, the hero of the Babylonian flood story. J. A. K.

LAMENTATION. See MOURNING AND MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 5.

LAMENTATIONS: One of the poetical books of the Bible usually placed in the EVV between Jeremiah and Ezekiel and attached to Jer as

1. Name. Ru is to Jg. The Eng. name is derived from the Latin Lamentationes Jeremiæ, which was used by the Fathers. The Vulgate title of the book, however (Threni Jeremiæ), is not a translation but a transliteration of the LXX. Θρῆνοι Ἰερεμίου. In the Heb. Bible the book is called אֵיכָה, 'ēkhāh, 'how?' from its first word, in analogy with many other Biblical books (see GENESIS, § 1; EXODUS, § 1, etc.), and in the usage of the Synagogue it is reckoned as one of the Five Rolls (Megilloth) and is included in the Hagiographa.

2. Structure and Contents. As extant, La consists of five chapters, each one of which is complete in itself (in spite of Ewald's contrary view). The first four of these consist of verses alphabetically arranged (acrostics). But here the identity of structural plan ends. In chs. 1 and 2 each letter of the Heb. alphabet is assigned one verse, and each verse consists of three members [clauses]. In ch. 3 each letter of the alphabet is given three verses, but each verse consists of a single member. In ch. 4 each letter is given one verse, and each verse consists of two members. Moreover, in chs. 2–4 the alphabetic arrangement deviates from the present order of the Heb. letters by placing פ before ע, a transposition which has never been satisfactorily explained. Finally, ch. 5, though consisting like the others of twenty-two verses, is not arranged as an acrostic. The literary form is that of the elegy (qīnāh) characterized by a special meter, the second line of which is shorter than the first — usually three accents followed by two. If this be regarded, as it is almost universally, the true form of Lamentations, each of the first four chapters is a separate elegy, and the fifth is a prayer. The general theme of the whole book is the grief of the faithful, in view of the desolation of the Holy City by the Babylonians in 586 B.C. In the first elegy the poet bewails the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the Temple (1 1-11), though he recognizes the event as a penalty for sin (vs. 5 and 8). Yet he laments her doom as a bitter and comfortless one (1 12-22). In the second elegy the desolation of the city and the horrors of the siege are once more brought into view (2 1-10), and their distressing features intensified by allusion to the joy of the enemies of Israel (vs. 11-17). The city itself is then represented as making her appeal to God to consider her distress (vs. 18-22).

The third elegy begins with a complaint of the poet in his own person (3 1-21), but proceeds to recall the love of God as the ground of Jerusalem's hope for the future (vs. 22-35). This leads to an exhortation to penitence and confession (vs. 36-55) and a prayer for vengeance upon the enemy (vs. 55-66). The fourth elegy bewails the fate successively of the people (4 1-6), the princes (vs. 7-11), the priests and prophets (vs. 12-16), and the king (vs. 17-20), and closes with a prediction of doom on Edom (ver. 21 f.). The last of the five poems in the book laments before J" the manifold sorrows of Zion (5 1-18), and pleads fervently for deliverance from them (vs. 19-22).

3. Authorship.

A very ancient tradition ascribes the authorship of La to the prophet Jeremiah. As early as the days of the Chronicler (c. 250 B.C.) a document, called "the lamentations" (qīnōth), was supposed to contain a dirge composed by Jeremiah upon the death of Josiah (II Ch 35 25). However, the only passage in La which may be construed as referring to Josiah is 4 20, which speaks of "the anointed of Jehovah," and this, though conceivably a mournful retrospect by Jeremiah of the fate of his friend Josiah (the last pious king of Judah), is almost certainly a reference to the fate of Zedekiah. Shortly after the age of the Chronicler (c. 200 B.C.) the LXX. translator of La into Greek incorporated the tradition at the opening of the book in the following words: "And it came to pass, after that Israel was made captive and Jerusalem laid desolate, that Jeremiah sat down weeping and lamented over Jerusalem, saying " Thus the belief found explicit written expression, and through the later Jewish history (Jos. Ant. X, 5 1; but Josephus mistakes La for a dirge to be used at Josiah's funeral), as well as by Christian writers (Jerome, in Zec. 12 11), La was uniformly and implicitly taken to be a work of Jeremiah's. This conclusion has the further support of internal considerations, such as the antecedent probability that the sensitive and emotional prophet who had witnessed the inevitable approach and culmination of Jerusalem's doom should give vent to meditative feeling after all was over, the linguistic resemblances between his prophecies and the style of La, and the fact that certain passages seem to have been written by an eye-witness. As against these considerations, which are generally confessed to be quite strong, it is argued (1) that it is unlikely that Jeremiah would deliberately express his grief in alphabetic dirges; (2) that the artificial form of the acrostic is inconsistent with the intensity of feeling which must have possessed the prophet at the time of the fall of Jerusalem; (3) that certain passages of La betray dependence on Ezk (cf. 2 14, 4 20 with Ezk 22 28, 19 24, etc. For a full list of parallels and echoes of Ezk see Cornill, Introd. to the O T, p. 416, and Löhr, ZATW, 1894); and (4) that Jeremiah could hardly be imagined as saying, "the prophets find no vision" (2 8), or as describing the weak Zedekiah as "the breath of our nostrils" (4 20), or as exclaiming, "our fathers have sinned and we have borne their iniquities" (5 7; cf. 31 29). On the ground of these considerations, the traditional assignment of the authorship of La to Jeremiah is much shaken.

4. Unity.

But the question of authorship is further involved in that of unity, and the starting-point for the denial of the unity of La is the consideration that one man would scarcely have made the same subject the topic of five different compositions. Further, there are internal characteristics evidencing differences of date (cf. EB, s.v.). Yet on attempting to assign the different parts to different authors analysis has not gone so far as to claim five authors for the book. Some (Thenius) hold that the 2d and 4th chs. were composed by Jeremiah, while the 1st, 3d, and 5th were by three other authors. Others (Stade and Budde [formerly]) believe chs. 1, 2, 4, and 5 to be the work of one author and ch. 3 of another. Most investigators, including Nöldeke, Löhr, Cornill, Wildeboer, and Budde [later] divide the elegies into three groups (chs. 2 and 4, 1 and 5, and 3), assigning each group to a separate author. But these attempts at analysis attach too much significance to slight and doubtful data, and are far from being established upon sound critical foundations. The authorship of chs. 1, 2, 4, and 5 by Jeremiah is quite probable. Ch. 3 was written at a later time, and perhaps by another author, but no part of the collection is later than 530 B.C.

LAMP: Properly the rendering of the Heb. nēr (LXX. λύχνος). The correlated Heb. m'nōrāh is translated "candlestick," and is used especially for the golden candlestick of the Tabernacle (Ex 25 31-35, etc.) and of the Temple (I K 7 49, etc.); while lapīdh (LXX. λαμπάς) (which in AV of Gn 15 17; Jg 7 16; Job 41 19; Ezk 1 13 is translated "lamp") is more properly rendered in RV by "torch." The Aram. nebhrashtā' (Dn 5 5, "candlestick") signifies a 'lamp' or 'light,' but the exact kind is uncertain. There is no description of a lamp in the Bible. All we know is that it had a wick of flax, pishtāh (Is 42 3, 43 17), which was saturated with the oil, shemen (Ex 25 6, 27 20). In general, the ancient lamps were the same as those in common use in the East to-day

(see illustration). From ancient times the lamp has been an indispensable household article, not alone of the dwelling-house, but even of the tent of the fellaḥīn. It was burned both day and night, not only to light the room of the tent, which was somewhat dark even in the daytime, but mainly in order that fire, which it was difficult to obtain easily, might always be at hand. Even at the present day among the Arabs it is only the very poor that sleep in the dark. If it be said of a man, "Poor fellow, he sleeps in the dark" ('ala l'atme), it is the same as saying: "He hasn't a penny left to buy oil; he has got to the end" (cf. Jer 25 10; Pr 13 9, 20 20). In the figurative language of the O T the burning lamp signifies the continuance of healthy, vigorous life, the extinguished lamp the reverse (cf. Ps 18 29; Pr 13 9, 20 20, 24 20, 31 18, etc.). In the N T we have φανός (in Jn 18 3 lantern EV), a 'light,' but it is not clear whether lamps or some kind of torches are meant, and λυχνία, lampstand (candlestick, in AV of Mt 5 15; Mk 4 21; Lk 8 16, 11 33, and also in RV of He 9 2; Rev 1 12, etc.). LANCE, LANCET. See Arms and Armor, § 1.

LAND: In most instances in the O T "land" is the rendering (1) of the Heb. 'ădhāmāh, 'ground,' 'soil,' properly used of arable land, but often used in a wider sense (cf. Dt 7 13 AV, for both usages); (2) of 'erets, which means 'land' as a portion of the earth's surface, and is properly used in such expressions as "land of Canaan," "land of Israel," etc. The great majority of occurrences of "land" are renderings of this term. In addition, we have (3) sādheh, 'field,' 'open country,' sometimes rendered "land" (Ru 4 3; I S 14 14, etc.). In the N T we find (4) ἀγρός, corresponding to (3) above, and (4) γῆ, corresponding to (2) above. Furthermore, we have (6) ξηρός, 'dry land' (Mt 23 15), (7) χώρα, 'region,' 'place,' 'country' (Mk 1 5; Lk 15 14; Ac 10 39), and (8) the diminutive χωρίον, 'small place,' 'plot of ground' (Ac 4 34, 5 3, 8). The land of promise (He 11 9) is the land of Canaan promised to Israel's ancestors (Ex 12 25; Dt 6 3, etc.). The expression "born in the land" (Lv 24 16; Nu 15 30 AV) is but one word in Heb. and is better rendered "home-born" as in RV. See also Country and Ground.

LAND CROCODILE. See Palestine, § 26.

LANDMARK: The rendering of the Heb. g'bhūl (nearly always rendered "border," q.v.) in Dt 19 14, 27 17; Pr 22 28, 23 10; and of g'bhūlāh in Job 24 2. The boundaries of the ancestral estates in ancient Israel, as in other nations, were considered sacred and inviolable (cf. the festivals in honor of the god Terminus in ancient Rome). E. E. N.

LAODICEA, lê-od''i-sî'a (Λαοδικεία): A now deserted site in the Lycus valley of ancient Phrygia. Its earlier names were Diospolis and Rhoas. Antiochus II, Theos, rebuilt it and named it after Laodice, his wife. It owed its wealth and importance chiefly to its situation at the forks of the great trade-route from the Cilician Gates to Ephesus and Pergamum. Little is known of its history. It belonged to the Seleucids till 190 B.C., when it was given by the Romans to Eumenes, King of Pergamum. Two generations later (133) it passed finally to Rome. Successive captures aided by frequent earthquakes caused its final abandonment. It was never a really great city, though it was populous, magnificent, a money center. When damaged by an earthquake (60 A.D.) it refused assistance from the imperial treasury (cf. Rev 3 17, "I am rich and have gotten riches and have need of nothing"). Its banking operations embraced the whole empire (cf. ver. 18, "I counsel thee to buy [through martyrdom, not as a gift] of me [not the filthy gold of thy banks, but] gold refined by fire, that thou mayest become rich [with true riches]." L. was also a great manufacturing center, having its trade chiefly in clothing. Its territory produced a breed of sheep (now extinct) with soft, glossy, black wool, needing no dyeing. This was manufactured into cloth, rugs, but chiefly into seamless black garments; also cloaks, the famous shirts, woven of thread of three thicknesses, called trimita, costly shirts with purple borders (paragandia), woolen rain-coats, embroidered outer garments (chlamides) (cf. Rev 3 18), "I counsel thee to buy of me [not the black garments of thy looms, but] white garments that thou mayest clothe thyself." L. produced many wealthy citizens (one of them, Hiero, gave the city over $1,000,000), and the remarkable family of the rhetor Zeno, whose son Polemon became king of Lycaonia (39 B.C.), king of Pontus (38 B.C.), and progenitor of a long line of kings and princes. It was the seat of the famous medical school at the shrine of Men Karou, whose physicians compounded the famous "Phrygian Powder" in cylindrical tablets, for the cure of ophthalmia (cf. Rev 3 18, "buy of me [not the tablets used by the physicians in your medical school, but true] eye-salve." Many Jews (7,500 adult freemen) were settled there by Antiochus the Great. It became Christian at an early period, but Rev 3 14 ff. shows that the first enthusiasm had cooled as a result of wealth. The Epistle "from the Laodiceans" (Col 4 16) was evidently Paul's encyclical letter which we have in the N T under the title "Epistle to the Ephesians" (q.v.). The Epistle to the Laodiceans, current in the Middle Ages, consists of excerpts from Paul's canonical Epistles and was doubtless compiled to satisfy the interest aroused by the foregoing reference in Col. Though Paul did not personally labor among the Laodiceans (Col 2 1), it is probable that it came within the personal work both of Philip and of the Apostle John. J. R. S. S.

LAPIDOTH, lap'i-doth (לַפִּידוֹת, lappīdhōth): The husband of Deborah (Jg 4 4). E. E. N.

LAPWING. See PALESTINE, § 25.

LASEA, la-sī'a (Λασέα): A very small island E. of Cape Lithinos, about the center of the S. coast of Crete, called Traphos, on which the town of Las(s)œa is located. Luke's mention of it in connection with Fair Havens (Ac 27 8) is the only known reference to it in antiquity. J. R. S. S.

LASHA, lē'sha (לֶשַׁע, lāsha'): A border town of Canaan (Gn 10 19), site unknown, but commonly located in SE. Palestine. Jerome (Quæst. in Gen. 10 19) identifies it with the hot springs of Callirrhoë, mentioned by Pliny and Josephus, situated in the Wâdy Zerka Ma'īn, in Moab. Dillmann, Com. on Gen., ad loc., thinks this too far N. Wellhausen considers it the same as Laish on the NE. border, but this is improbable. C. S. T.

LASSHARON, las-shē'rən (לַשָּׁרוֹן, lashshārōn; Lasharon AV): A place mentioned only in Jos 12 18 as a royal city of Canaan. From the readings of the LXX. we should perhaps take the first letter as the preposition ל and read, "the king of Aphek in Sharon," a district in Galilee between Tabor and Tiberias. C. S. T.

LATCHET. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 7.

LATIN (Ρωμαϊστί, Ρωμαϊκός, 'Roman'): The official language of the Roman Government. Although neither as widely known nor as far on the way toward recognition as an international language as Greek, it could not have been dispensed with in a legal declaration such as the inscription on the Cross was designed to be (Jn 19 20; Lk 23 38). LATTER RAIN. See PALESTINE, § 19.

LATTICE: The rendering of three Heb. words: (1) 'ashnābh (Jg 5 28); (2) ḥărakkīm (Song 2 9), both meaning 'lattice windows.' See HOUSE, § 6 (j). (3) s'bhākhāh (II K 1 2), strictly the trellis battlement of the roof. See HOUSE, § 6 (d). E. E. N.

The people of Israel, during the course of their national history up to the time when the Pentateuch and its laws became firmly canonized as the one great inspired body of authoritative law, came successively under the influence of different environments, each of which had a decisive effect on Israel's life and contributed its share to the formation of Israelitic law. Of these we specify as most important the following four: (1) The first determining influence came from the primitive type of life, which was the nomadic. In this early period there was no such thing in Israel as 'law,' as we now use the term. The fundamental basis of the tribe was the family (q.v.), in which the will of the father was supreme. In the exercise of his authority the father of a primitive Semitic family was doubtless guided by custom. Custom, as interpreted or sanctioned by the father's authority, was law. What had been the rule for his fathers before him, what had been in vogue for generations in his family, these determined the father in his decisions. And as a Semitic family was not only a social but a religious unit, all family customs carried with them the authority of religion, and thus to the early Semite religion and law were almost one and inseparable. In the process of centuries many of these family customs became so strongly intrenched and of such binding authority that no father of a family would even think of abrogating them. In the case of Israel we find them regnant, or at least influential, down to the latest periods. They maintained themselves with a wonderful tenacity, and it is therefore in these ancient family customs that we are to seek for the origin of much of Israel's law. The tribe was but the union of large clans, or families, and tribal custom was but the extension to a larger sphere of the principles already embodied in family custom. In the tribe, the heads of families, or clans, formed the authoritative body, but the authority of these over the tribe was not nearly so strong as that of the father over his family. Tribal custom, however, being the wider application of family custom, was of the highest authority. (2) The stage of national organization under the influence of the religion of J", as taught by Moses and made by him the bond of union among the tribes of Israel. Through Moses, the influence of religion on the whole of Israel's life took on a new significance. Among all the early Semites, family and tribal customs were under the protection of the family or tribal deity. When the customs were violated or disregarded it was the same as disobeying the Divine will, and a punishment, or some other manifestation of Divine displeasure, was liable to take place. Under Moses the same Divine sanction of Israel's inherited customs was inculcated—and something more. For J", as Moses taught, was in a very unique sense a God of righteousness, one to whom righteousness, in a higher sense than was commonly conceived of, was a matter of supreme interest. Moses taught Israel, in cases of dispute between man and man, the "statutes of God and his laws" (Ex 18 16), and in such sentences of justice and in all his work with Israel Moses gave Israel the light of higher conceptions of religion and right than were possessed by other Semitic peoples. In these higher conceptions we must find the reason for many of the specific enactments of later Israelitic law. It is evident, therefore, that in the foregoing citation the word statutes is used in the sense of formulated law, the sense in which it is commonly used by the later Deuteronomic and Priestly schools. (3) The third determining influence came from Canaanite law and custom. When Israel conquered Canaan, it did so only after a protracted struggle, during which the majority of the Canaanites were not exterminated but only gradually subdued. Israel gained her foothold first in the highlands and in the least thickly settled parts of the country. The Canaanite cities in the more open lowland-places were the last to yield. The presence of this large Canaanite element, which had been so long in possession, and which by intermarriage and other ways was gradually absorbed into Israel, was of highest significance for Israel's customs and religion. The Canaanites were well advanced in civilization. It was their cities and their farms that Israel appropriated. It was their tongue that Israel came to speak. They were Israel's teachers in agriculture and other arts of civilized life. Their influence on Israel's religion was very great. It would therefore be passing strange if, in the codified law of Israel, as we find it in the Pentateuch, there were not many enactments that, in whole or in part, reflect ancient Canaanite practise. (4) A fourth determining influence was that of the Babylonian civilization. The whole of SW. Asia, during all the O T period, was under the influence of the Babylonian culture. A knowledge of Babylonian literature had been prevalent in Canaan long before the conquest by Israel. Where Babylonian civilization, commerce, and literature were known it is probable that Babylonian law was also known. This is probably the reason for the many remarkable similarities that exist between the Code of Hammurabi of 2250 B.C. and the Code in Exodus, although it is not necessary to suppose that the Babylonian code is directly quoted in the Pentateuch. During the latter half of the kingdom period (735–536 B.C.) the contact between Israel and the civilization of the Euphrates Valley was very close, and during the Exile and after the Jews were face to face with this ancient and complex civilization. If Israel made use, in her own way, of the Creation and Flood stories of the East, there is no reason why she should not have done the same with its law, and in the Priestly law there may be much that is the result of such appropriation.

2. Formal Sources of Israel's Law.

From these various fields of influence and environment those who built up Israel's system of law drew in formulating their decisions. It was the sum total of such decisions that formed the sources which the codifiers used who have given us the codes of the Pentateuch. Those who thus formulated law in Israel were: (1) The Elders, a general term inclusive of fathers of leading families, heads (sheiks) of tribes, and, after the settlement in Canaan, the chief men of a town ("elders of the city," Ru 4 2 ff.; cf. Dt 19 12, 21 3 ff., 22 15 ff.; I K 21 8, etc.). These elders, or "judges" (Dt 16 18), pronounced judgment in cases of dispute between man and man. It was for them to decide the guilt or innocence of the accused, and fix the penalty. In earliest times criminal cases (theft, oppression, etc.) were probably most numerous. But with the more complex life of the kingdom-period many other cases acquired their attention. (2) The Priests. Of equal importance with the elders were the priests, and, as time went on, the priest gradually encroached upon the sphere of the elders, until finally (but not until after the Exile) almost the entire judicial system was in the possession of the priests. This progress is clearly reflected in the codes. The oldest civil code (Ex chs. 21–23) makes no mention of priests as judges, except possibly in the reference to the judgment of God (Ex 22 8). In the code of Dt the secular judges (elders) are fully recognized, but the attempt is being made to give the priests a larger share (cf. Dt 17 8 ff., 19 15 ff.). In the Priestly Code (and in the echoes of its legislation in Chronicles) the Levites, or priests, alone are recognized as judges. In most ancient times the priest's duty was primarily to care for the (a) sanctuary, and to give forth the Divine oracle. The old custom of 'casting the lot' was probably one of the earliest modes of determining the Divine oracle, and from this perhaps arose the term tōrāh (usually rendered "law"), from yārāh, 'to cast,' though some modern scholars deny this derivation. Thus the priest had to do mainly with matters having a religious significance, and the sanctuary became a place of religious instruction. When the sanctuaries became great centers, as they did in the kingdom-period, the priesthood became more influential, and it was natural for them to claim (as is done in Dt) a large share in deciding civil as well as religious cases. (3) The King and the royal courts. The king in Israel, especially after David, was a supreme court of appeal. The king was supposed to decide 'justly,' i.e., in accordance with what was recognized as custom and 'right' in Israel, as well as in accordance with his natural sense of justice. The king was thus not supposed to be a mere autocrat bound by no will but his own, and could not lightly override ancient law. Able kings, like David, Solomon, Omri, and Jehoshaphat, doubtless did much to arrange a system of courts, religious and civil, all working harmoniously, but of their work only the faintest traces remain in the unreliable statements of the late Chronicler. (4) The Prophets. The prophets gave forth their utterances as of Divine authority; they spoke a Divine "word" which they called tōrāh, "law" (Is 8 16). The prophets dealt with principles, however, and only rarely interfered with special cases, and then only by way of rebuke. But the prophetic teachings, being an exposition of the fundamental principles of Israel's religion and of conduct, exercised a great influence on Israel's lawmakers, as is evident in the Code of Dt compiled under their influence. (5) The learned class of Scribes. From the Exile on, much was done by learned scribes, mostly in the way of expanding and extending the application of legal principles already recognized. The early stages of this activity are no longer known. Of only one such man do we have any definite knowledge, Ezra, the "ready scribe," through whose efforts the Priestly law was finally codified. But Ezra was only one of many. After the canonization of the Law (in the Pentateuch), the application of this Law to all manner of circumstances was made the object of serious study, and comprised the greatest portion of the work carried on in the scribal schools. The opinions of the most learned and honored scribes, or Rabbis (doctors of the Law; cf. Lk 5 17; Ac 5 34; lawyers; cf. Mt 22 35, etc.), were held to be of nearly as great authority as the written Law itself. In process of time there came about an organization of the legal bodies, at the head of which, as the final court of appeal, was the Sanhedrin (q.v.). In the rabbinical schools the decisions of the learned Rabbis were not at first committed to writing, but passed on orally through many generations, gradually becoming more numerous and complex as time went on. Finally, circa 200 A.D., the first codification of scribal law was made, the Mishna. This in its turn was commented on orally, until at last, circa 600 A.D., these comments on, and discussions of, the Mishna, which constitute the Gemara, were reduced to writing, resulting in the Talmud (=Mishna+Gemara). Thus through the decisions of its elders in the petty local courts, of its priests at the various sanctuaries, notably the larger ones, of the king and the royal courts, in the teaching of the prophets, and through the painstaking toil of its scribes, Israel came to have in her possession a large body of formulated law, a portion of which we have codified in the Pentateuch, which represents but the survival of a selected part of the ancient Law, another portion of which is contained in the voluminous material of the Talmud.

We shall now proceed to note briefly the stages through which Israel's law passed, until it reached the form in which we now find it in the Pentateuch. (1) Preliminaries to Codification. Nothing can be said of codification in the period before Israel became acquainted with the art of writing. However the traditional laws and customs were remembered in most ancient times, a code, even the shortest, implies a knowledge of writing. It is a priori probable, then, that even the earlier of Israel's codes dates from the time when Israel had become acquainted with the civilization of Canaan, and after it had relinquished its nomadic type of life. It is also only when people are living in settled communities with something like a fixed judicial system that the need of codes will arise, and an authority will be at hand to promulgate them. If Moses did anything in the way of giving Israel a code, it must have been a brief and simple one, and it must have been given at Kadesh, where for many years Moses acted as the supreme judge of Israel, rather than at Sinai, where Israel stayed but a few months. In any case, what Israel received from Moses were principles rather than detailed statements, and the earliest code we have in the O T was probably formulated in Canaan by those who felt that they were but putting into definite form the principles of justice taught by Moses. (2) The oldest codes. The oldest codification of Israelitic law we find in Ex chs. 20–23 and 34 10-26.

3. Codification of Israel's Law.

This consists of: (a) Two sets of the fundamental principles of Israel's covenant with J". One of these is the Decalogue (originally two pentads of five short commands each). The other covers the more external and ceremonial features of the Covenant, and is found in two recensions, one of which was given in J (34 10-26), the other in E (20 22-26, 22 29, 23 10-33). Both of these recensions show many marks of elaboration, especially in the way of warning against the seductions of Canaanite practises, and were made to serve a historical rather than a legal purpose in the documents in which they stand. The original form back of both recensions was very likely a decalogue (double pentad) prescribing: 1. J" alone to be worshiped. 2. No molten gods. 3. Feast of unleavened bread. 4. Gift of first-born and firstlings. 5. The Sabbath. 6. Feast of Weeks and Ingathering. 7. No leavened bread with a sacrifice. 8. Passover. 9. First-fruits. 10. A kid not to be seethed in its mother's milk. Both of these sets of fundamentals may well go back to Moses.

(b) A civil code (Ex 21 1–23 9), called "the judgments." It has been analyzed as follows (Carpenter-Harford, Comp. of the Hex., p. 472 f.):

1. Concerning Hebrew slaves (21 2-11, two pentads).
2. Violence punishable by death (21 12-17).
3. Injuries (21 18-27).
4. Cattle (21 28-36).
5. Property, theft and damage (22 1-6).
6. Property, breach of trust (22 7-17, two pentads).
7. Various ordinances (22 18-27).
8. Reverence (22 28).
9. Administration of justice (23 1-9).

The fact that two of the sections can be subdivided into two pentads each makes it possible that the code was originally longer, and that each section once formed a complete decalogue, but this is only hypothesis.

So far as we know, this was the only attempt at codification between the conquest and the labors of the author(s) of the Deuteronomic code. To what extent this code (of Ex) was well known throughout all Israel is uncertain. It is also uncertain whether all the sanctuaries or courts had the same body of law. This code probably represents what was taught at the most important centers (Jerusalem, Bethel, Samaria, etc.). As it was based on custom, it is likely that there were no serious divergencies from it in any part of Israel, and that its general principles were pretty well known. It is just such a code as this that is presupposed by the early prophets (Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah) as known and violated by the leading men of their day. (3) The Code of Deuteronomy. The Exodus code must have been formulated very early, for between it and the much more elaborate Code of Dt the difference is so great that it can be accounted for only by a long period of development. The Code of Dt was formulated about 650, and probably contains the Law as it had been long practised in Judah, especially in the capital. In this code, however, we have another factor to reckon with. Its author, or authors, were reformers, and at many points altered existing law, in order to make it conform more nearly to their ruling ideas. This is particularly true of the sections dealing with religious practise, where the aim of Dt was to centralize all worship at Jerusalem and to enhance the standing of the Levitical priesthood. For an analysis of the Code of Dt and other particulars see DEUTERONOMY, § 2. (4) The Holiness Code. To a certain extent parallel to the Code of Dt is the so-called Holiness Code found mainly in Lv chs. 17–26 (with fragments in earlier chapters of Lv; see LEVITICUS, § 3, and also HEXATEUCH, § 23). This code covers, in part, the same ground as the Code of Dt, but differs from it in that it is mainly concerned with 'holiness,' a conception which is made to include both moral and ceremonial purity. The moral tone of this code is high, in spite of its strong leaning toward ceremonialism. As the code stands in Lv it is probably the result of a number of revisions. Its first draft was probably drawn up before the Exile, but its final revision took place after Ezekiel's prophecies were published. (5) The Contribution of Ezekiel. Toward the end of his prophetic ministry (572 B.C.) Ezekiel formulated his conception of the restored Israel (Ezk chs. 40–48). The central, dominating element here is that of holiness. Israel is (to be) a holy community, in whose midst J" dwells in His sanctuary. This is viewed as the most important fact for Israel. The Temple as J"'s dwelling-place, the Priesthood as His ministers, the sacrifices and offerings as the means of communion with Him—these things held the first place with Ezekiel, while "the prince," the laity, and secular affairs in general were relegated to an altogether secondary place. There can be no doubt that the views of Ezekiel proved a powerful influence with all the subsequent workers on Israel's Law. The tendency became ever stronger to emphasize and develop the ceremonial elements. The conception of Israel as a nation was displaced by the conception of Israel as a church. It was along these lines that the workers labored who revised the Holiness Code and who sought to develop and perfect other elements of their traditional Priestly law, much of which had not been as yet codified. (6) The Priestly Code. The climax of these labors was reached when, in the middle of the next century (5th cent. B.C.), Ezra had in his hand a completed Priestly Law-book, which he wished to take to Jerusalem and there have it adopted as the law of the community. This law-book was both a history (of Israel as the Covenant People) and a code. For its analysis see HEXATEUCH, § 27. It was a complex in which numerous earlier codes, as the manual for worshipers (Lv chs. 1–7), the Holiness Code, etc., were embodied. Later enactments, or formulations, were placed side by side with the earlier ones, in spite of the inconsistency and even contradictions thus introduced at many points. With the adoption of this law-book in 444 B.C. (Dt had been adopted in 621) the process of codification did not immediately cease. Some additions were probably made after Ezra's time. But it was not long before the Law, as we have it in the Pentateuch, came to be considered holy and of final authority, although the actual practise in Judaism has never been identical at every point with the letter of the Law.

4. Procedure at Law.

A case at law (cause, or controversy) might be criminal, civil, or religious, but the Law does not make these distinctions. The whole law was supposed to rest on a religious basis, and offenses against morality, or against religious ceremony, were equally against religion. The same courts had jurisdiction (in the O T period) over all cases. (1) Constitution of the Courts. In the O T the term "court" does not appear. "Judge," "judges," "elders," etc., are the concrete terms that take its place. Passing by the little known primitive patriarchal period, the earliest courts in Israel of which we have any record are those mentioned in the early historical narratives and in the old code of Ex chs. 21–23. The "elders," or "judges," here spoken of were, doubtless, the heads of the prominent families in their respective localities, and other men distinguished for wisdom or judgment. Except as we may infer from the immemorial custom of viewing the father of a family as a judge, we have no light on the question how these persons were appointed or recognized as judges. From Ex 18 21 (cf. Dt 16 18) it may be inferred that some mode of selection was in vogue. In the towns of Canaan there was also, doubtless, a judicial system of some sort. Here the basal social form was the city, not the family, or clan, as in Israel. So we read of "the elders of the city" as the judges (Jg 8 16, 11 5; Ru 4 2, etc.; cf. Dt 19 21, 21 3, 22 15, etc.), an expression that may have been adopted in Israel from Canaanite usage. To what extent and how these primitive courts were organized we do not know. When the kingdom was organized the king became a supreme court of appeal. It is quite likely that some correlation was established between the local courts and the royal courts in the capitals (Jerusalem, Samaria), but we have no record of anything of the kind, except in the late notices in Chronicles, where David is said to have appointed 6,000 Levites as "officers and judges" (I Ch 23 4), and Jehoshaphat (a century later) is said to have set judges in all the fortified cities of Judah, with a supreme court of Levites, priests, and elders in Jerusalem (II Ch 19 5-8). To the last reference some degree of historical truth may be allowed, but the first is plainly unhistorical. In Dt, while the old secular judgeship is recognized as legitimate, an effort is made to give the Levites (= priests) a larger and more important place in this work (cf. Dt 17 8 ff., where the priests, as knowing J"'s law, give the decision in difficult cases; 19 17, "priests" and "judges"; cf. also 21 5). Dt probably reflects the historical development in this matter, for as time went on the position of the priesthood at the greater sanctuaries became even more important. During the Exile, when Israel was deprived of independence and was living in a foreign land, it was natural that the priestly students and expounders of Israel's Law should favor the theory that the Levites and priests were alone capable of acting as judges, and it is to these classes alone that the judges belong, according to the Priestly Code and the literature that echoes the teaching of this code. But as the restored community (536 B.C.) was organized not on the basis of PC (adopted 444 B.C.), but on that of the earlier codes of JE and Dt, this theory did not hold in actual practise (hence the references to elders in Ezr 5 5, 9, 6 7, 14, 10 8, 14). During the Persian period, the Persian governor was, of course, the final court of appeal, though probably in all religious questions he gave full authority to the high priest and his council of priests. The power of the priesthood with the high priest at its head increased greatly in the later Persian period, and at the beginning of the Greek period the priesthood was supreme. In the council that assisted the high priest, which was composed of priests, we have the origin of the Sanhedrin (q.v.). Toward the end of the Maccabæan and in the Roman periods the Pharisees became influential, and a certain proportion of the members of the Sanhedrin was of this party, though the priests (the Sadducees), with the high priest at their head, appear to have predominated. The Sanhedrin did not displace the local courts, and it was not a simple court of appeal. It decided questions that the lesser courts could not decide. It decided also many matters independent of the lower courts. Its decisions were binding throughout Jewish Palestine, but death-sentences needed the sanction of the Roman governor. It is doubtless with special reference to the procedure of Roman law that the terms examine, examination, are used in the N T (Lk 23 14; Ac 4 9, 12 19, 24 8, 28 18). (2) Modes of Procedure. The procedure was simple as compared with Occidental usage. The courts were held in the open, generally in the broad place near the city gate. Only at the royal court (Solomon's hall of judgment) and in the later Greek and Roman period were houses of judgment used. The proceedings in early times were public. The civil or religious authority did not prosecute officially, but heard and decided accusations or cases brought before it. Each side, accused and accuser, stated or pleaded its case. The accuser stood at the right hand of the accused, who, at least in post-exilic times, was clothed in mourning garb (cf. Zec 3 1 ff.; Jos. Ant. XIV, 9 4). Witnesses, at least two, preferably three, were summoned (Dt 19 15; Nu 35 30). They testified on oath, and the heaviest penalties were laid upon false witnessing (Dt 19 15-21; Lv 10 11) if, on special investigation (inquisition, Dt 19 18), this was discovered—an indication that such corruption of justice was common (cf. I K 21 10). Bribery of judges is also severely condemned in both the Law and the Prophets, and was, doubtless, a source of much abuse. In cases of death-penalty, the witnesses were the first to lay hands on the condemned to put him to death (Dt 17 7; cf. also Ac 7 58). In certain cases where witnesses were not available circumstantial evidence (Dt 22 15 ff.), or the discernment of the judges, had to be relied upon. In desperate cases recourse was had to the judgment of God (Ex 22 8 f.; cf. Nu 5 11-31; Dt 21 1-9; cf. also I Co 5 3-5). For other details see CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS. E. E. N.

LAWYER. See LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE, § 2 (5).

LAYING ON OF HANDS: The act of laying on of hands expressed different ideas, as follows: (1) Most commonly it indicated the self-identification of the person that performed the act with the one on whom hands were laid. In the offering up of sacrifices, the offerer indicated his willingness to be considered one with the victim by placing his hand on its head (Ex 29 10 ff.; Lev 1 4 f., 3 2, 8, 4 4 ff.). (2) The impartation of an inner or spiritual gift. Thus the father's blessing (Gn 48 14), the good-will of Jesus Christ for children (Mk 10 13, 16), health to the sick (Mk 5 23), and the bestowal of the Holy Spirit by the Apostles (Ac 19 6). (3) Consecration to the service of God. Joshua, when he succeeded Moses (Nu 27 18, 23; Dt 34 9), the deacons, when they were set apart to their service (Ac 6 6), likewise the Levites (Nu 8 10), the missionaries (Ac 13 3), and ministers in the Apostolic Church (I Ti 4 14, 5 22; II Ti 1 6) were ordained by the laying on of hands. (4) Another symbolical use of the act is more difficult to explain, viz., that in which the witnesses against one accused of crime punishable by death laid their hands on him (Lev 24 14). This may be a reflex of the sacrificial laying on of hands as in (1), with the idea involved of devotion to death. On (2) and (3) see also CHURCH, § 8; cf. also ORDAIN. A. C. Z.

LAZARUS, laz'a-rus (Λάζαρος, from Heb. Eleazar, 'God has helped'): 1. L. of Bethany. A friend of Jesus, and brother of Mary and Martha (Lk 10 38 f.). He is not mentioned in the Synoptic Gospels, but his resurrection from the dead forms the climax of the seven miracles of Jesus recorded by John (11 1-44). He is described as subsequently making a feast for Jesus in Bethany, at which Mary anointed the Lord's feet (12 1-8). He is supposed, on account of the silence of Luke and the order in which the three are named in John (11 5), to have been the youngest of the family, the circle of whose acquaintance it is inferred was large (11 19), and their circumstances comfortable (12 3). His name seems to be preserved in the designation of El-Azarīyeh, a village on the SE. of the Mount of Olives, about $1\frac{3}{4}$ m. from Jerusalem, which is generally identified with the ancient Bethany.

His resurrection constituted the occasion for many Jews believing on Jesus, and also was the determining cause of the Sanhedrin's plot to put Jesus (and incidentally Lazarus) to death (11 45-53, 12 10). The interest centers about this miracle. The problem is inseparably connected with the larger one of the authorship and historicity of the Fourth Gospel. Those who believe this Gospel to be purely an allegorical fiction take the story of Lazarus to be a free composition out of elements drawn from the Synoptic Gospels. His name is obtained from the beggar of the parable (Lk 16 19-31), and the whole is an attempt to present a demonstration of the truth of Abraham's words in Lk 16 31, or a personification of Paul's in Ro 7 24, 8 20 f. The personalities of the sisters, the practical Martha and the contemplative Mary, are borrowed from Lk 10 38-42, and the details of the miracle are an enhancement of those of the raising of the daughter of Jairus (Mk 5 22 f. and ||s), and of the son of the widow of Nain (Lk 7 11 f.). The supper is explained as a combination of the Bethany meal (Mt 26 6; Mk 14 3), and the story of the anointing by the sinful woman in the house of Simon the Leper (Lk 7 36). It is more usual, however, to-day to admit that there are many trustworthy data underlying the accounts of the Fourth Gospel (cf. JOHN, GOSPEL OF), and that it is not to be considered, therefore, simply a religious and dogmatic allegory. In that case, the story of Lazarus may contain trustworthy elements, even though it may be difficult to determine just how much is fact and how much is due to modification and interpretation of the fact in the mind of the Evangelist. Obviously it is very difficult to explain the absolute silence of the Synoptic Gospels regarding Lazarus, containing references as they do to the two sisters and an anointing at Bethany, even though we freely admit the partial character of the sources of these Gospels. Such an event with such consequences as are described in the Fourth Gospel could hardly escape notice. There are also certain details in the narrative (e.g., the tone of Christ's prayer at the tomb, ver. 41 f.), which, as they stand at least, strike us as incongruous. Yet, on the other hand, it is perhaps more difficult, once the hypothesis of pure allegory is abandoned, to psychologically explain the story's composition as an ideal construction by the Evangelist to illustrate his view of Christ as "the resurrection and the life." It is too stupendous for any personal follower of Jesus, at least, to have simply invented. Some historical foundation is required, and the underlying facts, whatever they are, may therefore belong to that body of trustworthy information regarding a ministry of Jesus in Judæa which appears to have been known to the author of the Fourth Gospel alone. Assuming this to be true, and that our philosophical attitude to the miraculous does not preclude its possibility, the resurrection of Lazarus may have occurred, and the words "I am the resurrection and the life" have had, therefore, more than a purely spiritual significance. 2. L. of the Parable (Lk 16 19-31). A beggar pictured by Christ in contrast to an unnamed rich man to illustrate the truth of the words recorded in Lk 16 13, 15. Though designated by name, he is probably a hypothetical personage.

LEACH, LEECH. See HORSE-LEECH.

LEAD. See METALS, § 5.

LEAH, lē'ā (לֵאָה, lē'āh), 'gazel,' or 'wild cow': The daughter of Laban, and Jacob's first wife through the father's ruse (Gn 29 23). L. was the mother of six sons and one daughter (Gn 29 32 ff.). She was buried in the patriarchal tomb at Hebron (Gn 49 31). In Ru 4 11 she is styled one of the builders of Israel. Under the name of Leah, traditions of large Aramæan accretions to the original Hebrew stock have probably localized themselves (see TRIBES, § 2). A. S. C.

LEANNOTH, lę-an'noth: A musical term from 'ānāh, 'to sing' (Ps 88, title) in the phrase "Mahalath-Leannoth," which would appear to be equivalent to "Mahalath, to be sung." But the meaning of "Mahalath" is unknown. A. C. Z.

LEASING: An old English word meaning 'falsehood' (Ps 4 2, 5 6 AV). E. E. N.

LEAVEN: The term which renders two Heb. words (se'ōr, 'ferment,' and ḥāmēts, 'to be sour') and one Gr. word (ζύμη), all of which are used to signify a lump of sour dough. The daily bread of the Hebrews was kneaded in a trough, and the yeast was added in the form of a small piece of dough. Bread prepared in a great hurry or in an emergency was unleavened (Gn 18 6; Ex 12 34). Leaven was absolutely prohibited in connection with the Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread (see FASTS AND FEASTS, § 7), as well as in meal-offerings (Ex 12 15; Lv 2 11, 6 17). At the Exodus unleavened bread was used on account of a pressing emergency (Ex 12 34-39), and the prohibition of leaven ever afterward was due to the sacred associations clinging about the first Passover. The Feast of Unleavened Bread being an agricultural festival, the unleavened cakes represented the first-fruits unmixed with last year's harvest. The exclusion of leaven from all sacrifices (Ex 23 18, 34 25 [JE]) and from meal-offerings (Lv 2 11, 6 17 [P]) was due to the feeling that fermentation was closely allied to putrefaction and corruption, a view that the Hebrews shared with other peoples of antiquity. The peace-offering (Lv 7 13) and the wave-loaves (Lv 23 17) are only apparent exceptions, as they were not placed upon the altar. In the N T leaven is usually regarded as a symbol of corruption, which has a mighty pervasive power (cf. I Co 5 6-9; Gal 5 9). In this sense Christ used the phrase "the leaven of the Pharisees and the leaven of Herod" (Mk 8 15). In one of the parables the Savior uses it in a good sense, as an emblem of the pervasive power of the Kingdom of God (Mt 13 33 and ||). In Rabbinical literature leaven is a symbol of evil desires, and in Jewish theology it is used figuratively for the inherited corruption of human nature. J. A. K.

LEBANA, lę-bē'na, LEBANAH, lę-bē'nā (לְבָנָה, lebhānāh): The ancestral head of one of the divisions of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 45; Neh 7 48). E. E. N.

LEBANON, leb'a-nen (לְבָנוֹן, lebhānōn [in Heb. prose with the art.], from lābhēn, 'to be white,' because of its appearance when the snow covers its summits, as it does for the greater part of the year, though according to some it was the whiteness of its cliffs that gave L. its name): In general the double range of mountains running from NNE. to SSW. for about 95 m. from the plain of Jun Akkar on the N. to the turn of the river Litany westward and Banias on the S. The two parallel ranges are separated by a broad valley (the ancient Cœle-Syria), narrowing toward its S. end, alluded to in the Bible, as the Valley of Lebanon, and now called el Bukeiah. By classical writers the W range was named the Libanus and the E. the Anti-Libanus (cf. also Jth 1 7). In Biblical usage the two are given the same name (Dt 1 7, 3 25, 11 24; Jos 1 4, 9 1). The sea abound in chalk. The vast masses of limestone collect the rain and melted snow and yield it up in the form of innumerable springs where the sandstone intervenes. The scenery of the Lebanon is exceptionally fine and has served as the basis of the poetical allusions in the Bible, which are many and richly colored.

Politically, the Lebanon appears as a part of the ideal land of Israel (Jos 13 5; Dt 11 24), but was whole mass abuts on the Mediterranean to the W and slopes down into the plateau of Syria to the E. The average height of the range is not far from 6,000 ft., rising, however, at the highest point (Mt Hermon) to 10,400 ft. The general structure of the Lebanon is rugged and irregular, except for the main direction of the chain of summits, and abounds in precipitous cliffs and hollows, which make it difficult for the traveler, and at the same time an easy hiding-place for the fugitive. This feature has made the Lebanon territory the home of such persecuted peoples as the Maronites and the Matawilē, as well as of such untamed and warlike races as the Amorites, the Ituræans, and the Druses.

The geological constitution of the range is mainly threefold. The strata are irregular and faulty. The lowest of them is cretaceous (Glandaria limestone), the middle consists of Trigonia sandstone and the uppermost of Hippurite limestone. This last forms the summits. The foothills in the vicinity of the never conquered (Jg 3 3). The actual boundary of the land is, however, given as "Baal-Gad in the Valley of Lebanon" (Jos 11 17). In other particulars the Lebanon is noted for its height, which makes it a place of outlook (Song 8 8), for its streams (Song 4 15), its snowy summits (Jer 18 14), its fragrance (Song 4 11; Hos 14 7), probably the odor of its cedar forests; these are also mentioned on their own account (Jg 9 15; Is 2 13, etc.) and poetically called "the flower of Lebanon" (Nah 1 4), "the glory of Lebanon" (Is 35 2, 60 13). The "violence done to Lebanon" is evidently the cutting down of these stately forests (Hab 2 17). Besides the cedars, however, large pines, firs, oaks, and cypress groves are to be found on the range; while the almond, the mulberry, the fig, the olive, the walnut, the apricot, the pear, the pomegranate, the pistachio, and the grapevine also flourish. Of animal life the region sustains, besides the domestic fauna, the mountain, or wild goat, the gazel, the panther, the bear, the jackal, the hyena, the boar, etc.; but these are rarely alluded to (cf. II K 14 9 = II Ch 25 18). Whether the Tower of Lebanon in Song 7 4 was connected with Solomon's royal House of the Forest of Lebanon (I K 7 2; see Jerusalem, § 30), or was an independent structure, either real or imaginary, does not appear. In the N T no mention is made of Lebanon. A. C. Z.

LEBAOTH, lę-bê'ŏth (לְבָאוֹת, l·bhā'ōth), 'lionesses' (?): A city of Judah (Jos 15 32), also assigned to Simeon and called Beth-lebaoth (19 6) and Beth-biri (I Ch 4 31). Map II, E 4. E. E. N.

LEGION (λεγιών, or λεγεών, from Lat. legio): The unit of organization in the Roman army, consisting of a body of troops including both infantry and cavalry and varying in size, composition, and tactical arrangement at different periods. In the N T period a legion contained 5,000 to 6,000 men, composed of ten cohorts of six centuries each. The total military force of the empire consisted of twenty-five legions, of which four were stationed in Syria. See AUGUSTUS. The name "legion" came to be used in Greek, Rabbinical Hebrew, and probably in Palestinian Aramaic for any great number, and occurs in this sense, with perhaps the additional thought of obedience to a superior will, in Mt 26 53; Mk 5 9 and ||s. LEHABIM, lę-hê'bim. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

LEHI, li'hai (לְחִי, lᵉḥī), 'jaw-bone': A place, as yet unidentified, somewhere in the northern Shephelah of Judah, famed as the scene of Samson's single-handed slaughter of the Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass (Jg 15 9-19; II S 23 11, where for "into a troop" we should read "in Lehi"). Jg 15 17-19 should be interpreted as follows: In the place known as Ramath-lehi ('height of Lehi') there was a "hollow place" or basin, in which there was a spring known as En-hakkore, 'the spring of the one who calls' (or, since qōrē', 'caller,' means 'partridge,' 'the partridge spring'). The text does not mean that the 'hollow' was in the jaw-bone. In ver. 16, instead of "heaps upon heaps," read, "I have piled them in heaps." Cf. Moore on Jg in Int. Crit. Com. E. E. N.

LEMUEL, lem'yu-el (לְמוּאֵל, lᵉmū'ēl [Pr 31 1], לְמוֹאֵל, lᵉmō'ēl [31 4]), 'belonging to God': The name of a king to whom was attributed the poem in Pr 31 2-9, formerly commonly identified with Solomon. RVmg. makes him king of Massa (cf. Gn 25 14; I Ch 1 30), perhaps an unknown Arabian city (see MASSAH). Toy (Int. Crit. Com., ad loc.) considers the L. of ver. 4 a scribal repetition of the preceding letters. C. S. T.

LEPROSY (צָרַעַת, tsāra'ath, or נֶגַע־צָרַעַת, nega'-tsāra'ath, λέπρα): From the medical point of view, what is called leprosy in the Bible is not a single disease, but a group of essentially dissimilar diseases. True leprosy, as known in modern times, is an affection characterized by the appearance of nodules in the eyebrows, the cheeks, the nose, and the lobes of the ears, also in the hands and feet, where the disease eats into the joints, causing the falling off of fingers and toes. If nodules do not appear, their place is taken by spots of blanched or discolored skin (macular leprosy). Both forms are based upon a functional degeneration of the nerves of the skin. Its cause was discovered by Hansen in 1871 to be a specific bacillus. Defective diet, however, seems to serve as a favorable condition for the culture of the bacillus.

1. Medical Definition.

Leprosy was one of the few abnormal conditions of the body which the Levitical law declared unclean. Elaborate provision was therefore made for testing its existence, and for the purification of those who were cured of it. As to the description of the disease, it is rather external and conventional than scientific. Both in the diagnosis and the prescription for ceremonial treatment the term used is generic, and includes other ailments which fall outside the correct modern definition of leprosy. It would be wrong, however, to infer that the whole subject is treated without any effort at discrimination. On the contrary, Lv. ch. 13 deals with it in a somewhat systematic manner.

2. Ceremonial Uncleanness of Leprosy.

As a subject for ceremonial treatment, leprosy is given the general name of "plague ['stroke'] of leprosy." It is then divided into three kinds, as it might affect (1) the human skin, (2) articles of clothing, or (3) houses. So far as it appears in the human body, two stages in its development are marked, the incipient and the confirmed. In the incipient stage it was possible to mistake for it several other diseased conditions. Hence the provision that, when a suspicious case appeared, it must be brought to the priest to be tested (Lv 13 2, 9, etc.). From the moment, however, that the priest began his inspection and failed to declare his subject clean, the person under test was designated a leper, and considered unclean (Lv 13 3, 20, etc.).

3. Distinctions.

In the incipient stage leprosy was only constructively such, and might be cured. According to its development, which was scrutinized and judged by the priest, it might be declared (1) a "scab" (ṣappaḥath, psoriasis, Lv 13 2), (2) tsāra'ath-nōsheneth, false leprosy (Lv 13 11), (3) an inflamed cicatrix ("scar of the boil," tsārepheth hashsh'ḥīn, Lv 13 23, "burning boil" AV), (4) a scar of a former burn (sᵉ'ēth hammikhwāh, Lv 13 28), (5) a scalled-head (netheq, "ringworm," Lv 13 37), (6) a "tetter" (bōhaq, Lv 13 39), or (7) a baldness (gibbēaḥ, Lv 13 41). But any of these abnormal conditions might turn into a permanent leprosy, in which case the subject was required to be isolated, have distinctive signs by which he might be recognized, and be regarded as unclean (Lv 13 45 f.). For the purification of this uncleanness a special ceremonial was provided (Lv ch. 14. See also under PURITY, PURIFICATION, § 12 (3)).

4. Test of Leprosy.

The leprosy of clothing, as far as it can be identified, was the result of a fungus, or mildew, produced by unknown causes. It was to be tested for a week, and if persistent, the garment was to be burned (Lv 13 47-59).

5. Leprosy of Clothing.

The leprosy of a house (Lv 14 33-57) is also hard to identify. It is described as consisting in hollow streaks, greenish, or reddish, in color, and lower than the wall, i.e., as if issuing from its interior portions. It is probable that 'dry rot' is meant. Its treatment involved the scraping or removal of part of the wall, the carrying of the dust to a place for refuse, the replastering or rebuilding of the destroyed portion of the house, and the ceremonial cleansing of it as a whole (Lv 14 48-53). (Cf. Benzinger, Heb. Arch., 1894, pp. 103, 118, 450, 481, 488 ff. Cf. also DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § II (9).)

LEVIATHAN, lę'vai'a-than (לִוְיָתָן, liwyāthān): A mythological figure, popularly believed to cause eclipses of the sun and moon by swallowing these luminaries or by throwing its folds around them. The monster was supposed to be subject to enchanters who could rouse it to perform its feat. They were therefore alluded to as those that "cursed the day" (Job 3 8; Davidson, Camb. Bible, ad loc.). In Ps 74 14 and Is 27 1 it is the symbol of Egypt as the great devourer. In Job ch. 41 the reference is to the crocodile.

LEVITICUS, lę-vit'i-cus: The fourth book of the Pentateuch, called by the Jews, from its opening words, wayyiqrā', 'and he (J") called.'

1. Name.

The Greek-speaking Alexandrian Jews called it, from the general character of its contents, Λευιτικόν, i.e, 'the Levitical [book],' which the Vulgate rendered by Leviticus.

2. Lv a Part of the Priestly Element (P) of the Hexateuch.

The real character of Lv is revealed when it is perceived that it is but a portion of that long section of the priestly law and history book ([P] see HEXATEUCH, § 5) which deals with the organization of the worship at Mt. Sinai. This section begins at Ex 24 15b-18a, is continued in Ex 25 1–13 18a (the command concerning the making of the Sanctuary), and in Ex chs. 35–39 (the making of the Tabernacle). Here begins the story of the institution of the worship of Israel, which can be outlined as follows:

1. The general command regarding the setting up of the Sanctuary and the initiation of the Priesthood (Ex 40 1-16).
2. The erection of the Sanctuary and the first services (Moses in charge on the first day) (Ex 40 17-38).
   [Insertion—The sacrificial manual, Lv chs. 1–7.]
3. The initiation of the Aaronic Priesthood and related matters continuing the narrative of Ex 40 33 (Lv chs. 8–10).
   (a) Aaron and his sons formally inducted into the priestly office (ch. 8 f.), according to the directions in Ex ch. 29 and 40 12-16.
   (b) The death of Nadab and Abihu (10 1-11), with additional legal prescriptions in vs. 12-20
   [Insertion—A code concerning ceremonial purity, chs. 11–15.]
   (c) Legislation following the death of Nadab and Abihu—the Day of Atonement (ch. 16).
   [Insertion—The Holiness Code (chs. 17–26), with a supplement concerning vows (ch. 27).]

The large section of P, to which all this belongs, is continued in Nu, concluding at Nu 10 10.

3. Relative Age of the Various Strata in Lv.

Disregarding the obvious connection with P and viewing it as a book by itself, Lv may be divided into four parts. I. The manual of offerings (chs. 1–7). II. The consecration of the Priesthood (chs. 8–10). III. The laws of ceremonial purity (chs. 11–16). IV. The law of holiness (chs. 17–27).

It is generally recognized to-day that the extensive literature known as the P element of the Hexateuch went through a complicated process of editing before it attained its present form. Evidence of such editing is abundant in Lv. Space allows the mention here of only a few of the most important instances. (1) In the manual of offerings (chs. 1–7). This manual at present consists of two parts, the general directions for the five principal offerings (1 1–6 7), and a manual for priests (6 8–7 38). It will be noticed that in the first part of the main introductory portion formulas differ remarkably. In 1 3, 10, 14 (for the burnt-offering) and 3 1, 6, 12 (for the peace-offering) the regular formula is, "If his oblation be he shall"; but in 2 4-16 the formula uses "thou" and "ye," while in 1 2, 2 1-3 and in 4 1–6 7 the formulas are of a less distinctive character. Such facts as these may indicate that in 1 3-17 and 3 1-17, dealing with the two oldest and main classes of offerings, we have the oldest form or original content of this manual, which was then supplemented by ch. 2 and later by the addition of 4 1–6 7, and still later by 6 8–7 38 (which itself seems to be composed of earlier and later elements). If the reader will compare this manual with other sections of the Pentateuch covering, in part at least, essentially the same ground, as, e.g., Nu 15 1-31, he will discover for himself the existence of other and quite different sacrificial codes besides the comprehensive one found here. (2) In Part III, the laws of ceremonial purity, perhaps the clearest evidence of strata of different dates, is found in chs. 11 and 16. In ch. 11 we have the law regarding clean and unclean animals. This same subject is covered in the Code of Dt (14 3-21). In Lv ch. 11 the order of treatment is: (a) Quadrupeds which are "unclean" (vs. 2-8); (b) water-animals which are "abomination" (sheqets) (vs. 9-12); (c) birds which are "abomination" (vs. 13-19); (d) winged insects which are "abomination" (vs. 20-23); (e) defilement by contact with carcasses (vs. 24-28); (f) creeping things and reptiles which are "unclean," and contamination from them (vs. 29-38); (g) defilement from contact with carcasses (vs. 39-40); (h) creeping things which are "abomination" (vs. 41-45). In Dt 14 3-21 the order is: (a) Not to eat anything "abominable" (tō'ēbhāh) (ver. 3); (b) quadrupeds that may (clean) and may not (unclean) be eaten (vs. 4-8); (c) the water-animals that may and may not be eaten (vs. 9-10); (d) the birds that may and may not be eaten (vs. 11-20); (e) that which dies of itself may not be eaten (ver. 21). It is evident that the whole section in Dt is much simpler than the corresponding one in

Lv, and also that in Lv there are really two sets of prescriptions, one using the term "unclean" (as in Dt), the other using the term "abomination" (not in Dt). These and other facts seem to indicate that in Dt we find the earlier and simpler law on this subject, and that the form in Lv is based on an old source, which has been supplemented by later additions. Ch. 16, in the main, forms a fitting conclusion to the preceding material in chs. 11–15. The command for atoning ceremony, covering all phases of sin in the nation as a whole, might well conclude the group of laws on ceremonial purity. But in ch. 16, as it now stands, there is interwoven another set of prescriptions which have to do with Aaron and his sons alone and by ver. 1 are connected with ch. 10. These prescriptions (found in vs. 1, 3, 6, 11, etc.) are probably later additions to the original law. (3) Part IV, The Holiness Code, also appears to be made up of different strata. A general analysis of this code will be found in the article HEXATEUCH, § 23 and need not be repeated here. If this analysis be compared with the Code of Dt (see DEUTERONOMY, §§ 2, 4), it will be found that the two present many striking similarities, enough to suggest that both have been modeled on the earlier code in Ex 20 22–23 end, although their many differences also show that they are entirely independent of each other. Within this code, many passages may be found which are either contrary to or only loosely connected with the context, and have all the appearance of being added to the original code. Thus in ch. 23 a large amount (vs. 1-8, 21, 23-38, 39a, c, and 44) seems to belong more naturally with the later and more precise (as to fixed dates, etc.) priestly material (that forms the main thread of P) than with the earlier and more vague specifications that are characteristic of the original Holiness Code. The same differences can be noted in chs. 17, 21 f., and 24 f. (for detailed examination and proof, see Driver LOT, pp. 50–57). Ch. 27 is not a part of this code, but a later piece of legislation (P), dealing with the estimation and commutation of vows, consecrated things, and tithes. In its original form, the Holiness Code probably antedated Ezekiel. This prophet seems to have been well acquainted with it (or its constituent elements, in case it was compiled after his date), and largely influenced by it. (See also HEXATEUCH, § 24.)

4. General Character of Lv.

Lv is thus a book in which materials originating in widely separated periods are found closely woven together. In general, the earlier portions are marked by greater simplicity, less preciseness in details and specifications, a closer touch with the old agricultural type of life, less emphasis on ceremonialism per se, and more on morality and spirituality. The moral character of the Holiness Code is especially high. "Holiness to Jehovah" is here more than mere formalism. In the later portions the rigid ceremonialism of the later Judaism is more manifest and the cultus is made all-important.

LIBERTINES. See SYNAGOGUE OF THE LIBERTINES.

LIBERTY, CHRISTIAN: This term is used to denote the breadth of action allowed the believer as distinguished from the non-believer. The nearest approach to the conception in the O T is that underlying the release from obligation and penalty, which was provided for in the law of the Sabbatical year of Jubilee (q.v.) (d'rōr, Lv 25 10; Is 61 1; Jer 34 8 f.). Furthermore, he who serves J" is conscious of an advantage in this particular (Ps 119 45). In the N T the new light on the inner relationship of the believer with God reveals liberty to be one of the essential results of faith (Jn 8 32 f.). In general, this larger range for the play of human activity is viewed as obliterating restraints created by other conditions. Bondage and slavery in the political sense cease to be sources of distress to the possessor of Christian liberty (I Co 7 21; Col 3 11). This liberty consists in the change of attitude toward the law, whereby conduct becomes loving conformity to the will of the Father, instead of constrained obedience to arbitrary prescriptions (cf. "against such there is no law" Gal 5 23; also Ro 7 3; Gal 2 4, 5 1). Moreover, the principle of sin as a dominant force over conduct loses its compelling power. To this extent the believer is free from sin (Ro 6 18, 8 2). The added knowledge gained by the believer enables him to see many actions as indifferent, and therefore to be done or not, according to his pleasure (I Co 10 23-29). This is "the perfect law of liberty" (Ja 1 25), which, however, places upon its subject the responsibility of guarding against its misuse and abuse (Gal 5 13; I P 2 16).

LIBNAH, lib'nā (לִבְנָה, libhnāh): 1. The third station after Hazeroth (Nu 33 20 f.). 2. A town in the Shephelah, probably a member of the coalition against Gibeon defeated by Joshua (Jos 10 29 f.). It was made a priestly city (Jos 21 13). Apparently lying S. of Lachish, it joined in the revolt of Edom against Judah (II K 8 22). In the days of Hezekiah it was evidently a strongly fortified town, and required the attention of Sennacherib in order to secure his base of operations against Jerusalem (II K 19 8; Is 37 8). L. was the birthplace of the wife of Josiah, the mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah (II K 23 31, 24 18). Map I, C 9.

LIBNI, lib'nai (לִבְנִי, libhnī): 1. The ancestral head of one of the divisions of the Gershonite Levites, the Libnites (Ex 6 17; Nu 3 18-21, etc.). Also called Ladan (q.v.). 2. Another Levite, the grandson of Merari (I Ch 6 29).

E. E. N.

LIBYA, lib'i-ą (Λιβύη): The name of the large territory which included in ancient times Cyrenaica in the W. and Marmarica in the E.; the whole of L., therefore, lay between Egypt (the Delta) and the Roman province of Africa. Accordingly, the "parts of Libya about Cyrene" (Ac 2 10) meant the western portion of the country. In the O T, L. is the AV translation of the Heb. pūṭ (Ezk 30 5, 38 5). Libyans is the rendering of pūṭ (Jer 46 9 AV, "Put" RV) and of lūbhīm (Dn 11 43); though this word is rendered "Lubim" in II Ch 16 8 and Nah 3 9. LIEUTENANTS: The rendering of the Heb. transliteration (אֲחַשְׁדַּרְפְּנִים, 'ăḥashdarpᵉnīm, Ezr 8 36; Est 3 12, 8 9, 9 3), of the Persian khshatrapān, the original of the Gr. σατράπης, 'satrap,' 'governor.'
E. E. N.

LIFE: This term is used in the English Bible to render a number of different Heb. and Gr. words, each of which has its own special significance. (1) In the O T the proper and most frequent term is ḥay, 'life,' used (both as noun and adj.) almost exclusively of men and animals, and with reference to the principle of animate existence—in the case of man often of sentient existence—in contrast with that which is inanimate or dead. Consequently, even running water or spring water, in contrast with stagnant or cistern water, is spoken of as 'living' (cf. Gn 26 19; Lv 14 6, etc.). The noun, when rendered "life," is generally in the plural (the so-called abstract-plural). As examples of the more general use of the term, cf. Gn 2 7 ("breath of life"), 9, 3 22, 7 15. In some cases it is the period of conscious existence that is meant (Gn 3 14, 7 11), in others, life as affected by external conditions is the main idea (Ex 1 14), especially the ideal happy or blessed condition on earth, in which God's favor is manifest (Dt 30 15, 19 f., 32 47; Ps 30 5; Pr 2 19). In one case at least it is one's consciousness of his own condition, or state of his feelings, that is meant (Job 33 20). A special, but frequent, use of the term is in oaths, at times when God swears by Himself (Nu 14 21, 28; Dt 32 40; Jer 46 18), or when man swears by God (Ru 3 13; I S 14 39, 45, etc.) or, with a slight change in the Heb. pronunciation (ḥēy instead of ḥay), when man swears by some other man (Gn 42 15 f.; I S 1 26; II S 15 21, etc.). In all such cases the word is really used as a predicate adjective. (For the combination of ḥayāh [the fem. adj.] with nephesh, see the following.) (2) The word nephesh, frequently rendered "life," signifies the physical principle of life, which was sometimes located in the breath (Gn 2 7; in Job 41 21 it is rendered "breath"), but more generally in the blood (Gn 9 4; Lv 17 14; Dt 12 23, etc.). The more usual rendering of this term is "soul" (which can be understood in more than one sense), but where it is rendered "life," it is nearly always the physical existence that is intended (Gn 9 4 f., 19 17; Dt 19 21, etc.). Frequently a broader meaning is given to the term (e.g., Gn 44 30), and at times "soul" would seem to be a better rendering than "life" (e.g., Pr 6 26). The combination nephesh ḥayāh, rendered "living soul" (Gn 1 20, 30), indicates the individual entity, the seat of personality, which, though originating in the Divine breath being breathed into the material form, is not altogether destroyed when, at death, man returns "unto dust" (Gn 3 19). See also MAN, DOCTRINE OF, § 3. (3) yāmīm, 'days,' is rendered "life" in I K 3 11; II Ch 1 11; Ps 61 6, 91 16. (4) In Job 7 15 AV "life" renders 'etsem, 'bone'; cf. RV. (5) In the N T, ζωή is the equivalent of the O T ḥay. It is used to indicate conscious existence, especially in its higher moral and spiritual aspects. Of this God alone is the ultimate source; then, derivatively from God, its source is the Word (this only in Jn), and then in the Word Incarnate, Jesus Christ (Jn 1 4, 4 14, 5 26, 6 35, 14 6; cf. Col 1 15-17). Consequently, it often means the true life of the soul as found in communion with God, and the enjoyment of this throughout eternity (Mt 7 14, 18 8 f., Lk 12 15; Jn passim). (6) The N T ψυχή is the equivalent of the O T nephesh, 'physical life,' although in Mk 8 35 and ||s the term is used in a double sense, indicative of the higher and lower aspects of the soul's life. The more usual rendering of ψυχή in the N T is "soul." (7) The term βίος, meaning the external aspects of life, its material benefits or enjoyments, its affairs, also its period, occurs a few times in the N T (Lk 8 14; I Ti 2 2; II Ti 2 4; I Jn 2 16). (8) In Rev 13 15 AV πνεῦμα, 'breath,' is rendered "life"; cf. RV. See also in general MAN, DOCTRINE OF, and ESCHATOLOGY.
E. E. N.

LIFE, BOOK OF: This phrase is used to denote the record of the privileges of God's people. God's "book" (Ex 32 32; Ps 56 8, 139 16) is the emblem of His remembrance and guardianship of His people (cf. Mal 3 16). It is also called the "book of life" (Ps 69 28, "the living" RVmg.; Ph 4 3). The phrase is based on the custom of enrolling citizens for various purposes, e.g., as "childless," Jer 22 30; for identification of pedigree, Neh 7 5, 64, 12 22; for safeguarding of rights, Is 4 3; Ezk 13 9 (spiritual analogue, Lk 10 20). From the O T usage was developed the apocalyptic conception of a special "Book of Life" to be used at the last Judgment (Dn 12 1; Rev 3 5, 13 8, 17 8, 20 12, 15, 21 27; cf. Eth. En. 47 3, 108 3).

LIGHT: The rendering of a number of Heb. and Gr. terms: I. Terms relating to natural or physical light. (1) 'ōr (both verb and noun), used primarily of the physical phenomenon, either generally as created by or emanating from God (Gn 1 3; Job 38 19), or as opposed to darkness (Gn 1 4, 5; Ex 10 23, etc.), or specifically, of daylight, or the morning light (Jg 19 26; I S 14 36; II K 7 9, etc.), of the light of the sun (Job 31 26, 37 21; Hab 3 4), of the heavenly bodies (Ps 136 7), of the lightning (Job 36 32), or in the simple sense of 'brightness,' or 'shining' (Job 41 18; Is 13 10, 30 26, etc.). This term is often used figuratively: (a) Of the guidance, strength, and comfort vouchsafed by God to those who trust Him (Job 22 28, 29 3; Ps 27 1, etc.); so in the expression "the light of thy countenance," where the idea of communion with God is also set forth (Ps 4 6, 44 3, 89 15); (b) as the equivalent of physical life (Job 3 16, 20; Ps 49 19, etc.), or of the true moral life (Job 24 13; Pr 4 18, etc.). (2) mā'ār, 'a light given,' used of the planets, sun and moon (Gn 1 14-16), and of the lamps in the Tabernacle (Ex 25 6, 27 20, etc.), less specifically in Ps 74 16, 90 8; Pr 15 30). (3) nūr, in various derivative forms nēr, nīr, etc., used of David (II S 21 17), of the continuance of his dynasty (I K 11 36; II K 8 19; II Ch 21 7), and in a more literal sense in Dn 2 22, 5 11, 14; Job 3 4. (4) nōgēah, 'brightness' (Is 50 10). On the AV of I K 7 4 f. and Is 8 20 cf. RV. (5) In the N T the principal term is φῶς, which corresponds to 'ōr in the O T. Besides its use in a physical sense, metaphysically the term stands for the highest form of spiritual and moral life of which God is the source (I Jn 1 5, 7), and is mediated to man through the Word—Jesus Christ (Jn 1 4 ff., etc.). Consequently, the saving truth of God and the Christian character and life, which expresses it, is called light (Mt 5 14; Jn 3 19 f.; Ro 13 12; Eph 5 8, etc.). Related to φῶς are the nouns φωστήρ, literally 'light-giver,' used of beacon-lights, metaphorically in Ph 2 15, but perhaps more literally in Rev 21 11, and φωτισμός, 'illumination' (II Co 4 4, 6), the verb φωτίζειν, 'to give light to' (Jn 1 9; I Co 4 5, etc.), and the adj. φωτεινός (Mt 6 22; Lk 11 34 ff.). (6) λύχνος, 'lamp' (Mt 6 22; Lk 11 34, 12 35; Jn 5 35; II P 1 19; Rev 21 23). (7) λαμπάς, 'torch,' then 'lamp' (Ac 20 8); and the related verb λάμπειν, 'to give light as a torch' (Mt 5 15). (8) φέγγος, 'the light (of some bright object)' (Mt 24 29, etc.). (9) The verbs καίειν, 'to burn' (Mt 5 15), ἅπτειν, 'to kindle' (Lk 8 16, 11 33, 15 8), ἐπιφαίνειν, 'to shine upon' (Lk 1 79), and ἐπιφαύσκειν, 'to shine upon' (Eph 5 14). II. Terms relating to weight. (1) From qālal, 'to be light' (I K 12 4, etc.), we have qāl, of agility and swift-footedness (II S 2 18), and the verb itself, in the sense of 'to consider insignificant' (I S 18 23; I K 16 31; II K 3 18, 20 10; Is 49 6; Ezk 8 17), and q'lōqēl, in the sense of 'unsatisfactory,' possibly 'contemptible' (Nu 21 5). (2) pāḥāz, 'unreliable' (Jg 9 4; Zeph 3 4). (3) ἀμελεῖν, 'to be careless' (Mt 22 5). (4) ἐλαφρός (Mt 11 30; II Co 4 17). III. Terms relating to motion. (1) yāradh, 'to come, or go down' (Jg 4 15; I S 25 23 AV, etc.). (2) nāphal, 'to fall' (Gn 24 64; II K 5 21 AV; Is 9 8). (3) pāg'a, 'to chance upon' (Gn 28 11). On Mt 3 16 and Rev 7 16 cf. RV. E. E. N.

LILY. See PALESTINE, § 22; also TEMPLE, § 16.

LIME (שִׂיד, sīdh): In Is 33 12, Am 2 1 reference is made to the process of securing lime from its compounds by intense heat. In these passages it is used figuratively to mean complete destruction. In Dt 27 2, 4, the Heb. word is translated "plaster," to designate the substance made from lime, and put on walls to secure a smooth surface for decorating. C. S. T.

LINE: (1) ḥebhel, strictly, a 'cord' or 'rope,' then a 'measuring-line,' as in II S 8 2; Am 7 17; Zec 2 1. This word is often rendered "portion" or lot, and in Ps 16 6 it means the lot, or portion, of land marked off by the measuring-line, which was the Israelite's patrimony. (2) qāw, and qeweh (from qāwāh, 'to be stretched,' 'fixed,' or 'strong'), a line, especially one used for measuring (I K 7 23; II K 21 13; Jer 31 39, etc.). In Is 28 10, 17 it is doubtful whether the Heb. qaw lᵉqaw should be rendered "line upon line," as these syllables are probably mere imitations of the thick, foolish utterance of the drunkard. A derivative of qāw, tiqwah, is found in Jos 2 18, 21. (3) ḥūṭ, 'cord,' or 'thread,' is rendered "line" in I K 7 15. (4) pāthīl (from pāthal, 'to twist') is rendered "line" but once (Ezk 40 3; cf. Gn 38 18, 25; Ezk 40 3; Jg 16 9, etc.). (5) seredh, in Is 44 13, is of doubtful meaning. The RV "pencil" is probably correct, but not certain. (6) κανών (II Co 10 16) is strictly a 'reed,' then a rod for measuring, and then came to be used in the sense of 'limit,' or 'bounds.' The RV "province" is a fair interpretation. E. E. N.

LINEN: The various words translated "linen" in the O T are for the most part of somewhat uncertain meaning, and possibly in some cases varieties of cotton as well as of linen are meant. Where the Heb. word is pishteh, 'flax,' the meaning "linen" is practically certain (Lv 13 47-49; Jer 13 1; Ezk 44 17 f.). Sādhīm (Jg 14 12 f.; Pr 31 24; Is 3 23) means a square linen garment, something like a robe, that could be used as a wrapper, made probably of fine material. In I K 10 28, II Ch 1 16 RV has the correct reading. The N T terms present no difficulty, all meaning linen of various degrees of fineness. See also FINE LINEN, and DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 5. E. E. N.

LINTEL: In I K 6 31 the meaning of the Heb. term 'ayīl is very uncertain. RVmg. suggests 'posts,' but 'projection' may be nearer the truth. The verse then would mean that the door-opening was pentagonal in form, thus: ⌂. See illustration of front elevation, Solomon's Temple, under art. TEMPLE. On Am 9 1 and Zeph 2 14, cf. RV. See also HOUSE. E. E. N.

LINUS, lai'nus (Λίνος): One of four persons represented as sending greetings to Timothy (II Ti 4 21). Since the name is a comparatively rare one (only in CIG, No. 8518; I. Sic. et Ital. No. 2276) much is to be said for Irenæus' identification of L. with the successor of Peter and Paul (Adv. Hær. III, 3 3; cf. Eus. HE, III, 2; V, 6). According to the Ap. Const. (VII, 46) L. was the husband, or son, of Claudia (Λίνος ὁ Κλαυδίας), who is mentioned in the same salutation in II Ti 4 21. J. M. T.

LION. See PALESTINE, § 24.

LITTER: The translation of the Heb. word tsābh in Is 66 20. The same word occurs in Nu 7 3 with 'ăgālāh ("wagon"), where it indicates that the wagons were covered like palanquins. By itself the term meant 'a covered conveyance,' constructed so that it could be carried by two mules, one in front and one behind. C. S. T.

LIVER. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 10; MAN, DOCTRINE OF, § 8; MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 4; and DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 6 (3).

LIVING CREATURE (pl. hayyōth, in N T, ζῷον, "beast" AV): The name given to a symbolical figure first presented in Ezekiel's vision (Ezk 1 5 ff.), and again in Rev 4 6-9, 5 6, 8, 11, 6 1, 3, 5-7). The dependence of the latter on the former is quite manifest, though the figure is worked over with a considerable amount of originality, and the LXX. translation of the Heb. word in Ezk is the link of connection between the two. The figure is composite. It contains a human element and elements drawn from the world of lower animal life, either terrestrial or aerial. In Ezk 10 1 ff., the living creatures are called "cherubim"; but as cherubim, they differ from those which symbolize the Divine presence in the construction of the Mercy Seat (I K 6 23 ff.; see also CHERUBIM).

2. Extra-Biblical Parallels.

The affinity between these "living creatures" and the winged bulls, the sphinx, and the griffin of extra-Biblical lore is most unmistakable. But only with the winged bull of the Assyrian cult is the relation such as to call for explanation. And here it is not difficult to see that, whereas the form of the Biblical living creature is derived from Mesopotamia, the use made of it is radically different. The Biblical figure represents the highest elements of creation, as ministering to and worshiping the Creator. They are never, as in Mesopotamia, themselves objects of homage or worship. A. C. Z.

LOCUST: A migratory insect of which forty different species are known to exist in Palestine (Tristram, The Natural History of the Bible,[8] 1889, pp. 306 ff.), though the Rabbis assert that there are as many as 800 species. Those named in the O T, without strict regard to scientific classification, are the following: (1) 'arbeh, 'multiplier' (Ex 10 4-6; Lv 11 22). (2) ṣol'ām, 'bald locust' (Lv 11 22). (3) ḥargōl, 'galloper' (Lv 11 22; "beetle" AV, "cricket" RV, but "locust" RVmg.). (4) ḥāgābh, 'grasshopper' (Lv 11 22). (5) ts'lāṭsal, 'the tinkler,' because of the whirring noise of its flight (Dt 28 42). (6) gēbh, only in pl. gābhīm (Is 33 34). (7) ghāzām, 'shearer' (Jl 1 4, palmer-worm AV). (8) yelek, 'lopper' (Jl 1 4; Nah 3 15; Ps 105 34). (9) ḥāṣīl, 'finisher' (Ps 78 46, but usually translated caterpillar). Certain of these kinds were permissible as food, and were and are largely eaten by the natives, being regarded very palatable (cf. Lv 11 22; Mt 3 4). The destructiveness of the locust is particularly noted by Biblical writers; hence threats of judgment are couched in terms of a visitation of a locust pest (Jl 1 4 f.; Nah 3 15; Jer 51 14, 27, canker-worm RV, "caterpillar" AV). Upon the basis of this characteristic of the insect arose later the apocalyptic figure of the locust with certain features of the war-horse, of the warrior, of the king, of the woman, and of the lion attached to it (Rev 9 3-11). This is evidently a symbol of destruction, and is represented as appearing in large numbers—an army under the command of Abaddon. A. C. Z.

LOD (לֹד, lōdh), or Lydda (Λύδδα), during the Roman period called Diospolis, now Ludd: A village lying in a fertile hollow of the Plain of Sharon, 11 m. SE. of Jaffa. Map III, D 5. It is mentioned in the later books of the O T (I Ch 8 12; Ezr 2 33; Neh 7 37, 11 35), and once in the N T (Ac 9 32 ff.). Its exposed position, in the path of armies going from the coast to Jerusalem, subjected L. to devastation by Roman, Saracen, Crusader, and Mongol. In the time of Josephus, however, the city was large and prosperous, and was a celebrated seat of Rabbinical learning. It later became the seat of a bishopric (see Robinson, BRP [1868], ii, 244–248). According to ancient Christian tradition (adopted also by the Moslems), St. George was born at L. in the 3d cent. A.D., and, after his martyrdom, was buried there. The cathedral of St. George, whose crypt was said to contain the hero's tomb, has been frequently demolished, and its ruins now enclose both a mosque and a Greek church. L. G. L.

LO-DEBAR, lō″-dĭ′bār (לֹא דְבָר or לֹא, lo'- or lō-dh'bhār): A place E. of the Jordan, near Mahanaim (II S 17 27), where Mephibosheth, son of Jonathan, dwelt (II S 9 4 f.). Grätz translates the same Heb. words in Am 6 13 by Lodebar ("thing of nought" RV). Others find the same place in Debir (Jos 13 26 RVmg.). C. S. T.

LODGE: I. The verb. (1) In the O T the verb rendered "to lodge" usually is the Heb. lūn, 'to pass the night' (Gn 24 23, 32 13, etc.). (2) In Jos 2 1 the term is shākhabh, 'to lie down'; cf. RV. (3) In Mt 21 17, the Gr. αὐλίζεσθαι means properly 'to pass the night in an αὐλή' ('court-yard,' or 'sheep-fold'), but here it is used in a general sense. (4) In Lk 9 12 καταλύειν means 'to loosen,' hence 'to ungird,' preparatory to lying down for the night. (5) κατασκηνοῦν, 'to pitch the tent' and hence 'to dwell,' is found in Mk 4 32 and ||s. (6) ξενίζειν (from ξένος, 'stranger'), 'to receive as a guest,' is found in Ac 10 6, 18, 23, 32, 21 16, 28 7.

II. The nouns rendered lodge, lodging, or lodging-place are (1) t'ā (Ezk 40 7, 10, 12, etc. RV), meaning an antechamber of some kind, rendered "little chamber" in AV. Dr. Davidson (on Ezk in Camb. Bible) suggests "guard-room" (cf. I K 14 28; II Ch 12 11). (2) mālōn, 'place to spend the night' (Gn 42 27, 43 21; Ex 4 24 all "inn" AV; Jos 4 3, 8; II K 19 23; Is 10 29; Jer 9 2). The closely related term m'lūnāh, meaning the temporary structure for the watchman in a garden, is rendered "lodge" in Is 1 8; cf. 24 20 in AV and RV (3) ξενία (from ξένος, 'stranger') means first 'hospitality,' and then 'lodging' (Ac 28 23; Phm ver. 22). LOIS, lō'is (Λωΐς): The grandmother (probably maternal) of Timothy (II Ti 1 5). She was a Jewess, but whether by descent or by conversion from paganism is unknown. Through Paul she was led to embrace Christianity. E. E. N.

LORD: The rendering in EV of a number of Heb. and Gr. terms. As the ordinary term used in addressing a superior: (1) 'ădhōnī, 'my lord.' It is used of (a) a prophet (I K 18 7, 13; II K 2 19, 4 28), (b) princes or nobles (Gn 42 10, 43 20), (c) a king (I S 22 12, 26 17), (d) a father (Gn 31 35), (e) an elder brother (Gn 33 8 f.), (f) Moses (Ex 32 22; Nu 11 28), (g) a priest (I S 1 15 f.), (h) the theophanic angels (Gn 19 2; Jos 5 14; Jg 6 13), (i) a captain (II S 11 11), (j) any superior (Gn 24 18; Ru 2 13). In the N T κύριος, is the customary term for addressing Jesus, and also frequently occurs in the full title applied to Him, the Lord Jesus Christ. It is also used (Mt 25 11, 24, and elsewhere) in addressing a superior, when it is frequently rendered "Sir." (2) In AV it is the usual rendering of the Divine name יהוה (and of its shorter form יָהּ, Yāh), properly pronounced Yāhweh, but usually transliterated "Jehovah" in ARV. In AV it is usually rendered "LORD" (in capitals). The plural form, 'ădhōnay, 'my lords,' is also very commonly used in the Heb. O T for God, and is always rendered "Lord," "my Lord," or "O Lord." Where the Heb. has both terms together, 'ădhōnay Yāhweh (Gn 15 2; Dt 3 24, etc.), AV renders "LORD GOD" (in capitals), but ARV renders "Lord Jehovah." The term 'ădhōnay expressed in particular the authority and lordship possessed by God over His creatures. See also JEHOVAH. (3) ṣ'rānīm, a plural term of uncertain etymology, is used to designate the princes or leaders of the Philistine confederacy (Jos 13 3; Jg 3 3, etc.). Some think that the word is allied to the Gr. τύραννος. The exact nature of the Philistine confederacy is unknown. Practically, these five "lords" appear to have been petty kings, each a primus inter pares (cf. I S 29 2 ff.). (4) In the case of the other Heb. terms rendered "lord," this rendering is to be taken in a general rather than a specific sense. Such are (a) ba'al, 'master,' 'owner' (Nu 21 28; Is 16 8); (b) g'bhir, 'a [strong] man' (Gn 27 29, 37); (c) mārē' (Dn 2 47, 4 19, 24, 5 23); (d) rabh, which is simply an adjective, 'great' (Dn 2 10; cf. RVmg.); (e) sar, 'prince' (Ezr 8 25 AV); (f) shālīsh, which means probably one who has distinguished himself and thereby has attained to high rank (II K 7 2-19; Ezk 23 23); (g) rabhr'bhānim, 'magnates,' 'great ones' (Dn 4 36, 5 1, 9, etc.). (5) In the N T we have (a) δεσπότης, 'ruler,' 'master,' as a designation of God (Lk 2 29; Ac 4 24; II P 2 1; Jude ver. 4; Rev 6 10); (b) κύριος, the ordinary Gr. term for master or lord, is also the equivalent through the LXX. of both 'ădhōnay and Yāhweh in the O T, as well as being the common designation of Jesus Christ. In I Ti 6 15 the verbal form κυριευόντων (ptcpl. of κυριεύειν) occurs with κύριος in the same sentence; (c) μεγιστᾶνες (Mk 6 21) is properly 'great ones,' 'magnates.' On Mt 10 51, cf. RV. C. LORD'S PRAYER, THE: The title traditionally given to the prayer that Jesus taught His disciples (Mt 6 9-13; Lk 11 2-5), better known in the older Catholic churches by its opening words (Pater Noster, Πάτερ ἡμῶν). It occurs in two different forms, and the differences suggest the question of the relations of these to one another. In Mt it is incorporated in the Sermon on the Mount; in Lk it is given in answer to the request of the disciples, "Lord, teach us to pray, even as John taught his disciples," presumably on an occasion which fell after the Galilean ministry. If these accounts of its first delivery are absolutely independent of each other, the prayer must have been given on two separate occasions. Inherently this is neither impossible nor improbable. But from the literary point of view it appears more likely that the version in Mt is adapted to the plan of the Evangelist, and represents a transposition of it to a different setting from the original. In such a case the parallel account of Lk is to be regarded as giving the exact circumstances of the delivery. But the occurrence in both versions of the unusual word epiousios (rendered "daily") indicates that the two forms are not independent, even as translations of the same original Aramaic, and if Mt has given it with a different setting from the original, Lk has modified it in accordance with his design of making the life and teachings of Jesus clear to Gentile readers.

The omissions and changes made by each may be presented in parallel form:

Mt.	Lk.
Our father who art in heaven,	Father,
Hallowed be thy name. Thy Kingdom come.	Hallowed be thy name. Thy Kingdom come.
Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth.
Give us this day our daily bread.	Give us day by day our daily bread.
And forgive us our debts.	And forgive us our sins;
As we also have forgiven our debtors.	For we ourselves also forgive every one that is indebted to us.
And bring us not into temptation,	And bring us not into temptation.
But deliver us from the evil one.

From this comparison it is evident that Luke's is the older version.

The prayer is a unit, and although extra-Biblical parallels of some of its phrases have been pointed out in Rabbinical sources, it does not appear that Jesus compiled the whole from such preexisting forms (against Wetstein, on Mt 6 9). The similarities alleged are for the most part verbal, and the sources from which they are drawn of much later date than the times of Jesus. The purpose for which the prayer was given is not defined with precision. Evidently, however, it was neither to furnish a stereotyped form which should do away with the free expression of the individual at the throne of God, nor, on the other hand, to show the true nature of prayer to those who were totally unaccustomed to it. The disciples both knew and used prayer; but they had misleading and confusing models before them in the practise of the Pharisees. It was as a corrective of these, and at the same time as a comprehensive summary of all that might properly find a place in their devotional utterances, that the ideal was given.

The contents of the Lord's Prayer are usually outlined as consisting of seven petitions: (1) Hallowed be thy name. (2) Thy Kingdom come. (3) Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven. (4) Give us this day our daily bread. (5) Forgive us our debts. (6) Lead us not into temptation. (7) Deliver us from the evil one. Of these the fourth is beset by obscurity in both versions of the gospel record. This is occasioned by the use of the term ἐπιούσιος (deriv. uncertain; possibly through the ptcpl. of ἐπιέναι, 'to be at hand') which occurs nowhere else, either in Biblical or in classical Greek. The explanations of the term proposed are: (1) That it means bread of subsistence, i.e., sufficient; (2) bread for the morrow; (3) but best of all, because of the customary time of prayer in the evening, as having reference to the bread that shall be immediately needed (cf. Cremer, Bib.-Theol. Wörterbuch[1] (1893); Chase, The Lord's Prayer in the Early Church, Texts and Studies (1891). A. C. Z.

LORD'S SUPPER, THE (κυριακὸν δεῖπνον, I Co 11 20): The name of the ordinance observed from the earliest Apostolic days to signify the communion of the disciples of Jesus Christ in His sacrificial death, and to commemorate that death as well as to draw the disciples together into a closer fellowship with one another. There are four accounts of the institution of the ordinance (Mt 26 26-29; Mk 14 22-25; Lk 22 15-20; I Co 11 23-26). These differ from one another, and according to their differences fall into two groups, Mt and Mk, and Lk and Paul respectively. Mt and Mk say nothing of a formal institution of a new rite by Jesus. Luke and Paul do. In the two groups there is again a primary and secondary character discernible. Mt is dependent on Mk, and Lk on Paul. Reduced to their primitive forms the sources show that Mk represents Jesus as introducing the elements with the simple formula, "Take ye"; and Paul reports Him to have added, "This do in remembrance of me." The question must therefore be raised whether Jesus originally used the fuller form given by Paul, or the simpler given by Mk. If the former alternative is true, then Jesus instituted the Lord's Supper, and with such additions and developments in meaning as may be traced in the history of its observance, it has been perpetuated by the Church to the present day. If, on the other hand, it is Mk who gives the original and correct account of the events, the occurrence in Paul's version of them of the command, "This do in remembrance of me," must be accounted for. This can be done (1) as an addition of Paul's, on his own initiative. In this case, the ordinance as a permanent institution must be regarded as a creation of Paul's. But this is scarcely probable from the historical point of view. Paul, as a late comer into the community, would not have ventured to tell eye-witnesses what the facts exactly had been upon any definite historical occasion. But (2) Paul may have embodied into his account a later addition to the words used by Jesus. Yet, how could such an addition have arisen? Spitta (Urchristentum, 1893) answers that if Jesus died on the 14th Nisan, the very day of the Passover, His death broke up the whole tenor of the lives of His disciples, and made it impossible for them to enter into the festivities engaged in by the rest of the people. But by the law of Nu 9 10, the disciples must have returned to Jerusalem to celebrate the Passover on the 14th Iyyar. This accounts for the fact that they were found at Jerusalem at that time. But in observing the Passover in the light of what had occurred, they saw the death of their Master very differently; the parallel between Jesus and the paschal lamb, slain at the same hour in which He died, forced itself upon them, and the idea that He was the Passover sacrifice dawned on them; but with the awakening of this idea the peculiar meaning of the Lord's Supper began. The original circumstances were lost sight of, and new words and acts imagined in their places. Paul simply reproduces this account of later origin. (3) Professor Briggs proposes the conjecture that Jesus met His disciples between His resurrection and His ascension, and having again sat at supper with them repeated the words He spoke on the night of His betrayal, explaining more fully their sacrificial significance, especially with reference to the Sinaitic covenant (Ex 24 1-12), and then added the charge to commemorate His death, reported by Paul. Paul simply combined the record of the two occurrences into one in I Co 11 23 ff. (The Messiah of the Gospels, p. 123). These theories seem too ingenious to represent the true history, and have found no favor with critical investigators. From the point of view of pure probability they have no advantages over the harmonistic theory which would make the account of Paul the fuller, and that of Mk the more defective, report of the same event. There is only one ground on which it can be claimed that Mk's account is more primitive than Paul's, and that is its omitting of a feature contained in the other. Chronologically, Paul's was given in a written form earlier than Mk's, and in an oral form it had evidently been preached to the church at Corinth still earlier. In the absence of stronger grounds for doubt in the authenticity of the whole account as given by him, the best explanation of the facts regarding the sources is that Paul's report is full, and Mk's omits one feature of the affair, less important from the point of view of his purpose.

Upon the ground of the facts as above stated, it appears that for the body of the followers of Jesus the supper was to be an institution commemorative and symbolical, both of what Christ accomplished through His death, and of what He was to be to them continually, that it was to symbolize the union of His followers with Himself, and also to serve as a method of its progressive realization. In bringing His death to the memory, it should signify the sacrificial nature of that death as a basis of a new covenant. The underlying assumptions are that the covenant is a relationship of the most cordial and intimate kind, that in order that it may exist all sources of offense must be removed, and that in the case of man's relation to God the source of offense was sin, therefore it must be obliterated by a sacrifice. (See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 8.)

The Lord's Supper, however, was to be not only a memorial festival, but also a symbol of Christ's present relation to the believer. Through the bread and the cup the believer was to represent to himself the nourishing and strengthening of his inner life by communion with Christ. It has been alleged, upon the basis of comparative religion, that in the pagan faiths there are parallels to the eating of food which is believed either to be, or to represent, the Divine life and thus to bring the worshiper into vital relations with the Deity. Thus in the cult of Dionysus, a bull which was regarded as the incarnation of the god of fertility, was torn and its flesh eaten raw, in order that his divine life might be transmitted to those who took part in the ceremony. (Cf. other illustrative details in Frazer, Golden Bough, II, 260–300; Percy Gardner, Expl. Evang., 240 ff.) But whether such antecedents underlay the Christian sacrament at its inception or not, it is evident that its meaning was primarily that of the mystic infusion of the spirit of Christ symbolized in the external act of the eating of a common meal. The thought is dimly present in the sacrificial festival-meal of the earlier Israelitic ritual. (Cf. SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 3.) The institution was doubtless developed out of the O T Passover, and conveys in an exalted and spiritualized form the idea that in partaking of a sacrifice one enters into communion with God. This is only a part of the significance of the Lord's Supper, but it is a prominent part. On the other hand, while it is possible to lay undue stress on the influence of ideas drawn from the mystery cults of pagan religions on the Lord's Supper, it is not necessary to deny the kinship between the symbolism used in the institution and the similar rites in the mystery cults, in order to realize its spiritual import. Even in such passages as Jn ch. 6 the main stress is on the spiritual significance of the metaphorical language; and the Church in the Apostolic and sub-Apostolic ages clearly perceived this.

The words, "Having given thanks" in Lk 22 17-19 (εὐχαριστήσας εὐχαριστήσας), denoting probably an act in the old paschal ritual, have served as the ground for one of the names of the Lord's Supper in the historical usage of the Church (the Eucharist).

For the modern mind, the meaning of the Lord's Supper, as presented in the N T, may be found (1) in the commemorative aspect of it, bringing to mind the redemptive death of Christ, (2) in the expression of communion with God under the new covenant, (3) in the communion of the disciples with one another, (4) in the promotion of the spirit of gratitude (Eucharist) for redemption, and (5) in the realization of the anticipation of the completed redemption in the future ("till he come").

LO-RUHAMAH, lō″-ru-hē′mā (לֹא רֻחָמָה, lō'rūḥāmāh), 'not pitied': The name of one of Hosea's children. She was probably so named by the prophet in view of his wife's infidelity to him. Later when his domestic tragedy enlightened him as to the religious condition of Israel, he used the name symbolically of Israel (Hos 1 6, 8, 2 23). See HOSEA, § 2. E. E. N.

LOT (לוֹט, lōṭ): The nephew of Abraham, who emigrated with his uncle from Ur to Canaan (Gn 11 27–12 5), where the relatives at length separated on account of strife between their herdsmen. L. took his flocks and his herds to the fertile plain of the Jordan, and ultimately dwelt in the wicked city of Sodom (13 5-13). He was captured in a raid by the eastern kings, but was rescued by his uncle (14 12-16). Angelic guests (? cf. He 13 2) warned L. of the impending doom of the cities of the plain (19 1-13; cf. Lk 17 28 f.), and he escaped with his two daughters to the little city of Zoar (19 15-23). His daughters' husbands, however, ridiculed his fears and refused to leave Sodom (19 14), and his wife (see LOT'S WIFE) also perished. From Zoar, L. and his daughters fled to the hill-country E. of the Jordan, where they lived in a cave (19 30).[1] Here, of incestuous unions, were born Moab and Ben-ammi (19 31-38), the ancestors of the Moabites and the Ammonites (cf. Dt 2 9, 19; Ps 83 8).

Many modern scholars explain the details of the story of L. as personifying the characteristics, migrations, and alliances of certain tribes of which he was the supposed ancestor (see PATRIARCHS). Thus he is thought to be the personification of an Aramaic clan once closely allied with a Hebrew tribe (Abraham's), but which later separated and moved eastward. It is supposed also that the ancestry of the hated nations Moab and Ammon was intended to be brought into disrepute through the story of their shameful origin. It is indeed possible that incest was common among these eastern tribes. The rescue of Lot by Abraham (Gn ch. 14) belongs to a unique portion of the Pentateuch, which must be studied with the aid of the commentaries.

In rabbinical literature L. is usually represented in an unfavorable light as self-indulgent and quarrelsome (cf. JE, s.v.). The Koran, however, frequently refers to him as a preacher of righteousness (e.g., Sura 29 27 ff.; cf. II P 2 7), and calls the Sodomites "the children of Lot." The modern Arabic name for the Dead Sea is Baḥr Lûṭ, "the Sea of Lot." L. G. L.

LOT: (1) The Heb. word gōrāl, always rendered "lot," "lots," is probably derived from the root grl, which appears in Arab words, meaning 'stones,' 'stony place,' etc.; since in the primitive method of "casting lots" stones were probably used. In Pr

16 33 the lot is said to be "cast into the lap," and it may be inferred that stones (marked in some way) were placed in the fold of a garment or, perhaps more often, in a vessel of some sort, and then the shaking of the garment, or vessel, would throw a stone out on the ground, according to which the decision was given. Hence the expressions "the lot came forth" (Heb. 'came up,' or 'out'), or "fell." Other methods, however, may have been employed, to which these same terms would apply. The lot was but one means of divination employed by the Hebrews. Others were the ephod (q.v.) and the Urim and Thummim (q.v.). The lot was used to determine such cases as the inheritances of the tribes (Nu 26 55; Jos 14 2, etc.), the courses of the priests, and Levites (I Ch 6 54 ff., 24 5, 26 14), the scapegoat on the Day of Atonement (Lv 16 8 ff.), the discovery of one guilty of some sin (Jon 1 7); i.e., in cases in which Divine guidance was desired, or in which the decision was left to chance (cf. the two N T instances, Ac 1 26 and Mk 15 24 and ‖s, where the Gr. is κλῆρος). In a few cases the word is used to indicate one's fate or condition in life (Pr 1 14; Is 17 14; Jer 13 25). In other cases the term is used for the landed inheritance resulting from the lot (Jos 15 1; Jg 1 3; Ps 16 5, etc.). (2) In a few instances "lot" renders the Heb. ḥebhel, 'line' (Dt 32 9; I Ch 16 18; Ps 105 11). See LINE. E. E. N.

LOTAN, lō'tan (לוֹטָן, lōṭān): The ancestral head of a Horite clan of the same name (Gn 36 20-29; I Ch 1 38). E. E. N.

LOT'S WIFE: The wife of Lot is said to have disobeyed the angelic command (Gn 19 17) while fleeing from Sodom, and to have looked backward, whereupon she became a pillar of salt (19 26). Christ refers to her fate as a warning against thinking of the safety of worldly goods at the advent of the Son of Man (Lk 17 32).

Salt formations are common near the S. end of the Dead Sea. Jebel Usdum, "Mount Sodom," is a ridge of rock salt 5 m. long and several hundred ft. high. Near its base are numerous detached pinnacles of salt, and at different times particular 'pillars' have been popularly identified with Lot's wife (Wis 10 7; Jos. Ant. I, 11 4; cf. the frontispiece in Stanley's Sinai and Palestine), although it would be impossible for a comparatively small mass of rock salt to outlast many rainy seasons.

LOVE: The idea of love occupies a central place in the religion of the Bible as a whole. In the earlier writings the conception is that

1. Early Form of Conception. of a human affection as between individuals of the same sex or of opposite sexes. David's tender feeling toward Jonathan and Jonathan's toward David is love ('ahăbhāh, II S 1 26). But in the same passage the ideal of such love in its full strength and purity is recognized to be the love of a woman (cf. Gn 29 20; Ezk 16 8, 23 17). This is a conception which naturally does not disappear in later Biblical usage (Song 2 4 f., 3 5, 8 6 f.; Ec 9 6).

2. Love of God to Man. (1) In the Prophetic Books. The prophets seize upon this conception, and use it as the figure of the particular feeling of J″ toward Israel. The first to present God as entertaining toward His chosen people the sentiments that in earthly relations are cherished toward those nearest and dearest is Hosea (Hos chs. 1–3, and 11 4). But the thought is taken up by Jeremiah (2 2, 31 3), and becomes very common—in fact, characteristic—of the relation in which J″ is represented as sustaining to His people (Is 63 9). He is the Shepherd, the Father, the Guardian, in all of which capacities He is actuated by the tenderest affection. (2) In the Teaching of Jesus. At the very outset, the teaching of Jesus reveals love as the central and dominant affection of God. In fact, God's love is all-comprehensive, not being limited to any race, but extending beyond the bounds which the O T seers had seen as limiting it. In the Synoptics, the revelation is contained implicitly in the various phases of the doctrine of God's fatherhood. In the Johannine reports of the teaching of Jesus it is explicit (Jn 3 16). The conception is fully presented by Paul (Ro 5 5, 8 35, 39), and by John (I Jn 4 8 f., etc.) as the basis of redemption from sin.

3. Love of Man to God. (1) Love to J″ in the O T. The love of the faithful to God is even more clearly defined. It is a condition of the normal life, which results in blessing (Ex 20 6), and must reach the highest possible pitch of intensity and the largest fulness (Dt 6 5). This is the note that remains constant in the religion of Israel amidst its changing forms of thought and worship. From the Song of Deborah (Jg 5 31) to the Psalms of the latest period (Ps 145 20, 146 8) the love for J″ is a characteristic of the Israelite, and the ground of the good pleasure of J″ in him. (2) Love to God in the Teaching of Jesus. But though this condition is at the root of obedience to the Law of God throughout the O T, it assumes a new significance in the teaching of Jesus, who fixed the eyes of His disciples upon it, as distinguished from its consequences. It was possible to entertain regard for these consequences and obey the Law outwardly from motives other than love. On the law of love the commandments and the prophetic teachings had grown as ripe fruit upon a living plant. Apart from this connection they would be futile. What it was necessary to strive for and attain was not observance of commandments as such, but conformity to all that is required because of love to God. The teaching of the N T throughout is simply the unfolding of this principle. Hence the idea of love is raised into the place of a new commandment (Jn 13 34). It is even called the "law" (Ja 2 8).

4. Love Among Men. (1) Love the Basis of Ethics. The law of love is through the N T the basis of Christian ethics. What Jesus says of the fundamental and controlling place of love in the O T ethics He means to apply to all ethics, and both Paul and James make the application accordingly. Every commandment intended to govern the relations of men is fulfilled in the commandment of love (Gal 5 14; Ro 13 8). (2) Brotherly Love. But the law of love reaches its intensest and fullest expression in the peculiar bond which faith in Jesus Christ creates among its individual possessors. These constitute a brotherhood; and the love that brings and keeps them together is brotherly love (φιλαδελφία). When the affection is commended to them, it is done by the use of the same term (He 13 1). What distinguishes the believer's feeling toward God and Christ is, however, specifically ἀγάπη, 'the love of delight.' Christian love is thus the distinctive element of the fully developed religion of the Bible. As such it is made the subject of special treatment in two particularly significant passages (I Co ch. 13; I Jn ch. 4). A. C. Z.

LOVE-FEAST. See CHURCH, § 2.

LOVING-KINDNESS: This is a predominantly Biblical word. It translates the Heb. ḥeṣedh, and this, in the main, when that word is used to express God's love to man. In many places, however, the same Heb. word, when used of God's love to man, was in AV rendered "mercy" (Gn 19 7, 24 27, etc.), "goodness" (Ex 34 6), "kindness" (Ps 31 21), "merciful kindness" (Ps 117 2). ERV, though showing a preference for the distinctive term "loving-kindness," preserves in most of these passages the older term; but ARV introduces "loving-kindness" throughout (cf. also Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v. חֶסֶד, II). See also GOD, § 2. A. C. Z.

LOW COUNTRY, LOWLAND: The Heb. term sh'phēlāh (from shāphal, 'to be low,' 'sink down') was given to the region between the central range of Palestine and the seacoast plain, which is partly highland, partly lowland, and, from the point of view of the highlander, continually 'falls' toward the sea. It is uniformly rendered "lowland" in RV The AV often renders it "valley," or "vale" (Dt 1 7; Jos 9 1, 11 2, etc.), or "plain" (I Ch 27 28, etc.), only rarely "lowland." See PALESTINE, § 7 (2), and cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, pp. 199–237. E. E. N.

LUBIM, lū'bim. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

LUCAS, lū'cas. See LUKE.

LUCIFER, lū'si-fẹr. See DAY-STAR.

LUCIUS, lū'shi-ʊs (Λούκιος): 1. Lucius of Cyrene, mentioned among the prophets and teachers in the church at Antioch (Ac 13 1). 2. Lucius, whom Paul calls his fellow countryman (συγγενής, Ro 16 21; cf. Ro 9 3). Possibly to be identified with 1. This is all the more probable if the Jason of Ro 16 21 and of Ac 17 5, 7, 9 are identical, and if the Sosipater of Ro 16 21 is the same as the Sopater of Ac 20 4. Origen (Hom. in Rom. 16 21) identifies L. with Luke (Λουκᾶς) the physician, but the names are philologically distinct. J. M. T.

LUD, lʊd (לוּד, lūdh), LUDIM, lū'dim (לוּדִים, lūdhīm): The name of apparently two races mentioned in the O T, a Semitic and an Egyptian. (1) The Semitic. According to Gn 10 22, Lud was one of the four sons of Shem. Commentators have very generally identified Lud with Lydus, the eponymous ancestor of the Lydians. The difficulty with this view is that the Lydians were not a Semitic race, and their civilization had no connection with that of Assyria. Possibly Lud was the name of a lost North Syrian tribe. (2) The Egyptian. The Ludim are said to be begotten by Mizraim, or Egypt (Gn 10 13—the phrase 'begot' denoting a geographical relation rather than actual descent). They appear as mercenaries in the Tyrian and Egyptian armies, and are famous as archers (Is 66 19; Jer 46 9; Ezk 27 10). Various conjectures have been made as to the identity of the Ludim. Some have cut the Gordian knot by emending the text and reading "Libyans." Others have regarded them as identical with Lud (Gn 10 22), i.e., Lydians. This conjecture is supported by the LXX. (Ezk 30 5), where "Lud" is rendered "Lydians." According to this theory, Lydians were settled in NE. Egypt. Others have identified them with the Berber tribe Lewâta; still others with the Rebu = Lebu, who inhabited Cyrenaica (see ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11). J. A. K.

LUHITH, lū'hith (לוּחִית, lūḥīth): The "ascent of Luhith" was in Moab, S. of the Arnon. According to Eusebius (Onom.), there was a place of that name between Areopolis (Rabbath-Moab) and Zoar. It was the way of escape for Moabites fleeing to Zoar (Is 15 5; Jer 48 5). C. S. T.

LUKE (Λουκᾶς, probably contracted form of Λουκανός): One of Paul's companions and fellow workers.

He is mentioned by name in only three passages, and all these are in the Epistles of Paul (Col 4 14; Phm ver. 24; II Ti 4 11). At the same time, the critical certainty of his authorship of the Third Gospel and the Book of Acts places at our disposal the so-called diary passages in the latter writing (16 10-17, 20 5–21 18, 27 1–28 16) as additional sources for our knowledge of his life and work in the early Church. From the first passage (16 10-17) we learn that L. accompanied the Apostle from Troas to Philippi on his second mission journey. The second passage (20 5–21 18) tells us that some six years later, on the third mission tour, L. was again with Paul at Philippi, from which place he journeyed with the Apostle to Jerusalem. It may be that L. spent these intervening years in Philippi, carrying on, as the Apostle's representative, the work begun on the occasion of his first visit to the place. This would be the more likely if Philippi were L.'s home—as has been inferred (Renan)—though the early tradition recorded by Eusebius (HE, iii, 4 6) and found in the ancient Argumentum Evangelii Secundum Lucan (c. 225 A.D.) makes him a native of Antioch. This seems to be confirmed by the frequent and significant references in Ac to Antiochian persons and incidents (e.g., 6 5, 11 19-21, 26, 13 1-3, 14 26, 15 2, 23, 35, 18 22; cf. also the reference to Naaman as the Syrian, Lk 4 27). These references would remain significant were they made because of an Antiochian residence on the part of Theophilus, for which, however, the tradition is not strong. The third passage (27 1–28 16) shows him as Paul's companion on his voyage to Rome.

The references made to him by the Apostle are all in the Epistles written during his two imprisonments at Rome. In Col (4 14) he is mentioned simply as among those in Paul's company sending salutations to the Colossian Christians; similarly in Phm (ver. 24) he is among those greeting the Colossian Christians to whom the Apostle is writing; while in II Ti (4 11) he is spoken of as the only one who had remained faithfully by the Apostle as the fatal ending to his captivity drew near. While these items seem relatively unimportant, they show us that L.'s fidelity to Paul kept him at the Apostle's side through not only his first imprisonment—Col and Phm having been written toward the close of that period—but disclosing him as with the Apostle at the end of his second imprisonment—II Ti being his last letter—is most likely to have kept him in his company during his brief return to his Eastern mission-field and his second journey as a captive to Rome.

The evidence gathered from the Third Gospel and from Ac that their author was a Gentile Christian is confirmed by the fact that in the Col passage L. belongs to the Apostle's fellow workers who are marked off from those "who are of the circumcision" (ver. 11). The reference to him in this Col passage as a "physician" is amply borne out by the language of the Gospel and Ac (for full discussion see Harnack's Lukas d. Arzt [Eng. transl., pp. 175–198] and Plummer, Com., pp. lxiii–lxvi), while the literary quality of such portions of his writings as are most likely the products of his own style (e.g., the prologue of the Gospel and the diary sections of Ac) show him to have been a man of culture as well as of scientific education.

The legend which makes him a painter and assigns to him a picture of the Virgin found at Jerusalem is unreliable.

For discussion of his authorship of the Third Gospel and Ac, as well as his tendencies of theological thought, see articles on these books.

The third of the Synoptic Gospels (q.v.). In common with all the narrative writings of the N T, it attaches to itself no name of author, though, together with Ac, it states distinctly for whom it was written (1 3). In fact, this dedication is admittedly so like that of Ac that the reference in the latter to "the former treatise" (1 1) is universally recognized as a reference to this Third Gospel; so that both books are acknowledged as being by the same author. This is confirmed by the significant continuity disclosed by the closing passage of the Gospel (24 44-53) and the opening passage of Ac (1 1-14) and by the striking similarity in the general style and in the specific linguistic peculiarities of the two writings. (For a detailed display of these linguistic peculiarities cf. Plummer, in Int. Crit. Com., pp. xlviii–lxvi; Zahn, Introduction [Eng. transl.], § 61, notes 11-13.) This, however, is no help to a discovery of the author's identity, for Ac tells us nothing more of its author than does the Gospel. Our only recourse, therefore, is to a critical induction of the Gospel, with help from Ac, as to such indications as bear upon its origin.

1. Authorship.

An outline of its contents presents the following narrative scheme:

(a) Outline.

Chs. 1 and 2 contain the introductory portion, consisting of the prologue (1 1-4) and the preliminary history, i.e., the birth and early years of Jesus and the Baptist (1 5–2 52).

The remaining chapters are taken up with the narrative proper, which is divided into two parts: (I) The active ministry of Jesus (3 1–21 38) and (II) His passion, resurrection, and ascension (22 1–24 53). (I) The active ministry is presented in a way which conceives of it somewhat differently from the way in which it is viewed by the other two Evangelists. After a preliminary narrative (3 1–4 13), which gives the political situation at the opening of the Gospel events (3 1, 2a), an account of the ministry of the Baptist (3 2b-18)—to which is added an account of his death, later in the history (3 19 f.)—and an account of the induction of Jesus into His work, through His baptism (3 21 f.) and His temptation (4 1-13)—between which is interpolated His genealogy (3 23-38)—the Ministry in Galilee is taken up and presented as His popular work, i.e., His work among the people (4 14–9 17).

In this, taking Mk's sequence of events as the standard, there are some displacements (e.g., 5 1-11 should precede 4 31b-37, and 8 4-18 should follow 8 19-21, while 11 14-36 has been placed in the later ministry, though it should really precede 8 19-21).

The reason for the first two misplacements may be due to document sources peculiar to the Evangelist; the reason for the latter will be apparent when we see that the period between the Galilean and the Jerusalem ministry is considered by the Evangelist as Jesus' Educational work, i.e., the work in which He gave Himself particularly to the instruction and training of His followers (9 18–19 28); for this passage (11 14-36) is looked at from this point of view though really it is part of the event recorded in Mk 3 20-30, which occurred as the climax of the second preaching tour (see GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 6).

This educational work is represented as carried on (1) in regions near to Galilee (9 18-50) and (2) in regions covered by journeys to Jerusalem (9 51–19 28). The latter portion includes some significant discourses (e.g., those connected with the mission of the Seventy, 10 1-24, with the request of the disciples concerning prayer, 11 1-13, with the ceremonial criticism in the Pharisee's house 11 37–12 12 [cf. 13 10-17, 14 1-14], with the request concerning inheritance 12 13-59, and that concerning the signs of the times 17 20-37) and a number of His more elaborate parables (e.g., the Good Samaritan 10 25-37, the Rich Fool 12 13-21, the Lost Sheep, the Lost Coin, and the Prodigal Son, ch. 15, the Unjust Steward and Dives and Lazarus, ch. 16, the Unjust Judge, 18 1-8, the Pharisee and the Publican, 18 9-14, the Ten Pounds 19 11-27), and in its general contents is peculiar to the narrative of this Gospel, not being paralleled by either of the other Synoptics. The Jerusalem Ministry, with the public entry into the city, extends from 19 28 to 21 38, consisting largely in controversies with the authorities, aroused by their challenging questions (20 1-8, 20-40), illustrated by parables (20 9-19), and closed by His eschatological discourse (21 5-38), all of which are paralleled by the other Gospels. (II) Then follows, in common with the other Gospels, including the Fourth, the narrative of the Passion (22 1–23 56a), the Resurrection (23 56b–24 12), with the subsequent appearances to the disciples (24 13-43)—which, in distinction from the other Gospels, are located in the neighborhood of Jerusalem—closing with the only account given by the Gospels of the Ascension (24 44-53).

In the closer study of this outline it becomes at once apparent that the statements of the prologue are most significant in their bearing upon the Gospel's origin; for they tell us (1) that there were in existence at the time of the Gospel's writing many written ordered narratives of the Gospel history (1 1); (2) that these narratives were based, chiefly at least, upon oral tradition, handed down by those who participated in these events (ver. 2); (3) that these narratives, apparently not seeming satisfactory to the author, he had made an accurate investigation of all the facts from the beginning, on the basis of which he had written to Theophilus in chronological sequence (καθεξῆς), in order that he might know the certainty (ἀσφάλειαν) concerning the things (or 'words,' 'stories') in which he had been instructed (περὶ ὧν κατηχήθης λόγων).

These statements would seem to indicate that the author was not an eye-witness of the Gospel events, though not necessarily outside of the Gospel generation; for his Gospel, while dependent upon an investigation of the facts, evidently accomplished that investigation through a personal examination of oral sources of information, rather than through a critical study of written documents. In addition, he states distinctly that these events occurred in the generation to which he himself belonged (cf. the ἡμῖν of ver. 1).

The fact that the author gave himself to such examination would seem to suggest that he was possessed of literary capacity, which is borne out by the classical character of the prologue itself and the essential superiority in style of the rest of the book over that of the other Gospels (cf. Plummer, as cited above). This is brought out conspicuously in Ac, where, in the portions which relate the author's personal experience (16 10-17, 20 5–21 18, 27 1–28 16), he exhibits a literary style, which shows his ability to write when not constrained by the style of his sources (cf. these sections with the distinctly Aramaic style of the first half of the book). In fact, if it be claimed that the Aramaic style of the first part of Ac and of the chapters in the Gospel which immediately follow the prologue is due to the author's adaptation of his narrative to the distinctly Jewish events narrated, it simply shows in stronger light his literary versatility. From this it is natural to infer that the author was a Gentile Christian of Greek culture, which indeed has never been questioned by scholars.

A broader study of the Gospel's contents gives indication of a spirit and line of thinking which are strikingly like Paul's. Beyond a coincidence with Paul's Epistles in vocabulary and phraseology (cf. Plummer, pp. liv–lix for list), there is in the material peculiar to the Gospels such a breadth of national view (e.g., 2 32, 4 25 ff., 9 52-55, 10 25-37, 13 28-30, 24 47 [cf. Mt 6 32, 10 5, 18]) and such an emergence of characteristic Pauline doctrine (e.g., the graciousness of forgiveness, 7 36-50, ch 15, 23 39-43; the non-merit of mere works, 13 24-30, 17 7-10; the modifying influence of ignorance and unbelief, 12 47 f., 23 34) that it seems reasonable to believe not only that the author was acquainted with Paul's teaching but that he selected his material in sympathy with it.

(d) Pauline Character.

As to the Theophilus addressed in these writings, he evidently was a Gentile, since the Gospel was written obviously for one who was not only unfamiliar with Palestine geography, but was not even acquainted with Jewish customs. He was also apparently a man of rank (κράτιστε; cf. author's use of this word in Ac 23 26, 24 3, 26 25). There is no hint as to his residence, though tradition places it at Antioch.

(e) Theophilus.

The motive in sending him the Gospel is distinctly stated in the prologue to be in order that he might have certain knowledge of the matters regarding which he had been instructed (1 4). From this it is evident that he was favorably inclined toward Christianity and had had some information, if not distinct instruction, regarding its claims. It was the author's purpose to win him fully to the new religion by placing before him in their full historical setting the Gospel stories (λόγοι) which had been told him.

(f) Motive.

As to the time when the Gospel was written, it must be clear from a comparison of 19 41-44 and 21 20-24 with parallels in Mt (24 15-28) and Mk (13 14-23) that the author is writing from a point of view taken when these events of the predicted catastrophe of Judaism had occurred. Both passages are peculiar to this Gospel and contain (especially 19 41-44) military terms, lacking in the other Synoptics, which would readily agree with the presence before the writer's mind of the actual events, while the announcement of the Parousia is connected not so much with the definite event of the downtreading of Jerusalem by the Gentiles, as with the indefinite event of the times of the Gentiles being fulfilled (21 24), which would seem to place it further in the future, in the mind of the author, than in that of either of the other synoptists (cf. the εὐθέως of Mt 24 29 and the ἐν ἐχείναις ταῖς ἡμέραις of Mk 13 24 with the indefinite statement of Lk 21 25). It was written, therefore, after 70 A.D.; though from its early currency in the post-Apostolic Church (see § 2 below) and much more from the early character of its thought (see § 4, below) it is not likely to have been much later than this date. About 80 A.D. is most probable.

(g) Time.

No information is given of its place of composition, though perhaps, in view of the Gentile writer and the Gentile cast of the writing, it was more likely outside of Palestine than within it.

(h) Place.

This induction leaves the Gospel a thoroughly possible product of the Apostolic age—in fact, in view of the statements of the prologue, makes it impossibly later than the Gospel generation (see § 1 (b) above). It also discloses nothing which prevents its having been written by the man whose name it bears (see preceding article).

Both of these conclusions are borne out by the testimony of post-Apostolic literature. Its recognized currency in the Church can be traced back through Tatian (170 A.D.), who makes frequent and abundant use of it, Marcion (140 A.D.), by whom it was the only Gospel accepted and who held it in an abbreviated and corrupt form of text, showing that the original text was not a new production in history but had been long enough in use to undergo alteration, to Clement of Rome (100 A.D.), who seems to have had both the Gospel and Acts before him in his Epistle to the Corinthians. From the time of the Muratorian Canon (170 A.D.) onward the Gospel is distinctly referred to as Luke's, and this reference is made not as an individual opinion but as the accepted belief of the Church. For the selection of this name rather than that of an Apostolic eye-witness of the events, there must have been strong ground in the facts of the case.

2. External Evidence.

The critical conclusion from the above internal and external study of the Gospel is that it was written by Luke, the companion of Paul (see preceding article).

That written narratives of the Gospel events were in existence when the Gospel was produced is distinctly stated in the prologue (1 1). It is most improbable, therefore, that though Luke by preference made his investigation of facts through the personal sources at his disposal, he made no use whatever of the written sources at his hand. In fact, it is obvious that some of his material must have come from documents (e.g., the Genealogy, 3 23-38, the Annunciation narrative, 1 5-79, the Nativity story, 2 1-39, the Childhood record, 2 41-51. Note the evident conclusions of these documents, respectively at 1 80, 2 40, 2 52).

3. Sources.

Beyond these individual cases, however, it is clear that there are identities between this Gospel and the First Gospel which are so striking in character as to compel the conviction that a common document lies behind them (e.g., 3 7-10, 17 = Mt 3 7-10, 12; 4 3-13 = Mt 4 3-11; 6 41 f. = Mt 7 3-5; 7 6b-9 = Mt 8 8-10; 7 22-28 = Mt 11 4-11; 7 31-35 = Mt 11 16-19; 9 58-60 = Mt 8 19-22; 11 19 f., 23 = Mt 12 27 f., 30; 11 24-26 = Mt 12 43-45; 11 29-31 = Mt 12 39-42). They can not be due to a mere use of the First Gospel by Luke, since they form only a portion of his parallels with this Gospel, the remainder showing such differences as to raise the question whether he had it before him at all when he wrote (but cf. Allen on Mt in Int. Crit. Com., pp. xlvii–lx). The fact that they are confined to the discourse parallels between these Gospels shows rather that behind them lay a collection of sayings of Jesus with more or less of narrative setting, from which collection these two Evangelists drew much of their discourse material in common, though in distinctively different ways—Matthew making larger use of the original source as a whole and subjecting its contents to his arbitrary grouping plan, Luke using only excerpts of it—and with greater freedom of literary handling (cf. Allen, pp. lix ff., and for the origin and character of this source in general see GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 5).

The presentation which Luke makes of the teachings of Jesus and his selection among the incidents of the Gospel history bring to notice certain traits in his thinking which are worthy of consideration. (1) As to God: Luke unites with the other synoptists in representing Jesus as declaring not only the sovereign power (18 27) and absolute goodness of God (18 18 f.), but also His Divine Fatherhood—primarily toward Jesus' own disciples, involving a relation to them of care and protection in the outcome of their life of trust and obedience to Him (12 32). At the same time, as compared with Matthew, he makes but slight use of the term Father, though he alone records the parable of the Prodigal Son (ch. 15), which, in agreement with his spirit of universalism, implies a Fatherly relation extending beyond the circle of actual discipleship; while, unlike Matthew, he makes no use at all of the title King in his representations of Jesus' ascription of power to God, and records but one of the parables of Kingship and then eliminates this King-element from it (e.g., cf. 14 16 with Mt 22 2). (2) As to Jesus Himself: In common with the other synoptists Luke presents Jesus as referring to Himself as the Son of Man and as the Son of God, though the latter title He never explicitly uses in any of the Synoptics. By the former title He designates His relation to the Kingdom of God not only as its Founder, in which relation it is His function to seek and to save the lost (19 10), to forgive sins (5 24), to determine the significance and use of the Sabbath (6 5) and the conduct of the natural life (7 34), but as its Servant, in which relation He has to surrender the comforts of life (9 58) and to submit to the sufferings of persecution and to the sacrifice of death (9 22, 44, 18 31, 22 22, 48), in return for which, however, is to come to Him at last the glory of His revelation and His exaltation in the consummation of the Kingdom (12 8, 40, 17 22-30, 21 27, 36, 22 69). In these passages the reference to the redemptive function (19 10) and to the betrayal at the hands of Judas (22 22, 48) are peculiar to Luke. Though, as said above, the title Son of God is never explicitly used by Jesus of Himself and the relationship which the title involves is implicitly asserted only in a few passages (Lk 2 49, 10 22 [Mt 11 27]; Lk 22 29, 42, 23 34, 46, 24 49 and the parable of the Vineyard, Lk 20 9-18 and ||s), yet in this relationship there is claimed a unique intimacy with God, involving a mutual knowledge of uncomparable character (10 22), a mutual harmony of will in absolute devotion on the filial side (22 42) and in absolute acquiescence on the Father's side (23 34), a distinct representativeship by way both of commission from God to His people (20 9-18,

4. Theology.

22 29, 24 49) and of being intrusted by God with a work to be accomplished (2 49; cf. the consciousness of its accomplishment in the cry 23 46 [Jn 19 30]). It is to be noted that the seemingly deprecatory passage (Mk 13 32) does not appear in Lk, nor does the apparently despairing cry on the Cross, "My God, why hast thou forsaken me!" (Mt 27 46; Mk 15 34), while the final word of intimate trustfulness and the intercessory plea (23 34, 46) on the Cross, and the childhood passage of whole-hearted devotion (2 49) as well as the less significant statements of 22 29, 49 are given by Lk alone. Although Jesus is thus represented as but in a slight way referring to His personal relationship with God, He is at the same time shown as acquiescing in the application of this Divine title to Himself by others. This is significant in the two instances of the heavenly reference to Him as Son, where it is implied that He stands as the unique object of the Father's pleasure (3 22, 9 35), and in the Tempter's and in the Demoniac's reference to Him as the Son of God, where His possession of supernatural power is implied (4 3, 9, 8 28). Mark and Matthew record other occasions on which the title is given to Jesus, both by His friends and by His enemies; Luke, however, but twice records such references, and these are by the demons at Capernaum (4 41) and by the High Priest at His trial (22 70), in both of which cases the title is used apparently in nothing more than a Messianic sense. While Mark consistently presents Jesus throughout his narrative as the Wonder Worker, whose ministry impresses the people with its marvel, Luke begins his narrative with a nativity story in which the wonder element is developed throughout his narrative, alone of all the synoptists applies to Jesus the title Lord (5 17, 7 13, 10 1, 39, 41, 11 39, 12 42, 13 15, 17 5 f., 18 6, 19 8, 22 61, 24 3, 34), and alone closes his narrative with the wonder of the Ascension and the promise of the sending of the Holy Spirit (24 49-51). It is noticeable that this Evangelist frequently represents Jesus not only as Himself holding communion with God in prayer (3 21, 5 16, 6 12, 9 18, 28 f., 11 1, 22 32, 41, 44 f.), but as urging prayer upon His disciples as the need of their spiritual life (6 28 [=Mt 5 44], 11 5-13, 18 1 ff., 21 36, 22 40, 46 [=Mt 26 41; Mk 14 38]). (3) As to the Kingdom of God: While, with the other synoptists, Luke represents Jesus as making use of the current theocratic phrase "the kingdom of God" (="kingdom of heaven" in Mt), he is particular to bring out Jesus' conception of its non-national and non-political character. It is Luke alone who records Jesus' address at the Nazareth synagogue, in which He discloses the narrowness of the people's national idea of the Kingdom (4 16-30); it is Luke alone who has preserved the parable of the Good Samaritan (10 25-37), the incident of the Ten Lepers (17 11-19), and Jesus' rebuke of His disciples' national bigotry, when they desired to punish the Samaritans for not receiving them on their journey (9 51-56), in contrast with which is Matthew's record of Jesus' instruction to the Twelve (10 5 ff.; cf. also 15 24); and it is Luke alone who records Jesus' reply to the Pharisee's inquiry as to when the Kingdom of God should appear (17 20 ff.), emphasizing the distinctive character of this teaching by showing the slowness with which Jesus' own disciples apprehended it (24 21; Ac 1 6). It might seem that in his version of the Beatitudes Matthew brings out more distinctly the spiritual nature of the Kingdom in his description of the character of its subjects (cf. Mt 5 1 ff. with Lk 6 20 ff.); but that Luke's conception of the Kingdom is not a physical one is evident from his portrayal of its spiritual characteristics in the parables of Grace and Forgiveness, which he alone records (e.g., Lost Sheep, ch. 15 3-7; Lost Coin, 15 8-10; Prodigal Son, 15 11-32; Dives and Lazarus, 16 19-31; Pharisee and Publican, 18 9-14; cf. 7 36-50). He has also emphasized more than the other synoptists the conditions of suffering and self-sacrifice necessary for entrance into it (cf. 9 61 f., 14 28-35, 16 1-13). In agreement with this spiritual conception of the Kingdom, it is noticeable that Luke does not record those parables of the Kingdom which represent it as an objective good to be appropriated by men (Hid Treasure, Mt 13 44; Costly Pearl, Mt 13 45 f.; cf. the parable of the Great Supper, 14 16-24 =Mt 22 2-14; emphasizing the graciousness of the invitation rather than the material benefit of the feast). It is also in agreement with this spiritual idea that he brings out the universal purpose of the Kingdom (cf. the added citation in 3 6, the notes of universalism in the Nativity section, 1 79, 2 32, the historical statements, 4 25-27, the commission to the Seventy 10 1 f., the Gentile factor in the Kingdom's future 21 24). At the same time, it is strange that he makes no record of Jesus' ministry in the regions of Tyre and Sidon (cf. Mk 7 24–8 26 and Mt ||). (4) As to the Messianic Salvation: Luke, in common with Matthew and Mark, seems to represent Jesus as assigning eternal life to the world to come (18 30), and yet, with them, he makes clear that the salvation which Jesus bestows upon His disciples covers the present as well as the future life (ibid.). It does not consist in material things (12 33); in fact, Luke shows in the parable of the Rich Fool in what glaring contrast to them it stands (12 16-21). At the same time, it more than makes up for the loss of these things (18 29 f.), and even seems to secure them in the best sense of their possession (12 22-31). As to the general conditions on which this salvation is bestowed, Luke, together with Matthew, presents Jesus as laying emphasis upon the significance of personal relations to Himself (10 16, 12 8; cf. 10 21-24). In the matter of the more definite conditions of repentance and faith, however, Luke—as the other synoptists—makes but slight mention of the former of them, representing Jesus as speaking of repentance but twice—once in His earlier ministry (5 32) and again in His closing commission to His disciples (24 47). He gives more prominence to faith, mentioning it several times as referred to by Jesus (5 20 [=Mt 9 2; Mk 2 5], 7 9 [=Mt 8 10, 13], 7 50, 8 48 [=Mt 9 22; Mk 5 34], 8 50 [=Mk 5 36], 17 19, 18 8, 42 [=Mk 10 52]), which is natural in one so Pauline in his way of thinking as this Evangelist. (See § 1d, above.) At the same time it is remarkable that as to the means by which the bestowal of this salvation is made possible, Luke alone does not refer to the death of Jesus (cf. Mk 10 45 and Mt 26 28), beyond recording His general remark to the disciples on the way to Emmaus (24 25-29). On the other hand, it is noteworthy, as an early element in his thinking, to what an extent Luke—as James in his Epistle—connects poverty and humbleness of social rank with possession of the blessings of the Kingdom (cf. Parable of Dives and Lazarus, ch. 16; the Lukan version of the Beatitudes, ch. 6; the O T passage read by Jesus in the Nazareth Synagogue, 4 18; and the following: 12 33 [cf. Mt 6 19], 3 11, 5 11, 28 [cf. Mt 4 22, 9 9], 6 27, 30, 38, 11 41, 14 12-14, 21, 33, 19 8). (5) As to Eschatology: Luke, together with the other synoptists, and, in fact, along with the entire early Church, has blended many of the teachings of Jesus regarding the progress and development of His Kingdom with His announcement of its consummation at His Second Coming (e.g., cf. eschatological address, ch. 21, and the passage and parable, 17 20–18 8), though, as said under (3) above, the spiritual character of this development and consummation is perhaps more conspicuous in Lk than in the other Synoptics (cf. 17 20–18 8). So also in the presentation of the Judgment Luke, with the other synoptists, blends Jesus' teachings as to the process of judgment with those as to its final pronouncement; though he is less inclined than the others to display the crisis element in it (cf. 13 25-27 with Mt 7 21-23, 6 43-45 with Mt 12 33-37), which also is in agreement with his conception of the definite spiritual character of the Kingdom.

LUNATIC. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5 (8).

LUST: The rendering in verbal and substantive forms of several Heb. and Gr. words: (1) In the O T the noun does not occur in RV; on Ex 15 9; Ps 78 18, 81 12 (all AV), cf. the more correct rendering in RV. (a) 'āwāh, 'to desire,' or 'to wish'; the special sense is to be determined by the context (Nu 11 34; Ps 106 14, and in AV Dt 12 15, 20 f., 14 26). In Nu 11 4 we have ta'ăwāh, lusting AV, from the same root. (b) ḥāmadh, 'to desire,' stronger than (1), usually rendered "covet" (Pr 6 25). (2) In the N T. (a) The noun ἐπιθυμία, of frequent occurrence, is usually rendered "lust." In itself this term means simply 'desire,' and can be used of the noblest and purest sentiments (cf. Lk 22 15; Ph 1 23); but where it is rendered "lust," it indicates desires after mere material things, or the lower physical appetites and passions (Mk 4 19; Jn 8 44; Ro 1 24; Gal 5 16; II Ti 2 22, 3 6, etc.). In Mt 5 28; I Co 10 6; Gal 5 17; Ja 4 2 the related verb ἐπιθυμεῖν, 'to lust,' and in I Co 10 6 the derivative noun ἐπιθυμητής, 'one who longs for,' occur. (b) ἡδονή (Ja 4 1, 3 AV) is rendered more properly by RV "pleasure." (c) The phrase ἐν πάθει ἐπιθυμίας ("in the lust of concupiscence," I Th 4 5 AV) is rendered literally by RV "in the passion of lust." (d) ὄρεξις, in Ro 1 27 means properly 'sensual desire.' (e) In Ja 4 5 ἐπιποθεῖν is rendered more correctly by "doth long unto" in RV. E. E. N.

LUTE. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3 (3), (b).

LUZ, luz (לוּז, lūz): 1. A noted place in Canaan (Gn 35 6, 48 3), renamed Bethel (Gn 28 19; Jg 1 23) by Jacob, on the border between Ephraim and Benjamin (Jos 16 2, 18 13). In Jos 16 2 it is distinguished from Bethel. Perhaps Bethel was the original name of the sanctuary E. of Luz. See BETHEL. 2. A town N. of Canaan, founded by a refugee from Luz (Bethel), which was taken by Ephraim (Jg 1 26). Site unknown. C. S. T.

LYCIA, lish′i-a. See ASIA MINOR, § 8.

LYDDA, lid′a. See LOD.

LYDIA lid′i-a (Λυδία): One of Paul's early converts in Europe, a native of Thyatira (Ac 16 14), in the district known as Lydia. The omission of all mention of L. by Paul in his Epp. renders it probable that Λυδία is an adjectival form = 'the Lydian,' and not the convert's personal name. Only Λύδη (Lyda) is found in inscriptions as a proper name (cf. CIG, Nos. 653, 6975). Perhaps, therefore, L. may be identified with one of those women who in Ph 4 2 are said to have labored with Paul in the Gospel. See also ASIA MINOR, § 9. J. M. T.

LYE: The rendering of the Heb. nether (Jer 2 22 RV; "niter" AV), the equivalent of the Gr. νίτρον, Lat. nitrum, i.e., natron, or carbonate of soda (cf. Pr 25 20), a mineral alkali, which when mixed with oil was used as soap. E. E. N.

LYSANIAS, lai-sê′ni-as (Λυσανίας): The tetrarch of Abilene (see ITURÆA), or the territory of the city of Abila, now Sûk on the Abana river, nearly midway between Damascus and Heliopolis. The L. mentioned by Lk 3 1 was Lysanias II, and must not be confounded with Lysanias I, who in 40 B.C. inherited the throne from his father, Ptolemæus, son of Mennæus, and was executed by Antonius in 36 B.C. (see ITURÆA). An inscription of Abila dating from the reign of Tiberius speaks of a Lysanias (II) as being tetrarch of Abilene at that time. It is thus clear that Abilene had been severed from the kingdom of Chalcis (that of Lysanias I) and that it formed a separate tetrarchy, at whose head stood Lysanias II. The name "Lysanias" was probably a common one in the princely family, and continued to cling to the region. Lk 3 1 is certainly correct. J. R. S. S.

LYSIAS, lis′i-as (Λυσίας): 1. A general, appointed governor of Syria by Antiochus Epiphanes in 166 B.C. (I Mac 3 38 f.). He was defeated the following year at Bethsura by Judas Maccabæus (I Mac 5 34 f.; Jos. Ant. XII, 7 5), and was put to death by order of Demetrius I in 162 B.C. (I Mac 7 2-4; Jos. Ant. XII, 10 1). 2. Claudius Lysias, a freedman of the Claudian gens, who was commander of the Roman cohort in Jerusalem at the time of Paul's arrest (Ac 21 31 ff., 22 28). He permitted the latter to address the populace (Ac 21 39), protected him against their violence (Ac 22 24), and finally sent him under guard to Cæsarea (Ac 23 23 f.).

LYSTRA, lis'trɑ (Λύστρα): A city of Lycaonia, with which province it passed, in 36 B.C., into the kingdom of Galatia, and on the death of Amyntas (25 B.C.) into the Roman Provincia Galatia (see ASIA MINOR, § 6). Of little importance historically, L. is known chiefly from Luke's mention of it in connection with the visits and preaching of Paul (and Barnabas). The site, now called Zoldera, 1 m. N. of Khatyn Serai (six hours' travel S. of Iconium) was discovered by the writer, through a Latin inscription on a pedestal (still in situ), which in the time of Paul supported a statue of Augustus (Divum Aug[ustum] Col[onia] Julia Felix Gemina Lustra consecravit d[ecreto] d[ecurionum]). Thus L. was a Roman colonia (founded about 6 B.C.), and coined money (only four coins are known, one of which was bought by the writer at Iconium). There are almost no remains of the old city and only a few inscriptions (chiefly Latin). L. was the home of Timothy (Ac 16 1), and of Artemas, one of the seventy disciples, said to have been first bishop of Lystra.

MAACAH, mê'ɑ-cā, MAACHAH (מַעֲכָה, ma'ăkhāh): I. A district of Syria, near Mt. Hermon, and N. of Geshur (II S 10 6, 8; I Ch 19 6 f.), the home of the Maachathites (Dt 3 14; Jos 12 5, 13 11, 13; II S 23 34 [?]). See ARAM, § 4 (3). II. 1. A 'son' of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gn 22 24). As Nahor was an Aramæan, this Maacah is probably the genealogical equivalent of I. 2. One of David's wives, the daughter of Talmai, King of Geshur, and the mother of Absalom (II S 3 3; I Ch 3 2). 3. The father of Achish, King of Gath (I K 2 39; but cf. I S 27 2). 4. One of the wives of Rehoboam, King of Judah, and the mother of Abijah (I K 15 2; II Ch 11 20 ff.); perhaps identical with 2. 5. The mother of King Asa (I K 15 13; II Ch 15 16); but there seems to be some confusion here with 2. 6. Caleb's concubine (I Ch 2 48), and probably the name of a clan rather than an individual. The term Maacathite, as used in II S 23 24; II K 25 23; I Ch 4 19 and Jer 40 8, may refer to members of this clan. 7. A Benjamite woman (I Ch 7 15 f.). 8. The wife of Jehiel, the "father" of Gibeon (I Ch 8 29, 9 35). 9. The father of Hanun (I Ch 11 43). 10. The father of Shephatiah (I Ch 27 16).

MAAZIAH, mê''ɑ-zɑi'ɑ (מַעַזְיָה, ma'azyāh): The ancestral head of the 24th course of priests (I Ch 24 18), which was represented at the signing of the covenant (Neh 10 8). E. E. N.

MACCABEES, mɑc'ɑ-bîz, THE: The Maccabees, or Hasmoneans (sometimes Asmoneans), as they were also called, from Hashmon, the great-grandfather of Mattathias, received their name from the title given to Judas, the second son of Mattathias. He was called Judas Maccabæus, i.e., Judas "the Hammerer," because, doubtless, of his vigorous assaults upon the Syrians. The title gradually included all the members of the family of Mattathias and their descendants. The attempt by Antiochus IV,

Epiphanes (175–164 B.C.) to force Greek worship upon the Jews brought on the crisis in which this family came to leadership. The successors of Alexander the Great had taken up his policy of furthering Greek culture and customs among their subjects. Up to the time of Antiochus the Jews had been allowed religious freedom, but he, not content with the measure of Hellenization which had already been accomplished in Palestine, determined to make the Jews give up their religious rites and ceremonies, and adopt heathen practises. In the execution of his mad purpose he polluted the Temple, and sent his agents throughout the land to compel the people to worship idols. At the little town of Modin, where (I) Mattathias, an aged priest, and his five sons were living, the horror and anger of the Jews struck fire. The Syrian official who attempted to carry out the king's wish was slain, the idolatrous altar was overturned, and, with a call to all who wished to be faithful to the Law to come to them, Mattathias and his five sons fled to the mountains. The father lived but about a year after this, and at his death in 167 B.C. committed the leadership to (II) Judas. This vigorous young captain won victory after victory, and was able to restore the temple worship in three years after its defilement by Antiochus (Dec., 165 B.C.). The question of religious liberty being soon thereafter settled, the Maccabees now set before themselves the larger ambition of political independence. For this Judas fought on against great odds, and at last fell in the battle of Elasa (161 B.C.). For seven years, with superb skill and unflagging zeal, he had defended the faith. The leadership was then given to his brother (III) Jonathan, whose successes were rather those of the politician than the warrior, though he did not escape the disagreeable duties of war. He profited largely by the quarrels and intrigues of the Syrian court, and lost his life by a trap into which Tryphon, an aspirant for the Syrian throne, led him at Bethshan (143 B.C.). As John and Eleazar had both perished, there was only one son of Mattathias left, and the people called him heartily to lead them. His reign was short but brilliant. By his glowing zeal, unremitting energy, and clever diplomacy (IV) Simon achieved the independence of the nation (142 B.C.), and the troubles in Syria left him free to attend to the needs of his own government. He it was who drove the Syrians from the citadel in Jerusalem, where for twenty-six years they had disturbed the peace of the city. So completely did he free the land from the fear and trouble of war that "every man sat under his vine and fig-tree, and there was none to make them afraid" (I Mac 14 12). In Sept., 141 B.C., the people in great assembly resolved that he should be civil governor, military chief, and high priest "forever, until there should arise a faithful prophet" (I Mac 14 41). Thus his exalted position was made hereditary. Simon's reign was characterized by two important political acts—his embassy to Rome, and his coinage of money. It had been fitting that his prosperous career should end in a peaceful death; but, involved again in the turmoils of the court at Antioch, he was, with his two sons, treacherously murdered by his son-in-law at a banquet at Docus near Jericho, 135 B.C. (V) John Hyrcanus, the third son of Simon, by a timely warning, escaped the fate of his father, became his successor, and ruled the land for thirty-one years (135–105 B.C.). His reign is notable for its extension of the kingdom. Territory E. of the Jordan, also Samaria and Edom, were brought under his rule, and he was independent of the Syrian kings. His policy of conquest and employment of foreign troops awakened strong opposition. During his reign the Pharisaic party became a prominent factor in the life of the nation. The whole drift of his administration was away from their ideals, and their opposition caused him, near the end of his reign, to side with the Sadducees. On the whole, however, his rule was prosperous. Josephus pays him a high tribute of praise (Ant. XIII, 10 7). Hyrcanus left the government to his wife and the high-priesthood to his eldest son (VI) Aristobulus. Trouble, however, came soon, for Aristobulus, ambitious to have full power, imprisoned his mother. Once at the head of the government, he showed his sympathy with the Sadducees, took the title of king, encouraged Hellenism, and carried on a war of conquest. He was called the "Phil-Hellene." A fatal illness ended his career in 104 B.C. Bad as this man was in the eyes of the Pharisees, he did not compare in shamelessness and infamy with his successor (VII) Alexander Jannæus, the third son of Hyrcanus. For twenty-six years (104–78 B.C.) this man fought, intrigued, and murdered in pursuit of his selfish ambitions, and won for himself a place among the reprobates of Jewish history. His reign was marked by fierce internal conflicts growing out of the opposition of the Pharisees. The outcome of his whole career was widened territory and external glory, but deep inner unrest and uncertainty. (VIII) Alexandra, his wife, succeeded him upon the throne, and her reign of nine years has been called the "golden age" of Pharisaism. In every possible particular she reversed the policy of Jannæus. As Josephus says, "while she governed other people, the Pharisees governed her." The high-priesthood was given to the indolent and incompetent Hyrcanus, eldest son of Jannæus, while the younger son, Aristobulus II, because of his shrewd, energetic and ambitious nature, was studiously kept out of power. He became the rallying center for the Sadducees, and used them for his own aims. The death of Alexandra in 69 B.C. brought (IX) Hyrcanus II to power, but his brother (X) Aristobulus II made him give up both his royal and high-priestly rank. At this time the Herodian house began to exert a dire influence on the affairs of Palestine. Antipater, father of Herod the Great, sided with the deposed Hyrcanus II, and Aristobulus II was shut up within the Temple enclosure. At this juncture Scaurus, Pompey's lieutenant, arrived in Syria, to whom both the rival parties appealed for aid. On this appeal (65 B.C.) Aristobulus II won the day. But Pompey himself came to Damascus in 63 B.C., and again the Roman authority was asked to decide. Aristobulus II, who foolishly determined to resist the demands of the Romans, was finally overcome and Judæa became henceforth a Roman province. Her independence was taken away, and the Hasmonean rulership overthrown. Hyrcanus II was reappointed high priest, but he was simply a tool in the hands of the Idu-mæan Antipater (q.v.) and the Romans. In the course of the succeeding years the Hasmoneans made desperate efforts to reinstate themselves in power. There was a charm about the very name which led the Jews to second these fruitless attempts. Thousands lost their lives in trying to put Alexander, the son of Aristobulus II, upon the throne in 57 B.C. Aristobulus II himself made another attempt in 56 and Alexander again in 55 B.C. All these attempts were frustrated by the Romans and Antipater. One last attempt did succeed, and for a while (40–37 B.C.) (XI) Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus II, was king of Judæa. He accomplished this by calling in the help of the Parthians. His coins were stamped with the title "King" on one side, and "High Priest" on the other. He was, however, neither a statesman nor a general. In trying persistently to get revenge upon Herod, the son of Antipater, he wasted his energy and at last the Idumæan overthrew him and put him to death in 37 B.C. Thus ended the dynasty of the Hasmoneans. Herod married Mariamne, the daughter of Alexander, and by her had two children, Alexander and Aristobulus. All three were at last murdered by the cruel jealousy of Herod himself (see HEROD).

LITERATURE: The Books of Maccabees: Streane's The Age of the Maccabees (1898); Histories of the Jews by Grätz, Cornhill; Schürer's The Jewish People in the Times of Jesus Christ (transl. 1891); Riggs, History of the Jewish People, Maccabean and Roman Periods (1900). J. S. R.

MACCABEES, BOOKS OF: Of the five books which bear this title only two (I, II) are usually included in the Apocrypha. The third is found in most MSS. and editions of the LXX.; the fourth in MSS. ℵ and A, and in MSS. of Josephus. The fifth is extant in an Arabic text printed in the Paris and London Polyglots, where it is accompanied by a Latin translation. These books differ greatly from one another in character and worth. Indeed, their worth is in general in accord with their order, the first being very valuable as a history and the fifth having no independent value whatever.

(1) The Contents of I Maccabees. The brief, vivid narrative of this work begins with an account of the events which led to the Maccabæan uprising (see MACCABEES, THE) and ends with the death of Simon. Its history covers thus the forty years between 175–135 B.C. In an introduction (1 1-9) the author aims to show how the stream of Hellenism found its way into Judæa, and then, taking up the story of the mad folly of Antiochus, he carries us on through the brilliant campaigns of Judas Maccabæus from 166–161 B.C. (chs. 1–9). While Judas is the real hero of the book, the narrative covers the successful administration of Jonathan (161–143 B.C.) and the prosperous reign of Simon (143–135 B.C.), to show how the aims of Judas were realized in both the religious freedom and political independence of the nation. In a simple, straightforward style it sets forth the heroic, triumphant patriotism of the brave souls who stood for the Law and God against fearful odds. It is the work of a true historian. Events are left to speak for themselves. In all that pertains to the struggle itself the account is trustworthy. It is only when it treats of foreign nations that mistakes are found (see Mac 1 2, 9, 8 2, 4, 6, 8 f., 15 f.). The work is in marked contrast to II Maccabees in its soberness and in its freedom from the miraculous.

1. I Maccabees.

(2) Author, Place, and Date. All that can be said of the author is that he was a Palestinian Jew whose point of view is that of orthodox Judaism. His heart was with those who fought and planned so nobly for the nation's welfare. He wrote his work in Hebrew, and it has come down to us in a Greek translation. One singular fact, which all students of the book have marked, is the absence of the name of God. This is not due to an undevout spirit, but rather to a reticent faith. It is in the record of noble deeds that we must seek for the expression of faith. There are several hints which help us to the determination of the date, though this can not be fixed within narrow limits (cf. 13 30, 16 23 f.). The friendly spirit toward the Romans (8 12-16) prevents us from dating the work as late as 63 B.C. The period of writing may be put at some time in the early part of the 1st cent. B.C. Some of the sources which the author has used are found in 8 22 f., 10 18-20, 25-45, 11 30-37, 12 6-15, 14 22-45, 15 16-21. These consist of letters and decrees. For the facts of the history he may have relied, in part, upon personal recollection, and, in part, upon the word of witnesses then living.

2. II Maccabees. (1) The Contents of II Maccabees. The narrative of II Mac begins with the attack upon the Temple by Heliodorus, the minister of the Syrian monarch Seleucus IV (175 B.C.), and ends with the victory of Judas Maccabæus over Nicanor (160 B.C.). For the few years which preceded the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes it is our sole authority. At the opening of the book are two letters (1 1-9 and 1 10–2 18), supposed to be written by the Jews in Judæa to their countrymen in Egypt, inviting them to celebrate the feast of Dedication. These letters have no connection with the narrative, are from different hands, and are both forgeries. From 4 7 on, the account runs parallel with that of I Mac, and this parallelism affords opportunity for an easy comparison of the characteristics of each narrative. In II Mac is found a copiousness of detail which sometimes helpfully supplements the narrative of I Mac, but along with this is found an amount of exaggeration and inaccuracy which makes the whole work inferior. A notable feature, entirely absent from I Mac, is the miraculous element. The chief value of II Mac as a source of information to the historian is in those facts where it is not directly at variance with I Mac, and where additional and not improbable material makes more complete the picture of times or events. (2) Author, Date, and Aim. With the exception of chs. 1 and 2, the author claims that his work is an epitomization of a work in five books, written by Jason of Cyrene. Of him we know nothing more. Criticism of this epitome makes evident that Jason did not know I Mac, and that he gained his material largely from oral sources. In a work thus produced it is not easy to say how much in the way of style and method is due to the original writer and how much to the epitomizer. In two places (2 19-32 and 15 38-39) we have the writing of the latter, and these passages would seem to show that the rhetorical effects sought, after all, through the book are due to the epitomizer rather than to Jason. The original work was in Greek, as was this epitome, and the Greek of the latter is that of one who knew well how to use it. No certain date can be given to the work. It was known to Philo, and so must have existed before 40 A.D. Conjecture has put the time of its preparation in the last part of the 1st cent. B.C. Jason's work may have been written about 160 B.C. Like I Mac, this is also written from the point of view of orthodox Judaism. It is quite in accord with the spirit of the Pharisees. The writer is not content with simply setting forth the events of the stirring times between 175 B.C. and 160 B.C. He aims to give their religious value, and so to strengthen faith. God is behind and in the history, "watching above His own." Glorious is the Temple in Jerusalem, and to its sacred enclosure and service the writer would bind more closely the hearts of his brethren in Egypt and all lands. They could join with the home people in celebrating those Maccabæan feasts which commemorated the death of Nicanor and the dedication of the Temple, and thus promote national unity. True to its religious tone, the book emphasizes the punishment of the wicked, the chastisement in suffering for those who are faithful, and the joyful hope of resurrection. The last doctrine is expressed with exceptional clearness.

3. III Maccabees. The third book has nothing whatever to do with the Maccabees, and may have got its name, as Fritzsche thinks, from being "a sort of prolegomena to a complete history of the Maccabees." The original language of the work was Greek, and it is found in most MSS. of the LXX., including A and B. (1) The Contents of III Maccabees. At Raphia (217 B.C.) Ptolemy IV defeated Antiochus the Great. Because of gifts and congratulations from the Jews, Ptolemy visited Jerusalem. While there, he insisted upon entering the sanctuary against the earnest and united opposition of both priests and people. Providence saved the Temple from desecration, for Ptolemy was stricken with a fit, as he was about to carry out his design. Returning to Egypt, he was bent upon revenge, and so sent out an edict that all the Jews should be shut up in the hippodrome at Alexandria and then murdered. Before this was done the name of every victim was to be secured. So immense was the number that the means of registration failed, and for a time the Jews were safe. Ptolemy then planned to turn loose upon the people 500 elephants made frantic with wine. Night and day the Jews prayed unto God and their prayer was heard. For two days the execution of the fatal order was delayed by the oversleeping of the king, and by his opportune loss of memory. The deliverance came through the sudden descent of two angels, who turned the elephants back upon the Egyptian army. Such a signal rescue changed completely the attitude of the king toward the Jews. They were set free, honored with a seven days' banquet, and given favor throughout the land. In memory of this deliverance they ordained a festival to be annually observed "for all the time of their sojourn among strangers, from generation to generation." At the same time they put to death more than three hundred of their nation, who had apostatized at the time of the trouble. (2) Author, Date, and General Character. The author was an Alexandrian Jew. The date of the work is uncertain. It may have been written near the close of the 1st cent. B.C., or in the 1st cent. A.D. The book as a whole is a fiction, though some historical facts are undoubtedly embedded in its improbable story. Josephus (Contra Ap. II, 5) gives an account of imprisoned Jews attacked by elephants, and of a signal deliverance similar to this, but he connects it with Ptolemy VII. His tale, however, is quite as unlikely as that of III Mac. The yearly festival is probably a fact, and the character of Ptolemy IV is faithfully drawn. Farther than this we can not go. The inconsistencies and impossible situations show a legend, which has for its purpose the comforting of those in trouble by making clear God's fidelity to His own people.

4. IV Maccabees.

(1) General Character of IV Maccabees. This work relates to the Maccabæan times simply in that it uses the incidents of II Mac 6 18–7 42 as illustrations of its theme, which is the "supremacy of pious reason over the passions." It is a philosophical presentation, and can be divided into two main parts. Part I (1 1–3 19) contains a brief introduction, the statement of the theme, and an argument to show that the passions, severally considered, may be under the control of the reason. Part II gives illustrations of this theme and arguments from II Mac. There is, however, no such sharp division of the philosophical and historical as this partition of the book would seem to indicate. All through there are reflections which reveal the author's aim to edify and to inspire his readers with fidelity to the Law. (2) Author, Aim, and Date. Since all thought of Josephus as the author has been given up, there is no name which we can give to the writer of this work. He was a Jew, whose Hellenistic culture had in no way diminished his fidelity to the faith of his fathers. Rather, he seeks on the basis of his own Scriptures, but with the forms which Greek culture gave him, to hold his countrymen true to Moses. In general, the form of the whole is that of an address. It resembles a sermon, the main purpose being religious edification and impulse. Two of its teachings are noteworthy, viz.: the eternal existence of all souls after death—the good being in blessedness (9 8, 17 18), and the wicked in torment (9 9, 12 12)—and the vicarious atoning worth for the people of the death of the martyrs (6 29, 17 20). The style is exceptionally good, and the Greek of unusual excellence for a Jew. The work is, as a whole, a fine specimen of the best kind of Hellenistic literature. The date can not be determined with certainty. It is, of course, later than II Mac, and may be placed probably somewhere near the beginning of the Christian era.

5. V Maccabees.

The last book, which is a compilation from I and II Mac and the writings of Josephus, aims to give a history of the Jews, from the time of Heliodorus (186 B.C.) to the last years of the reign of Herod the Great. Up to ch. 19, it follows I and II Mac as well as Josephus; from ch. 20 to the end, it borrows from Josephus and consequently has no independent value as a history. Its date must be placed later than Josephus (70–100 A.D.).

MACEDONIA, mas″ę-dō′ni-a (Μακεδονία): The name of a Roman province which in N T times was bounded by Thrace, Illyricum, the Adriatic, and Achaia, and traversed from Dyrrachium to Neapolis by the military Egnatian road. The kingdom of Macedon, created by Philip, fell under Roman control after the battle of Pydna in 168 B.C.—the four older districts into which it was then divided (Ac 16 12) being united later (146 B.C.), with portions of Illyricum and Thessaly, into the one province of Macedonia under proconsuls or proprætors (the former in the time of Paul), with Thessalonica as its capital. The population on the fertile plains of the four eastern river basins and along the Thermaic and Strymonic gulfs was predominantly Greek, differing from the mixed population of the interior. Jewish synagogues were formed at Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea, but probably not at Amphipolis and Apollonia (Ac 17 1). R. A. F.

MACHBANNAI, mac′ba-nai (מַכְבַּנַּי, makhbannay): A Gadite, one of David's soldiers (I Ch 12 13). E. E. N.

MACHBENA, mac-bî′na (מַכְבֵּנָה, makhbēnāh, Machbenah AV): Probably the name of a place (I Ch 2 49), perhaps the same as Cabbon (q.v.). E. E. N.

MACHI, mê′cai (מָכִי, mākhī): A Gadite, father of Geuel (Nu 13 15), whom Moses sent to spy out the land. C. S. T.

MACHIR, mê′kir, MACHIRITE, mê′kęr-ait (מָכִיר, mākhīr): 1. The first-born son of Manasseh (Jos 17 1 f.); in Gn 50 23 and Nu 26 29 ff. represented as his only son. His family took possession of Gilead (Nu 32 39 f.; Dt 3 15; Jos 13 31; cf. Nu 27 1, 36 1). According to Jg 5 14 (where Machir = Manasseh), the Machirites dwelt originally W of the Jordan, and at a later time migrated to Gilead. In I Ch 2 21 f., 7 14 f. Machir is connected with Gilead. 2. A son of Ammiel in Lo-debar, E. of the Jordan, near Mahanaim, who gave protection to Mephibosheth, son of Jonathan (II S 9 4 f.), and ministered to David on his flight from Absalom (II S 17 27 f.). MACHNADEBAI, mac-nad′ę-bai (מַכְנַדְבַּי, makhnaddᵉbhay): A Jew who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 40). E. E. N.

MACHPELAH, mac-pî′lā (מַכְפֵּלָה, makhpēlāh): A plot of land E. of ("before") Mamre, bought by Abraham from Ephron the Hittite, after a series of typically Oriental negotiations (see Thompson, Land and Book, i, 246–249), in order that Sarah might be buried in the cave which was in the end of the partly timbered field (Gn ch. 23). This cave was afterward the sepulcher of Abraham, Rebekah, Isaac, Leah, and Jacob (Gn 25 9 f., 49 30 f., 50 13). The signification of 'the Machpelah' (always with the article) is doubtful. It may mean 'double,' and is thus translated in the ancient versions. Possibly the designation referred originally to the two chambers of the cave. Rabbinical literature contains curious conjectures as to the application of the term (see JE). But in Gn 'the Machpelah seems to be used indifferently of the cave (29 9, 25 9), the field (23 19, 49 30, 50 13), or the entire property (23 17).

Outside of Gn the Machpelah is never mentioned in the Scriptures or in the Apocrypha. Ac 7 16 curiously places the tomb bought by Abraham at Shechem. A tradition places the sepulcher of Joseph in Hebron, by that of his ancestors, where it is shown to-day. Josephus (BJ, IV, 9 7) speaks of the marble monuments of the patriarchs. From the allusions of early pilgrims and historians it appears that the site and general outline of the sacred enclosure at Hebron have not been changed during our era; but no less singular than the silence of the later Biblical writers concerning the sepulcher of the patriarchs is the fact that we possess no conspicuous structure which now encloses the traditional cave of Machpelah.

The Hebron Ḥarâm ('sacred,' or 'forbidden,' place) is a fortress-like quadrangle, 197 × 111 ft., with walls of hard limestone, 40 ft. high, which date from at least as early as the time of Herod, but are considered by many to be much older than the Herodian period; e.g., Robinson, Stanley, Warren. These ancient walls are surmounted by modern ones, plastered and whitewashed. Lofty minarets rise at diagonally opposite corners, and flights of steps along the short sides of the quadrangle give access to the interior platform, which is about 18 ft. above the lowest ground adjoining. One end of the enclosure is entirely taken up by the mosque, whose clearstory can be seen above the exterior walls of the Ḥarâm. This mosque was originally a Crusaders' church, built probably shortly after 1167 (see HEBRON). Most of the other structures within the enclosure are Moslem, of the 14th cent. and later. In front of the mosque a four-arched portico opens into a small court, beyond which a number of chambers fill the farther end of the platform.

The six monuments to the patriarchs and their wives are supposed (wrongly?) by the Moslems to be placed directly over the corresponding graves in the cave beneath. Each coffin-like cenotaph is covered with richly embroidered silk, and enclosed in a little chapel or shrine. The shrines of Isaac and Rebekah alone are within the mosque, those of Abraham and Sarah are in the portico, while the cenotaphs of Jacob and Leah are in the chambers adjoining the NW. exterior wall. Non-Moslems are rigidly excluded from the entire enclosure, and the cave itself is held in such reverence and fear that perhaps no one has entered it during the past seven centuries. Two supposed entrances in the floor of the mosque are covered with flagging and carpets. A third opening allows one to see down through a well-like shaft into a little whitewashed room, about 12 ft. square, whose floor is apparently on a level with the ground outside the Ḥarâm. This room seems to be an antechamber which, through a doorway in its S. wall, gives access to the sepulchers. Just what lies beyond that door will possibly remain unknown as long as the Moslems rule Palestine. There is probably, however, a small double cave, not extending beyond the walls of the mosque.

In view of the many centuries before our era during which there was no allusion to the cave of Hebron, not to mention the unsolved critical problems relating to patriarchal history, the claim that the genuineness of the traditional sepulcher of the patriarchs has been finally proved (e.g., Warren in HDB, Stanley, Thompson, Robinson [?]) would seem to be unjustified. But while as yet there is not an unbroken line of evidence supporting the claims of the Hebron Ḥarâm, its genuineness is better established than that of any other ancient site in Palestine of commensurate importance; and perhaps no spot on earth possesses such a combination of hoary antiquity, religious interest, and fascinating mystery.

MADON, mê'don (מָדוֹן, mādhōn): A royal city of the Canaanites (Jos 11 1, 12 19), usually identified with Madîn near Hattîn, a few m. W. of Tiberias. The LXX.(B) of Jos 11 1 has Μαρών, which suggests Meron, two hours WSW. of Kedesh-naphtali (Map IV, E 5).

MAGADAN, mag'a-dan (Μαγαδάν): A town visited by Jesus (Mt 15 39, Magdala [Μάγδαλα] AV); in the ‖ Mk 8 10 Dalmanutha, Δαλμανουθά). It can not, however, be identified with certainty under either name. Ewald's suggestion that Magadan is Megiddo is impossible, unless Megiddo be located, with Conder, near Beisan, instead of Lejjun (but see MEGIDDO). 'Dalmanutha' is probably a corruption of Delimnitha (λίμνη, 'harbor'; see Herz in *Expos. Though variously defined these words are so often used indiscriminately, or with the meaning of one shading off into that of the other, that accuracy of definition is difficult. Magic, however, properly has to do with the use of objects to produce certain results upon human beings, or to influence the spirits, or jinns. It, therefore, in one respect resembles a crude form of science, while in another it approaches the sphere of religion; for magic rites are often but imperfect prayers or external forms through which deity is to be moved. Divination, on the other hand, is an effort to discover the future or the fate of the individual, or to learn of events which have some bearing upon the inquirer's life or fortunes. It, therefore, is closely akin to prophecy, and in many of its forms, as it becomes more highly developed, we find it closely approximating to the work of the seer or true prophet. Yet the diviner may use magic arts to accomplish his purpose. The most fully developed systems of magic and divination were found in Egypt and Babylonia (cf. Gn 41 8 ff.; Ex 7 11 ff.; Dn 1 20, 2 2, etc.). It has been a question whether the Hebrews borrowed theirs from the one or the other. It is probable that a certain proportion of Hebrew magic was indigenous, but the influence of Babylonia was far more potent, during the period of the kingdom, and during and after the Exile, than that of any other land. Correlative terms for magic and divination are sorcery and soothsaying. These two words usually imply a lower depth than the former and are generally used when the practises are prohibited. The word magic, which seems to come to us from Babylonia and perhaps from Persia, carries with it an element of superiority, just as divination might be regarded as legitimated by the results which it sought. Sorcery in every instance is resorted to when people desire the accomplishment of some purpose which is counter to morality or religion, and soothsaying pertains to an unholy desire to peer into the unseen world or the future. The soothsayer may be a sorcerer. Note how the term is used of Balaam (Jos 13 22; cf. Nu 22 7, 24 1), in connection with whose efforts victims were slain and sacrifices offered.

1. General Significance of the Terms.

The Hebrew legislation was emphatic in its condemnation of all that pertained to these arts, and it prescribed the most condign punishment for them. Lv 20 27 condemns the witch or the wizard to death, and Dt 18 10 f., which is the classical passage on this subject, specifies, in an exhaustive summary, the different kinds of sorcery. In this attitude Hebrew law is in complete conformity with that of other nations. The Code of Hammurabi (2200 B.C.), in its first paragraph, legislates against witchcraft. The reason for this lies in the fact that such practises were contrary to the common social welfare. The man who sought the sorcerer was endeavoring to gain an advantage over his fellow men, and consequently became a public enemy. The danger was that he would break up the clan or the tribal, or even the national, life by arraying unseen powers against it. Such an effort meant the forsaking of the national god and, therefore, was to be classed with idolatry.

2. Attitude of the Law Toward Such Practises.

When the people of Jerusalem once found themselves in the most serious straits, they turned to the powers of the unseen world for help (Is 8 19) and ignored their God. This, like all other efforts of the kind, testifies to the deep-seated desire of humanity to find some kind of a sympathetic response from a power greater than human, and as God often seems too far away to be a present help, lesser powers are turned to, who are felt to be more accessible and perchance more closely allied to humanity. In this respect Israel was at one with the larger world of its day.

3. The Practise of Magic and Divination in Israel. Terms Used.

The Heb. word which is most frequently used of magical methods is the verb qāṣam (together with the deriv. noun qeṣem, usually rendered divination, but witchcraft in I S 15 23), generally rendered to divine or to use divination, or as a ptcpl. diviner, the root of which is found also in the Arabic kismet, 'destiny.' This, therefore, throws light upon the Hebrew conception. Magic or sorcery was an effort to determine fate, not so much by foretelling as by working out the destiny by means of charms, or spells, or potions, or the use of objects which in themselves are supposed to possess power, or into which the sorcerer himself has infused efficacy. Sometimes the arts may be practised by any individual and by simple methods, an instance of which occurs in Gn 30 14, where dōdhā'īm, 'love-apples,' rendered "mandrakes," are mentioned as possessing powers similar to those of a love-philter. The teraphim, which seem to have been often found in households, were probably used in connection with such arts (cf. Gn 31 30, 34; I S 19 13). The lot and the ephod were also familiar, a staff as well (Hos 4 12). More often, however, the seeker must have gone to a person supposedly endowed with peculiar powers. The most striking illustration of this is found in Saul's experience (I S 28 3 ff.), who, though he had expelled all who practised the black art, in his own extremity searched out a witch to help him, of whom he might inquire, or consult, i.e., learn the issue of the coming battle. The name by which she is called is a fairly common one in the O T, ba'alath 'ōbh, 'the possessor of 'ōbh,' rendered "that hath a familiar spirit." This Heb. term 'ōbh has been much discussed, and the balance of opinion seems to be that it is derived from a word which also means 'bottle,' from its hollowness, the significance being that the sound which is produced by the sorcerer in answer to the inquirer is 'hollow' and muffled, as if coming from some cavity (cf. Is 29 4). This is not altogether satisfactory, and yet, in some ways, it suits the conditions of the case. Those who gave responses often inhabited a cave and were thought to receive communications from a hollow in the earth. Such was probably the case at Delphi, and so, we may suppose, at Endor. The use of the word 'possessor' or 'mistress' indicates a certain power over the unseen world, and thus 'ōbh may be a general term. With this phrase is generally connected the word yidd'ōni, translated wizard, but it more probably refers to the spirit which was the sorcerer's familiar or 'control.' It is naturally derived from the root yādha', 'to know,' and would apply very well to the spirit that the medium most often called upon, or which dwelt within her. In the use of this term we see how sorcery and soothsaying are combined, for the arts necessary to call the spirit would be sorcery, while the response of the spirit itself would be soothsaying and in the realm of divination.

Dt 18 10 f., already referred to, contains two groups of terms which must indicate the popular conception of the relationship of different kinds of divination. At the head of the first group (ver. 10) we find denounced the one who makes his son or his daughter "to pass through the fire." At first sight this would seem to be a form of heathen sacrifice, but this conception is probably wrong, for while the child might have been killed by the ordeal, evidently the act was to enable the inquirer to get some light upon the future. It may have been a drastic method of consulting omens. Fire ordeals of various kinds are characteristic of the superstition of many primitive peoples. Another term, the ptcpl. me'ōnēn, practiseth augury (observer of times AV, also rendered "soothsayer" Is 2 6; Jer 27 9, enchanter AV; Mic 5 12, and "sorceress" Is 57 3), is of doubtful origin. W. Robertson Smith suggests that it is from a root, 'ānan, signifying 'to murmur,' and that the diviner received his message through the murmuring of leaves as at Dodona (cf. also the "sound of going in the top of the mulberry-trees," II S 5 24), or the hum of insects (cf. the name of the prophetess Deborah, 'a swarm of bees' [?], and Baalzebub, 'the lord of flies'). The term menaḥesh, enchanter, seems to have the general sense of 'practising divination' or 'observing omens.' It is used of hydromancy (Gn 44 5), and, in spite of its form, probably has no connection with serpent-charming. The word mekhashshēph, sorcerer (witch AV; cf. also Ex 22 18; II Ch 33 6; Mal 3 5), is akin to the Assyrian kasapu, and is often associated with the astrologers (Ex 7 11) and wise men (Dn 2 2). It is probably of foreign origin, and perhaps to be regarded as a general term summarizing the preceding. The last word of the first group in the above-mentioned passage, Dt 18 10 f., is ḥābhar, charmer, which seems to contain the idea of 'binding,' and has been interpreted as meaning 'the tying of magic knots.' But W Robertson Smith's suggestion, that it means 'to weave a spell,' is far more acceptable. The second group of words (ver. 11) represents different ways of consulting the unseen world, ending with the term necromancer, literally, 'one who inquires of the dead.' The whole passage is, therefore, a comprehensive denunciation of those who use magical arts ('sympathetic magic') as well as of those who assume to have intercourse with the departed.

4. The Attitude of the Prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel.

Besides several passages in the legal literature that forbid sorcery, the prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel are very specific in their attacks upon such unholy practises. Isaiah singles out special classes, and in his condemnation of the daughters of Zion (3 16 ff.) he enumerates their ornaments, several of which, from their names, must have had a magical use. In fact, it is probable that pendants and bangles were originally worn to keep off evil influences, as indeed is the case in many parts of the world at the present day. The most spiritual conception of the radical difference between the true and the false is found in Is 8 19 ff., where the hopeless people who are seeking "familiar spirits" that chirp (peep AV) and mutter (ironical, probably suggestive of sounds made by the sorcerers) are exhorted to seek instead the living God.

Ezekiel, more than a century later, found the people saturated with the strange customs of the Orient. Lying divinations and false visions were the evils with which he had to contend. Wizards and witches preyed upon the superstitions of the populace. In 13 17-23 some peculiar kind of charm is referred to. The obscurity of the expressions, however, is great. The "pillows" and the "kerchiefs" (ver. 18) are probably amulets, possibly the predecessors of the phylacteries and frontlets which in later Judaism had a magical use, although then they had been conventionalized and become a part of decent and orderly dress. The "handfuls of barley" and "pieces of bread" (ver. 19) have sometimes been supposed to be the fees paid the witch, but it is more likely that they were employed in some magical rite (cf. the use of a portion of the meal-offering in the test for adultery, Nu 5 26). One of the most interesting passages is Ezk 21 21, where the king of Babylon is represented as consulting the omens before deciding whether he should advance against Jerusalem or Rabbah of Ammon. On arrows were written the names of the two cities, they were shaken in the quiver, the king drew one, and on it was the word "Jerusalem." Teraphim were included in the augury used, and this gives us a clue to the employment of teraphim in general, and to the reason for their exclusion from legitimate rites. The last clause of ver. 21 is the only definite Biblical allusion to the consultation of the entrails, but the examination of the liver was one of the commonest Babylonian practises. In a cabinet in the British Museum there is a clay model of a sheep's liver, the surface of which is divided into small squares like the "regions" of an astrologer's map of the heavens, and in each square are cuneiform characters evidently intended to explain how certain appearances in each region are to be interpreted.

The so-called false prophets may in many cases have been soothsayers, and prophetism, starting with the more naive and innocent forms of divination, gradually rose to greater heights and more spiritual conceptions with the greater insight into moral needs. Samuel might give a response for a small fee (I S 9 7 f.), but his larger mission was to find a king and to hold both king and people to an undeviating path of rectitude. The trivial and the transient were divorced from the true prophet's occupation, and the man with the far-reaching vision of Israel's destiny scorned the frenzied demonstrations of the false prophets, and in the form of vision and parable declared the fate of king and people, like Micaiah (I K ch. 22). Yet how near the methods of the two classes were we see from II K 3 13 ff., where Elisha required the playing of a minstrel before he could attain the proper state of ecstasy. We need not wonder at this when we find how close we are to the most primitive notions of cause and effect among even fairly educated people at the present day. The Midianite who adorned his camel with chains and crescents for good luck in the time of Gideon (Jg 8 21-26) would find his successor to-day in Syria or Italy.

5. Divination and Prophecy.

Another point of contact between the true and the false appears in dreams. The will of God might be thus revealed. Jacob claimed to receive Divine messages by this means (Gn 31 11). Joseph dreamed of future greatness (Gn 37 5 ff.), and to him as well as to Daniel came the power to interpret (Gn 40 8, 12, 41 25 ff.; Dn 1 17, etc.). Incubation-places were esteemed; perhaps Jacob's at Bethel (Gn 28 11, 15), certainly the shrine at Gibeon, where a king might meet God in the visions of the night (I K 3 5 ff.). Yet the leading prophets did not greatly esteem dreams. The vision was a higher medium of communication, and even this often gave place to forms in which the fancy had less play.

6. Divination by Dreams.

A recrudescence of sorcery must have taken place during or toward the close of the Exile. This was due to Babylonian influence and the large and elaborate system there displayed. The second part of Isaiah is a witness to this, and the magicians of different orders are there presented in antithesis to true seekers after God, while Babylon herself, in the day of her downfall, was to have no profit from those practises upon which she depended (Is 44 25, 47 12 ff.). Astrologers, star-gazers, and monthly prognosticators are the names given those who sought, not in the chance omens of trees or birds or entrails, but from the aspect of the heavens, a more sure word of prophecy, and even they are discredited. The Book of Daniel is another witness of the power of sorcery over the mind, although the tone of the narrative shows it not to be a contemporary description of the Babylonian system. The wise men, the Chaldeans, the soothsayers, and the magicians (ḥarṭummīn, the Aram. equivalent of the Heb. ḥarṭummīm, spoken of as the "magicians" attached to the court of Egypt in Gn 41 8; Ex 7 11, etc.) seem in Dn to be great bands or gilds, who appear before Nebuchadrezzar and Belshazzar somewhat as the false prophets of Micaiah's time (cf. I K 22 10 ff.), though in more ceremonious guise. Daniel by superior endowment triumphs over them and becomes himself their chief (Dn 5 11). But from the beginning to the end of the O T the sin of witchcraft is classed with idolatry and teraphim as the enemy of true religion (cf. I S 15 23).

7. Practise of Magic in Post-Exilic Israel.

It is an interesting, though difficult, task to discover what traces of old magical customs were preserved in the religion and carried over into the rites. Yet what was once an incantation may often have been purified and retained in a ritual. In this question is involved the whole problem of the origin of religious forms. Certain peculiar laws in Lv and Nu show the influence of early superstitions. The jealousy ordeal (Nu ch. 5) is a good example of this. In the first place, the fact that it is an ordeal connects it with the entire series of practises into which magic enters as a large factor; and, secondly, the details of the test are decisive. Holy water was to be mingled with the dust from the floor of the Tabernacle, and when a portion of the meal-offering had been burned, the woman was to drink the water, meanwhile assenting to the consequences of the curse pronounced by the priest if she were really unfaithful. This is in all essential respects identical with ordeals among other early people. The dress of the high priest was doubtless symbolical in character, though much of the early significance must have been obscured and forgotten. Yet the bells suggest the idea of a counter-charm by which evil influences were to be driven away. Naturally such notions disappeared in course of time, and the ornamental purpose was the only one thought of. The phylacteries and frontlets, the sacred words fastened on the door-post (the mezuzoth of to-day), and the cabalistic use of the Divine name testify to the persistence of old superstition. The Book of Tobit gives us some insight into the views of early Judaism concerning the unseen world. The strange custom preserved in the ritual of the Day of Atonement, viz., the sending away of the goat Azazel, seems to be a survival of early beliefs in the necessity of propitiating demonic powers. Among all ancient peoples the processes of life were considered mysterious and awful, and it is probable that circumcision, performed generally at the period of puberty, had its origin in the desire to propitiate the unseen powers, which presided over life and death. Ex 4 24 ff., obscure as it is, must refer to such a conception. The circumcision of the child, made to apply in a vicarious manner to Moses, was a propitiatory act. In a similar way the period of a woman's uncleanness was regarded as taboo, and her separation was due to the feeling that in some way the powers of the unseen world were involved. Sacrifices at the time of childbirth had a similar origin. The peculiar law in Lv 19 23-25, about the period before a fruit-bearing tree might be used, is only a further extension of the same idea that unseen powers must be considered and placated before human beings could come in for their share of the fruits of the earth, or into the full participation of the rights of life. It would seem probable that the art of the physician suffered often from the imputation of sorcery. Asa's recourse to them for his malady (II Ch 16 12) is reprobated. Undoubtedly the medical means used were of a kind which resembled a witch's brew, and the list of unclean beasts (Lv ch. 11) probably included some which were neither totems nor sacred, but whose use was forbidden because associated with magical practises.

In the N T there are sundry allusions to magic and sorcery. The form then most prevalent was that of exorcism (Ac 19 13 and cf. Mt 12 27), in which the main feature was the pronunciation of magic formulas, or incantations, or the use of certain names to expel demons from human beings. Josephus (Ant. VIII, 3 5) says that the incantations discovered by Solomon were still in use in his time and appears to have had great faith in their efficacy. There seems to have been a question whether exorcism was a strictly legitimate practise. Christ's miracles in connection with demons were met with the sneer that He was in league with the powers of darkness (Mt 12 24). It is significant that the word Beelzebub ("Beelzebul" EVmg.) which we find here, according to some MSS., is the name of the oracle from which responses were sought in Elijah's time (II K 1 2), the one that gave answers through the droning of flies. In Ac 19 13 we have a record of the proceedings of certain exorcists who endeavored to imitate Apostolic methods, and found themselves routed by the unfortunate demoniac in a burst of grim satanic humor. This happened at Ephesus, the home of curious arts (περίεργα, Ac 19 19, magical arts RV), and resulted in the wholesale destruction of the apparatus of sorcery (Ac 19 18 f.).

9. Magic in the N T.

Two masters of this art are prominently named in the Apostolic narrative, Simon Magus (q.v.) (Ac 8 9 ff), and Bar-Jesus, surnamed Elymas (q.v.) (Ac 13 6 ff.), the latter title being of Semitic origin and testifying to his reputation for occult wisdom. Lastly, the girl possessed of "a spirit of divination" (Ac 16 16; Gr. 'a spirit, a Python'; so RVmg.) should be mentioned. She is the N T equivalent of the "familiar spirit" of the O T. Serpent superstition and clairvoyance seem combined in the description of this girl, and, if we knew more of the details of her case, such an example might cast some light on certain words which occur in Dt 18 10 f. Sorcery comes in for final denunciation in Rev, where its identification with spiritual wickedness is complete. Sorcerers are among those who are to be forever shut out from the heavenly city (22 15). As a sorcerer was the representative of that which militates against the unity of the body politic, the aider and abetter of treason and treachery, so he could have no consideration when the city was cleansed of everything that loveth and maketh a lie.

MAGICIAN. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 7.

MAGISTRATE: A term for a civil official. In Ezr 7 25 it is equivalent to the ordinary Heb. term for "judge." In Lk 12 58, the language of which is apparently molded by Gr. usage, it translates the term ἄρχων, an officer higher than the 'judge' (cf. Mt 5 25); in Ac 16 20 ff. it renders the word στρατηγοί, which is the ordinary Gr. equivalent for the duoviri, the two chief municipal officers of a Roman colony; called by courtesy pretors (cf. RVmg.), before whom political charges were brought. On Jg 18 7, Lk 12 11, Tit 3 1, cf. RV

MAGOG, mē'gŏg. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11, and also GOG, 2.

MAGOR-MISSABIB, mē"gōr-mis'a-bib (מָגוֹר מִסָּבִיב, māghōr-miṣṣābhībh), 'terror on every side': A phrase coined by Jeremiah (Jer 6 25, 20 10), and (in 20 3) given by him as a name to Pashhur in prophecy of the fate which awaited him (cf. 46 5, 49 29).

C. S. T.

MAGPIASH, mag'pi-ash (מַגְפִּיעָשׁ, magpī'āsh): The name of a family whose representative signed the covenant (Neh 10 20). Perhaps the same as Magbish (q.v.).

MAHALAH, ma-hē'lā. See MAHLAH.

MAHALATH, mē'ha-lath (מָחֲלַת, māḥălath): 1. The wife of Esau (Gn 28 9). 2. The wife of Rehoboam (II Ch 11 18). See also PSALMS, § 3.

MAHALALEL, ma-hal'a-lel (מַהֲלַלְאֵל, mahălal'ēl, Mahalaleel AV), 'praise of God': 1. One of the antediluvian patriarchs in the Sethite genealogy (Gn 5 12 ff.). 2. A descendant of Judah (Neh 11 4). 3. The N T form is Maleleel (cf. Lk 3 37).

MAHALI, mē'ha-lai. See MAHLI.

MAHANAIM, mē"ha-nē'im, מַחֲנַיִם, maḥănayim: A place of some importance. The earliest reference to it is in Gn 32 2 (E). Here Jacob, as he was returning from Mesopotamia, met the angels of God, and gave to the locality the name Mahanaim, i.e., 'two camps,' or 'companies.' Mahanaim became the capital of N. Israel under Ish-bosheth (II S 2 8, 12, 29). It was David's headquarters during the revolt of Absalom (II S 17 24), and became the seat of one of Solomon's prefectures (I K 4 14). The exact location has never been determined; it was certainly trans-Jordanic, and lay to the N. of Jabbok and the S. of Penuel. Driver advocates an identification with Deir 'Allâ, situated on the route which passes N. and S. along the Jordan Valley. Following Jos 13 26, G. A. Smith is satisfied with locating it on the borders of Gad. (See Map III, J 2.)

J. A. K.

MAHANEH-DAN, mē'ha-nĕ-dan" (מַחֲנֵה דָן, maḥănēh-dhān), 'camp of Dan': A name given to the place where the Danites encamped (Jg 13 25, 18 12). Perhaps two places are thus named, one between Zorah and Eshtaol (13 25), the other on the border of Benjamin, behind (west) of Kiriath-jearim.

C. S. T.

MAHARAI, ma-har'a-ai (מַהְרַי, mahăray): One of David's heroes (II S 23 28; I Ch 11 30, 27 13).

E. E. N.

MAHATH, mē'hath (מַחַת, maḥath): A Kohathitc Levite of Hezekiah's time (I Ch 6 35; II Ch 29 12, 31 13). See AHIMOTH.

E. E. N.

MAHAVITE, mê'ha-vait, THE (הַמַּחֲוִים, haMaḥăwīm): Eliel, one of David's heroes, is called "the Mahavite" (I Ch 11 46). The term is obscure and probably a scribal error for some other word. E. E. N.

MAHAZIOTH, ma-hê'zi-oth (מַחֲזִיאוֹת, maḥăzī'ōth), 'vision': One of the names in the peculiar verse (I Ch 25 4; see JOSHBEKASHAH), later taken as the name of an individual (I Ch 25 30). E. E. N.

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ, mê''her-shê''lal-hash-baz'' (מַהֵר שָׁלָל חָשׁ בַּז, mahēr shālāl ḥāsh baz), 'the booty hastens, the spoil speeds': The symbolic name given to one of the sons of Isaiah, the prophet (Is 8 1), indicative of the impending doom of Damascus and Samaria. E. E. N.

MAHLAH, mā'lā (מַחְלָה, maḥlāh): 1. The eldest (?) of the five daughters of the Manassite Zelophehad (Nu 26 33), who obtained the right to inherit their father's property (as he had no son, 27 1), on the condition that they marry sons of their father's brother (36 11). Their story gives the origin of the later law, which modified the earlier law of inheritance by males only (see FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, §§ 3, 8). 2. A Gileadite name (I Ch 7 18). C. S. T.

MAHLI, mā'lai (מַחְלִי, maḥlī): 1. A son of Merari (Ex 6 19; Nu 3 20; I Ch 6 19 [4]), and the founder of the Levitical family of Mahlites (Nu 3 33, 26 58; Ezr 8 18), descended from his two sons by the marriage of the daughters of one to the sons of the other (I Ch 23 22). 2. The son of Mushi, and grandson of Mahli (I Ch 6, 47 [32], 23 23, 24 30). C. S. T.

MAHLON, mā'lon. See CHILION.

MAHOL, mê'hol (מָחוֹל, māḥōl): The father of the three wise men, Heman, Calcol, and Darda, with whom Solomon is compared (I K 4 31 [5 11]). His origin is unknown. C. S. T.

MAHSEIAH, mā-sî'yā (מַחְסֵיָה, maḥṣēyāh, Maaseiah AV), 'J" is a refuge': The grandfather of Baruch (Jer 32 12, 51 59). E. E. N.

MAINSAIL. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

MAJESTY: The translation of (1) gā'ōn (root idea, 'to raise oneself'), indicative of elevation, superiority; often translated "pride." Used of God in Is 12 10, 19, 21, 24 14; Mic 5 4; (2) of the related term gē'ūth, cf. Ps 93 1; Is 26 10; (3) of hādhār (root idea, 'adornment,' 'distinction'), often rendered "beauty," "honor," "excellency." Used of God in I Ch 16 27; Ps 29 4, 90 16, 96 6, 104 1, 111 3, 145 5, 12; Is 2 10, 19, 21, 35 2; (4) of hōdh (root idea uncertain), e.g., I Ch 29 11, 25; Job 37 22; (5) of several other terms, in both the O T and N T—all meaning 'greatness,' e.g., Est 1 4; Dn 4 36, 5 18; He 1 38; II P 1 16. E. E. N.

MAKAZ, mê'kaz (מָקֵץ, māqats): A town near Shaalbim and Beth-shemesh (I K 4 9). Site unknown. E. E. N.

MAKKEDAH, mak-kî'dā (מַקֵּדָה, maqqēdhāh): A Canaanite stronghold in the Shephelah, mentioned only in connection with Joshua's victorious campaign and the subsequent allotment of the conquered city to Judah (Jos 10 10-29, 12 16, 15 41). It was near Gederoth, Beth-dagon, and Naameh, and apparently on the natural route from the valley of Aijalon southward. Not far from the city was a cave, in which the five "kings" hid from their pursuers. These conditions are all satisfied by the modern el-Mughâr, a large, mud-built village, situated upon a kind of promontory, which extends into the valley of Sorek (Wâdy Surâr) from the north (Map III, C 5). It is undoubtedly an ancient site, as is shown by the rock-quarrying and the existence of rock-cut tombs with loculi running in from the sides of the chambers. So far as a careful examination by the PEF surveyors could show, this is the only site in the plain where caves occur, and here they are numerous. The houses are built over and in front of caverns of various sizes, and small caves exist in the face of cliffs N. of the village. The Syriac of Jos 10 10 renders 'Makkedah' as Mokor, which approaches closely the Arabic mughr (pl. mughâr), 'a cave.' See PEFSt (1875), 165–167. L. G. L.

MAKTESH. See JERUSALEM, § 36.

MALACHI, mal'a-cai (מַלְאָכִי, mal'ākhī), 'my messenger'; possibly originally Malachiah, 'the messenger of J"': The name of the last book in the prophetic collection. It consists of two parts. The first part (1 1–2 17) opens with a declaration of J"'s love for Israel, and hatred of Edom (1 2-5); this is followed by a rebuke of the priests, who violate the prescriptions of the ritual law (1 6-14), and a threat of a heavy curse (2 1-3). This leads to the rehearsal of J"'s ideal covenant with Levi (2 4-9), and the denunciation of the special sin of faithlessness to the law of marriage (2 10-17). The second part begins with the prediction of the coming of J"'s messenger (3 1-6), and once more condemns the violation of J"'s commandments (3 7-15). The prophecy then closes with a vivid forecast of the judgment which shall separate between those who work wickedness and those who fear J" (3 16–4 3), and with the promise of the sending of Elijah (4 4-6).

1. Contents.

The date of the book is not definitely fixed by anything within it, but the general conditions reflected point to a time subsequent to the restoration of the Temple worship under Zerubbabel (1 7, 10, 3 1). The evils denounced are similar to those met and rebuked by Ezra and Nehemiah (violations of the marriage law, 2 10-16; cf. Ezr 9 2, 10 3, 16-44; withholding the tithes 3 7-12; cf. Neh 13 10 f.). A governor is alluded to (1 8), but, as he is one who may receive presents, it can not be Nehemiah, for Nehemiah repelled the possible charge of doing so (Neh 5 14-18). From all these facts, it may safely be inferred that the prophecy belongs to the Persian period, and more especially to the time immediately preceding the reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah. For these it prepared the way. The years 460–50 B.C. may be regarded as the time of its composition.

3. Authorship. Whether the name of the book is the name of the prophet who wrote it is an open question. The title "The burden of the word of Jehovah" (cf. Zec 9 1 and 12 1) indicates the appearance of a new type of superscription for prophecies. If the two sections in Zec are to be regarded as prophetic discourses anonymously published and later appended to the Visions of Zechariah, it is not unlikely that another anonymous prophet of the same general period should have published his message under the generic appelative of 'messenger' or 'messenger of J".' This view of the use of mal'ākhī seems to be supported by 3 1 and the tradition that Malachi was none other than Ezra himself (Targ. Jon. b. Uzziel, which adds to the name 'Malachi' the words "whose name is Ezra the scribe," an opinion adopted by Calvin). Against these considerations the reason for taking 'Malachi' as a proper noun is that it seems to be so translated in the LXX. In addition to this it is alleged "that every other book of the Minor Prophets opens with the name of its author." But this is a mere assumption (cf. JONAH; see also Driver, LOT[6], p. 321 f.).

4. Literary Features. In literary form the book is characterized by a quasi-dialectic type of discussion. This consists in the laying down of a general proposition which provokes contradiction leading to counterstatements, and ending with a vindication of the main position, perhaps more fully elaborated (cf. 1 2 f., 2 17 f., 3 8 f., 13 f.). By some this has been taken to be a sign that the prophecy was from the first circulated in writing. A better explanation of the fact is that the author adopted a method of teaching which was just coming into use and which later became a favorite in the schools and synagogues of Judaism. As to the book itself, it is more than probable that it represents a collection of sayings from a number of addresses delivered at different times.

5. Type of the Prophecy. The type of prophecy represented in Malachi is also different from that of his predecessors, and points to a new development in this direction. While the prophet's great motive is, like that of earlier prophecy, the law of righteousness laid down by J" for His people, his outlook into the future is peculiar. It foreshadows the great and terrible day of J" as about to break upon the accustomed order of things, and bring unsparing judgment. But while the coming of this consummation is to be abrupt, it is to be prepared for by the return of Elijah.

6. Summary. Thus, by its style of composition, by its type of prophecy, and by its system of thought, the book puts itself at the end of one order of things, and points to the beginning of another. It was an accurate instinct, therefore, and not a mere arbitrary impulse, that led to its being placed at the very end of the O T Canon, although not the latest in date of the O T books.

MALCAM, mal'cam (RV), MALCHAM (AV) (מַלְכָּם, malkām): I. The eponym of a Benjamite family (I Ch 8 9). II. A deity of the Ammonites (Jer 49 1, 3; Zeph 1 5), the same as Milcom. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 26. C. S. T.

MALCHIAH, mal-cai'ā, MALCHIJAH, mal-cai'jā (מַלְכִּיָּה, מַלְכִּיָּהוּ, malkiyyāh, malkiyyāhū), 'my king is Jah': 1. A descendant of Gershom (I Ch 6 40 [25]). 2. A priest, the father of Pashhur (I Ch 9 12; Neh 11 12; Jer 21 1, 38 1). 3. The head of the fifth course of priests (I Ch 24 9, perhaps = preceding). 4, 5, 6. Two of the "sons of Parosh" (Ezr 10 25) and one of the "sons of Harim" (Ezr 10 31) who had married foreign wives; the last also repaired the wall (Neh 3 11). 7. A son of Rechab who repaired the dung-gate (Neh 3 14). 8. A goldsmith who repaired the wall (Neh 3 31). 9. One who stood at Ezra's left while he read the Law (Neh 8 4). 10. One who sealed the covenant (Neh 10 3 [4]); perhaps the same as 2. 11. A priest who assisted in dedicating the wall (Neh 12 42). C. S. T.

MALCHIEL, mal'ki-el (מַלְכִּיאֵל, malkī'ēl), MALCHIELITE, -ait, 'God is king': The ancestral head of the Malchielites, one of the clans of Asher (Gn 46 17; Nu 26 45; I Ch 7 31). E. E. N.

MALCHUS, mal'cus (Μάλχος): One of the mixed company of Roman soldiers and officers of the Sanhedrin who arrested Jesus (Jn 18 3). He seems to have been a slave belonging to the household of the high priest. In the mêlée that preceded the arrest his right ear was partially severed by Peter, and healed by Jesus (Jn 18 3, 10). Luke also records the incident, but not the name (Lk 22 49 f.). J. M. T.

MALEFACTOR: The Eng. translation of two Gr. words having practically the same meaning. (1) κακοποιός (κακὸν ποιῶν, in some MSS.) (Jn 18 30 AV, "evil-doer" RV). But in I P 2 14 (AV) it is rendered "evil-doer." It is possible that κακοποιός in I P 4 15 may mean 'astrologer' (cf. Artemid. Oneir. IV, 59). MALLUCH, mal'uc (מַלּוּךְ, mallūkh), also MALLUCHI, mal'lu-cai: 1. The name of a post-exilic family and of several of its representatives (Neh 10 4, 12 2), called Malluchi in 12 14 (Melicu AV). 2. A Merarite Levite (I Ch 6 44). 3. One of the "sons of Bani" (Ezr 10 29). 4. One of the "sons of Harim" (Ezr 10 32; Neh 10 27). E. E. N.

MAMMON (μαμωνᾶς, an Aram. word for 'riches' [Mt 6 24; Lk 16 9, 11, 13]): The origin of the word is quite obscure. The following explanations are proposed: (1) Mammon was a deity of wealth; but there is no trace of belief in such a deity. (2) The word comes from the root 'āman, 'to trust' (mā'āman, 'that which is trusted'). (3) It comes from maṭmān, 'that which is treasured,' or (4) from maḥmān, 'to desire' (cf. Nestle, EB). The last is probably the correct derivation. A. C. Z.

MAMRE, mam're (מַמְרֵא, mamrē'; more fully, "the oaks" ["terebinths" ARVmg.] of Mamre" (Gn 13 18, 14 13, 18 1): I. The site of Abraham's camp, which is placed by early Christian and modern Jewish tradition at er-Râmeh, 2 m. N. of Hebron. Near this is a ruin called "The House of the Friend (i.e., Abraham)," and a second ruin, which is probably the basilica erected by Constantine in the neighborhood. Since the 12th cent., however, the Christians have located Mamre 1¼ m. NW of the city, where at the present time a very ancient tree is revered as "Abraham's Oak." Both of these sites, however, seem too far from Machpelah (Gn 23 17) and Hebron (Gn 13 18, 23 19).

MAN: The original Heb. and Gr. terms rendered "man" are numerous, and each has its distinctive meaning. Only the briefest discussion can be given here. (1) The most generic term is 'ādhām, properly collective for 'man' in general, the genus Homo, mankind (Gn 1 26 f., 2 7, etc.), in distinction from God (Nu 23 19), or from other creatures (Gn 6 7, etc.). An individual is a "son of man" (Ezk 2 1, etc.). This word has no plural; "men" is literally 'sons of man.' (2) 'īsh indicates man as an individual, the male, the husband, the man of affairs, the citizen, etc. (Gn 2 23 f., 4 1, 13 16, 41 33; Hos 2 16, etc.). (3) 'ĕnōsh, a collective, like 'ādhām, and used much in the same way (Dt 32 26; Job 28 4, 32 8; Is 51 7, etc.). The Aramaic equivalent 'ĕnāsh is used in Ezr 4 11; Dn 2 10, etc. (4) ba'al, 'owner,' 'master,' is often rendered "man" (pl. "men") (Gn 20 3; Ex 24 14; Jg 9 2 ff., etc.; see also BAAL and FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 3). (5) gebher, properly man as 'strong,' 'vigorous,' 'brave,' and found mostly in poetry (Ex 10 11; Jos 7 14; Jg 5 30. Often used in a more general sense; cf. Job 3 3, 14 10; Ps 34 8, etc.). The Aram. equivalent is gebhar (Ezr 4 21; Dn 2 25, etc.). (6) gibbōr, properly an adj., 'strong,' 'powerful,' but also, especially when referring to warriors or heroes, used as a substantive. In either case it is generally rendered mighty man (Gn 10 9; Jos 10 2; Ru 2 1; II K 5 1, etc.). (7) zākhār, 'male' (Lv 15 33; Nu 31 17 f., etc.). (8) In a number of passages "man" stands for the Heb. ben, "son of," thus, in I K 1 52 "worthy man" is lit. 'son of worth'; in II K 2 16 "strong men" is lit. 'sons of strength,' etc. (9) ἄνθρωπος in the N T corresponds to the O T 'ādhām, as the most generic term, which is used in a great variety of senses. (10) ἀνήρ corresponds to the O T 'īsh, 'man' as an individual, etc., but its use is very general (Mt 7 24; Mk 6 20; Jn 1 13, etc.). (11) ἄρσην or ἄρρην, 'male,' is used in Ro 1 27; Rev 12 5. (12) The adjectives ἀνθρώπινος ('human,' 'of man') and τέλειος ('perfect,' 'full-grown,' 'adult') are found in I Co 2 13, 4 3, 10 13; Ro 6 19; I P 2 13; Ja 3 7, and I Co 2 6, 14 20. E. E. N.

MAN, DOCTRINE OF: The term 'man' (the rendering of the following Heb. and Gr. terms: 'ādhām, 'īsh, 'ĕnōsh, gebher, ἄνθρωπος, ἀνήρ) is used of the human race, or human nature generally, or else of the individual. It is in the former sense that it becomes a doctrinal term. Whether the Bible has a distinctive science of man (anthropology) is a much-mooted question, but must be answered upon the whole in the negative. This answer carries with it the view that each large period of Biblical thought (as that of the O T, or that of the N T) incorporates within itself the scientific ideas of its time, and that these are used as the vehicles for the communication of the essentials of religion. Inasmuch, however, as the latest stages of this development are controlled by the earlier, and do not at the end present radically contradictory tenets, the subject may be said to possess at least a relative unity.

1. General Features.

As to the origin of man the Bible contains two accounts (Gn 1 27 [P], and Gn 2 7 [J]). In both, man is the creature of God. P puts this in a generic, J in a specific, form, i.e., according to P, God created man as a part of the world; according to J, He fashioned him out of the dust of the ground, and then breathed into him the breath of life. The essential truth to be taught in both was that man owes his being to God, and has a spiritual affinity with Him. The mode of his coming into existence is a subordinate question to be answered by natural science.

2. The Origin of Man.

The Biblical account of man's creation includes also a statement of his endowment with the image (form) of God. This has been understood to involve the presupposition that God has a bodily form, which serves as the pattern for that of man, or to consist in a superadded quality of a moral nature, or in simple lordship over the other creatures. None of these views is satisfactory. Yet the frequent repetition of the statement (Gn 5 1, 9 6; Ja 3 9; Col 3 10) forbids the dismissal of it as a mere rhetorical embellishment. The image of God is better understood to be that which brings man into relation with God; in other words, to be his personality (Ps 8 5).

4. The Distinction of Sex. The same account includes a statement that God created man, male and female, which, however, is not to be associated with the mythological notion of an androgynous first man, but with the idea dominant throughout the Bible that the two sexes are on an equal footing, as far as relationship to God is concerned (Gal 3 28). This is in contrast with some forms of heathenism, in which woman is of inferior origin and occupies a lower place than man.

5. Unity and Complexity of Man. According to the prevalent representation of the Bible regarding man's constitution, he is a unitary being. In every relationship he acts as one, both in the present life and in that after death. A separation of body from spirit is not held in view. And yet the complexity in unity of the human being is not ignored. On the one side, man is in contact with the material world, and possesses a nature which can be expressed only in terms of matter; on the other, he has powers that go beyond the world of matter. From this point of view, man is a twofold being. This doctrine is found in its simplest form in the idea of the "inner man" (Ro 7 22; II Co 4 16; Eph 3 16). It is implicit in Gn 2 7, and constantly comes to the surface in the designation of the superphysical in man, by the phrase the inward parts (Ps 5 9, 51 6).

6. Trichotomy. A still more exhaustive way of speaking of the whole man is resorted to by Paul. It consists in specifying body, soul, and spirit as parts of a complete human nature (I Th 5 23). This appears also in expressions in which a distinction between soul and spirit is alluded to (I Co 15 44, 46; He 4 12). Some apparent support for this distinction is further found in the O T use of two separate words to designate soul and spirit respectively (nephesh and rūaḥ). But on closer examination, this usage of the O T does not appear to be based upon a consistent psychological theory, but is rather a conventional one. So far as the distinction is observed, the word 'soul' stands for the principle of life as embodied in individuals, while spirit is the same principle as cause underlying the constituted life. In the N T, with its tendency toward keener analysis, spirit and soul are more clearly discriminated from each other. The former is used of that specific side of human nature which allies man to God; the latter is restricted to the secular exercises of the inner man.

7. The Physical Man. The non-ethical side of man is concretely associated with the physical. The body is in the O T the seat of weakness, while in the N T it receives a more and more detached conception, until at times it is thought of as the mere residence of the spirit (II Co 5 1). At other times it is the "vessel," or instrument (II Co 4 7), or the "temple" (I Co 6 19). The word flesh itself, ordinarily applied to the body, is found in several very broadly distinct meanings: (1) The material body (bāsār, Gn 2 21), (2) human nature in general (Jn 1 14), (3) relationship by marriage (Gn 2 23; Jg 9 2; Ro 9 5, 8), (4) the seat of all weakness ("All flesh is as grass," Is 40 6; "The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak," Mt 26 41), (5) moral turpitude (Ro 8 1, 2 ff.; Gal 5 13).

8. Localization of Faculties in the Body. Individual members or organs of the body are identified with special functions of the mind. (1) The heart is the organ of thought (Pr 23 7; Mk 2 6; Lk 24 33), but not exclusively of the reasoning powers; for it is also the seat of the affections and appetites (Ps 104 15), e.g., of joy (Is 30 29), anger (Dt 19 6), hatred (Lv 19 17), and, in fact, of the whole personal life, including all the moral impulses, both the discriminative and the directive. 'Heart' is thus synonymous with 'conscience' (Job 27 6). (2) The bowels are more consistently the seat of the emotions, especially of those which, on account of their intensity or suddenness, produce a more perceptible reflex condition in the body (Is 16 11 AV. 63 15. La 1 20 ARV, however, renders more according to the sense). (3) The liver less frequently (La 2 11), and (4) the kidneys (Ps 7 9, 26 2, etc., "reins" AV and ERV; ARV here also renders, according to the sense, "mind") appear as seats of feeling.

9. Psychological Notions. The more purely psychological data of the Bible are scanty and more or less elastic. The conception of mind, except where it has been introduced by ARV in renderings according to the sense, is almost altogether a characteristic of the N T. And here it appears predominantly in the synonymous terms νοῦς, βουλή, the first of which denotes the deliberative reason, as applied to the moral life, with a bias either toward good or toward evil (Ro 7 23; Col 2 18; Rev 13 18); while the second denotes the act or state of intelligence, rather than a separate power or faculty.

10. Will. The Biblical conception of will must be gathered from what is said incidentally of willing as a phase of human activity. A name for the so-called faculty of will is nowhere given. Neither is there a question of the freedom of the will, or of its determination. Practically, will arises in appetency, or strong inclination, and culminates in a wish (θέλημα [Ac 13 22; Eph 2 3] and ἐπιθυμία [Ro 6 12]). An inclination of a weaker nature, however, may show itself first in the form of a deliberation (βούλημα [I P 4 3]). The power of choice involves the power to accomplish what is chosen (Jos 24 15, 22; cf. also the appeal of Elijah, I K 18 21; cf. also Ph 1 22; He 11 25). Hence arises the idea of responsibility underlying the choice. Will worship (Col 2 23) is not the rendering of Divine honors to one's own will, but the introduction into religion of arbitrary elements, according to one's own choice. These may be well intended, though unnecessary (or supererogatory), or hypocritical and harmful (cf. Lightfoot on Col 2 23).

MAN, SIN OF. See ANTICHRIST.

MAN, SON OF. See JESUS CHRIST, § 14 (c).

MANAEN, man'a-en (Μαναήν = Heb. Menaḥēm): A prophet in the church at Antioch, when Paul and Barnabas undertook their first missionary journey (Ac 13 1). He is also called a σύντροφος of Herod the Tetrarch. While this may mean that he was the "foster-brother" of Herod (cf. CIG, 3109), more probably it is simply a court title meaning 'friend' or 'associate' (see especially two Delos inscriptions reported in Bulletin de Correspondance hellénique [1877], I, 285, and cf. Deissmann, Bible Studies,[2] 310 f.). J. M. T.

MANAHATH, man'a-hath (מָנַחַת, mānaḥath): I. A son of Shobal, and the eponym of a Horite clan of Edom (Gn 36 23; I Ch 1 40). II. A place on the border of Judah, to which certain Benjamite clans were carried captive (I Ch 8 6). Site unknown. C. S. T.

MANAHATHITE, man'a-hath-ait (הַמָּנַחְתִי, mānaḥtī, Manahethite AV): A Calebite clan descended from Salma (I Ch 2 54). We should read the same word for "Menuhoth" (I Ch 2 52), which was also a Calebite clan and likewise inhabited Manahath, which ultimately became a city of Judah. C. S. T.

MANAHETHITE, man'a-heth-ait. See MANAHATHITE.

MANASSEH, ma-nas'ē (מְנַשֶּׁה, menashsheh = Gr. Μανασσῆς, Manasses): I. The ancestral head of one of the tribes of Israel; see TRIBE, TRIBES, § 3 f. II. 1. The son of Hezekiah, King of Judah (695–641 B.C., II K 21 1). He succeeded his father at the age of twelve. As Hezekiah had hearkened to the teachings of the prophets and had carried on a drastic system of reforms in religious worship, based on their principles (II K 18 4), one of the first steps of the anti-prophetic party when he died was to start a violent reactionary movement. In this they succeeded so far as to enlist the young king in their cause. His policy was accordingly molded quite early in his reign by the leaders of this faction. Hezekiah's reformation was arrested, and the cruder forms of worship practised in the reign of Ahaz were restored. Things went even further; for the king thought to strengthen himself against the prophetic party by winning over to his side the adherents of other religious systems, through the establishment of a syncretistic national religion in Judah. For this purpose he introduced from Assyria the astral system (the adoration of the "host of heaven," II K 21 3), and caused "his son to pass through the fire" (ver. 6), i.e., he practised human sacrifice. In fact, he completely reversed his father's policy, and even persecuted the prophetic party, especially the prophets. Many who resisted him were actually put to death (II K 21 16, 24 4; Jer 2 30). The syncretism thus introduced seems to have survived as late as the days of Ezekiel (Ezk 8 16). At all events, Jeremiah, after Manasseh's death, was full of prophetic indignation and horror at Manasseh's sins, and looked for their expiation as still in the future (Jer 15 4). Politically, Manasseh's reign was prosperous and free from petty warfare with the surrounding nations. Judah's relation to Assyria had been defined under Sennacherib as that of tribute-paying vassalage. This condition continued under Esarhaddon (687–662 B.C.), who names Manasseh as one of twenty-two tributary vassal princes (Menasé, Minsé, Schrader, COT, II, 58–60); but Manasseh rebelled against Asshurbanipal and was probably reconquered and taken for a time to Assyria as a prisoner. No extra-Biblical account of such an occurrence, however, has been preserved. The Chronicler who relates this incident attributes the misfortune to Manasseh's disobedience to the prophetic voice (II Ch 33 11). It is further added that this experience brought Manasseh to his senses, that he humbled himself before God, was restored to Jerusalem, reenacted his father's reforms, and strengthened the fortifications of the city. Later tradition attributes to him the composition of a prayer in his distress (see MANASSES, PRAYER OF). 2. One of the "sons of Pahath-moab" who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 30). 3. One of the "sons of Hashum" who also married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 33). A. C. Z.

MANASSES, ma-nas'siz. See MANASSEH.

MANASSES, PRAYER OF: An apocryphal document, based upon the reference in II Ch 33 12 f. In the foregoing passage no prayer is given, but we are told (ver. 18) "that the rest of the acts of Manasseh and his prayer unto his God . are written among the acts of the kings of Israel"; also (ver. 19) that "his prayer . . . is written in the history of Hozai (the "seers" AV). The so-called Prayer of Manasses purports to be this prayer. It is found among the Canticles appended to the Psalter in some MSS. of the LXX.; also in Apost. Const. II, 22. Some scholars have favored the view that our Greek version of the prayer is connected, through the Hebrew, with the lost original referred to in II Ch. This, however, is not the generally accepted opinion. The prayer is rather a composition (date uncertain) emanating from later Judaism, and stands much in the same relation to II Ch 33 12 f. as does the Prayer of Azariah to Dn 3 24 f. It has never been recognized as canonical, but is included in our EV among the Apocrypha. J. S. R.

MANASSITE, ma-nas'ait: The gentilic of Manasseh, meaning a member of the tribe of Manasseh. See TRIBES, § § 3, 4. E. E. N.

MANDRAKE. See PALESTINE, § 23; also DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 7 (5).

MANEH, mē'ne. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 4.

MANGER: The Gr. φάτνη properly means 'feeding-place' (from πατεῖσθαι, 'to eat'), and should be thus rendered in Lk 13 15 ("stall" AV and RV), as it is correctly rendered in 2 7, 12, 16. E. E. N.

MANIFEST, MANIFESTATION (φανερόν, φανέρωσις): In their general meaning these terms do not materially differ from 'reveal' and 'revelation'; but they are found in a more specific usage in the N T, underlying which usage there is the idea of a sharp separation between spiritual and material realities. The breaking of the spiritual into the sphere of the material is designated a "manifestation," i.e., the bringing into visibility of what is real but invisible. The terms are favorites in the Johannine writings (Jn 2 11, 17 6; I Jn 3 2, etc.), though also used in the Pauline Epistles (I Ti 3 16). They are still more specifically applied to the second coming of Christ, as a spectacular revelation of Himself, emerging from His present invisibility (Col 1 26, 3 4; I Jn 2 28).

A. C. Z.

MANNA: The food miraculously provided for the Israelites during their desert wanderings (Ex 16 15 ff.; Nu 11 6 ff.; Jos 5 12). According to Ex 16 15, the name originated in the exclamation man hū', 'what is it?' but Ebers suggests the derivation from Egyptian mennu, 'food.' In appearance it resembled hoar frost or bdellium (see STONES, PRECIOUS) or coriander seed (Ex 16 14, 31; Nu 11 7), which is about a sixth of an inch in diameter, whitish, globular, and aromatic. The sweet, sticky gum exuding from a species of Tamarisk is called manna by the modern Arabs (Ritter, Geog. Pal. I, 271–292), and attempts have been made to identify this with the Biblical food. Exudations from other shrubs have also been suggested, and the scales of various lichens; but none of these has any practical food-value (all being medicinal rather than nutritive), or occurs in sufficient quantities, or possesses the other requisite qualities to satisfy the Scriptural descriptions. The 'manna' of the American Pharmacopœia is an exudation from a species of ash, and comes chiefly from southern Italy and Sicily.

MANNER: In the majority of instances this is an adequate, though not literal, rendering of original terms meaning 'word,' 'way,' 'judgment,' etc. A few cases need comment. In Is 5 17 "manner" AV should be "pasture" as in RV. In Is 10 24, 26 the references are historical, in the first instance (ver. 24), to the rod of the Egyptian taskmaster, in the second (ver. 26), to the rod of J", with which Moses smote the Red Sea. In Am 4 10 Egypt as the home of pestilence is meant, while in 8 14 ('way' RV) it may refer to the (sacred) road to Beersheba. On Lv 20 23 cf. RV. In II S 7 19 the text is doubtful, and in any case 'way' is an incorrect rendering.

MANOAH, mȧ-nō'ȧ (מָנוֹחַ, mānōaḥ), 'rest': The father of Samson (Jg 13 2 ff.), described plainly as a man of Zorah, of the family of the Danites. From this it has been conjectured that his name was the eponym of the Manahathites (q.v.), of which it might be a corruption. The only thing certain seems to be that one-half of the clan of the Manahathites were Zorahites, viz., residents of Zorah, Manoah's town.

MAOCH, mē'ȯc (מָעוֹךְ, mā'ōkh): The father of Achish, King of the Philistine city of Gath (I S 27 2), called Maacah in I K 2 39.
C. S. T.

MAON, mē'ȯn (מָעוֹן, mā'ōn), MAONITES, mē'ȯn-īts, מְעוֹנִי, mā'ȯnī: A city in the hill-country of Judah near Ziph and Carmel (Jos 15 55), represented (genealogically) as a descendant of Hebron and father of Beth-zur (I Ch 2 45). It is now Khurbet Ma'in, a conical hill with caves and extensive ruins, which rises 200 ft. above the site of Carmel. Map II, E 3. E. of Ma'în a waste pasture-land slopes down toward the Dead Sea. This is apparently the Wilderness of Maon, in which David took refuge (I S 23 24 ff.). The Maonites (Heb. mā'ōnī; Jg 10 12) are apparently the same as the Meunim (q.v.), and the original home of the tribe seems to have been in Edom (I Ch 4 41; II Ch 20 1 ARVmg.), possibly at Ma'ân, 13 m. SE. of Petra.

MARA, mē'rȧ (מָרָא, mārā'), 'bitter': A name given by Naomi to herself, because of her bitter experience (Ru 1 20).
C. S. T.

MARAH, mē'rā (מָרָה, mārāh), 'bitterness': The name of a bitter spring made sweet by Moses (Ex 15 23 ff.), the site of which constituted the first station of the Israelites after crossing the Red Sea (Nu 33 8 f.). Not yet located.
C. S. T.

MARALAH, mar'ȧ-lā (מַרְעָלָה, mar'ălāh): A city of Zebulun (Jos 19 11). Site uncertain, but see Map IV, C 7.
E. E. N.

MARANATHA, mar"ȧ-nath'ȧ: An Aramaic expression found in I Co 16 22. According to Dalman (Aram. Gram.[2] pp. 152, 357), the Gr. μαράν ἀθά = the Aram. מָרַנָא תָא, 'our Lord, come.' It was probably a widely current expression, a watchword of the early Christians, indicative of their fervent hope in the speedy reappearance of the Lord Jesus.
E. E. N.

MARBLE: A stone capable of polish, and therefore, for its brightness, called in Gr. μάρμαρος ('glistening'). The Heb. shayish is of uncertain derivation. Marble was often used in costlier buildings (Est 1 6; Song 5 15), and especially in the Temple (I Ch 29 2; Jos. Ant. VIII, 3 2). The pillars of Herod's Temple were of marble (BJ, V, 5 2).

MARCUS, mār'cus. See MARK (JOHN).

MARESHAH, mȧ-rī'shā (מָרֵאשָׁה, mārē'shāh):
I. A city of Judah (Jos 15 44), fortified by Rehoboam (II Ch 11 8). It became the battle-field in a war between Asa and Zerah of Ethiopia (II Ch 14 9 f.). It was later sacked by Judas Maccabæus (Jos. Ant. XII, 8 6), and figured in the wars of the Maccabæans generally (Jos. Ant. XIII, 9 1; XIV, 4 4, 13 9). Map II, D 2.
II. The father of Hebron (I Ch 2 42) and the son of Laadah (I Ch 4 21).
A. C. Z.

MARINER. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

MARISH: An old English form for 'marsh' (Ezk 47 11 AV).
E. E. N.

MARK: The rendering of (1) 'ōth, 'sign' (Gn 4 15 AV). The sign was placed on Cain to protect him, not to mark him as a murderer. (2) maṭṭārāh, from māṭar, 'to watch,' and hence the object on which the eye is fixed when shooting (I S 20 20; Job 16 12; La 3 12). (3) miphg'ā, 'that against which one strikes,' the obstacle in the way (Job 7 20). Job complains that God (purposely) strikes against him continually. (4) tāw, the last letter of the Heb. alphabet, the old form of which was T (Ezk 9 4, 6). Here the word seems to mean simply a mark or brand, not necessarily the letter itself. (5) qa'qa' in Lv 19 28 probably refers to barbarous customs of tattooing. (6) σκοπός (Ph 3 14 AV) is 'goal,' as in RV. (7) στίγμα (Gal 6 17), 'imprints,' or 'brands,' mean the scars of the wounds Paul had received for his loyalty to Christ. As slaves were branded to show to whom they belonged, so Paul calls these marks the 'brands' showing to what Master he belonged. (8) χάραγμα, a 'stamp' imprinted on a surface, is used in Rev 13 16 f., 14 9, etc., of the mark branded or stamped on the foreheads of the followers of Antichrist. E. E. N.

MARK, mārk, JOHN (Μᾶρκος): Of the life of M., the supposed author of the Second Gospel, but few notices are contained in the N T. His Jewish name was John, but like many Jews of the day he had a Gentile (Latin) surname, Mark (Marcus, Gr. Μᾶρκος). Presumably, he was a native of Jerusalem, where his mother had a large house (Ac 12 12) and was apparently a woman of some means. How M. and his mother became identified with the primitive Christian Church of Jerusalem we do not know. Some have thought that the peculiar episode related in the Gospel (14 51 f.) refers to him and is, as it were, his signature to his Gospel. In any case, we may be sure that by 44 A.D.—i.e., less than fifteen years after Pentecost—both M. and his mother were prominent members of the Christian community in Jerusalem. The mother of M. was sister to either the mother or father of Barnabas, since M. is called the latter's ἀνεψιός (Col 4 10 "cousin" RV, not "nephew" as AV). When Paul and Barnabas returned to Antioch, after their visit to Jerusalem with alms from the Church of Antioch, they took with them "John whose surname was Mark" (Ac 12 25). A year or two later M. was selected to accompany them on their first missionary journey as a helper, ὑπηρέτης (not a menial servant, nor, on the other hand, a colleague; Ac 13 5). M. remained with them while they evangelized Cyprus. But when they crossed over to the mainland, to Perga of Pamphylia, and planned to go thence into the interior of Asia Minor, M. withdrew and returned to his home in Jerusalem (Ac 13 13). Paul was much displeased at this, although he appears to have had no objection to M.'s presence in Antioch after he and Barnabas had returned from their journey. Possibly M. returned to Antioch in their company after the Apostolic Council of 49 or 50 A.D. But when Paul and Barnabas planned a second journey the latter wished to take M. along again, but Paul refused (Ac 15 37). The disagreement was so positive that Paul and Barnabas parted, and Barnabas with M. visited Cyprus once more (Ac 15 39), c. 50 A.D. After this time the history of M. is involved in obscurity. In Col 4 10 (c. 60 or 61 A.D.) Paul writes to the Church of Colossæ that in case M. comes to them, they should receive him, stating also that they had had some communications regarding him. It is evident that during the preceding ten years M. had been restored to the Apostle's favor, but when and how is not known. Col was written from Rome and would imply that M. was then with Paul at Rome and was about to start thence on a journey to the East, expecting to visit Colossæ. The letter to Philemon, ver. 24, shows that this was the case. M. did leave Rome, but whether he visited Colossæ we do not know. He was in the East when Paul, at the time of his second imprisonment, wrote to Timothy and asked him to come to him and bring M. with him, since "he is useful to me for ministering." Presumably M. was in Rome with Paul when the latter was executed.

In I P 5 13 there is a reference to M. which only adds to the perplexity of the problem concerning the latter part of his life. If I P was written at Babylon (as Weiss holds) and some years before the execution of Paul, M. must have been associated with Peter after his visit to Cyprus with Barnabas, and then later transferred himself from Peter to Paul. But if I P is late and was written from Rome, M. may have joined Peter after the death of Paul. Other solutions are, of course, possible, but no one of them can be considered more than a conjecture.

The earliest Christian tradition, outside of the N T, associates M. with Peter as his ἑρμηνευτής, a term capable of several renderings. The more common rendering, 'interpreter,' would signify that M. may have been used by Peter to interpret his Aramaic discourses into Greek, such as people in Rome, for example, might more readily appreciate. Papias, to whom we owe this notice, thinks of M. as the constant companion of Peter and consequently well fitted to compose a Gospel in which Peter's teaching was accurately reproduced even if not correctly arranged (see MARK, GOSPEL OF, § 1 [h]). Later traditions connect M. with Alexandria, of which city he is reputed to have become the first Christian bishop. His supposed remains were taken thence by the Venetians in the 9th cent. and thus St. Mark became the patron saint of Venice. But nothing certain is known of his later career, although many legends exist in the apocryphal literature of the early Christian centuries. E. E. N.

The second of the so-called Synoptic Gospels (q.v.).

1. Authorship.

As is the case with all the narrative writings of the N T there is no one named as the author of this Gospel; though the incident given in 14 51 f. is held by some scholars to be the author's reference to himself, largely on the basis of what is generally assumed to be the Fourth Evangelist's indefinite expression of self-reference (cf. Jn 18 15 f., 20 1-10). But even so, there is no way of identifying the person there referred to.

As a matter of fact, it is only by a careful study of the contents of the Gospel that we can come to any conclusions as to the directions in which its authorship lies, and these conclusions must at the best be tentative, until subjected to the testimony of the external evidence.

(a) Contents. The material of the narrative is arranged in an order which not only follows the recognized general development of Jesus' ministry, but is practically chronological in its sequence of individual events.

After an Introductory Statement, containing the title of the Gospel (1 1), the record enters at once upon the Public Ministry of Jesus (1 2–13 37).

This is prefaced by a preliminary narrative (1 2-13), consisting of a brief account of the ministry of the Baptist (1 2-8), leading up to Jesus' induction into His work through His baptism (1 9-11) and His temptation (1 12 f.). The Ministry proper is then taken up—very much as Luke gives it in his later Gospel—from the aspect of Jesus' work among the people, viz.:

A. His Popular Ministry (1 14–8 26).

This popular work is described:

(A) As it covered the region of Galilee proper (1 14–7 23), prefaced by a statement of His coming into Galilee and the theme of His message (1 14 f.), and then taking up the action of the Ministry, beginning with the call of the four fishermen (1 16-20) and the opening day of the Capernaum work (1 21-34) and recording the tours out from Capernaum which, while spoken of as for the purpose of preaching (κηρυσσειν, 1 38), are reported practically in their characteristic activity of events.

I. First tour—through the smaller villages near by Capernaum (1 35-45). This is followed by an account of the return to Capernaum and the work in that neighborhood (2 1–3 19a).

II. With 3 19b-30 is given an incident in Capernaum which evidently marks the return from a second more extended preaching-tour (cf. Mt 11 2-30; Lk 7 11–8 3 as giving the incidents probably occurring on this tour). This is followed by a further incident (3 31-35)—presented as a sequence of the former—and by what Mark records of the parables by the sea (4 1-34), and then by what may be considered as a

III. Third tour—across the sea into the country of the Gerasenes (4 35–5 20). This is followed by a return to Capernaum, with subsequent miracles and a visit to Nazareth (5 21–6 6a), after which is recorded a

IV. Fourth tour—this time, however, apparently representative, through the sending out of the Twelve over a much larger region of country, while Jesus Himself continued the more local work (6 6b-33). This is closed with the events which ended His work in Galilee proper (6 34-56), to which is added a ceremonial criticism by the Pharisees and Jesus' answering discourse (7 1-23).

The record of this popular Ministry is then continued:

(B) As it covered the region of Northern Galilee (7 24–8 26), consisting largely in an account of miracles, along with which, however, are given some remarks (8 11-21).

His Ministry is then taken up—again very much as Luke has given it—from the aspect of its work among the disciples, viz.:

B. His Instructional Ministry (8 27–10 52).

(A) In the regions of Northern Galilee (8 27–9 29), including

I. The Messianic Confession at Cæsarea Philippi (8 27–9 1).

II. The Transfiguration and the announcement of the Passion, with accompanying miracle (9 2-29).

(B) During the last journey to Jerusalem (9 30–10 52).

There is then given the final stage of His Ministry:

C. His Messianic Work in Jerusalem (chs. 11–13), including the Eschatological Address of ch. 13, and leading up to

D. His Passion and Resurrection (14 1–16 8 [vs. 9-20 being spurious].

(b) Nationality of Author. A careful study of these contents makes clear that the author was a Jewish Christian, not because of any Jewish cast in the narrative, for this seems to be altogether lacking, but (1) because of the author's familiarity with Jewish customs (cf. 1 44, 2 18, 11 15, 14 1) and beliefs (cf. 12 18) and his ready ability to explain them (cf. 7 2 ff., 14 12, 15 6, 42), and (2) because of his acquaintance with the Aramaic language, which he translates for his readers' sake (cf. 3 17, 5 41, 7 11, 34, 9 43, 10 46, 14 36, 15 22, 34).

(c) Readers. On the other hand, it is equally clear that the readers were Gentile Christians, not simply because they were unacquainted with the language and customs of Palestine, for so were the Jewish Christian readers of Mt (q.v., §1 d), but because, in addition to the explanation of Aramaic terms, there are some Latin terms (e.g., 2 4, 6 55 κράβαττος, 6 27 σπεκυλάτωρ, 7 4, 8, ξέστης, 15 39, 44 f. κεντυρίων 15 15, τὸ ἱκανιὸν ποιεῖν), which are used only by him and some which seem to be used not so much from the writer's habit of speech as from his desire to be understood by the readers (cf. 12 42, 15 16). At the same time there is, apart from the remarks of others, an almost total absence of O T quotations.

(d) Place. There is no indication as to where the Gospel was written, though perhaps from what has just been said a Latin country might be more likely than a Greek or Hebrew one would be—in other words, the Western rather than the Eastern region of the Early Church.

(e) Time. As to when it was written, the general tendency of modern scholarship is to place it well before the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A.D.). This would seem to be justified, for there is here the same naive unconsciousness that we find in Mt (q.v., § 1 f) regarding the unfulfilment of Jesus' announcement of His return to earth immediately upon the soon impending catastrophe predicted in ch. 13, cf. vs. 28-37), while there is an absence even of the things which in Mt might seem to betray a more developed church organization or doctrinal thought. Certainly the statement of Jesus in 9 1 (paralleled by Mt 16 28 and Lk 9 27) could not well have been reproduced after the first generation had wholly passed away without some explanation (cf. Jn 21 22 f.). All this would be confirmed by any evidence which might be forthcoming from a literary comparison of the contents that Mk was used by Matthew in the writing of his Gospel.

(f) Motive. As far as this Gospel has a distinctive motive, it is to present Jesus to its readers in the actual reality of His wonderful life. It is a thoroughly objective narrative which is given. The discourses of Jesus are largely omitted, while there are brought out into strong prominence not simply His wonderful deeds, but the wonderful effects which they produced (cf. 1 22, 27 f., 37, 45, 2 12 f., 3 6-12, 4 1, 5 14-21, 42 [contrastive unbelief 6 2 f., 6a and Herod's opinion 6 14], 6 31-33, 54-56, 7 36 f., 12 17, 34—naturally more evident during His popular than His instructional work).

(g) Results of Internal Evidence. It is frankly admitted that the results obtained from this internal study of the Gospel are not indicative of anything beyond its being a possible product of the Apostolic Age and of the person whose name it bears. Any more definite conclusions can be reached only by a full and impartial comparison of these results with the external evidence regarding the Gospel furnished by the post-Apostolic Age.

This evidence uniformly ascribes the origin of the Gospel to Mark and to M. as in some way connected in the writing with Peter. That M. could have been associated with the Apostle is of course evident from a glance at the N T notices of him (see previous article). The difficulty is simply to determine just what was this association from a literary point of view.

(h) External Evidence.

Gathering from Jerome back to Papias such statements as have a bearing upon the problem, and considering their respective values in the way of evidence, it becomes quite clear that, as in the case of Mt, Papias furnishes the point of departure for all the succeeding tradition, not merely because he was the earliest witness, but because we can understand how the other statements by those who came after him have been developed from his.

The statement of Papias is as follows: "Mark, who had been Peter's interpreter, wrote down accurately, though not in order, whatever he remembered of the things said or done by Christ. For he did not hear the Lord, neither did he follow Him, but at a later time, as I said, followed Peter, who delivered his discourses according to the needs [of each occasion], but not with the idea of making a complete arrangement of the Lord's sayings. So that Mark erred in no respect, thus writing down such things as he remembered; for of one thing he made great care, not to omit anything of what he had heard, or to falsely state anything in them [as he gave them]." [1]

From this it would seem that the literary relation between M. and Peter was connected with Peter's fragmentary Gospel preaching. This, however, raises the question as to how M. could get from such desultory discourses such a connected narrative as our Second Canonical Gospel gives us.

In turning to Papias' statement for more detailed investigation we find that it tells us that M., who had been with Peter as his interpreter (ἑρμηνευτής, 'translator'—before audiences whose language the Apostle could not use well enough for public discourse), committed to writing what he could remember of Peter's Gospel discourses (διδασκαλίαι), which were delivered not with the purpose of making a completely arranged presentation (σύνταξις) of the Lord's sayings, but in a way to suit the needs of each occasion (πρὸς τὰς χρείας), and that the writing of them itself was not in order (οὐ μέν τοι τάξει).

The query is, of course, how such a description suits the contents of our Gospel. It might be possible that the statement of Peter's purpose in his discourses not to completely present the sayings of the Lord was intended to explain the fragmentary appearances of such sayings in our Gospel; but it is not so easy to explain the criticism of M.'s own writing as being not in order; for whatever may be said of the Gospel's bringing together into immediate connection events more probably separated in time or its piecing together into one discourse sayings uttered on different occasions (cf. Menzies, The Earliest Gospel, pp. 30–33), it not only presents a consistently developed plan of Jesus' ministry, but it is in the main current of its narrative chronological in its sequence of sayings and events. When we consider the expression used in Papias' statement, however, it becomes evident that this lack of order in M.'s writing was a lack of orderly arrangement (τάξις) rather than of orderly sequence (καθεξῆς)—a condition we could easily understand as applying to our Gospel providing M. had in mind some other Gospel writing up to whose standard arrangement of material M. had not, in his opinion, come.

As such a standard each one of the Gospel narratives has been suggested (Mt—Holtzmann, Taylor; Lk—Salmon; Jn—Jülicher, Harnack, Zahn), including the Logian document (B. Weiss). Whether it is possible to decide among them or not, it is clear that with the above understanding of his statement there is no reason to doubt that Papias was talking about our Second Canonical Gospel, substantially as we have it before us to-day, and not about some hypothetical fragmentary writing by M., which possibly may have formed the basis for our Gospel but which has been hopelessly lost.

That the sources M. may have had for his narrative were confined to these Gospel discourses of Peter is not likely, whether he wrote during the Apostle's lifetime, when he could freely consult with him and gain from his personal reminiscence such purely individual incidents as 1 30 ff., 35-38, 3 16, 8 32 ff., 14 30, 66-70, 16 7, which may not have entered into his public discourses, or whether he wrote after Peter's death and gathered from the current tradition of the early Christian community such incidents as the above (note that Mt 14 28-31, 15 15, 16 17-19, 17 24-27, 18 21; Lk 5 3 ff., 12 41, 22 31 f. are omitted in Mk, which alone gives 11 21; cf. also 14 30, 37 with ‖s) and such collections of Jesus' sayings as may be evident in chs. 4, 9, and 13. (See evidence for a written document in the phrase ὁ ἀναγινώσκων νοείτω of ver. 14.) In any event it is most probable that what M. has given us in his Gospel is a reproduction of the common Apostolic preaching in the Early Church, based perhaps in general on Peter's presentation of it, but at the same time modified by his own wider experiences in company with Paul (cf. such Pauline traits as 13 35-37 [= Ro 13 12], 14 36 [= Ro 8 15; Gal 4 6], 1 15 [= Gal 4 4]) and Barnabas.

(i) Sources.

This might account for the absence from Mk of the Nativity stories and the Genealogies given by Mt and Lk, which would not be part of such preaching, and even for the absence of the Preaching of the Baptist, the Sermon on the Mount (excepting small fragments, 4 21, 24, 9 43, 47, 50, 10 11, 11 25), the discourse to the Twelve (excepting the brief saying 6 10 f.), with the whole incident of the Seventy and the parabolic and discourse material peculiar to Lk (chs. 9–19 [excepting scattered sayings in Mk ch. 10]) which may have come from the primitive Logian document. The fact that generally speaking the sayings of Jesus find their way into Mk only in scattered fashion shows perhaps that he gave them only as they found their way fragmentarily into the common preaching (note examples of this in Paul's speech at Miletus, Ac 20 35). In truth, the fact that Mk has practically but one so-called collected discourse, and this the prophetic one on the coming catastrophe and the Parousia (ch. 13), shows how the thought of the primitive disciples was forward rather than backward (cf. Burkitt, The Gospel History and its Transmission, p. 264 f.), and how when they preached "Jesus and the resurrection" they were likely to give, not so much His teachings as the facts of His ministry culminating in His death and resurrection as the basis of their personal experience of Him as the Savior of the world. It is the later Gospels, whose plan and purpose were less objective—as Mt with its Messiahship of Jesus and Lk with its universalism of Jesus' religion—which incorporated the teachings of Jesus as a preponderating element in their record of His life and work.[1]

2. Theology.

When we come to study in detail the thought of M., it becomes at once clear that we have relatively little material at our disposal. The objective character of the Gospel has resulted in a characteristic failure to preserve for its readers the teachings of Jesus. Its presentation of Jesus lies more in what it represents Him as having done than in what it records Him as having said. A statement of its theology, therefore, must necessarily be meager. It is also evident that, Mk being the primary Gospel which both Mt and Lk almost wholly have reproduced in their narratives, there is not likely to be much in M.'s theology which is not shared by the others. Such peculiarities of position as he may have had in all probability have been made common property by those who so copiously drew from his narrative to construct their own. The differences which the others show in comparison with him are likely to be in the direction of positive additions to his rather neutral lines of thinking.

(1) As to God: While M. shares in the general synoptic custom of representing Jesus as ascribing to God absolute goodness (10 17 f.) and unlimited power (10 27, 12 24, 14 36), he has not, as they have, preserved in these ascriptions either the title King or, with four exceptions (8 38, 11 25, 13 32, 14 36), the title Father. In but one of these excepted passages is His Fatherhood presented as related to Jesus' disciples, and in no case is it even inferentially considered as in a general way related to all men; while but one lordship parable is preserved by this Gospel, viz., that of the Vineyard (12 1-11). (2) As to Jesus Himself: M. represents Jesus as using of Himself the title Son of Man, which though not a current Messianic title, was employed by Him to designate His authoritative right, as Head of the Messianic Kingdom, to forgive sin (2 10) and to determine the meaning and use of the Sabbath (2 28). Its almost exclusive presentation, however, is in connection with Jesus' announcements of His coming Passion and the exaltation and glory which were to follow it. In this connection it designates Jesus' consciousness of His necessary relation to the Salvation which His Messianic rule was to offer to the world. As Son of Man He was to be delivered into the hands of His enemies (9 31, 10 33, 14 21 [bis] 41), through whom He was to suffer many things and be killed (8 31, 9 12, 31, 10 33), and in this death was to give His life a ransom for many (10 45). From this death, however, He was to be raised again (8 31, 9 9) and to be exalted to the right hand of God (14 62), whence He was to come in glory to judge the world (13 26; cf. 8 38). In all of these passages M. is paralleled by the other synoptics. Associated with this title is the more significant one of the Son of God which, however, neither M. nor the others represent Jesus as explicitly using of Himself. At the same time, they all represent Him as accepting its explicit ascription to Himself by others and as implicitly ascribing it to Himself. M. restricts this ascription of it to Jesus by others to four occasions, in all of which he is paralleled by his fellow evangelists—on the occasions of Jesus' baptism (1 11) and His transfiguration (9 7), when its use designates Him as the unique object of the Divine love and as gathering up in Himself and the mission He was accomplishing the Divine satisfaction; on one occasion of demonic healing (5 7), when it shows Him as regarded by the demons as possessed of supernatural powers (to which is prefaced by M. alone a general statement to the same effect in connection with His Capernaum work following His first preaching tour, 3 11), and at His trial, where the challenge of the High Priest ("Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?" 14 61), as far as it can be considered as employing this title, is made in nothing more than a technical Messianic sense, though Jesus' reply transforms it into the title Son of Man, in which He assumes the possession of a Divine glory and power (the confession of the centurion at the Cross [15 39], though employing this specific title, in all likelihood represents nothing more than a pagan idea of a superhuman hero). The implicit ascription to Himself by Jesus of this title is recorded by M. in but three passages—in all of which he is paralleled by the other synoptists—once when He is speaking of the final acknowledgment by the Son of Man before His Father of those who have been His true followers on earth (8 38); again in His agony in Gethsemane, where He surrendered Himself in loyal obedience to the Father's will (14 36); and finally, in His eschatological discourse, where He confesses that the time of His Parousia is known not even to the Son, but only to the Father (13 32). The one parable in which this relationship is implied is that of the Householder and the Vineyard (12 1-11), which is given by all the synoptists. Few as these passages are, they disclose, as they do in the other Gospels, a consciousness on Jesus' part of a relationship to God involving a mutual harmony of will (14 36) and an acknowledgment by God of Jesus' exalted right and authority to pronounce judgment upon men at the consummation of His Kingdom (8 38, 9 1), and yet, at the same time, a subordination on Jesus' part, at least so far as the determination of the time and season of this consummation were concerned (13 32). (3) As to the Kingdom of God: Unlike Matthew, M. does not represent Jesus as using the peculiar phrase "kingdom of heaven," but, with Luke, as employing the general Messianic term "kingdom of God." The passages recorded are few in number, are all (excepting 9 47, 12 34, and the parable of the Growing Grain, 4 26-29) paralleled in the other Gospels, and in the picture of the Kingdom which they present emphasize the fact that its membership is determined by character and conduct (9 47, 10 23-25, 12 29-34), involving humility as its test of greatness (10 14 f.) and perhaps for this reason it is destined to go through a process of development before its consummation is reached (4 26-30, 30-32)—a development, however, which will be marked by great crises (cf. 9 1 with the general statements of the eschatological discourse, ch. 13). To this consummation Jesus is represented as looking forward as the realization of His mission (14 25). There does not seem to be, as there is with the others, any emphasis laid upon the universalism of its scope (though cf. the phrase peculiar to Mk in 11 17; cf. also 14 9 [= Mt 26 13]), or upon the non-nationalism of its plan and purpose (though M. unites with Matthew in denouncing the ceremonialism of the Pharisees, 7 1-23, 12 38-40); while, apart from the character-condition of its membership, its spirituality does not appear to be specially brought out (but cf. the passage peculiar to Mk 12 32-34). (4) As to the Messianic Salvation: Together with all the synoptists M. represents Jesus as apparently confining eternal life to the future world, yet at the same time portraying the rewards of His discipleship as realized in the present life (10 29 f.). As to the character of this salvation, this passage is the only one in which it seems to be described, and here the impression is that it makes good the loss of material things which may come through following Him. As to the general conditions on which this Salvation is possible, Jesus is represented by M., as well as by the other synoptists, as emphasizing the need of personal relations to Himself (8 34 f., 38, 10 29, 14 5-9); while of the specific conditions, both faith (1 15, 2 5, 5 34, 10 52; cf. 6 5 f., 9 42) and repentance (1 15; cf. 6 12) are mentioned, though special attention seems to be called by M. to the enduring of persecutions (13 9-13). In common with Matthew, the death of Jesus is presented as the means by which this Salvation is secured (10 45, 14 24 [cf. the more specific statement in Mt 26 28]). (5) As to Eschatology: M. shows no difference from the other synoptists in his merging of the ideas of development and consummation in the Kingdom (cf. the eschatological discourse, ch. 13). At the same time, besides the parables of the Sower and the Lamp (4 21-25), the only parables by the sea which he has given are those which emphasize the development through which the Kingdom is to go (4 26-32). On the other hand, he does not seem to have entered into any presentation of the idea of judgment beyond the simple statements attached to the parable of the Lamp (4 21-25), to the announcement of His Passion (8 38), to the remarks on humility and forgiveness (9 43-49), and the pronouncement of national doom contained in the parable of the Householder and the Vineyard (12 1-11).

Jesus' prophetic discourse (ch. 13) is, apart from the parables, the only collected discourse of any length which M. has reproduced. This may be due to the prominence in the Early Church of the hope of the Kingdom's consummation which this discourse aroused; for even if writing as he did, from a western city—say, from Rome—and at an early date, the various collections of Jesus' sayings and discourses had not yet come to his notice. Yet the presence of this particular one shows the early currency of this source of the Church's general forward look.

LITERATURE: In addition to the extended discussion of the criticism of the Gospel to be found in the Introductions of Jülicher (Eng. transl. 1904) and Zahn (Eng. transl. 1908) which represent respectively the best phases of modern German literal and conservative scholarship, much critical material may be found in the prefatory portions of the following excellent commentaries: B. and J. 1. The Legal Character of Marriage in the O T. Betrothal.

In the O T marriage belongs within the sphere of individual law, that is, it took place through a commercial contract which was concluded between the man who wished to marry and the man who had control over the woman who was sought in marriage. It concerned to a certain degree also the family or the local community, but the larger public, the people or the state, had no interest in the marriages of individual Israelites. The legal character of marriage is nowhere specifically described in the O T, but presupposed as understood. For example, the Book of the Covenant (Ex 21 9) speaks of the (known) rights of daughters, the prophet Ezekiel (16 38-41) of the (known) law concerning the adulteress. The carefully guarded position of the first-born son (Dt 21 15-17) necessarily presupposes fixed regulations concerning marriage, and the married woman is spoken of as b'ūlath ba'al (Dt 22 22; Gn 20 3; cf. Dt 24 1; Is 54 1; Pr 30 23), i.e., as 'acquired by a husband,' 'taken into possession.' The prescriptions concerning marriage were not by any means all of Israelitic origin. Many regulations may have been retained by Israel from ancient usage, but others were probably taken over from the Canaanite civilization. If a comparison is made between the Israelitic law concerning marriage and that of the Code of Hammurabi, many distinctions as well as remarkable points of agreement will be found. The latter can not be explained otherwise than as due to the fact that Babylonian law (c. 2000 B.C.) had exercised an influence upon Israel through the medium of the Canaanite civilization. In addition, there are also found such regulations as correspond to the higher spirit of the Israelitic religion.

So far as the steps preparatory to a marriage are concerned, the matter of first importance was the choice of a bride. In antiquity the youths and maidens mingled more freely than has come to be the case to-day in Oriental countries, under the influence of Islam. The drawing of water at the springs or wells, the work in the field, or the care of the flocks furnished opportunities where they could see and speak to one another (Ex 2 16 ff.; Gn 29 9-11; I S 9 11-13; cf. Dt 22 25-27). The young man who wished to marry was consequently easily in the position to seek out for himself, among the maidens of his age and station, the one whom he would prefer for his life companion; but custom demanded that it should be the father, or one who represented him as head of the family, who picked out the wife for the son who was in position to marry. Thus Abraham selected the wife for Isaac (Gn 24 2 ff.), Isaac for Jacob (28 1 ff.), Judah for Er (38 6), Hagar, the mother, for Ishmael (21 21). Of course, there was nothing to prevent the wish of the son being the occasion of the father's suit (Gn 34 4, 6; Jg 14 1 ff.), or that the inclination of the daughter should be respected (I S 18 20). Indeed, the case is narrated of a son who took a strange wife against the will of his parents (Gn 26 34 f., 27 46; Jg 14 1-10). But the rule was that the will of the father or of the parents was decisive. This decision was determined mainly by the fact that in every marriage two important conditions, relating intimately to the life of the times, had to be considered: (1) the size and limits of the families or clans involved, and (2) the assurance or certainty that the family estate would be kept in the possession of the proper family line. One did not willingly permit his daughter to pass over into a strange family, because there she would be deprived of the protection of her own family or clan (Gn 29 19), and one was not inclined to allow the share of the family in the promised land which was inherited from his fathers to be broken up and pass into strange hands (Nu 36 1 ff.). These interests could be better conserved when the knowledge of the parents regarding the prospective wife of the son was determinative rather than the irresponsible inclination of the son himself. The ultimate ground for this law was, without doubt, the complete, unlimited authority which a father possessed over the members of his own family.

2. Marriage Negotiations: The Wedding.

The second transaction preparatory to the completion of the marriage contract related to the determination of the price through which the bridegroom acquired his prospective bride from her father. This was arranged between the parents (or their representatives) of the young people and was called the mōhar (dowry, Gn 34 12; Ex 22 16; I S 18 25, still called mahr by the natives of Palestine). Its amount, also its kind, differed according to the position and desirability of the bride: when David declared that he was without the means to procure the mōhar for a king's daughter, Saul fixed upon two hundred foreskins of slain Philistines as the price (I S 18 20-27); and in order to show the ardent character of Shechem's love, the narrator of Gn 34 11 f. represents him as declaring himself ready to meet any conditions (cf. also the case of Jacob, Gn 29 15 ff., and of Othniel, Jos 15 16 f.).

From a comparison of Ex 22 15 and Dt 22 28 f. it may be inferred that the average price paid for a bride to her father was 50 shekels (so also Cod. Ham. 138 f.). It was always understood in such cases that the father gave over to the bridegroom the bride as an inviolate virgin; for the Law (Dt 22 20 f.) prescribed that if this was found not to be the case the bride was to be publicly stoned. It is true that in Israel young women were sold in marriage who were no longer virgins; but in such cases the price was reduced. Thus, it appears, Hos 3 2 may be taken as indicating that 30 shekels was the usual price of a slave (cf. Ex 21 32). The same passage shows also that there were various ways of making the payment, these being probably so arranged for beforehand. The bridegroom paid over the contract price to the father of the bride or his representative, as is evident from such passages as Gn 29 18, 28; I S 18 27; Gn 34 11 f.; Dt 22 29 (so also Cod. Ham.). The same custom holds to-day among the inhabitants of Palestine. Custom did not allow the father to do with the mōhar as he pleased. The bride still had the right to expect of the father that he would devote a part of it to her, or at least to her benefit. Only in this way can the dissatisfaction of the daughters of Laban be explained over the fact that he, as a genuine miser, had used the gain he secured through Jacob's service exclusively for himself (Gn 31 15). It is not contradictory to this that at their marriage he had given to Leah and Rachel each a slave as a handmaid (29 24, 29), for there are other references to a gift (berākhāh) which a father might give his daughter at the time of her marriage (Jos 15 18 f.). All such gifts are not to be understood as the dowry which the woman brought to her marriage, but they ever remained as the individual property of the wife. It is in the post-exilic times that we first hear of an inheritance brought by daughters from their parental estate to their husbands (To 8 12; Sir 25 22) as also of inheritances of daughters in general (Nu chs. 27, 36). As distinct from the mōhar we are also to consider those presents of all kinds which the bridegroom gave the bride before the marriage (Gn 24 53, 34 12) which are expressly distinguished from the mōhar by being termed mattān (cf. Cod. Ham. 159 f.). These were the private property of the bride and could be viewed as an assurance that the marriage price would be paid. It was only through the actual payment of the mōhar that the young man came to acquire any authority or claim upon the prospective wife. Consequently, the Hebrew expression 'ērēs (espoused II S 3 14; Hos 2 21; Dt 20 7) is to be understood as something different from 'to be betrothed to one.' The bride was thereby designated as one upon whom no longer the father but another had the claim (me'ōrāsāh, Ex 22 15; Dt 22 23). Whoever violated such a (prospective) bride was liable to the same punishment as the adulterer (Dt 22 23-27; so also Cod. Ham. 130). On the other hand, whoever violated a virgin who was still free had to pay her father the mōhar and marry the woman (Ex 22 15; Dt 22 28 f.).

The marriage was completed by the bride being led from the house of her parents into the house of the bridegroom or that of his parents. This transaction, the espousal proper (Song 3 11), signified not only that now the father had released the bride from his authority and handed her over to the control of her future husband (cf. To 7 12), but also that the bride had now entered into the family or clan of her husband (Ps 45 10). Nowhere do we find any mention of any covenant or formalities of a religio-juridical sort, as an appeal to God or the like. This is easily understood if one but keeps in mind that marriage was not considered as going beyond the domain of individual law. What we find in Mal 2 14 has to do only with the mode of expression chosen by the prophet, and the case of Ru 4 11 f. is particular, not general. The Cod. Ham. (128) holds that a marriage contract was necessary for the genuineness of a marriage, but the oldest Israelite notices say nothing of this. In To 7 15 we find the first mention of such a custom, in order to set forth the pious care and wise forethought of Raguel. Unfortunately, we do not possess a complete description of the procedure at a wedding. Only a few details are occasionally mentioned: the elaborately clothed bridegroom (Is 61 10), surrounded by his friends, υἱοὶ τοῦ νυμφῶνος, sons of the bridechamber (Mt 9 15; cf. Jg 14 11), betook himself toward evening (Mt 25 1 ff.) to the house of the bride. She was then led thence, veiled (Gn 29 23, 25, 24 65), and decked with rich ornaments (Jer 2 32; Is 49 18), surrounded by her friends (Ps 45 14), accompanied by music and song, with lights (Mt 25 1 ff.), to the house of the parents of the bridegroom, into the bridechamber (To 7 15 ff.). Now began the wedding "week" (Gn 29 27 f.; Jg 14 12; doubled in To 8 18), participated in by those who were bid, which was filled with eating and drinking, joking, singing, and dancing, the guests being clothed in wedding-garments. J. G. Wetzstein in his essay, Die syrische Dreschtafel (Zeitschr. für Ethnologie, 1873, pp. 270–302), has made a collection of the marriage usages and marriage songs of the modern peasants east of the Jordan and of Lebanon, and in comparison therewith has recognized the Song of Solomon as a collection of wedding-songs. K. Budde has carefully worked out this conception in The New World, March, 1894. According to this theory, we have in the Song of Solomon a small collection of such songs as were sung by the youth in the neighborhood of Jerusalem at wedding-feasts. In these the friends of the bridegroom (thirty in Jg 14 11; sixty in Song 3 7) played the chief part, their leader being termed in Jn 3 29 ὁ φίλος τοῦ νυμφίου, the friend of the bridegroom.

In the O T there are also found cases in which the husband enters the family or clan of the wife. So Jacob, who indeed later, with the consent of his wives, severed his connection with Laban, had good ground to fear that Laban might take away his wives from him (Gn 31 14-16, 31). Further, we find in Nu 27 1-11 the regulation that any one who married an heiress did so in order that the name of the father might not disappear from his family (ver. 4). And in To 10 7-10 the question comes up for special discussion whether the young Tobias should remain with Raguel or should return with his wife to his father. Here also belongs, in a certain sense, the case of Samson's marriage (Jg ch. 14 f.), which was so arranged that Samson's wife remained in the house of her parents and was visited by Samson only from time to time (cf. § 8, below). In all such cases the bride was not brought to the parental house of the bridegroom, and the joyous wedding-week was held in the house of her parents.

3. Polygamy.

Israelitic marriages were regularly polygamous, in remarkable distinction from the regulations of the Cod. Ham., which holds fast to monogamy as fundamental. According to the terms noted in § 2, an Israelite could marry as many wives as his means would allow, consequently the rich, and especially princes, are mentioned as having a large number (cf. the case of Gideon, Jg 8 30; of David, II S 3 2-5, 5 13; and of Solomon, I K 11 1-4). Poor people contented themselves with one wife, although that cases were not rare in which a man had two wives is evident from the fact that the law in Dt 21 15-17 deals particularly with such cases. Theoretically, all these wives stood on an equal footing among themselves and with reference to their husband. Actually, however, the relationship was generally different. Barrenness, loss of youthful charms, or a blemish of some sort not only easily robbed a wife of the love of her husband, but also drew upon her ridicule and abuse on the part of the other wife who was still able to bind the husband to herself. Consequently, the Law calls the one sᵉnū'āh (i.e., 'set aside,' 'neglected'), the other 'ăhūbhāh (i.e., 'the loved,' 'cared for') (Dt 21 15-17), both expressions being from the view-point of the husband. How such wives were accustomed to treat each other is expressed in the term tsārāh, that is, 'enemy,' 'adversary,' with which Peninnah, the rival wife of Hannah, is designated from the view-point of the latter, in I S 1 6. Alongside of these legitimate wives the O T also recognizes concubines (Heb. pillagᵉshīm) (cf. Gr. παλλακίς, and the Arab. belḳīs), that is, female slaves (handmaids, maid-servants) who belonged to the husband and were subject to his authority (II S 15 16, 16 21 f.), or were the property of his wives, and had been given over by these to the husband (e.g., on account of their own childlessness) and yet continued to be under the authority of the respective wives so that these remained their mistresses (gᵉbhīrāh, Gn 16 4) and could at any time reduce them again to the position of slaves (Gn 16 6). So, e.g., Bilhah, the female slave of Rachel (Gn 29 29), was made the concubine of Jacob (35 22). Such concubines could either belong to another people or be Israelites. With the former the law of Dt 21 10-14 is concerned, with the latter that of Ex 21 7-11 (cf. Dt 15 12-18; Jer 34 8 ff.).

Between the prescriptions regarding adultery in the case of men and those in the case of women there were marked differences. For men they were lax, for women, strict. The prohibition of the Seventh Commandment (Ex 20 14; Dt 5 17) is indeed general; but it leaves open the question of what constitutes adultery for a man and what for a woman. The rigidity of the prescriptions relating to the virginity of the woman who was sought in marriage (Dt 22 13-21, 23 ff.; cf. § 2, above) shows that a chaste life on the part of a woman before marriage was to be the rule. And since the woman was obtained by the man as his wife under fixed regulations, it is easily understood that absolute fidelity was to be expected of her. If she were convicted of guilty conduct, in earlier times she was burned (Gn 38 24), in later times she was brought out naked (Hos 2 5) before the assembled people of the locality and by them stoned to death (Ezk 16 38-40, 23 45-47; cf. Dt 22 20 f.; Jn 8 5). Presumably, the same punishment was meted out to the man who had seduced the wife of his neighbor (Dt 22 22; Lv 20 10). That in other cases, not made public, the private vengeance of the injured husband was to be feared is evident from Pr 6 34. On the other hand, intercourse with the concubine of another was not viewed as adultery, but probably only as injury to his property (Lv 19 20). That wives were jealously watched by their husbands is evident, not only from the provisions of Dt 22 13-19, but also from the law regarding the drinking of the bitter curse-water ("water of jealousy," Nu 5 11-31), whereby the guilt or innocence of the suspected wife was supposed to be established. Even if this law belongs to the latest strata of the Pentateuch, it certainly deals with an ancient custom, traces of which are also to be found among other peoples. To the husband was granted much more liberty. Though he also was forbidden to commit adultery with another man's wife, he was allowed to increase the number of his own wives and concubines, according to his desires and means, and also to have intercourse with women outside of his own house, provided only that these were not already bound by a betrothal or by a completed marriage. In case he violated a still free virgin, he was dealt with according to the law in Ex 22 15, Dt 22 28 f. What a wife was entitled to demand from a husband is told in Ex 21 10. We nowhere read anything to the effect that he was forbidden extramarital intercourse with other women. There was abundant opportunity for this not only in pre-Israelitic Canaan, but also after the Conquest. Harlots (q.v.), zōnāh, zōnōth (πόρνη, I Co 6 15) were to be found not only in the cities (Is 23 15 f.; Pr 7 6-23), but also in the country districts (Gn 38 15). The expression nokhriyyāh ('foreigner') for "harlot" (Pr 2 16, 5 20, 6 24, 7 5, 23 27) implies that this practise was carried on in Israel originally by foreign women. Married women sometimes made a long absence of their husbands from home the occasion of having dealings with other men (Pr 7 18-20). The house of a harlot was a sort of inn where any one, even an enemy of the land, might stop (Jos 2 1 ff.).

4. Adultery and Fornication.

In particular, that characteristic of the Caananite cultus whereby men and women yielded themselves at sanctuaries, in honor of the deity, was a great incentive to unchastity. Such persons (masc. qᵉdhēshīm, fem. qᵉdhēshōth, i.e., 'dedicated to deity,' hence not permitted to marry) were to be found at the sanctuaries of J″, as is evident not only from Am 2 7, Hos 4 13 f., but also from the measures of kings Asa and Jehoshaphat of Judah (I K 15 12, 22 46) and the prohibition in Dt 23 18. Between such 'holy' women and harlots there was often very little difference (cf. Gn 38 12-18). Such uncleanness at the sanctuaries was always denounced as contrary to the religion of J″. To have intercourse with harlots was, even in ancient Israel, an offensive matter. The narrative in Gn ch. 38 attempts to excuse the conduct of Judah (vs. 12-15, 20-23). The Book of Proverbs is fully cognizant of the dangers of such conduct and emphatically warns against it (5 3 ff., 6 20 ff., 7 4 ff., 22 14, 23 27 f., 29 3 f., 30 20). The demands of Jesus and the Apostles are remarkable not only for their incisiveness, but above all for their new religious basis (Mt 5 27-32; I Co 6 9-20; Eph 5 3-5; Col 3 5-8; Tit 2 2-6; Ja 4 4-8).

In accordance with the fundamental principles involved in the contraction of a marriage (cf. § 2, above), the husband alone had the right to dissolve the marriage, and since in such a case he did not receive back the mōhar paid for the wife, so he also voluntarily renounced his right to his property when he sent away (Heb. shillaḥ, Gr. ἀπολύειν, Mt 5 32, 19 3) his wife. Probably the husband's right to drive (Heb. gārash, Lv 21 7) his wife out of the house was in ancient Israel unlimited, as it is to-day in Islam. The wife went back to her family, with whose wrath the husband, at least usually, had to reckon, and had the privilege of marrying again. But in case the husband was compelled by the wife's family to divorce her, and she was given to another man, the first husband had the right, as the case of David (II S 3 14-16) shows, to demand back his wife. Dt attempts to regulate such matters in the direction of making divorce more difficult. For example, it stipulates that the husband must give the wife a "bill of divorcement" (Heb. ṣēpher kᵉrīthūth, Dt 24 1; Jer 3 8; Is 50 1), and further that something immoral or unseemly must be the ground of the divorce (Heb. 'erwath dābhār, Dt 24 1), and, finally, that the divorced wife, in case she in the meantime has married another man, can not again become the wife of her first husband (Dt 24 1-4; cf. Jer 3 1). The expression 'erwath dābhār was indeed variously understood by the learned Jews. In the time of Christ the stricter school of Shammai took it to mean unchaste, shameless conduct on the part of the wife. The milder school of Hillel, on the other hand, understood it to signify some contrariness of disposition or fault on the part of the wife. The latter view, which was also approved by later rabbis, harmonizes well with the meaning of the lawgiver, who uses the expression in 23 15 in the broader sense (cf. also Cod. Ham. 141, 143).

5. Divorce.

There could be two cases, according to Dt, when a man lost the right to dismiss his wife: (1) When he had done her the injustice of wrongly charging that she entered the married state not as a virgin (Dt 22 13-19), and (2) when he was compelled to marry a virgin who, while yet unbetrothed, had been violated by him. Mal 2 10-16 goes beyond Dt when it denounces him as dealing "treacherously" who divorces "the wife of his youth." Nevertheless, the later times held to the regulation of Dt (cf. Mt 5 31 f., 19 3-12). The provisions of Cod. Ham. 134 ff. are more favorable to the wife.

6. Widowhood and the Levirate Marriage.

Throughout the O T widows appear as needing assistance. Their condition must, therefore, have been sad. Legally, they belonged to the private property of the husband (§ 2, above), and could, like this, be inherited. So Absalom played the rôle of the heir of his father David when he took possession of the concubines left behind in Jerusalem by David (II S 16 20-22; cf. 20 3). A similar meaning is implied in the conduct of Abner (II S 3 7 ff.), and in the demand of Adonijah (I K 2 13-22; cf. Gn 35 22). Furthermore, this was the ground of the custom that a son should marry his stepmother, which indeed is forbidden in Dt 22 30, 27 20; Lv 18 8, 20 11; but nevertheless was usual even down to the time of Ezekiel (Ezk 22 10). On the other hand, we find instances of widows living by themselves with their sons or other dependents (II K 4 1 ff., 8 1 ff.; cf. II S 14 5 ff.; Ru 1 6 ff.; also the case of the widow of Zarephath, I K 17 8 ff.). Such instances may be in part cases in which the widow sought to conserve the property of her husband for her minor sons. A widow herself had no right of inheritance to the property of her husband. There seems to have been no fixed regulation in ancient Israel concerning the care of widows, but, on the other hand, their defenseless position was used by many men as the occasion for advancing their own interests (II K 8 1 ff.; Is 10 2; Mic 2 9). The prophets came forward, therefore, as their champions (Is 1 17; Jer ch. 6). Dt provides that the gleanings of the field and the vineyards should be left for them (24 19, 21; cf. Ru 2 2), and includes them among those who should have a share in the tithes of the third year and be invited to take part in the sacrificial meals (14 28 f., 26 12, 16 11, 14). In later times (as earlier in the Cod. Ham. 171 f.) widows were better cared for. Tobias, e.g., received his full inheritance from Raguel only after the death of his mother-in-law (To 8 20).

The position of the childless widow was particularly sad, since even during the lifetime of her husband she usually enjoyed no consideration (I S 1 6 f.; Gn 16 4). In case a husband died without leaving behind a son even by one of his concubines, the ancient custom demanded that his surviving brother should marry the widow in order to preserve the name and inheritance of the dead. Then the first son born of this marriage was counted as the descendant and heir of the dead brother. This attempt to give to one already dead a son by means of the 'levirate marriage' (from levir, 'husband's brother') is evidently to be traced back to the prehistoric worship of ancestors which demanded that the worship due a father should be assured through his son after the father's death. For a widow this preserved a valuable right for which Tamar contended with the greatest cleverness against Judah (Gn ch. 38), who had promised her his third son. In Dt 25 5-10 this custom is sanctioned, and yet it is allowed to the brother-in-law to refuse to enter upon such a marriage. The custom therein prescribed of drawing off the shoe (Heb. hălūtsāh; cf. Ru 4 7) signified probably the renunciation of the inheritance of the brother (cf. the opposite in Ps 60 8). The attempt in Lv 18 16, 20 21 to forbid such marriages was not successful. In Mt 22 24 the usage of Dt ch. 25 is presupposed as in vogue and made the basis of the discussion. Since daughters, in case there were no sons, had the right of inheritance (Nu 27 1 ff.), the levirate marriage was probably limited to such cases in which the father had left behind no children at all. The later law (Nu 27 4) provided that the name of the father could be preserved in the family through the daughters (cf. § 2, above).

7. Prohibited Marriages.

Under this heading belong, in the first place, the mixed marriages, i.e., unions with Canaanite or other heathen peoples, which are forbidden in Dt 7 1-4, 23 4-7; Ex 34 15 f., because thereby the worship of other gods would be introduced into Israel. This prohibition marked a sharp distinction against the earlier customs which saw nothing irregular in marriage with the native population of Canaan. When, after the occupation of Canaan, the unity of the local community found place alongside of the tribal unity and in part supplanted it, it was impossible to avoid marriages between Israelites and Canaanites. Numerous passages show that this actually took place (Jg 3 5 f.; II S 11 3, 23 34; I K 7 14, etc.; Dt 21 10 ff.). The prohibition of Dt evidently found its reason in the religious or, more correctly, cultus view-point of the party of reform of those days (7th cent.). After the Exile it cost Nehemiah and Ezra anxious care to carry through the prescriptions of this law among the Jewish families in and about Jerusalem (Neh 13 23 ff.; Ezr ch. 9 f.; Mal 2 14, where 'ēsheth bᵉrīthēkh means 'your wife of the Jewish faith'). Furthermore, in Dt and in PC marriages with persons of the following degrees of relationship are forbidden: with the wife of a father (Dt 22 30, 27 20; Lv 18 8, 20 11); with one's own sister or step-sister (Dt 27 22; Lv 18 9, 11, 20 17); with the mother-in-law (Dt 27 23); with a niece (Lv 18 10); with an aunt on the father's or mother's side (Lv 18 12 f., 20 19); with the wife of the father's brother (Lv 18 14, 20 20); with a daughter-in-law (Lv 18 15, 20 12); with the wife of a brother (Lv 18 16, 20 21); with mother and daughter (or niece) at the same time (Lv 18 17, 20 14; cf. Dt 27 23); with two sisters at the same time (Lv 18 18). Such marriages were, however, in the earlier times not rare (cf. the cases of Abraham, Jacob, etc.; also Ezk 22 10 f., and § 6, above). The prohibition in regard to these marriages was probably worked out in connection with the opposition against Canaanite cults (cf. Lv 18 3, 24 ff.).

8. Historical Development in Reference to Marriage Customs.

The regulations concerning marriage were of the greatest importance to the Israelites, since the social organization of the people rested altogether upon the family. For clan and tribe were nothing else than expanded families. The head of a family was the master of all its branches; through the means of the family, custom and law were regulated. The family also was the primary cultus organization (I S 1 1 ff.; 20 6, 28 f.; Ex 13 8, 14; Dt 12 7, 12, 18, 16 11, 14). An Israelitic family was founded by the father, who wished to continue the existence of his clan. The father was the master of the wives and children. Of matriarchy only a few traces survived in Israelitic customs. One may compare the marriage of Samson (Jg ch. 14 f.; cf. § 2, above). Marriages between brother and sister (not of the same mother; cf. Gn 20 12; II S 13 13), as also marriages with a stepmother or a daughter-in-law (Ezk 22 10 f.), presuppose that the relationship was not reckoned according to the father.

Polygamy, which it is evident from Jos. (Ant. XVII, 1 2) was a prevalent custom, involved a lower status of woman, although her position in general was not so unfortunate as we might suppose. She was indeed purchased by the husband, and yet could not be sold by him as a slave, presupposing, of course, that she was herself not a slave (Ex 21 7-11; Dt 21 10-14). At the same time, a father could, in case of necessity, sell his still unmarried daughter as a slave. It was only on the basis of her union with a husband that she could become free after a six-year period of servitude (Ex 21 2 f.). Consequently, a woman materially bettered her condition through marriage. On the other hand, the women of antiquity, as is the case to-day in the Orient, sighed by reason of the hard labor which fell to them day by day in the villages, in caring for household affairs and the farms. Nevertheless, there was no lack in ancient Israel of clever and energetic women whose influence extended far beyond their own household (cf. Ex 15 20 f.; Jg 4 4 ff., 17 ff.; I S 25 14 f.; II S 14 1 ff.; II K 11 2 f., 22 14 ff.), a conclusive proof that in those days women had more liberty and stood on a much higher level than is the case to-day in Islam. The fact that the position of woman in Cod. Ham. is a high and responsible one speaks well, without doubt, for the advanced state of the ancient Babylonian civilization, and if we look for the same thing in vain in the O T, this is partly to be explained from the fact that Israel came in the first place out of the uncivilized desert, and in part also from the fact that the civilization of Canaan was on a lower level than that of Babylonia. At the same time, a finer appreciation of the significance of marriage and the worth of woman is evidenced in the later portions of the O T. It is sufficient here to refer to Gn 2 18, to the prophets who compared the union between Jehovah and Israel with marriage (Hos, Is, Jer, Ezk, etc.), to Pr 12 4, 19 14; Ps 128 3, and especially to the eulogistic "description of a worthy woman" (Pr 31 10-31). With this agrees also the purpose of the legislation, especially of Dt, which was to improve the condition of women. At the same time, the growing estimation of the worth of woman, the increasing individualizing of spiritual life, together with the deep horror of unbridled sexual license, led to the judgment that only lifelong monogamy with absolute prohibition of divorce corresponded to the Divine ideal of marriage (Mk 10 2-12; I Co 7 10 f.). On a lower level than the formulation of Jesus (Mk 10 5-9) is to be placed the judgment of Paul, who saw the ideal in absolute celibacy and considered marriage only as a lesser, although often wholesome, evil (I Co 7 1-7, 38; cf. I Ti 3 2, 12, 4 3-5, 5 9; Tit 1 6; Rev 14 4) than license.

The two passages into which RV introduces the word are both obscure; and the text, as reflected in ancient versions, is quite doubtful. But the functions of scribe and a military office (marshal) are often united in the same person (cf. sōphēr = "enumerator," "muster-officer"). A. C. Z.

MARS HILL. See AREOPAGUS.

MARTHA, mār'tha (Μάρθα = Aram. מָרְתָא, mārthā'), 'lady': The name occurs twice: (1) As that of a woman identified only as a resident of an unnamed village, as having a sister named Mary, and as "cumbered about much serving" and slow to understand and sympathize with her sister's more contemplative temperament (Lk 10 38-42); (2) as that of a sister of Mary of Bethany and of Lazarus whom Jesus raised from the dead (Jn 11 1 ff.). According to some the similarities between these two in character (cf. Jn 12 2, "M. served"), in relationship (each had a sister Mary), and in setting (both lived in villages), should lead to their identification. On the contrary, others are impressed by the differences which would place the two accounts in different parts of the ministry of Jesus and in different geographical locations, and assume that there were two women of the name. A. C. Z.

MARTYR: The original meaning and use of the word μάρτυς were legal, i.e., 'witness' (cf. Mt 18 16). It is also used in the sense of 'spectator' (cf. Herod. 12 1). In the N T it is used chiefly of those who testify what they have seen and heard concerning Jesus (cf. Ac 1 8). Since loyalty in this testimony often incurred violent treatment (cf. Rev 17 6), the word came ultimately to mean one who was put to death for the sake of the gospel. J. M. T.

MARY (Μαρία, Μαριάμ, the Gr. form of the Heb. miryām, or maryām, Miriam EV): The name of at least six women in the N T. In the O T "Miriam" occurs only as the name of the sister of Moses (Ex 15 20; Nu 12 1; Mic 6 4) and of the daughter (or son?) of Jether (I Ch 4 17). The frequency of its Greek equivalent in the N T can be easily accounted for as a result of the popularity of "Mariamme" (Μαριάμμη, and less correctly "Mariamne" Μαριάμνη), the granddaughter of Hyrcanus II, the last Hasmonean ruler of the Jews and the favorite wife of Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. XIV, 12 1; BJ, XII, 1 3). 1. Mary the mother of Jesus. See MARY, THE VIRGIN.

2. Mary Magdalene.—Among the women who accompanied Jesus and the Twelve on the tour through Galilee one named Mary bore the surname Magdalene, Μαγδαληνή, 'of Magadan' q.v. (but cf.

Schmiedel in EB, art. Mary, § 26. For variant explanations of the surname cf. also Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Mt 27 56). This Mary is singled out as one from whom Jesus had cast out "seven demons" (Lk 8 2; Mk 16 9). As demonic possession in those days was assumed to be the general cause of ailments and disorders, this means that she was cured of a serious disability; but exactly what this was is disputed. According to some, the ailment was mainly moral aberration, possibly complicated with physical and mental disease. Those who thus explain the case allege that Jewish usage confused certain forms of immorality with demonic possession (cf. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Lk 8 2; Jer. Vit. Hil. Erem.; the latter specifically names possession by an amoris dæmon). If this be the true description of the evil from which Jesus delivered Mary, it becomes at once extremely probable that she is the same as the "sinner" who anointed His feet at the house of Simon the Pharisee (Lk 7 36 ff.). Some have gone further and identified her with Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus of Bethany (cf. David Smith, In the Days of His Flesh, 1905, pp. 206–211). Of this Mary, too, it is said that she "anointed the Lord with ointment and wiped His feet with her hair." The identification of Mary Magdalene, however, with Mary of Bethany upon this ground is quite precarious. Anointing, though not frequently mentioned, when spoken of at all, is assumed to be a not unusual act of courtesy, and could easily have occurred twice during the career of a personage such as Jesus Christ. All that is known otherwise of Mary of Bethany is inconsistent with her being the sinful woman of Simon's banquet. Whether Mary Magdalene was the same as that sinful woman must depend on the nature of her aberration and cure. If this was moral, the two designations may refer to the same person; if only mental, they must belong to different individuals. The reasons for identifying the two which are derived from the alleged linguistic usage (as given by Lightfoot, cited above) lose their force when closely scrutinized; and apart from these reasons there is no ground for the view that Mary Magdalene was the "sinner" of Lk 7 36 ff. The nature of the ailment described as possession by "seven demons" must be largely a matter of speculation and conjecture. The number itself may be taken in a twofold sense. It may refer to the unusual violence of the attacks of the malady, making the cure a permanent source of the greatest relief and gratitude. But the "seven demons" may also be conceived as possessing the sufferer not simultaneously but successively. It is not unusual after a mental ailment has been cured by suggestion for it to return. This recurrence may have been counted as a second demon, and each subsequent lapse following a temporary cure an additional one. This ingenious suggestion, made by Schmiedel (EB, art. Gospels, § 144), would imply that the cure of Mary by Jesus consisted not in one permanent act but in many successive treatments, a view which, to say the least, is not the prima facie meaning of the Gospel narrative. Mary's discipleship seems to belong to the latter part of Jesus' ministry. Apart from Lk 8 2, she appears by name only in the story of the Passion and Resurrection (Mt 27 56, 28 1, and ||). But even if late, her attachment to Jesus was none the less strong, as is evidenced by the fact that she was found visiting His tomb, apparently alone, at the earliest opportunity offered after His burial (Jn 20 1). The Magdalene of tradition and art is almost altogether a creature of the imagination. She derives her name from Mary of Magdala, her interest as a penitent from the assumed identity of this Mary with the sinful woman of Lk 7 36, and the remainder of the creation is pure fancy.

3. Mary the Mother of James and Joses, Wife of Clopas.—Another Mary, "the mother of James and Joses," is named in the Synoptics (Mt 27 56, 61; cf. Mk 15 40) as one of those who witnessed the Crucifixion. In Mt 28 1 this same Mary is called "the other Mary." When the parallels Mk 16 1 and Lk 24 10 are brought into comparison, no doubt is left that "the other Mary" is "the mother of James and Joses." In the Johannine report of the Crucifixion, however, the place of the mother of James and Joses in the list of the woman who witnessed the Crucifixion is occupied by "Mary the wife of Clopas" (Jn 19 25). At first sight this identification also appears to be beyond doubt, but considerable difficulty is experienced on account of the confused data regarding Clopas. This name is certainly not to be identified with Cleopas in Lk 24 18. It may be regarded as the same as Alphæus, since both represent the same Aramaic Halphay (cf. Lightfoot, Gal. p. 256; but, per contra, cf. Schmiedel in EB, art. Clopas). In such a case James "the Less" (Mk 15 40) must have been like Matthew (Levi) a son of Alphæus, and, as patristic tradition has it, a "tax-collector" (cf. Chrysost. Hom. in Matt. 23, "two tax-collectors, Matthew and James"). If true, this identification would place Mary's interest in Jesus in a clearer light. But Clopas may be altogether independent of any one of the persons mentioned in the Synoptic narrative. If so, he was either the father or the grandfather of James and Joses, the former if Mary was the wife, the latter if she was the daughter, of Clopas. But neither of these methods of identifying the mother of James and Joses with the Mary of Clopas is convincing, and it is possible to suppose, since the name is common enough otherwise, that the author of the Fourth Gospel may have had some other Mary in mind regarding whom nothing else is known. (See BRETHREN OF THE LORD.)

4. Mary of Bethany.—Mary, the sister of Martha, appears in Lk 10 38-42 as an eager listener at the feet of Jesus. The residence of the two sisters is in this passage given as "a certain village." In Jn ch. 11 f. Martha and Mary again appear as the friends and hosts of Jesus, but this time more definitely located at Bethany. The characterization of the two sisters, as well as their names, is the same as in the Lucan story, and whatever hesitancy may exist about identifying the household of the "certain village" with that of Bethany is altogether overbalanced by these obviously common characteristics. Mary of Bethany takes a place among the disciples of Jesus as a distinct type of the mystic and contemplative believer. The view that she was the same person as Mary Magdalene, or the "sinner" of Lk 7 37, is not supported by sufficient evidence.

5. Mary the Mother of Mark.—"Mary the mother of John whose surname is Mark" (Ac 12 12) was the owner of the house in which the disciples assembled for prayer when Herod put James to death and cast Peter into prison. The latter upon his deliverance from prison immediately hastened to this meeting-place. Besides these details no further information is given of her in the N T. It is safe to infer, however, that she was a widow, otherwise her husband's name must have stood as that of the owner of the house. She also must have occupied a prominent place in the Christian community. The fact that Barnabas was a "cousin" (Col 4 10, "sister's son" AV) of Mark shows her to have been related to Barnabas. In later Christian literature her house is located on Mt. Zion (the SW hill, according to later theory). The house also is said to have served as the meeting-place of Christ and the disciples at the time of the Last Supper, of the Ascension, and of Pentecost. See JERUSALEM, § 42.

6. Mary the Friend of Paul.—The "Mary" who bestowed much labor on the Roman Christians ("you," Ro 16 6, "us" AV) was apparently an active Christian in Rome. About her life and services, however, nothing more is known than is given in this brief salutation by Paul. The condition of the text leaves it somewhat uncertain whether the services for which she is singled out were rendered to Paul (εἰς ἡμᾶς), among the Romans (ἐν ὑμῖν) or to the Romans (εἰς ὑμᾶς). A. C. Z.

MARY, THE VIRGIN: In the N T the Virgin Mary is represented as a descendant of the house of David (Lk 1 27; Ro 1 3; but these may be references to the genealogy of Joseph). Her kinswoman Elisabeth, however (Lk 1 36), was "of the daughters of Aaron" (Lk 1 5). But this relationship, too, may have been established some generations earlier by marriage. In the evangelic narratives, Mary appears quite rarely. Of her personal history before her betrothal to Joseph the N T gives no hint. In the accounts of the birth of Jesus, she naturally stands in the foreground (Mt 1 18, 20; Lk 1 27 ff., 2 5 ff.), and in general these accounts are so framed as to harmonize with the extraordinary character of the circumstances recorded. They throw a poetic halo about the person of Mary as well as about the mystery of the Nativity. In the story of the life and work of Jesus, however, the personality of His mother is not put into a prominent place. His words as a child of twelve in the Temple (Lk 2 49) are just as full of mystery for her as they are for Joseph. When she is again mentioned (though this time the report is found in the characteristically different account of the Fourth Gospel, Jn 2 1-12) she seems to have some intimation of His possessing more than natural powers. Yet there is something about her notion, at least, as to the use of these powers that stands in need of correction. But in the matter of the failure of His brothers to believe in Jesus (Jn 7 5), the evidence, though negative, indicates that Mary was more sympathetic and expectant in her attitude than they. Jesus, on His part, is represented as placing more stress on the spiritual relationship to Him involved in obedience to His Father's will than on relationships of a merely earthly and physical character (Mt 12 46-50). Yet at His crucifixion, which Mary witnessed in a womanly and motherly spirit, Jesus also showed His appreciation of the earthly filial relation through the committal of His mother to the care of the beloved disciple (Jn 19 25-27). After the resurrection and ascension of Jesus, Mary appears as a devout member of the first company of believers (Ac 1 14), but without any discernible preeminence among them. In these few and simple allusions to her the N T gives in a restrained and chastely rational picture all the authentic materials we possess regarding Mary.

1. Mary as Represented in the N T.

Soon after the close of the Apostolic Age, the process began of embellishing and expanding these authentic data. The result is shown best in the Protevangelium Jacobi (cf. Tischendorff, *Ev. Apocr.*² 1876), although individual traces of this mythologizing tendency are to be found as early as Justin Martyr and Tertullian. According to the document named, the parents of Mary were Joachim and Anna, a childless pair, who like Hannah (I S ch. 1) vowed that in case their prayer for offspring should be answered, they would consecrate the child to a life of service in the Temple. Mary was born and Anna at once placed her under the care of pure virgins. One year later, her father secured her special consecration by priests with the accompaniment of a sacrificial banquet. At the end of her third year, she was led in a procession of torch-bearers to the Sanctuary, and there "grew like a dove which builds her nest in the Temple." Her nourishment came through the hands of angels. When she reached the age of twelve, it became necessary that she should be removed from the Temple. The question how to accomplish this was answered by an angel directing that all the widowers should be assembled together into the presence of the high priest Zachariah and that each should bring a staff in his hand. The high priest took the staves into the Holy Place, where he offered his prayer. Coming out thence, as he returned them to their owners a dove flew out of the staff of Joseph, the carpenter of Nazareth, and alighted on his head. This was recognized as the sign of Joseph's being chosen to take charge of Mary (not as his wedded wife but as a ward entrusted by the Temple officials to his care). Presently it became necessary to weave a new curtain (veil) for the Temple. Seven virgins were appointed to do this work, and Mary was added to the number. It was during the making of the curtain that the angel of the annunciation appeared to her (as in Lk ch. 1). Mary, being found pregnant, was called with Joseph before the Sanhedrin, and at the instigation of the learned Rabbi Hannas, both she and Joseph were made to undergo the ordeal of "bitter water" as prescribed in Nu 5 18 ff. This they stood, proving their innocence. On the way to Bethlehem (as in Lk 2 4), the time for the birth of her child having arrived, she took refuge in a cave. The universe, visible and invisible, lapsed into a profound silence of expectation. Joseph hastened to bring a midwife, but found the cave overshadowed by a cloud which presently lifted, revealing a great light and the infant Jesus was seen resting on the bosom of His mother. When Salome was informed by the midwife of the wonder of a virgin giving birth to a child, she disbelieved and was punished with the burning of her hand; but upon taking the child into her arms as directed by an angel, she was at once healed. From this point onward the apocryphal narrative coalesces with the canonical, recounting the visit of the magi, the murder of the children at Bethlehem, and other details, with the exception that instead of representing Jesus as saved from Herod's murderous intentions by flight into Egypt, it states that He was taken into a cleft in the mountain and there concealed until the danger was past.

Another class of additions to and embellishments of the biography of Mary are those which relate the manner of her leaving the earthly life. These are of a somewhat later origin. Two apocryphal Greek writings now extant in Latin translations (De Transitu Mariæ) of the end of the fourth or the beginning of the fifth century contain the legend of the transportation of the soul of the Virgin to heaven by Christ and His angels, followed subsequently by the transportation also of her body in a cloud. In the earlier centuries it was more commonly believed, upon the basis of Lk 2 35, that she had suffered martyrdom. Epiphanius is uncertain as to whether or not Mary died and was buried. The current tradition finally settled down to the negative of this question.

3. Mary, the Virgin.

The title "Virgin" has been attached to the name of Mary in all Christian literature because of the firm belief that the birth narratives (Mt 1 18-25; Lk 1 26-2 21) record exact historical facts. The position of traditional Christianity on this point was in ancient times met by Jews and opponents of Christianity among the heathen (Celsus) with the allegation that Jesus was the unlawful son of Mary and Panderas (Πανθήρ, Πανθήρας, corrupted from παρθένος, 'virgin,' the distinctive title of Mary among Christians). The Talmud (cf. Laible's essay, Jesus Christus im Talmud, in Schriften des Institutum Judaicum in Berlin, 1891, pp. 9–39), in addition, represents Mary as a professional braider of women's hair, a calling which was not considered very reputable. The animus of all this, however, is too transparent to admit of its being allowed weight as historical evidence. In modern times, doubts regarding the virgin birth have been based on historical-critical and scientific-philosophical grounds. (1) The birth narratives in Mt and Lk, the only portions in which explicit mention of the virgin birth is made, are said not to belong to the earliest tradition of the life and work of Jesus. (2) The idea of the virgin birth was, it is alleged, first deduced from a misinterpretation of Is 7 14, and then constructed into a historical statement and inserted in the evangelic narrative. (3) The notion of virgin birth for extraordinary men is quite common among the peoples of the earth, even those most developed intellectually (Hindus, Greeks, etc.), and was imported into the story of Jesus. (4) The notion is an outcome in the historical sphere of the dogma of the essential divinity of Jesus. Per contra, the defense of the traditional conception is conducted partly upon the presumptive truth of the evangelic narrative, whose early date and genuineness are strenuously contended for, partly upon the a priori fitness of such an earthly origin for the Savior of mankind, and partly upon the harmony between it and the church doctrine of Christ's person and work. (For a full discussion, see Saltau, Birth of Jesus Christ, 1903; Lobstein, Virgin Birth of Christ, 1903; Sweet, The Birth and Infancy of Jesus Christ, 1906; Orr, The Virgin Birth of Christ, 1907.) Historically, the question whether Mary is the sole human parent of Jesus must stand or fall with the acceptance or rejection of the evangelic infancy-narratives as absolutely credible testimony, issuing from Mary herself. In the absence of strong grounds for their rejection, their general apparent sanity, their freedom from objectionable features on a subject of such delicacy, and the early and implicit credit given them in the Christian community entitle these narratives to be believed as true accounts of fact.

4. Mary in Ecclesiastical Literature and Dogma.

The thought of the virginity of Mary at the time of the birth of Jesus has led to further developments. These, however, for the most part possess a historical rather than a Biblical interest. They are traceable to diverse motives. The predominance of the ascetic idea and the belief in the superior merit inherent in the celibate and virgin state led to the notion that the mother of Jesus must be not only a virgin before and in the process of giving birth to her Divine Son, but must have remained a virgin ever afterward (perpetual virginity). Accordingly, Jesus could have had no brothers or sisters in the strict and true sense of the terms. Hence to explain the occurrence of the phrase "brethren of the Lord" it was proposed to construe it as meaning either cousins, or children of Joseph by a previous marriage (the Hieronymian and Epiphanian views; see BRETHREN OF THE LORD). Another interest centering about the personality of Mary was the dogmatic one of the sinlessness of Jesus. If she was the mother of the sinless nature of Jesus she must herself have somehow been purged of original sin. The idea legitimately worked out led, though only as late as the middle of the 19th cent., to the dogma of the immaculate conception of Mary. Still another interest finds its starting-point in the respect that Mary had earned as the mother of the Savior of mankind. In the Biblical narrative, this natural deference to her as a privileged character appears in the addresses of the angel and of Elisabeth (Lk 1 28, 42). From natural felicitation to veneration and from veneration to adoration, first akin to that due to God and afterward identical with it, were inevitable steps, though many generations passed before the last one was taken. The controversy whether Mary should be called the "mother of God," involving the story of Nestorianism with all its sequels, leads to subjects which are altogether outside the field of Biblical interest even in its broadest and most indirect associations.

MATTATHA, mat'a-tha (Ματταθά): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 31). E. E. N.

MATTATHIAS, mat"a-thai'as (Ματταθίας, Heb. mattithya, 'gift of J"'): This name, common in the later O T times, occurs also in the Maccabæan period. 1. A priest in Modein, the father of the five Maccabæan brothers (I Mac 2 1). See MACCABEES, THE. 2. One of the captains in the army of Jonathan Maccabæus (I Mac 11 70). 3. A son of Simon the high priest (I Mac 16 14-16). 4. An envoy sent by Nicanor to Judas Maccabæus (II Mac 14 19). 5, 6. The name is twice found in Luke's genealogical table. In 3 25 M. the son of Amos, the seventh removed from Joseph, and in 3 26 the son of Semein, the thirteenth from Joseph. J. M. T.

MATTENAI, mat"ę-nê'ai (מַתְּנַי, mattənāy): 1. One of the "sons of Hashum" (Ezr 10 33). 2. One of the "sons of Bani" (Ezr 10 37). 3. A priest (Neh 12 19). E. E. N.

MATTHAN, mat'than (Ματθάν): An ancestor of Joseph (Mt 1 15). E. E. N.

MATTHAT, mat'that (Ματθάτ and Μαθθάτ): The name of two ancestors of Jesus (Lk 3 24, 29). E. E. N.

MATTHEW, math'iū (Μαθθαῖος): One of the Apostles. His name is given in all the lists (Mk 3 18; Mt 10 3; Lk 6 15; Ac 1 13); in two of them (Mk and Ac) he is paired with Bartholomew and in the other two (Mt and Lk) with Thomas. Outside of this record of Apostolic appointment he is mentioned but once in the Gospel history, viz., in connection with his call by Jesus to His discipleship (Mk 2 13 f.; Mt 9 9; Lk 5 27), where his name is given by Mk and Lk as Levi, Mk adding his father's name Alphæus, and implying Capernaum as his home (cf. Mk 2 1 with ver. 13 f.).

From the record of his call we learn that he was one of those Jews whose nationalism was weak enough to allow him to enter the execrated service of tax-gathering, although this service was carried on apparently with less friction in the tetrarchy of Antipas than it was in the rest of Palestine. M. was a customs-officer, and it was while he was seated at his "place of toll" on the customs-route between Damascus and the Mediterranean, which passed outside of Capernaum along the Sea of Galilee, that Jesus called him to His following.

This call was evidently intended by Jesus as a further object-lesson to the scribes and Pharisees, before whom He had just healed the paralytic in proof of His right to forgive sins without resort to ceremonialism; for along with all his class M. was unchurched by the religious leaders of the people, so that no more practical evidence of Jesus' independence of ceremonialism could be given than to call M. to His discipleship. It is evident that before his call M. must have been familiar with Jesus and His gospel message and mission, since the promptness of his response implied an intelligent understanding of what was involved in the call. The "great feast" which, following his call, M. made to his new Master (Lk 5 29 ff.) was, therefore, of special significance; for it was given not only with an understanding of what his call involved for himself, but apparently with some idea of what its acceptance by Jesus involved for Himself. Its guests, apart from Jesus and His disciples, were made up mainly of M.'s fellow publicans and the general class of the "sinners" (i.e., the ceremonially outlawed) to which the publicans belonged, and the Pharisaic criticisms and Jesus' answering remarks were quite to be expected (Mt 9 10-13 and ‖s).

The first of the group of the so-called Synoptic Gospels (q.v.).

This Gospel, in common with the others, fails to name any one as its author, or even to hint, as some of the others do, at a more or less possible identification. Consequently, whatever knowledge is to be obtained as to its authorship and its historical relation to the events which it records must come from a critical study of its contents and a comparison of the results thus secured with the early traditions of the post-apostolic age.

1. Authorship and Historical Character.

(a) Contents.

Its contents are peculiarly arranged. After the preliminary history, comprising the genealogy (1 1-17) and the Nativity story (1 18–2 19) and a brief statement of the preaching of the Baptist (3 1-12), the record of Jesus' public ministry is introduced with an account of His induction into it through His baptism (3 13-17) and His temptation (4 1-11), and a statement of the beginning of His work in Galilee (4 12-25). This public ministry, while it discloses a certain geographical arrangement (5 1–15 20, covering His own country of Galilee, 15 21–17 21, the outside regions of Tyre and Sidon, 17 22–20 34, Galilee and the regions beyond the Jordan, and chs. 21–28 His final ministry in Jerusalem, with His Passion and Resurrection), nevertheless is presented in such a topical grouping of its teachings and its events as really to control the whole disposition of its material. There comes first:

A. The Galilean Ministry (5 1–15 20), consisting of
   - I. A group of representative discourses treating of the Messianic Kingdom (5 1–7 29); then
   - II. A group of representative miracles, typical of Messianic times—showing Jesus' popularity (8 1–9 34)—an alternation which is then repeated with
   - III. A group of representative discourses treating of the Messianic Kingdom—showing a growing opposition against Jesus (9 35–13 58), and
   - IV. A group of representative miracles, illustrating Messianic times (14 1-36)—followed by an apparently isolated discourse treating of the Messianic Kingdom (15 1-20). Then follows

B. The North Galilean Ministry (15 21–17 20), presented in
   - V. A group of miracles illustrating in outlook the future missions to the Gentiles (15 21-39), then
   - VI. A group of discourses treating of the rejection of Israel and announcing the coming Passion (ch. 16), and
   - VII. A group of miracles illustrating the glory of the Messiah and the weakness of the disciples' faith (17 1-20).

Then, after a statement of the return to Galilee, with a discourse in Capernaum (17 22–18 35), and of the final departure from Galilee into the regions beyond the Jordan (19 1 f.), with discourses on the way (19 3–20 34), is given

C. The Closing Ministry in Jerusalem—showing His final presentation of Himself as Messiah (chs. 21–25), which is arranged as follows: First,
   - VIII. The triumphal entry into the city, with its connected incidents and remarks (21 1-17), and then
   - IX. A group of representative discourses treating of the rejection of Israel (21 18–25 46).

Then there is given the concluding narrative of

D. The Passion and the Resurrection, closing with the Final World Commission to the Disciples (chs. 26–28).

(b) Nationality of Author.

It is obvious from even a cursory study of these contents that the author was a Jewish Christian. (1) The whole narrative is cast so in the Messianic mold that any other conclusion is quite impossible. (2) Further than this, a detailed study will show that Jesus is not only presented definitely as the Jewish Messiah (e.g., 1 1 [cf. 9 27, 12 23, 15 22, 21 9, 15], 1 16-18, 2 4, 27 17, 22 [cf. 2 2]), but His birth, the events of His life and His death are connected with O T specific predictions, and are displayed in a perfectly Jewish spirit as the necessary outcome of the Divinely prearranged plan (c.g.,1 22 f., 2 15, 17 f., 23, 4 14-16, 8 17, 12 17-21, 13 35, 21 4 f., 27 9). (3) Finally, there is a distinct tendency in the narrative to revert to theocratic terms and points of view (e.g., Palestine = "the land of Israel," 2 20 f.; Jerusalem = "the Holy City," 4 5, 27 53, "the city of the Great King," 5 35; God = "the God of Israel," 15 31 [which is different from Lk's LXX. citation 1 68]; the Apostles are sent to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel," 10 6, 15 24; Gentiles are held to be outside the immediate field of Christ's mission, 15 23, 26 f., and as people of outside life and religion, 5 47, 6 7, 32, 18 17); the permanency of the Law is emphasized, 5 17-19; while the Sermon on the Mount is brought into comparison with the teachings of the Pharisees and also with the O T, as it is not in Lk (cf. chs. 5–7 with Lk 6 20-49).

At the same time, it is evident that the author is not a narrow-minded Jew: (1) He not only recognizes, but is in perfect accord with the Gentile element in the Church—in spite of his recording (a) such an episode as that of the Syro-Phœnician woman in ch.

15, and (b) such commands as those to the disciples in ch. 10 (cf. 10 18, 12 18, 21, 21 43; cf. also Jesus' announcements of the nation's impending doom, 8 11 f., 21 43, 22 7, alone reported by Mt; also the incorporation into his narrative of the North Galilean ministry, 15 21–17 20, in which he is paralleled by Mk). (2) He unites with Luke in the Baptist's rebuke of the Jerusalem Jews, ch. 3. (3) He alone records Jesus' denunciation of the Pharisees and scribes, ch. 23; cf. also 15 13 f., 21 28-32. (4) He is the only one to give Jesus' commission to go into all the world and make disciples of all the nations (28 19).

(c) His Gentile Point of View.

As to the readers, it is clear from the foregoing §§ (1b) and (1c) that the Gospel was intended for Jewish Christians; while from the Gospel itself it is evident that they were, (1) not only outside of Palestine, (2) but without familiar knowledge of many Jewish things; otherwise it would not have been necessary to interpret (a) such Heb. words as "Immanuel" (1 23), or (b) such Aram. words as "Golgotha" (27 33), or (c) the sentence from the Ps (27 46), or to explain (d) such a custom as the Passover amnesty (27 15), or (e) such a belief as that of the Sadducees (22 23).

(d) Readers.

Obviously, the distinctive motive of the Gospel is to present Jesus as the consummation of theocratic history and the fulfilment of theocratic principles, and yet not as answering to the national Messianic hopes, but as standing out against them and disclosing the falseness of Judaism, in consequence of which the Kingdom of God was to be world-wide in its scope.

(e) Motive.

As to the time when the Gospel was written, little of a positive nature can be said. There are some things that would seem to indicate a late date (e.g., the use of the baptismal formula, 28 19 [though cf. the use of a similar formula in the benedictory conclusion of II Co]; the use of ἐκκλησία in an organized sense, 16 18 f., 18 17 [though cf. the same use of this term in the speeches of Stephen, Ac 7 38 and of Paul, Ac 20 28; also in the early Pauline Epistles to the Corinthians (I Co 7 17, 11 16, 14 33; II Co 11 28) and the still earlier Ep. of James (5 14)]; the employment of such an expression as "to this day," 27 8, 28 15). On the other hand, the naive unconsciousness of the nonfulfilment of the prophetic discourse of ch. 24 in its apparent reference to an immediate advent (cf. the distinctly different presentation in Lk chs. 19 and 21) would seem to betray a time of writing at least before the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A.D.). Such an earlier date would be in agreement with any evidence to the effect that this Gospel was known to Luke in the writing of his narrative about 80 A.D. (See Luke, Gospel of, § 3, and cf. in general on this point, Allen in Int. Crit. Com. p. lxxxiv f.)

(f) Time.

As to place of composition, it is impossible to make any statement of fact, and conjecture is fruitless.

(g) Place.

Such an induction of the internal evidence produces, of course, no proof of authorship, though the breadth of national view disclosed by the Gospel is in significant agreement with what we might naturally expect would be the liberal standpoint of such a man as the publican Matthew, whose name has been from the beginning assigned to this Gospel. A Jew who could become a tax-gatherer among his people is not likely to have been a narrow nationalist; while, as far as we know anything of his life and work, a Jewish Christian readership outside of Palestine and a time of writing before 70 A.D. would have been perfectly possible in his case.

(h) Results of Internal Evidence.

The question is whether such a possible authorship is confirmed by the testimony of external evidence. This evidence is, in brief, that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Heb. (Aram.). Our Canonical Gospel, however, not being a translation (see § 1 (k), below), this would seem to make it one of two things—either another Gospel by a later (non-apostolic) hand, or a second Gospel by the same (apostolic) hand. Against this second alternative there is no antecedent objection, though it is not a usual literary procedure. The first, however, is difficult to reconcile with the fact that external evidence itself holds our Canonical Gospel to be of apostolic origin.

(i) External Evidence.

This dilemma would seem to call for a more detailed study of what external evidence really means by its statement that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Heb. From such study emerge the following results: (1) An evident tradition from Papias to Jerome that Matthew wrote in Heb. a Gospel writing of some sort —called λόγια by Papias and εὐαγγέλιον from Irenæus onward—which tradition must have been based on some sort of a Gospel writing under Matthew's name existing at the earliest time. (2) An evident existence in the time of Origen and Jerome of an apocryphal Gospel in Heb. claiming to be Matthew's. (3) An evident tendency on the part of Jerome to identify the tradition and the apocryphal Gospel existing in his day.

Manifestly, these results necessitate the further question: Was this apocryphal Gospel the basis of the tradition from the beginning, or did a genuine Heb. Matthew writing exist at the first and then in some way disappear, leaving only this apocryphal Gospel to account for the tradition?

In answer to this question further investigation discloses the fact that the Apocryphal Gospel of Jerome's day was the Heb. Gospel under Matthew's name possessed by the sect of the Nazarenes and known as the Gospel According to the Hebrews. The existence of this Nazarene Gospel can be traced back to the 2d cent.—apparently to Papias' own time. Inasmuch, however, as its apocryphal character and consequently false claim to Matthean authorship was evidently not discovered till the day of Origen and Jerome, it may have constituted the basis for Papias' statement that Matthew composed τὰ λόγια in the Heb. dialect and that each one interpreted it as he was able (Ματθαῖος μὲν οὖν τὰ λόγια Ἑβραΐδι διαλέκτῳ συνεγράψατο, ἡρμήνευσε δ' αὐτὰ ὡς ἦν δυνατὸς ἕκαστος), upon which statement all subsequent tradition concerning this Heb. Matthew Gospel is based. This would, in fact, seem to be the necessary conclusion, in spite of the use by Papias of the term τὰ λόγια, instead of τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, were it not for facts which disclose themselves upon a more detailed investigation of the contents of the Canonical Mt, in comparison with the contents of Mk and Lk.

This investigation shows that the Canonical Mt had two main sources for its material. The first and more comprehensive was the Canon-

(j) Sources. ical Mk, whose contents have been practically reproduced in Mt's narrative, the phraseology often being altered to suit the author's linguistic taste (for display of alterations cf. Allen in Int. Crit. Com., pp. xix–xxxi, and Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, pp. 114 ff.), or his theological ideas (cf. Allen, pp. xxxi–xxxiv and lxxi–lxxix), the sequential order being largely broken to suit the author's topical plan of arrangement. The other source was a document apparently used in common with Lk, which lay behind the discourse material of their narratives (see LUKE, GOSPEL OF, § 3), and which must have contained, with more or less narrative setting, something approaching a collection of the sayings, or teachings, or discourses of Jesus. Such a document, whatever its specific character and make-up, lends significance to Papias' statement, since at once the reason for his usage of the term τὰ λόγια becomes apparent and his reference to a genuine Matthew Gospel-writing most probable.

Assuming some such document as referred to in Papias' statement, we can account for the confusion in the subsequent tradition; since having been more or less incorporated into the Canonical Gospel, this original writing would most likely have disappeared from use and knowledge, leaving as the only Heb. document under Matthew's name this apocryphal Gospel of the Nazarenes, which, known as it was only at second hand till later times, might be thought to be the writing to which Papias referred. This in its turn might account for the substitution by Irenæus of the term τὸ εὐαγγέλιον for Papias' τὰ λόγια and its retention from his day onward.

This external evidence, therefore, that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Heb. reduces itself to this statement of Papias which seems to indicate that the writing in question was not a Gospel, but some collection of words or sayings uttered by Jesus in connection with incidents in His ministry as made it different from the ordered narrative of a Gospel and so justified the usage of the title τὰ λόγια, in distinction from the title τὸ εὐαγγέλιον.

The only remaining question is as to who compiled this primary Matthean document with the Canonical Mk into our Canonical Mt. Manifestly, (k) Conclusions. it is a matter of secondary importance how this question shall be answered; since the discourses of Jesus in the Canonical Gospel are so vitally connected with a first-hand report of Jesus' utterances through this early Matthean writing and the substance of the narrative is so reproductive of the primary record of Mk. Matthew may have written nothing more than his primary document, yet our Canonical Gospel is too closely and intimately connected with eye- and ear-witness reports of Jesus' life and teachings to give us anything less than an essential history of His ministry. In other words, nothing is gained in the way of historical reliability by insisting upon the rather unusual literary procedure which would make the Apostle both the writer of the primary document and the compiler of the canonical narrative.

The apparent uncertainty of modern scholars as to the origin and contents of this Matthean document (see GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 5) does not essentially affect its value as a source for the ministry of Jesus; since whatever the facts as to these points may ultimately prove to be, it shows itself where it appears in the Gospels so primary in its characteristics that its reliability as a source must remain beyond question.

The claim that the statement of Papias refers to an original narrative Gospel written by the Apostle in Heb. and afterward translated by him into Gr.—making our Canonical Mt a Gr. translation of the original Heb. and not an original Gr. writing (Zahn, Introd. § 54—overlooks the fact that it is obviously inconceivable that the Gr. of Mark's Gospel should have been originally translated into the Heb. of this original Mt Gospel and then retranslated into the Gr. of our Canonical Mt, with such fidelity to the Markan original. The identities of word and phrase which the Canonical Mt shows to the Canonical Mk betray a contact at first hand and not through such a double process as this theory involves.

When we study the character of the thought in the First Gospel we see at once that it moves in a distinctively O T atmosphere. Jesus is

2. Theology. presented to the readers as in Himself, His Kingdom, and its accompanying salvation the direct fulfilment of Messianic predictions and as thus specially accredited to the Jewish Christian circle to which the Gospel was sent. In any detailed consideration of the main themes the following facts will emerge: (1) As to God: With the other synoptists M. represents Jesus as ascribing to God absolute goodness (19 16 f.) and unlimited power over all creation (11 25, 10 28). At the same time, His application to God of the title "King" is in the theocratic sense of the O T term rather than with the idea of creative rule (5 35 [cf. 15 31] and the King and lordship parables of the Unmerciful Servant, 18 23 ff. [peculiar to Mt], the Householder and his Vineyard, 21 33-45 [cf. espec. ver. 43 with ||s], and the Marriage Feast, 22 2 ff. [cf. ver. 2 with Lk 14 16]). Similarly, His ascription to God of the title "Father," while it shows this rule exercised beneficently over all His creation (5 45, 6 26, 10 29 [cf. Lk 12 6, without the title "Father"]), displays, as in the other Synoptics, His peculiar relation to Jesus' own disciples, and in this sense is used conspicuously by M. (5 16, 45, 48, 6 1, 4, 6, 8 f., 14 f., 18, 26, 32, 7 11, 21, 10 20, 13 43, 18 14, 23 9).

(2) As to Jesus Himself: While, in common with the other synoptists, M. does not represent Jesus as explicitly using the title "Son of God" of Himself, he does make clear, as they do, that He accepts its explicit application to Himself by others (e.g., in the Divine declaration at His baptism, 3 17, and His transfiguration, 17 5, in the Tempter's approach to Him, 4 3, 6, in the demon's appeal, 8 29, and in the high priest's challenge, 26 63), and that He implies it of Himself (e.g., in His remarks connected with the upbraiding of the Galilean cities, 11 25-27, in His eschatological discourse, 24 36, in the parable of the Householder and his Vineyard, 21 33-45). At the same time, it is noticeable to what extent M. alone represents Jesus as implying the title of Himself (e.g., 7 21, 10 32 f., 12 50, 15 13, 16 17, 18 10, 19, 35, 20 23, 22 2 [cf. Lk 14 16], 25 34, 26 39, 42, 53, 28 19), though His acceptance of its explicit application to Himself by others as given by M. alone is really confined to the confession of the disciples, 14 33, 16 16. (The use of the title by the railing mob, 27 40, 43, and the impressed centurion, 27 54, can hardly be considered in this connection.) In the implicit use of the title by Jesus there is the assertion of a relation of unique intimacy with God, involving the consciousness of a mutual knowledge (11 25-27 [=Lk 10 21 f.]; and yet see the strangely contradictory statement, 24 36); a mutual harmony of will (26 39, 42, 53 [=Mk 14 36; Lk 22 42]) and a commission of peculiar revelatory and representative character (7 21, 10 32 [=Mk 8 38; Lk 9 26], 12 50, 15 13, 16 17, 18 10, 19, 35, 20 23, 25 34, 28 19). In the explicit application of the title to Jesus there is implied, in the Divine declarations, 3 17 and 17 5, the fact that He is the peculiar object of the Father's pleasure, in the use of it by the Tempter, 4 3, 6, and the Demoniac, 8 29, the possession of supernatural power and in the confession of the disciples, 14 33, 16 16, and the challenge of the high priest, 26 63, a Messianic claim.

As do all the synoptists, M. represents Jesus as making frequent application to Himself of the title "Son of Man" (e.g., 8 20, 9 6, 11 19, 12 8, 32, 16 27 f., 17 9, 12, 22, 20 18, 28, 24 30b, 26 24 [bis], 45, 64), although the instances in which he alone places it on Jesus' lips are noteworthy (e.g., 10 23, 12 40, 13 37, 41, 16 13, 19 28, 24 27, 30a, 37, 39, 44, 25 31, 26 2). In no case is this title applied to Jesus by others, while Jesus' own use of it involves the conception of a relationship to the Kingdom not only as its Founder (e.g., in the revealing of truth, 13 37, the forgiving of sin, 9 6, the determining of the conduct of life, 11 19, and of the use of the Sabbath, 12 8), but as its Ministering Servant (e.g., in the resigning of the comforts of life [8 20], in submission to the persecutions of foes [17 12], in yielding to the sacrifice of death [12 40, 17 22, 20 28, 26 2, 24, 45], in return for which is to be the final exaltation to a throne of judgment and eternal glory [13 41, 16 27 f., 19 28, 20 18, 24 27-44, 25 31, 26 64]).

Throughout his references to Jesus' life and teachings, it is evident that M. takes a Messianic point of view, for he omits few opportunities of connecting both the words and the acts of Jesus with the Messianic forecasts of the Scriptures, e.g., His birth (1 22), His childhood (2 15, 17, 23), His Galilean work (4 14-16), His healing ministry (8 17), His avoidance of publicity (12 17-21), His method of teaching (13 35), the manner of His triumphal entry (21 4 f.), the disposal of the betrayal money (27 9), and at times represents Jesus Himself as so connecting the experiences of His ministry and the events of His life, e.g., the misconceptions of His teachings (13 14), His betrayal (26 24), His desertion (26 31), His arrest (26 54, 56).

(3) As to the Kingdom of God: For this phrase M. represents Jesus as using almost exclusively the phrase "Kingdom of Heaven"—seven times where the other phrase is reproduced by Mark (3 2, 4 17, 8 11, 13 11, 31, 19 14, 24), eight times where it is reproduced by Lk (5 3, 7 21, 10 7, 11 11, 12, 13 33, 18 3, 23 13), and eighteen times in passages peculiar to himself (5 10, 19 [bis], 20, 13 24, 44, 45, 47, 52, 16 19, 18 1, 4, 23, 19 12, 20 1, 22 2, 25 1). In three passages the other phrase is represented as used—one paralleled in the other Gospels with the same phrase (12 28 [=Lk 11 20]), two in passages peculiar to this Gospel (21 31, 43). At the same time, we find reproduced other phrases peculiar to M.—e.g., "my Father's kingdom" (26 29), "the kingdom of their Father" (13 43), "thy kingdom" (6 10 [= God's], 20 21 [= Jesus']), "his kingdom" (6 33, 13 41, 16 28), and the simple term "kingdom" (4 23, 8 12, 9 35, 13 19, 38, 24 14, 25 34). While it may not be possible to determine the reason for the peculiar phrasings of this common term which M. presents, it is clear that the frequency of his reproduction of the Kingdom idea is due to his O T conception of the Messiah's mission as embodying God's sovereignty and rule. (For detailed discussion of the term see Allen, in Int. Crit. Com., pp. lxvii-lxxi.) In common with the other synoptists, M. represents Jesus as making strong its distinction from the national and political kingdom conceived of as the Messianic promise to the Covenant People; though he brings out particularly that its membership is based on character and conduct (5 3-10, 19, 20, 7 21, 13 41, 18 1-3, 19 14, 23 f.), the test of greatness in it is humility (18 4), and its realization is to be in the perfect doing of God's will (6 10); while he portrays its special value as an objective good (13 44-46)—because of which perhaps there will be by some a counterfeiting of real connection with it (13 47-50), and its progress will meet with hindrance and embarrassment (13 24 ff.). While the Jews are represented as by right its "sons" (8 12), their rejection of their privileges will cause them to be cast out (8 11 f.) and the Kingdom to be given to others who will satisfy its conditions (21 43). In this sense, M. understands that the Kingdom is to be universal (21 31), and portrays it as conceived of by Jesus as a present fact (11 12, 12 28, 21 31, 23 13), as well as a future consummation (8 11 f., 13 40 ff., 47 ff., 24 30 ff., 25 31 ff.) and as thus characterized by a constant element of growth (13 31 f., 33).

(4) As to the Messianic Salvation: M., as the other synoptists, represents Jesus as conceiving of the Messianic Salvation as a thing not merely of the future, but of the present life (19 29 [=Mk 10 30; Lk 18 30]), though the details gathering around its future consummation are given special prominence by M. (13 30, 39-43, 47-50, 19 28, 25 31-46). This Salvation does not consist in material good (6 19 f. [=Lk 12 33 f.]), though it replaces the loss of such good a hundredfold (19 29 [=Lk 18 29 f.]), and secures it in the true sense of its possession (6 33 [=Lk 12 22-31]). In common with the other synoptists, M. represents Jesus as emphasizing in general the need of personal relations to Himself in order to the bestowal of this Salvation (10 34-39 [=Lk 12 51-53, 14 26 f.; Mk 8 34], 11 29), and as presenting as its specific conditions both repentance (4 17 [=Mk 1 15; cf. 11 20 f. =Lk 10 13], 12 41 [=Lk 11 32], 21 32) and faith (8 13, 9 2 [=Mk 2 5; Lk 5 20], 9 22 [=Mk 5 34; Lk 8 48], 9 29, 15 28 [cf. Mk 7 29]). M., as does Mark, represents Jesus as referring to His death as the means by which the bestowal of this Salvation is secured (20 28 [=Mk 10 45]; cf. the additional passage 26 28, peculiar to Mt).

(5) As to Eschatology: M. follows the general synoptic custom of merging the announcements of Jesus regarding the crises in the Kingdom's development with those regarding its final consummation (cf. the eschatological address, ch. 24), though he gives more prominence than the others to the distinctive element of progress in the development (cf. Parables of the Leaven, 13 33, and the Tares, 13 24-30, 36-43; cf. also Parable of the Drag-net, 13 47-50—all peculiar to Mt). So also in the announcements of the judgment, M. follows the general tendency to merge the ideas of its processes with those of its final declaration—though, unlike his custom in the matter of the Kingdom's development, he gives prominence to the element of the final pronouncement of the judgment (cf. 7 21-23 with Lk 6 46; 12 33-37 with Lk 6 43-45; cf. also as peculiar to Mt, 25 1-13, 31-46). This is doubtless due to the peculiar influence upon his thought of the O T idea of the Messianic rule, which, whatever its hidden and confused development, is fully to reveal itself in its final judgment. See the similar element characterizing the Baptist's announcement of this rule (3 11 f. [= Lk 3 15-17]).

MATTHIAS, mat-thai'as (Ματθίας, 'gift of God' [cf. the Gr. Theodore], abbr. from Ματταθίας, which was common in the Maccabæan age; cf. I Mac 2 1 ff., 11 70, 16 14; II Mac 14 19; also Lk 3 26): One of the little company of Jesus' followers, who was chosen by lot to take the place of Judas among the Twelve (Ac 1 21-26), on the ground that he had "companied with" them and was, therefore, competent to witness to the teaching and work of Jesus. The historicity of the transaction is denied (Zeller, Acts), but on insufficient grounds. The method of the choice by lot has been challenged, as clouding the title of M. to a place among the Twelve (Stier, Words of App., i, 1). But he was recognized as such (Ac 6 2), even though nothing authentic of his life and ministry is known. Eusebius considered him one of the Seventy (HE, I, 12); Clement (Strom., IV, 6 35) identifies him with Zacchæus; the Clem. Recog. (I, 60) with Barnabas; Hilgenfeld (N T Extra Can., 105) with Nathaniel. His name soon became the center around which apocryphal writings clustered. These include a Gospel, a group of Traditions, and some Discourses. (Cf. Harnack, Chronol., 597 ff.). There are also apocryphal Acts of Andrew and Matthias (cf. Bonnet, Acta Apost. Apocr., 2, 1, 1898). A. C. Z.

MATTITHIAH, mat"ti-thai'ā (מַתִּתְיָה, mattithyāh): 1. A Levite (I Ch 9 31). 2. A musician (I Ch 15 18, 21, 16 5). 3. Another musician (I Ch 25 3, 21). 4. One of the "sons of Nebo" (Ezr 10 43). 5. One of Ezra's assistants (Neh 8 4). E. E. N.

MATTOCK: The term renders the following Heb. words: (1) maḥărēshāh (I S 13 20), which, however, is somewhat uncertain. It means the 'plowshare'; but as this is already named in the first part of the verse, probably another term (one of those in ver. 21) originally stood at the end of ver. 20. (2) ma'dēr (Is 7 25), 'a chopping instrument,' probably similar to a pickax. (3) hārābh (II Ch 34 6), but the text is uncertain; cf. RV E. E. N.

MEALS: Two regular daily meals are mentioned in the Bible, besides which there was doubtless in the early morning a slight and informal repast of bread, with some relish. (1) The simple 'breakfast' (Lk 11 37 mg., "dinner" AV), or lunch, was eaten during the heat of the day, probably shortly before noon (Ru 2 14). (2) The principal meal, or "supper," took place at about sunset, after the labor of the day was over (Gn 19 1 ff.: Jg 19 16-21; Lk 14 16-24; Jn 12 2). This was the meal at which meat would usually be served (cf. Ex 16 12). Guests were sometimes entertained, however, at the midday repast (Gn 43 16, 25; Lk 11 37 f.; cf. I K 13 7).

1. The Regular Daily Meals.

The word "meal" occurs only in Ru 2 14 (literally 'at food time'). The O T gives no special names to the different meals. In Gn 43 16 to "dine" is really 'to eat bread,' as in ver. 25. "Dinner" (Pr 15 17) is better 'a portion' (ARVmg.). The N T ἀριστᾶν (ἄριστον) is always rendered dine, dinner) by AV; but ARV sometimes calls this meal a "breakfast" (Lk 11 37 f. mg.; cf. Jn 21 12, 15; "dinner" is retained, however, in Mt 22 4; Lk 14 12). The terms 'breakfast,' 'dinner,' etc., are inevitably somewhat misleading, as the meals thus named vary in hour and in formality, even in different sections of the same country.

The early Hebrews sat at meals (Gn 27 19; I K 13 20; I S 20 25, etc.), either on chairs, or squatting in Arab fashion. But in spite of the invectives of the prophets (Am 3 12, 6 4; cf. Ezk 23 41), by N T times it had become the usual custom among the better classes to eat reclining[1] luxuriously upon low couches. These were ordinarily arranged around three sides of the table, the fourth being left open for convenience in serving. Each person rested upon his left elbow, with the body at such an angle to the table that the head was near the "bosom" (Jn 13 23) of the person next behind. Certain places on these couches were considered more honorable than others (Mt 23 6; cf. Lk 22 24). For the position at the Last Supper, see Edersheim, ii, 492 ff.

2. Customs at Meals.

The meals were naturally prepared and served by the women (Mt 8 15; Lk 10 40), who ordinarily ate with the men of the family (Dt 16 14; I S 1 4; Job 1 4). There was but little cutlery, except for carving, and but few dishes, perhaps only one (cf. Lk 10 42a), into which each dipped his hand (Mt 26 23). The modern Syrians sop a piece of bread in the gravy, oil, or sauce; or fold it around a piece of meat, which can thus be taken out of the stew without soiling the fingers (cf. Rev 2 14; Jn 13 26; cf. also Pr 19 24).

[1] Thus AV "sit at meat" (ἀνακεῖσθαι, ἀνακλίνειν, etc.) is usually explained as "recline" by ARVmg. (e.g., Mt 9 10; Lk 13 29; Jn 12 2). These verbs are sometimes used, however, where it seems hardly likely that the actual position was a reclining one (e.g., Mt 14 19).

3. Special Meals, Banquets, etc.

Meals to which friends were previously invited (Lk 14 16), or feasts held upon special occasions—such as birthdays (Gn 40 20; Job 1 4; Mt 14 6), marriages (Gn 29 22; Est 2 18; Mt 22 2), funerals (II S 3 35; Jer 16 7), laying of foundations (Pr 9 1-5), vintage (Jg 9 27), sheep-shearing (I S 25 2, 36), and the numerous religious festivals—were, of course, more formal and elaborate. A second invitation was often sent when all was prepared, or a servant conducted the guests to the feast (Est 6 14; Lk 14 17; Mt 22 2 ff.). These customs still prevail in the Lebanon region. The host welcomed the guests with a kiss (Lk 7 45), after which the feet were washed, because of the dust of the journey (Gn 18 4; Jg 19 21; Lk 7 44). The head was anointed (Ps 23 5; Am 6 6; Lk 7 46) and sometimes crowned with garlands (cf. Is 28 1). The guests were then seated according to their respective rank (I S 9 22; Lk 14 8; cf. Jn 13 23), the hands were washed (II K 3 11), and grace was said (I S 9 13; Mt 15 36; Lk 22 17, etc.). These last two ceremonies were elaborated into a confusing and burdensome ritual by the Pharisees (Mk 7 1-23), and were repeated after the meal (cf. Dt 8 10, which was cited in support of the blessing after eating). An honored guest received the largest, or choicest, portion of food (Gn 43 34; I S 9 23 f.), and portions were sometimes sent to friends not attending the feast (II S 11 8; Neh 8 10; Est 9 19, 22). During the meal entertainment might be provided in the form of instrumental music (Is 5 12; Am 6 5), singing (II S 19 35; cf. Ec 2 8), dancing (Mt 14 6; Lk 15 25), or riddles (Jg 14 12). One of the guests was sometimes appointed "ruler of the feast," to regulate the drinking and the entertainment (Jn 2 9). A great banquet occasionally continued for several days (Jg 14 12; cf. Est 1 3 f.), but excess in eating and drinking is unsparingly condemned by the sacred writers (Ec 10 16 f.; Is 5 11 f.; Am 6 1-6; cf. I Co 6 13; Ph 3 19). See also in general Food and Food Utensils.

MEAT: (1) The rendering of several related terms (derived from ākhal, 'to eat'), 'ākhīlāh, 'oklah, 'ōkhēl, and ma'ăkhāl, all meaning 'food' or 'eating' (I K 19 8; Gn 1 29; Lv 11 34, etc.) and usually rendered "food" in RV (2) leḥem, 'bread,' but frequently used broadly for food in general (Lv 22 11, 13; Nu 28 24; I S 20 24, etc.). (3) bĕrūth and biryāh (from bārāh, 'to eat,' especially to strengthen oneself when sick or weak, as in La 4 10), food suitable for a sick one (Ps 69 21; II S 13 5, 7, 10). (4) ṭareph (Ps 111 5; Pr 31 15; Mal 3 10). (5) māzōn (Gn 45 23; Dn 4 12, 21). (6) path (from pāthath, 'to break in pieces'), a 'bit,' or 'morsel' (for food) (II S 12 3 AV). (7) tsēdhāh, 'provisions for a journey' (Ps 78 25 AV). (8) βρῶμα, 'food,' βρώσιμος, 'eatable,' and βρῶσις, 'eating,' all frequently rendered "food" in RV (Mk 7 19; Lk 24 41; Jn 4 32; Ro 14 17, etc.). (9) προσφάγιον, 'anything eaten with' [bread or other food] (Jn 21 5 AV). (10) τράπεζα, 'table' (Ac 16 34). (11) τροφή, 'nourishment' (Mt 3 4, 6 25, 10 10, etc. AV, "food" RV). (12) φάγειν, 'to eat' (Mt 25 35, 42; Lk 8 55 AV). See also Food, §§ 8–10. E. E. N.

MEAT-OFFERING. See Sacrifice and Offerings, § 12.

MEBUNNAI, mę-bŭn'nai (מְבֻנַּי, mebhunnay): One of David's heroes (II S 23 27), called Sibbecai in I Ch 11 29, 27 11. E. E. N.

MECHERATHITE, mę-kĭ'rath-ait (מְכֵרָתִי, mekhērāthi): Probably a scribal error in I Ch 11 36 for Maacathite (cf. II S 23 34). E. E. N.

MECONAH, mę-cō'nā (מְכוֹנָה, mekhōnāh), Mekonah AV): A town in Judah, near Ziklag, occupied in post-exilic times (Neh 11 28). Site unknown. E. E. N.

MEDAD, mĭ'dad (מֵידָד, mēdhādh): An elder who had the gift of prophecy (Nu 11 26 f.). See also Apocalyptic Literature, § 3. E. E. N.

MEDAN, mĭ'dan. See Ethnography and Ethnology, § 11.

MEDEBA, med'ę-bā (מֵידְבָא, mēdhebhā'): A town in the "plain" ("tableland" RVmg.) E. of Jordan, originally a possession of Moab, but after the conquest under Joshua assigned to Reuben (Jos 13 9, 16). There is no evidence that it came under Israelitic control before the days of David. After the disruption under Rehoboam it once more passed into the hands of the Moabites, and is mentioned in the Mesha Stone (see Mesha) as captured by Omri (line 7 f.) and recaptured by Mesha and fortified (line 29 f.). According to I Ch 19 7, the Syrians who came to assist the Ammonites against Joab encamped at the spot. The modern site is Mādābā, 6 m. from Heshbon (Map II, J 1). It has been colonized by Catholic Christians and contains important ruins. A mosaic map of Palestine was discovered here in 1896. The map formed a part of the floor of a church, built in the 5th cent. A full description with plates will be found in Libbey and Hoskins, The Jordan Valley and Petra (1905), vol. i, chap. xii, and Appendix. A. C. Z.

MEDES, mîdz, MEDIA, mĭ'dĭ-a, MEDIAN: Media (מָדַי, mādhay) was a mountainous country, bounded on the N. by the Caspian Sea, on the E. by a great desert, on the S. by Susiana and Persia, and on the W by Assyria and Armenia. This territory, about 600 m. in length and 250 m. in breadth, is approximately covered by the provinces Ardelan and Irak Ajemi of modern Persia. In ancient times, M. had two capitals: namely, Rhague and Ecbatana (q.v.).

It began to attract the attention of the warlike Assyrian kings as early as the middle of the 9th cent. or the beginning of the 8th B.C. At that time, to judge from the names of its leading inhabitants as they appear in the Assyrian lists, its population was of Indo-European or Aryan stock, an inference which is confirmed by the nature of the names reported in the classical writers. This affinity of the Medes with the Aryan race is also reflected in Gn 10 2, which represents Madai as the son of Japheth. According to Herodotus (I, 95 ff.), M. was made into a kingdom by Deioces, who was succeeded by his son Phraortes; but of these two monarchs nothing is known except what the Greek historian reports. The real power of M. began with Kyaxares (584 B.C.), the conqueror of Nineveh; but the glory of the monarchy was short-lived. The successor of Kyaxares, Astyages (the Ishtuvegu of the cuneiform inscriptions), being defeated by Cyrus (550 B.C.), Median independence came to an end, and Persia took the leadership in the Mesopotamian valley. The Medes never came into direct contact with the Hebrews. Sargon did indeed deport some of the conquered Israelites of the Northern Kingdom into their cities (II K 17 6, 18 11), and the prophets of Israel (Is 13 17, 21 2; Jer 51 11) regarded Media as the scourge in the hands of J" for the punishment of Babylon; but these are indirect relationships. In the later books of the O T (e.g., Est 1 3, etc.) M. appears as second to Persia, though still recognized as a large and almost coordinate portion of the great monarchy. In Dn 5 31 "Darius the Mede" ("Median" AV) is named as "taking the kingdom,' but the reference is not as yet historically confirmed. A. C. Z.

MEDIATOR (μεσίτης), 'middleman': One who by his friendly offices establishes cordial relations between two naturally hostile or estranged persons, or parties. The term "mediator" occurs only in Gal 3 19 f.; I Ti 2 5; He 8 6, 9 15, 12 24. The synonym "umpire" ("daysman" AV) is found in Job 9 33. The idea of mediation, however, is not only common, but regulative in the religious thought both of the O T and the N T (cf. in the O T the verb pāga', 'to make intercession,' Is 53 12).

The basis for the idea of mediation is that of intercession before a monarch by one who enjoys his favor in behalf of one who, either because he has lost it or because he never had it, seeks it. In this sense mediatorship is common in human relations. Jonathan makes intercession for David before Saul (I S 19 4); Abigail for Nabal before David (I S 25 18-31); the king of Syria for Naaman before the king of Israel (II K 5 6). But it is preeminently in the approach to God that mediation is necessary. Abraham intercedes for Abimelech (Gn 20 7, 17); also for Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn 18 23); Moses for Pharaoh and the Egyptians (Ex 8 8, 30, 9 28-33, 10 17 f.) and also for Israel (Ex 17 11, 33 13; Dt 9 18). Other cases of intercession are those of Samuel (I S 7 5, 12 19, 23; Jer 15 1) and Job (42 8).

1. Intercession.

This mediation in behalf of the inferior before the superior (for man before God) is in principle identical with the priestly function, and is carried through the priestly ritual all along the history of the people. In the Apocrypha and in the apocalyptic literature instances of mediation include the intercession of angels, who take the prayers of men before the throne of God (To 3 26). Enoch is besought by the fallen angels to plead for them (Eth. En. 13 4-7). In the Assumption of Moses, Moses makes intercession for the people of Israel (11 17, 12 6); while Enoch attempts to correct the common belief that there is any efficacy in such intercession (Slav. En. 53 1). The idea survives, and is carried into the N T (ἐντυγχάνειν, ἔντευξις). Here it is, however, connected with the work of Christ for His people (He 7 25), or the work of the Holy Spirit in behalf of the praying believer (Ro 8 27), or the sympathetic plea in prayer by believers for their fellow men (I Ti 2 1).

2. Priestly Mediation.

Mediation by creatures, especially angels before the throne of God, became obnoxious to later Jewish thought, on account of the great risk involved of corrupting the monotheistic idea by the temptation to offer worship to angels, or other creatures, as intermediaries between God and man. Accordingly in the Rabbinical schools the idea was discountenanced, and Moses alone was given the title mediator (Pesiq. Rab. 6). Among Christians the belief in the intercession of saints, of angels, and of the Virgin Mary was largely developed in the later post-apostolic ages.

3. Angelic Mediation.

The counterpart of mediation in behalf of man before God is the presentation of God's word and will to men by an intermediary. The twofold ground for such mediation is (1) the necessity of communicating God's will to men, and (2) the incapacity, or unwillingness, of men to receive it directly from Him. Moses becomes God's mediator to Pharaoh and the Israelites (Ex 4 10 ff.). Later, in the giving of the Law on Mt. Sinai, at the express request of the people all communications from God are made to them through Moses (Ex 20 19). Hence the later uniform representation that Moses was the mediator of the old covenant (He 8 6; Philo, Vita Moys, 3 19; Ass. Mos. 1 14, 3 12). But even Moses being supposed incapable of receiving the Law directly, the idea arose that it was delivered to him through angels (Jos. Ant. XV, 5 3; cf. also Hermas, Simil., VIII, 3 3, who names Michael as the individual angel; cf. Ac 7 53; Gal 3 19). A. C. Z.

4. Prophetic Mediation.

MEDITERRANEAN SEA (also called Great Sea [Nu 34 6; Jos 1 4, 15 12; Ezk 47 10], Hinder, or Western Sea [Dt 11 24; Jl 2 20; Zec 14 8]): The inland ocean lying between Europe, Western Asia, and Africa, 2,320 m. long by 100 to 600 m. broad, and, between Sicily and Africa, divided into two basins by a submarine ridge. Its main divisions were the Phœnician (Levant), the Ægean, the Adriatic (including the Ionian; see Adria), and the Tyrrhene Seas. During the summer months the prevailing winds ("Etesian") in the E. portions are from the NW. In the winter, fierce gales ("Levanters") sweep down from ENE., and in the western portions violent storms from the NW. and the NE. The Syrtes ("quicksands" Ac 27 17) on the shores of Africa, the straits of Messina, between Sicily and Italy, and Cape Malia on the S. of Greece were regarded by ancient mariners with dread. The commerce of the Hebrews was chiefly by land, and they regarded the sea with some fear. Their coast-line, almost harborless, except N. of Carmel, was unfavorable to the growth of maritime trade; but they had intercourse with "the Isles," and had the Western world opened up to them by the Phœnicians. In N T times the Mediterranean was surrounded by the civilization of the world, and its great islands were very productive; so that there was a constant traffic in every direction, though most of the trade converged on Rome from Spain, Sicily, Africa, the Ægean, the Black Sea, and even India through Egypt—the grain-ships of Alexandria also supplying the capital with most of her food (cf. Ac 27 6, 28 11). Through Joppa, Cæsarea, and Ptolemais (q.v.), Palestine was in constant communication with the coasts of Asia Minor, Cyprus, Rhodes, Greece, and the West.

MEEK, MEEKNESS: In the O T there is a small group of words, 'ānāh, 'ānī, 'ānāw, 'anwāh, and 'ănāwāh, all derived from the root עָנָה, the primary significance of which seems to be 'to take or receive a low place.' The verb 'ānāh may mean (in the active) 'to bend,' 'to oppress,' or 'to afflict,' or (intransitively) 'to be humble,' especially before God or His law, or (in the passive) 'to be bent,' 'oppressed,' 'afflicted.' The derivative 'ānāw is considered intransitive, and generally rendered "meek," "humble," or "lowly," and the nominal forms, 'anwāh, 'ănāwāh, are rendered "meekness" or "humility," while 'ānī is taken as passive and rendered "poor" or "afflicted." Since those who 'humbled themselves' before God and were loyal to Him were also frequently the oppressed ones whose cause was championed by prophets and psalmists (Ps 22 26, 25 9; Is 61 1; Am 2 7, etc.), the terms 'ānī and 'ānāw came to have somewhat of a technical religious sense, indicative of loyalty to J" as well as of lowly station in life. The significance that thus came to be read into these terms in the course of Jewish history explains the important use in the N T of the corresponding Gr. adjectives πραΰς and πρᾷος (Mt 5 5, 11 29, 21 5; I P 3 4) and the nouns πραότης and πρᾳότης (I Co 4 21, etc., frequently in Paul; Ja 1 21, 3 13; I P 3 15). When Jesus says, "I am meek and lowly in heart" (Mt 11 29), He must be understood as using the word in its acquired sense, in which whole-hearted submission to the will of God was the dominant note.

MEGIDDO, mę-gid'ō (מְגִדּוֹ, mᵉgiddō), MEGIDDON (in Zec 12 11): A very ancient Canaanite stronghold (Jos 12 21, 17 11), captured by Thotmes III, and mentioned in the Tell-el-Amarna tablets, as well as in Assyrian inscriptions. The ruins of el-Lejjûn (Latin, Legio), 4½ m. NW. of Taanach (q.v.), mark the site of the city in Roman times, but the ancient citadel was on the neighboring Tell el-Mutasellim (Map IV, C 8). This fortified city (I K 19 15) commanded the mouth of the chief pass from Sharon, as well as the road from En-gannim to the sea, and was so important a strategic point that the whole plain of Esdraelon was called "the valley of Megiddo" (II Ch 35 22; Zec 12 11). "The waters of Megiddo" (Jg 5 19) are apparently those of the Kishon, one of whose tributaries rises near el-Lejjûn. See also HAR-MAGEDON.

MEHETABEL, mę-het'a-bl (מְהֵיטַבְאֵל, mᵉḥēṭabh'ēl), MEHETABEEL, bē'il, AV, 'God benefits': 1. The wife of Hadar, King of Edom (Gn 36 39; I Ch 1 50). 2. The father of Delaiah (Neh 6 10).

MEHIR, mi'hęr (מְחִיר, mᵉḥīr): A small Judahite clan inhabiting the neighborhood of Eshton (I Ch 4 11).

MEHOLATHITE, mę-hō'la-thait (מְחֹלָתִי, mᵉḥolāthī): A native of Abel-meholah, the birthplace of Elisha (I K 19 16), situated on the border of one of Solomon's prefectures (I K 4 12). Adriel, the husband of Merab, Saul's daughter, is thus designated (I S 18 19). In II S 21 8 his father Barzillai.
C. S. T.

MEHUJAEL, mę-hū'ja-el (מְחוּיָאֵל, mᵉḥūyā'ēl, mᵉḥiyyā'ēl), perhaps 'smitten of God,' or 'God gives life': A great-grandson of Cain, the fourth in the Cainite genealogy (Gn 4 18). Same as Mahalalel (5 12) of the Sethite line.

MELCHIZEDEK (מַלְכִּי־צֶדֶק, malkī-tsedheq, Melchisedec, He 5 6, etc. AV), 'king of righteousness': M. appears abruptly in the narrative of Gn 14 18 as "priest of God Most High," and "king of Salem," and, in his priestly capacity, by the symbolical use of bread and wine bestows a blessing on Abraham. Such a person combining in himself the priestly and royal offices was afterward seen in the ideal king of Israel, to whom, therefore, a priesthood "after the order of Melchizedek" was ascribed (Ps 110 4). In He 5 6, 7, this is elaborated in its application to Christ. Of the historicity of Melchizedek doubts have been expressed. But as it is admitted that Gn ch. 14 contains a historical kernel, such doubts are not justified.

MELEA, mĭ'lę-a (Μελεά): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 31). E. E. N.

MELITA, mel'i-ta: An island in the Mediterranean, the scene of Paul's shipwreck (Ac 28 1), the modern Malta (the identification with Meleda, on the Dalmatian coast, is baseless). It lies 58 m. S. of Sicily and 180 m. N. of Cape Bon in Africa, and has an area of 95 sq. m. Occupied in turn by the Phœnicians, Greeks, and Carthaginians, it came under the Romans in 218 B.C. and formed part of the province of Sicily. Paul's ship, after drifting from Cauda near Crete for a fortnight, close-hauled on the starboard tack under an ENE. gale, reached what is now called St. Paul's Bay, 8 m. NW. of Valetta, and struck a shoal formed, it would appear, between the island of Salmonetta and the shore on the W. side of the bay. The vessel went to pieces, but the ship's company all escaped to the beach (Ac 27 14-44). The inhabitants of the island ("barbarians" and abundantly superstitious, Ac 28 2-6) probably spoke Punic, though Publius, "the chief man of the island," and his family apparently knew Greek as well as Latin. This title for the governor is confirmed by early inscriptions from the neighboring island of Gozo. The "viper" episode has been questioned, but the fact that to-day in a very thickly populated island there are no poisonous serpents is no evidence as to its condition in the 1st cent. After three months of great hospitality on the part of the inhabitants, and doubtless of more or less missionary work on the part of Paul, he and his companions sailed to Syracuse on an Alexandrian ship which had wintered at Melita. Nothing certain is known of Christianity in the island until the middle of the 5th cent., though some hold that Christian inscriptions of the 2d cent. have been discovered. R. A. F.

MEMORIAL: In most cases the occurrence of this term in the Bible needs no explanation. That through which a person or an event, or even God Himself, is to be remembered is a "memorial" (Ex 3 15, 12 14; Jos 4 7; Mk 14 9, etc.). The term 'azkhārāh, used as a technical term in the manual of offerings (Lv 2 2, 9, 16, 5 12, 6 15) and in other places in the Priests' Code (Lv 24 7; Nu 5 26), is rendered "memorial" as if derived from zākhar in the sense of 'to remember.' The term is used of the portion of the vegetable offering that was burned on the altar as incense and of the frankincense that was sprinkled on the showbread (Lv 24 7), and the idea seems to have been that it was the fragrance of the incense that caused it to serve as a "memorial." As the primary meaning of zākhar was, apparently, 'to stick,' or 'prick,' perhaps it was the pungency of the incense that led to its being called 'azkhārāh. (So Dillmann on Lv 2 2-4.) E. E. N.

MEMPHIS, mem'fis (Μέμφις), only in Hos 9 6, where Heb. is mōph; and Noph in the AV of Is 19 13, Jer 2 16, 44 1, 46 14, 19, and Ezk 30 13, 16, where the Heb. is nōph: The capital of Egypt. In the sacred texts it is called Hat-ka-ptah ('house of the Image of Ptah'), the name applied to the whole land (Αἰγυπτος, 'E-gy-pt'). The secular name of the city was, however, Men-nofer ('the fine residence'), and was abbreviated into Mennefe and Menfe; hence the Greek form, which has prevailed in later historical times. The city was situated on the W. bank of the Nile, 12 m. S. of modern Cairo, and covered a large area of territory, probably shifting and changing its boundaries as the kings of the several dynasties chose new sites for their palaces. According to tradition, it was built by Menes of the first dynasty, and held a place of prime importance to the days of the Ptolemies, even though other cities, especially Thebes, rivaled and at times surpassed and supplanted it as a political center. It was the seat of a temple of the god Ptah ('the world creator'), who was thought to be embodied in the Apis bull; but there were also many foreign deities worshiped in the city, especially Astarte. With the exception of the necropolis with its pyramids, the ruins of Memphis, which even to the 12th cent. A.D. were said to extend half a day's journey, have totally disappeared. A. C. Z.

MEMUCAN, mę-miū'can. See PRINCES, THE SEVEN.

MENAHEM, men-a-hem (מְנַחֵם, menaḥēm), 'comforter': The son of Gadi (II K 15 14) and military governor of the earlier capital of Israel, Tirzah. When Shallum usurped the throne, Menahem refused to submit, made an attack on Samaria, where the king was holding court, captured the city, put the usurper to death, and was himself proclaimed king (circa 744 B.C.). His rule, however, was at first opposed, and it was necessary to suppress a rather formidable rebellion. This Menahem did, evidently with a strong hand, inflicting cruel revenge upon the disaffected. In order to maintain himself in power, he placed himself under vassalage to Pul, King of Assyria (II K 15 19 f.), better known as Tiglath-pileser III. But to secure this alliance, he was compelled to pay a large sum of money (1,000 talents) to the Assyrian king, which he in turn exacted from the wealthy men of his realm. The alliance turned out to be a serious disaster for Israel; since it offered the Assyrians the occasion for a hold upon the nation, which was destined to end in complete absorption into the larger kingdom. Menahem's policy was resisted in Israel by an anti-Assyrian party. But though in constant peril, the king ended his reign in peace (circa 735 B.C.), and was succeeded by his son Pekahiah. A. C. Z.

MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN, mī'nī, tī'kel, yu-fār'sin (מְנֵא מְנֵא תְּקֵל וּפַרְסִין, mᵉnē', mᵉnē', tᵉqēl, ūpharṣīn): The words that appeared on the wall at Belshazzar's feast (Dn 5 25). As Belshazzar and his lords were desecrating the sacred vessels that Nebuchadrezzar had brought from Jerusalem, the form of a hand appeared writing upon the plaster of the wall these mysterious words. The king's wise men failing to interpret them, Daniel was called, and after a lengthy exordium, presented his interpretation. The words are Aramaic, and by Daniel's interpretation were to be paraphrased as in ARV, while the marginal rendering of the four words is "numbered, numbered, weighed and divisions." There is almost endless discussion as to their rendering, many of the proposals being very fanciful. Daniel's own interpretation takes enough liberty with the four words, as he interprets the first and third, and changes the fourth from upharsin to peres, to warrant us in questioning the meaning of the entire inscription, as well as its proper pronunciation. There seems to be nothing better than Daniel's rendering of the first three words, while the last may be either "divisions," "divided," "assessed" (Margoliouth), or "Persians." According to Driver (Camb. Bible, ad loc.) the words are the names of weights, and should be read: "A m'na, a m'na, a shekel and half-shekels." I. M. P.

MEONENIM, mę-on'ę-nim (מְעוֹנְנִים, mᵉʿōnᵉnīm); with 'ēlōn ('oak'), 'soothsayer's oak': The seat of an oracle near Shechem, perhaps the same as 'oak of Moreh' (J 9 9 37; cf. Gn 12 6; Jg 7 1). C. S. T.

MEONOTHAI, mę-on'o-thai (מְעוֹנֹתַי, mᵉʿōnōthay): A Kenizzite clan (I Ch 4 14). E. E. N.

MEPHAATH, mef''a-ath (מֵיפַעַת, mēphaʿath): A place in Reuben, assigned to the Levites (Jos 13 18, 21 37; I Ch 6 79), later reoccupied by the Moabites (Jer 48 21). Site unknown; but it was somewhere between Medeba and Dibon. E. E. N.

MEPHIBOSHETH, mę-fib'o-sheth (מְפִיבֹשֶׁת, mᵉphībhōsheth), 'he who scatters shame' (?) (II S 4 4, 9 6 ff.); originally Meribbaal, 'Baal is advocate,' or 'hero of Baal' (so Gray, Proper Names, p. 201) (I Ch 8 34): 1. A cripple, son of Jonathan. A realistic account of the accident that crippled him is given in II S 4 4. When David was recognized king, M. promptly made his submission to him and received as a reward the private estate of Saul and an honorable place at court (II S 9 6 ff.), together with the services of Saul's steward Zibah. Later, during the rebellion of Absalom, Zibah slanderously accused his master of secretly joining the rebels and obtained his estate, which was adjudged forfeited (II S 16 1-4). But when M. protested his innocence David restored half the estate to him and gave him back his place at court (II S 19 24 ff.). In the affair of Rizpah M. was spared for the sake of Jonathan (II S 21 7). 2. A son of Rizpah (II S 21 8). A. C. Z.

MERAB, mi'rab (מֵרַב, mērabh): The eldest daughter of Saul (I S 14 49), promised to David (18 17), but given to Adriel (18 19). Their five sons were delivered by David to the Gibeonites to be put to death (II S 21 8, where "Merab" should be read for "Michal"). C. S. T.

MERAIAH, mę-rê'yū (מְרָיָה, mᵉrāyāh): The head of the priestly house of Seraiah in the days of Nehemiah (Neh 12 12). E. E. N.

MERAIOTH, mę-rê'yoth (מְרָיוֹת, mᵉrāyōth): 1. A priest in the ancestry of Ahitub (I Ch 6 6 f., 52; Ezr 7 3). 2. A son of Ahitub (I Ch 9 11; Neh 11 11). 3. By mistake in Neh 12 15 for "Meremoth," q.v. (cf. ver. 3). E. E. N.

MERARI, mę-rê'rai (מְרָרִי, mᵉrārī), MERARITES: The third and youngest son of Levi (Gn 46 11; Ex 6 16). His importance lies chiefly in the fact that he was the ancestor and eponym of one, though the smallest, of the Levite clans (Nu 3 17, 4 29; I Ch 6 1, 9 14). As a gentilic the name is preceded always by the article (Nu 26 57). There were two subdivisions of the Merarite Levites, called respectively Mushi and Mahli. In the allocation of cities of residence, they were placed in Zebulun, Gad, and Reuben (Jos 21 7, 34-40). The family of M. was prominent in the train of Ezra at the restoration (Ezr 8 19), though it is barely possible that this may be another clan of the same name. A. C. Z.

MERATHAIM, mer''a-thê'im (מְרָתַיִם, mᵉrāthayim), 'double rebellion' (?): An enigmatic name, apparently for Babylonia (Jer 50 21). Possibly it represents the Babylonian name for the 'sea country,' i.e., S. Babylonia. E. E. N.

MERCHANT, MERCHANDISE. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

MERCHANT SHIP. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

MERCURIUS, męr-kiū'ri-us, MERCURY. See GREEK AND ROMAN RELIGION, § 6.

MERCY: This term is the translation in AV of derivatives of several Heb. roots: (1) ḥesedh, 'goodness,' 'kindness,' in most passages, of God: for which RV has usually "loving-kindness," sometimes "kindness," also "goodness." The only verbal form is translated "show thyself merciful" (II S 22 26 = Ps 18 25 [26]). The adj. ḥāsīdh, denoting the active practise of ḥesedh, is used twice of God (Jer 3 12, "merciful"; Ps 145 17 "holy" AV, "gracious" RV), twice of men and then rendered with "merciful" (II S 22 26 = Ps 18 25 [26]); elsewhere it is used of men as exhibiting 'dutcous love' toward God, hence rendered "pious," "godly." (2) raḥāmīm, 'bowels,' as the seat of tender compassion, is rendered "mercies," but according to many this word is a denominative from reḥem ('womb'), and means 'brotherhood,' 'brotherly feeling,' i.e., of those born of the same womb. It is usually used of God, whose mercies are "great" or "manifold." The verb raḥām, in the pi'el (active) is used mainly of God and rendered "be merciful" AV, in RV often "have compassion," and in the pual (passive) of men. The adj. raḥūm, used only of God, is rendered "merciful" (AV and ERV), also "full of compassion" (Ps 78 38, etc.), but ARV has uniformly "merciful." (3) ḥānan, 'show favor,' 'be gracious,' usually of God in bestowing favors on men or redeeming them from various ills. It is rendered "be gracious," "merciful" or "favorable," "have mercy" or "pity." (4) ḥemlāh, an inf. from a vb. meaning 'to spare,' 'have compassion,' is rendered "being merciful" (Gn 19 16), also "pity" (Is 63 9). (5) kippēr, 'cover over,' 'propitiate' (in Dt 21 8, 32 43, "be merciful" AV; "forgive," "make expiation" RV), elsewhere "make atonement," or "reconciliation." It is characteristic of the O T revelation that so much emphasis is found laid upon the great truth of God's mercy to sinful man and the correlated truth of the duty of man to be merciful and compassionate toward his fellow men (cf. Mic 6 8). In the N T both of these truths have a flood of light thrown upon them by the revelation in Christ. God's mercy revealed in Christ only makes more evident the primary place mercy must hold in the Christians' attitude toward his fellow men. C. S. T.

MEREMOTH, mer'ę-moth (מְרֵמוֹת, mᵉrēmōth): 1. A priestly family (Neh 10 5, 12 3, 15; here Meraioth should be Meremoth). 2. A priest in Ezra's day (Ezr 8 33; Neh 3 4, 21). 3. One of the "sons of Bani" (Ezr 10 36). E. E. N.

MERES, mî'rîz. See PRINCES, THE SEVEN.

MERIBAH, mer'i-bā (מְרִיבָה, mᵉrībhāh), 'strife': The name of two places where similar occurrences are reported to have taken place during the course of the Exodus. (1) The first is in the region of Mt Horeb, N. of Mt. Sinai, and in connection with the murmuring ("striving" RV, "chiding" AV) of the children of Israel (Ex 17 1-7; see also MASSAH). (2) Meribath-kadesh, in the wilderness of Zin in the neighborhood of Kadesh (Ezk 48 28; cf. also Nu 27 14; Dt 32 51, where the rendering is "Meribah of Kadesh"). Here also the people found no water and "strove" with ("chode" AV) Moses. By smiting the rock Moses caused water to gush forth. The similarity of these accounts has led many to assume that they are different versions of the same story, confusedly given as if they were two occurrences. There is valid reason, however, for believing that the same circumstances, repeated in two different places, gave the same name to the places. This is especially likely because the Meribah of Rephidim is only incidentally spoken of under that name. Its more distinctive designation is Massah, 'temptation.' The waters of Meriboth-kadesh in Ezk 47 19 ("strife in Kadesh" AV) are given as the S. limit of the ideal land of Israel. MERODACH-BALADAN, (מְרֹדַךְ בַּלְאֲדָן, mᵉrō'dhakh bal'ădhān; Assyrian, Marduk-bal-iddin, 'Marduk has given a son'): The king of Babylon (II K 20 12 ff. = Is 39 1 ff.) from 721 to 709 B.C. and for about six months in 702. Merodach-Baladan was a Chaldean and head of the people of that name, whose capital was at Bit-Yakin, near the head of the Persian Gulf. He was a sworn enemy of Assyria, and gradually pushed northward until, with the aid of the Elamites, he seized Babylon in 721 B.C. After the embassy sent to Hezekiah (Is ch. 39), M.-B. was defeated by Sargon II (709), and driven back to his native city, whence, to avoid capture, he fled to Elam. In 702, under Sennacherib's reign in Nineveh, he secured the throne of Babylon for about six months, but was forced to retire to his home land, whence, after a period of defense, he fled, and is reported to have died in the city of Nagitu, on the western border of Elam. I. M. P.

MEROM, WATERS OF, mî'rem (מֵרוֹם, mērōm): A place noted for the great victory of Joshua over King Jabin of Hazor and his allies (Jos 11 5). It is usually identified with the modern Bahrat el-Ḥuleh, the northernmost of the three bodies of water through which the Jordan flows (see JORDAN). But the identification is strongly contested by some on the grounds (1) that the word yām, 'sea,' would have been used if such a large body of water had been meant, and (2) that the situation does not harmonize with the geographical data of Jos 11 8. Accordingly, it is proposed to find the Waters of Merom in a locality in upper Galilee abounding in springs, near the modern village Meron, or Marun er-Ras, a little W. of Safed, Map I, E 4 (so Buhl, Geog. Pal., p. 234). The solution of the difficulty seems to lie along the line of identifying the site, not with any particular spot, but with a district (suggested in the Vulgate regione Merome of Jg 5 18). Such a district is in general that which, including the lake Ḥuleh, stretches northward and is traversed by a stream, to which the phrase Waters of Merom is more strictly to be applied. (Cf. Schenkel, Bib. Lex., 1869–75). A. C. Z.

MERONOTHITE, mę-ron'o-thait (מְרֹנֹתִי, mērōnōthī) 'man of Meronoth': The designation of two men, Jehdeiah (I Ch 27 30) and Jadon (Neh 3 7). No other reference to Meronoth occurs. Site unknown, but it was probably near Gibeon. E. E. N.

MEROZ, mî'roz (מֵרוֹז, mērōz): A place mentioned only in the song of Deborah (Jg 5 23). The extreme bitterness of the curse against this otherwise unknown village has been accounted for on two hypotheses: either Meroz was so near the battlefield that its inaction was tantamount to a declaration of hostility to the Israelite cause, or else the fleeing Sisera was suffered to pass through the village unmolested. The position of this curse, just preceding the blessing upon Jael, seems to lend weight to the second hypothesis. The name Meroz may survive in el-Murusṣuṣ, a small, mud-built village 5 m. NW of Bethshean. L. G. L.

MESECH, mî'sec. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11, under Meshech.

MESHA, mî'sha: 1 (מֵישַׁע, mēsha'). A king of Moab conquered and made a vassal of Israel by Omri (885–874 B.C., II K 3 4). He is spoken of as a "sheepmaster," who paid an annual tribute consisting of the wool of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams. Some time near the end of Ahab's reign he renounced his allegiance to Israel and secured his independence. After the death of Ahab, his son Jehoram attempted to recover the territory lost, and by the aid of Judah and Edom obtained a considerable victory over Mesha's army (II K 3 22-24), but was led to abandon the campaign on account of Mesha's desperate deed of sacrificing his son and heir as a propitiation to Chemosh in plain view of the allies (II K 3 27). Mesha, Stone of. Besides the Biblical data in II K 3 4 ff., a memorial pillar of black basalt 3½ ft. high by 2 ft. wide, erected by Mesha, gives information about the events of his reign. This stele was discovered in 1868 among the ruins of Dibon (Dibān), by Rev. F. A. Klein, a Prussian missionary. A rough squeeze was made for Clermont-Ganneau in 1869, and a copy of lines 13–20. When the Arabs of the neighborhood realized that the stone was possessed of value they broke it into fragments in the hope of selling the pieces separately to greater advantage. Two large fragments together with a large number of smaller ones were ultimately recovered and by the aid of the squeeze the stone was completely restored and taken to the Louvre in Paris. The inscription consists of thirty-four lines, and recounts how Mesha wrested back the cities Medeba, Nebo, and Jahaz, which Omri and his son Ahab succeeded in taking from Moab, together with Ataroth, formerly inhabited by Gadites. The inhabitants of these cities he "devoted" (made herem, 'devoted to deity') to Chemosh, and carried on a campaign southward to Horonaim. The victorious campaign here commemorated was probably the same as that alluded to in II K 3 4 f. The stone is of special interest and value, since it is the oldest extant inscription in Hebrew (in the broad sense). It throws much light upon the history of the Hebrew alphabet and also on the grammatical and lexical characteristics of the ancient Hebrew speech. The stone reveals the fact that the Israelites and Moabites (as well as the other neighboring Semitic peoples) spoke practically the same language. There are remarkable affinities of thought, also, between the Moabite Stone and many passages of the O T. For a facsimile reproduction of two lines of this inscription see ALPHABET.

1. I am Mesha, son of Chemosh [kān?], King of Moab, the Daibonite.
2. My father reigned over Moab for thirty years, and I reigned
3. after my father. And I made this high place for Chemosh in ḲR[Ḥ]H, a [high place of sal]vation,
4. because he had saved me from all the assailants (?), and because he had let me see (my desire) upon all them that hated me. Omri,
5. King of Israel, afflicted Moab for many days, because Chemosh was angry with his land.
6. And his son succeeded him; and he also said I will afflict Moab. In my days said he [thus;]
7. but I saw (my desire) upon him and upon his house, and Israel perished with an everlasting destruction. Omri took possession of the [la]nd
8. of Mĕhēdeba, and it (i.e., Israel) dwelt therein, during his days, and half his son's days, forty years; but Chemosh [resto]red
9. it in my days. And I built Ba'al-Me'on, and I made it the reservoir (?); and I buil [t]
10. Ḳiryathēn. And the men of Gad had dwelt in the land of 'Aṭaroth from of old; and the king of Israel
11. had built for himself 'Ataroth. And I fought against the city, and took it. And I slew all the people [from]
12. the city, a gazingstock unto Chemosh, and unto Moab. And I brought back (or, took captive) thence the altar-hearth of Dawdoh (?), and I dragged
13. it before Chemosh in Keriyyoth. And I settled therein the men of SRN, and the men of 14. MḤRT. And Chemosh said unto me, Go, take Nebo against Israel. And I
15. went by night, and fought against it from the break of dawn until noon. And I took MESHA, mî'sha (מֵישָׁא, mēshā'): I. A son of Sharaim, a Benjamite (I Ch 8 9). II. A place on the boundary of the region occupied by the sons of Joktan (Gn 10 30). A. C. Z.

MESHACH, mî'shac (מֵישַׁךְ, mēshakh): A name given by Nebuchadrezzar to Mishael, one of Daniel's companions in Babylon (Dn 1 7). He was appointed over the province of Babylon (2 49). For refusing to worship the golden image he was cast into the fiery furnace, from which he came out uninjured (3 14 ff.). C. S. T.

MESHECH, mî'shec. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

MESHELEMIAH, mę-shel"ę-mai'ā (מְשֶׁלֶמְיָה, mᵉshelemyāh), 'J" has recompensed': The ancestral head of a division of Korahite Levites, entrusted with caring for the gates of the Temple (I Ch 9 21, 26 1, 2, 9). Also called Shallum (I Ch 9 9, 17, 19, 31), Shelemiah (26 14), and Meshullam (Neh 12 25). E. E. N.

MESHEZABEL, mę-shez'a-bel (מְשֵׁיזַבְאֵל, mᵉshēzabh'ēl, Meshezabeel AV), 'God is Savior': The name of a family of post-exilic Jews (Neh 3 4, 10 21, 11 24). E. E. N.

MESHILLEMITH, mę-shil'ę-mith. See MESHILLEMOTH.

MESHILLEMOTH, mę-shil'ę-mŏth (מְשִׁלֵּמוֹת, mᵉshillēmōth): 1. An Ephraimite (II Ch 28 12). 2. The head of a priestly family (I Ch 9 12, here called Meshillemith; Neh 11 13). E. E. N.

MESHOBAB, mę-shō'bab (מְשׁוֹבָב, mᵉshōbhābh), 'returned': The head of a Simeonite family (I Ch 4 34). E. E. N.

MESHULLAM, mę-shŭl'am (מְשֻׁלָּם, mᵉshullām), 'reconciled'?: 1. The grandfather of Shaphan, the scribe, in the reign of Josiah (II K 22 3). 2. A son of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 19). 3, 4, 5. Three Benjamites (I Ch 8 17, 9 7 = Neh 11 7; I Ch 9 8). 6. A Gadite (I Ch 5 13). 7. The father of Hilkiah, the priest (I Ch 9 11 = Neh 11 11). 8. A priest (I Ch 9 12). 9. A Kohathite, overseer of the repairs on the Temple, under Josiah (II Ch 34 12). 10. A "chief man" in Babylon, who helped Ezra to procure Levites to accompany him to Jerusalem (Ezr 8 16). 11. One who opposed Ezra in the matter of foreign wives (Ezr 10 15). 12. One who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 29). 13. A son of Berechiah, who assisted in repairing the wall (Neh 3 4, 30) and whose daughter was the wife of the son of Tobiah, the enemy of Nehemiah (6 18). 14. A son of Besodeiah who helped to repair the old gate (Neh 3 6). 15. One who stood at the left of Ezra when the Law was read (Neh 8 4). 16, 17. A priest and a chief who sealed the covenant (Neh 10 7, 20). 18. A prince in the procession at the dedication of the wall (Neh 12 33). 19, 20. Two heads of priestly houses in the time of Joiakim, the high priest (Neh 12 13, 16). 21. A porter under Joiakim (Neh 12 25). C. S. T.

MESHULLEMETH, mę-shŭl'ę-meth (מְשֻׁלֶּמֶת, mᵉshullemeth): The wife of King Manasseh and the mother of King Amon (II K 21 19). C. S. T.

MESSIAH (מָשִׁיחַ, māshīaḥ), from māshāḥ, 'to anoint': In the N T generally translated into Χριστός, "Christ," i.e., anointed (Jn 4 25, etc., Messias AV). In the O T, M. is used in conjunction with J″ ("Jehovah's anointed") as a title of honor for the king (I S 24 6, etc.). It is applied, however, without being designed to be literally understood, to the patriarchs (Ps 105 15) and to Cyrus (Is 45 1). Priests, as well as kings, and occasionally prophets, were anointed as a sign of their elevation to high functions.

1. Name.

The Messianic idea in its breadth is not to be limited by the meaning of the word Messiah. It includes all the aspirations of Israel to world-wide influence from the very first. Long before the hope was fixed in a single person who should carry out God's plan of righteous rule on earth, it had existed as an expectation that J″ would impart a blessing to all nations through the posterity of Abraham (Gn 12 3), that a succession of prophets would communicate God's will to Israel (Dt 18 18), and that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent (Gn 3 15). It was only after the downfall of the empire established by David and brought to its highest glory in Solomon that the idea assumed the form of the hope that the ideal kingdom should be restored. Hosea points to the return of Israel to David in the latter days (3 5), and Amos to the raising up of the fallen Tabernacle of David (9 11).

2. Earliest Conception.

But it is with Isaiah that the prospect of the birth of an ideal king first becomes clear (9 2-7). His reign is to be one of universal and endless peace and prosperity (11 1-9), though he was to appear in circumstances least promising. This thought is dwelt on specially by Micah in the announcement that, when the house of David had been reduced by the national misfortunes to the lowest condition and driven to its ancestral residence at Bethlehem, then the Deliverer ["Prince"] should appear (5 2, 5). Similarly, Jeremiah (23 5) foretold the springing up of a "Branch" from the fallen trunk of David, a king with the significant name "Jehovah our righteousness" (ver 6). During the period of the Exile, Ezekiel developed and enforced the hope (34 11-15, 23-31, particularly ver. 24; cf. also 37 24).

3. The Messianic King.

Quite a different aspect of the Messiah's person and work is presented in Deutero-Isaiah. In a series of passages is given the picture of a deliverer for Israel who accomplishes his work by sacrifice, suffering, and death (42 1-4, 61 1-3, 52 13–53 12) and is known as the "Servant of Jehovah," because his whole-hearted loyalty is in significant contrast to the stiff-necked disobedience of the people as a whole; and it is precisely because of this perfect devotion and obedience unto death that he is raised to a high reward. It has been said that the Servant of Jehovah is a personification of the faithful remnant of Israel, by whose vicarious sufferings the people are redeemed; but inasmuch as a nation could only be organized under a Head as the specially anointed of God, this Head (King), under whom the people is integrated, certainly has a real place in the conception of the servant. Here belong, too, Ps 22 1-11, 28 31. In Ps 2 the personal Messiah is represented as enthroned in Zion, and in Ps 110 as combining in Himself the office of Priest with that of King.

4. The Servant of God.

This agrees so completely with the conception of Zec 3 8 ff., where the Messiah is given the name of "Branch" (as in Jer), as to make it clear that in the post-exilic period the appearance of an ideal king had become an ineradicable element in Israelitic thought. From Zec 4 6 f. it might be inferred that Zerubbabel was by some regarded as the Branch; but, though the prophet encourages confidence in him, he seems to designate Jeshua, not Zerubbabel, as the 'anointed one' (6 9-15; cf. 4 14). In the Maccabæan age the name "Son of Man" was given to the Messiah (Dn 7 13). And in the apocalyptic literature the ideal figure, though naturally clothed in the symbolic garb characteristic of that type of writing, is constantly kept in view. In the Sib. Or. (III 97–807), issuing from the middle of the 2d cent. B.C., there is an unmistakable description of him. In Eth. En. (chs. 36–72, the Book of Similitudes) he is portrayed under the figure of a white bull. In addition, in the judgment of many scholars, Enoch adopted from Dn the title "Son of Man." In two of the Psalms of Solomon (17 36, 18 6-8) even the title "Messiah" is clearly fixed. Finally, the titles "elect" and "Son of God" are applied to him.

5. Post-Exilic Development.

6. Diverse Outgrowths.

Throughout its long history the conception of the Messiah became the subject of a variety of side developments, some of which are mere variants of the same fundamental type, and some are mutually exclusive. Of the latter class are the contradictory ideas, on the one hand, that the Messiah was Himself to be the deliverer of the people, and, on the other, that He was to be only the king who should rule it after it was delivered; also the view, on the one hand, that He was to deliver through His sufferings (carrying out the thought of Is 52 13–53 12), and, on the other, that He was to reign in glory. That a preparation should be made for Him was commonly accepted. Malachi's "messenger of Jehovah" and the second appearance of Elijah furnished the ground for this. The precursors of His reign were to include the dolores (ὠδῖναι) Messiæ, a phrase that refers, not to the experiences of the Messiah Himself, but to the experiences of the world in preparation for His coming; namely, the convulsions in nature and society foreshadowed in prophetic passages, such as Joel 2 28-32.

7. N T Messianism.

In the N T Jesus of Nazareth is identified as the Messiah (Mt 16 16, 20; Lk 4 18; Ac 2 36, 10 38), and is uniformly called "the Christ." What Jesus Himself thought the Messiahship was must be learned partly from His use of the title "Son of Man" as His own self-designation. By the choice of this title He excluded from the Messiah's character the main elements of the popular ideal, i.e., that of a conquering hero, who would exalt Israel above the heathen, and through such exclusion He seemed to fail to realize the older Scriptural conception. The failure, however, was only apparent and temporary. For in the second coming in glory He was to achieve this work. Accordingly, His disciples recognized a twofoldness in His Messiahship: (1) They saw realized in His past life the ideal Servant of Jehovah, the spiritual Messiah, the Christ who teaches and suffers for the people, and (2) they looked forward to the realization of the Davidic and conquering Messiah in His second coming in power and glory to conquer the nations and reign over them. But Jewish and Christian ideals part from each other at this point.

8. Later Jewish Messianism.

The later Jewish Messianic ideal was differentiated upon the ground of this distinction. Under the influence of the N T departure, Jewish thought took up the idea of a dying Messiah, but put it into a preparatory character (Mashiaḥ ben-Joseph), who was to give his life in the defense of the nation as a warrior, but with no reference to sin or atonement. His death would simply pave the way for the second Messiah, the Everlasting King (Mashiaḥ ben-David). Cf. Dalman, Der leidende u. sterbende Messias, 1888.

9. Christian Messianism.

The Christian idea, on the other hand, took into itself all the spiritual elements of the Hebrew thought as revealed in the O T, blended them into a unity, grouped them under the one head of anointing from above, and traced them to Jesus, who was thenceforth considered preeminently the Anointed. With the Greek name "Christ" the conception passed from its Jewish to its universally human stage. See also ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 28, 33 f.

METALS: The geological strata of Syria and Palestine being of recent sedimentary formation are wanting in metals. A limited amount of brown and granular iron ore is found, but the nature of the formation forbids the presence of other metals, which consequently were known to the Israelites only through importation from outside. Gold (zāhābh, poetical ḥārūts, kethem, paz) finds mention in the earliest times. It came into Palestine chiefly through the agency of the Phœnicians (Ezk 27 22). Arabian merchants brought it to the market of Tyre from Sheba and Ra'ma. Solomon is said to have obtained it through the expeditions of his navy to Ophir. It was used for gilding the roofs, walls, and doors of palaces and temples, for plating idols, for all kinds of vessels, bowls, and cups, for ornamentation, etc. Minted gold coins were unknown in pre-exilic days, but bars, round, flat disks, rings, and wedges (cf. Jos 7 21) of gold were in use, as media of exchange.

1. Gold.

It is evident that the Israelites learned how to work gold at an early date, since the oldest prophetic writings contain many figures of speech derived from the goldsmith's art. Gold and silver were 'refined' (tsāraph) by melting, i.e., the dross was separated from the pure metal. To hasten the purifying process use was made of an alkali (bôr, Is 1 25). We find mention made of a number of the instruments and utensils of the goldsmith, viz., the hammer, the anvil, tongs, chisel, graving tool, bellows, crucible, and melting-oven. That they understood soldering is clear from Is 41 7, while other passages show they knew how to smooth and polish the metal. They were also acquainted with the art of plating metals, an industry always of great importance in Western Asia. In Ex 28 6 ff. we read of small threads, which evidently were cut from thin gold-plate, being woven into expensive cloth.

2. Silver.

Far more common was the use of silver (keṣeph), which also probably was brought into the country by the Phœnicians, who obtained it from the mines of Tarshish, i.e., Spain. From the earliest times it served as a medium of exchange, though not in the form of coins, but of bars, which were weighed. Silver was put to much the same use as gold, e.g., for decorating palaces and sanctuaries, for idols, for musical instruments, etc.

Of almost greater importance was the Cyprian bronze (æs Cyprium), i.e., copper (nᵉḥōsheth).

3. Bronze.

Since pure native copper was found but rarely in the countries known to the ancients, the ore had first to be smelted (cf. Job 28 2). Through this process it was discovered that, if the copper was alloyed, especially with tin, it became nearly as hard as steel. Such alloyed copper was called brass (nᵉḥōsheth). From this were made pots, cups, pans, ladles, knives, etc. (Ex 38 3; Lv 6 21; Nu 16 39 [17 4]; Jer 52 18). Of the same metal weapons were also made: helmets, coats of mail, greaves, coverings for the legs, and shields (I S 17 5 f., 38); spear tips and bows (II S 21 16, 22 35); also chains (Jg 16 21) and mirrors (Ex 38 8; Job 37 18). Great quantities of brass were used in the construction of the Temple: the altar and its network, the basins, the sea that rested on twelve brazen oxen, the two pillars that stood before the Temple, etc.—all were of brass (II Ch 4 1). That Solomon had to employ the Tyrian Huram-abi (Hiram) to cast these things shows that as late as the early Kingdom period the Israelites were still ignorant of the art of casting the metal. They learned it from the Phœnicians.

Iron (barzel) was not equal in importance to brass. Israel became acquainted with it somewhat late.

4. Iron.

Their knowledge was gained through the Canaanites, who had long known how to work the metal, and even in early times had possessed chariots protected with iron. This agrees with the fact that Israel did not gain possession of the Canaanite cities until some time after the Conquest. As peasants they had been accustomed to make their own clothing, utensils, weapons, etc., as is partly the case in Palestine to-day. It was in the cities that division of labor first took place, and only in these could craftsmen exist at a time when trade was so little developed. The raw material was brought in by Tyrians, mainly from Spain, though it was also found in the Lebanon range (Jer 11 4; Dt 4 20, 8 9; I K 8 51). Out of iron the blacksmiths (ḥārāshē habbarzel) made axes and hatchets (Dt 19 5; II K 6 5), sickles, knives, swords, and spears (I S 17 7), bars (Is 45 2), chains and fetters (Ps 105 18, 107 10), nails, hoes, and pens (Jer 17 1; Job 19 24). Iron was also used for plows, threshing-wagons, and sledges (Am 1 3; I S 13 20; II S 12 31).

Tin (bᵉdhīl) was brought by the Phœnicians from Tarshish (Ezk 27 12). It seems to have been used almost entirely as the alloy with which to harden copper.

Lead (ʿōphereth) was also brought in by Phœnicians in connection with their naval expeditions to Tarshish (Ezk 27 12; cf. Pliny, III, 7).

6. Lead.

The metal came mainly, however, from the so-called Tin Islands (the Cassiterides), usually identified with the coast of Cornwall, which still constitutes the main source of tin and lead for Europe (cf. Pliny, IV, 36; VII, 57). According to Job 19 24, lead was used for monumental tablets. In Am 7 7 we read of the plummet of lead. From Ezk 22 20 it may be inferred that the use of lead as an alloy was known to the ancients.

METE-YARD. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES § 2.

METHEG-AMMAH, mi''theg-am'ā (מֶתֶג הָאַמָּה, metheg hā-'ammāh), "the bridle of the mother-city" (so RV): The text where this term occurs (II S 8 1) is difficult, if not corrupt, and the Greek versions give no help. The meaning seems to be that David captured the Philistine metropolis. Most expositors have felt it necessary to find here an equivalent for Gath and its towns. C. S. T.

METHUSAEL, mę-thū'sa-el. See METHUSHAEL.

METHUSELAH, me-thū'sę-lā (מְתוּשֶׁלַח, mᵉthūshelaḥ), 'man of the dart'; perhaps a variation of a Babylonian name, 'man of Shelah' (the name of a deity): A Sethite, the father of Lamech (Gn 5 25) = Methushael in the Cainite genealogy (Gn 4 18). C. S. T.

METHUSHAEL, mę'thū'sha-el (מְתוּשָׁאֵל, mᵉthūshā'ēl, Methusael AV): One of the antediluvian patriarchs in the Cainite list (Gn 4 18), corresponding to Methuselah of the Sethite list (5 21). The name is Babylonian, meaning 'man of God.' See METHUSELAH. E. E. N.

MEUNIM, mę-ū'nim (מְעוּנִים, mᵉʿūnīm, Mehunim AV): A tribe residing to the S. of Judah near Edom, probably to be identified with the Arabians of Maʿān. It is first mentioned in Jg 10 12 (under the name Maonim), as an ancient enemy of Israel. In the days of Jehoshaphat the M. joined with Moabites and others in an unsuccessful attack on Judah (II Ch 20 1, 10, 22 f.). Later, Uzziah had trouble with them (II Ch 26 7). In Hezekiah's day they suffered severely at the hands of the Simeonites (I Ch 4 41 RV). It may be that descendants of captive Meunim are referred to in Ezr 2 50 = Neh 7 52. Recently, it has been thought by some that the preceding passages (except the last) refer to the N. Arabian Minæans, but the reasons given are inconclusive. E. E. N.

MEZAHAB, mez'a-hab (מִיזָהָב, mēzāhābh), 'waters of gold' (?): The grandfather of Mehetabel (Gn 36 39; I Ch 1 50). E. E. N.

MEZOBAITE, mę-zō'ba-ait (מְצֹבָיָה, mᵉtsōbhāyāh, Mesobaite AV): An obscure term designating, apparently, the home of Jaasiel (I Ch 11 47). The text is probably corrupt. E. E. N.

MIAMIN, mai'a-min. See MIJAMIM.

MIBHAR, mib'hār (מִבְחָר, mibhḥār): One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 38), but in the ‖ (II S 23 36) we read "of Zobah" (very similar in Heb. letters to Mibhar), which is probably the true text. E. E. N.

MIBSAM, mib'sam (מִבְשָׂם, mibhsām): 1. An Ishmaelite clan (Gn 25 13; I Ch 1 29). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11. 2. A clan of Simeon (I Ch 4 25). Curiously, in both cases after Mibsam a Mishma is mentioned, indicating a possible connection between Simeonite and Ishmaelite clans. E. E. N.

MIBZAR, mib'zār (מִבְצָר, mibhtsār): A clan-chieftain, probably a clan also, of Edom (Gn 36 42; I Ch 1 53). It may also be a place-name.

MICA, mai'ca, MICAH, mai'cā, MICAIAH, mai-kê'yā (מִיכָיָהוּ, mīkhāyāh[ū], also מִיכָיָהוּ, mīkhāyʿhū, מִיכָה, mīkhāh, and in some MSS. מִיכָא, mīkhā'; cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex.): A name very common in the O T, from mī, 'who,' khᵉ, 'like,' and Yāh, 'Jehovah,' 'who is like J",' abbreviated often to Mica, but more usually to Micah and Micaiah.

I. Mica (Micha AV). 1. A Levite, the son of Zichri (I Ch 9 15). 2. The son of Mephibosheth, see below II, 3. 3. One of the signatories of the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10 11). 4. The son of Zabdi, a Levite (Neh 11 17, the same as 3?).

II. Micah. 1. An Ephraimite (Jg 17 1), who restored some money he had stolen from his mother. This money was then dedicated to the service of J", and spent in the making of a graven image and the employment of a Levite priest, both ultimately taken from Micah by the Danites. 2. A son of Joel, the head of a family of Reubenites (I Ch 5 5). 3. A great-grandson of Saul through Mephibosheth (Meribbaal) (II S 9 12; I Ch 8 34; cf. I, 2, above). 4. The son of Uzziel, a Kohathite priest (I Ch 23 20). 5. The father of Achbor (or Abdon) (II K 22 12; II Ch 34 20; see III, 2, below). 6. The Morashtite prophet Micah (Mic 1 1; see MICAH, BOOK OF).

III. Micaiah (Michaiah AV). 1. The son of Imlah (I K 22 8 f.; II Ch 18 2 f.), a prophet of the time of Ahab, who was summoned at the request of Jehoshaphat to Samaria, and there foretold the impending defeat of Ahab at Ramoth Gilead. For this he was put into prison. 2. The father of Achbor (II K 22 12, the same as II, 5, above). 3. One of the princes sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the people (II Ch 17 7). 4. A priest, father of Mattaniah (Neh 12 35). 5. Son of Gemariah, a leading man of Judah in the days of Jehoiakim (Jer 36 11, 13). 6. The mother of Abijah, King of Judah (II Ch 13 2), and daughter of Uriel, but in II Ch 11 20, "the daughter of Absalom" (I K 15 2, "Abishalom"), called Maacah.

A. C. Z.

MICAH, BOOK OF: One of the minor prophetic writings of the O T. The personality of the author of this book, like those of most of the minor prophets, is hidden in obscurity. He was a resident of Moresheth-Gath, an obscure town in Judah, and bore the very common name of Micaiah (see MICA, II, 6). The time in which his prophetic ministry falls is given as "the days of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah," or between 745 and 700 B.C. In the early part of this period, the Northern Kingdom was still standing, but the signs of its downfall were in clear view, and Micah joined with Hosea and Amos in denouncing its sins. His mission, however, was not to the Northern Kingdom alone, but also to the Southern, and he views the sins of both kingdoms as summed up and brought to their climax in the capital cities of Samaria and Jerusalem respectively (1 5).

1. The Prophet.

The Book of Micah is usually divided into three sections, each introduced with the formula "Hear ye." I. The first section comprises the first two chapters of the book, and begins by describing the coming of J" for judgment upon Samaria and Jerusalem (1 1-9). This visitation is figured under the image of the march of a devastating army through the country (1 10-16). It is a judgment based on the violence and greed of the wealthy, who do not scruple to crush the poor and defenseless (2 1-11). II. The second section (chs. 3–5) opens with a repetition of the charges against the leaders of the people, enumerating judges, priests, and prophets as guilty of avarice and injustice. For these sins Zion should be "plowed as a field" (3 1-12). But the prophet looks forward to the effect of the chastisement of the nation as it shall come in a grand Messianic age of restoration and comfort (4 1–5 1), and goes on to picture the Deliverer, who is to issue from the house of David, even though this house had been compelled by adversity to withdraw into its rural domain of Bethlehem (5 2-15). III. The third section is a simple series of exhortations to repentance and warnings against sin (chs. 6, 7).

2. Divisions and Contents.

The foregoing outline, however, follows the thought of the book only in a very general way, overleaping certain abrupt transitions and serious obscurities. Upon the basis of these it has been argued that the book is not a unit. Moreover, the allusion in 4 10 to Babylon seems meaningless as addressed to the generation of 745 to 700 B.C. It has been supposed by some that this difficulty might be obviated by the assumption of the alteration of some other name into Babylon, but this supposition rather confirms than explains the obscurity in question. Chs. 6 and 7 have also been supposed to fit better into the age of Manasseh than into the last quarter of the 8th cent. B.C. In fact, in 7 7-20 signs of a post-exilic date have been discerned, such as the scattering of the exiles far and wide through the world (7 12), the expectation that the walls of Jerusalem will be rebuilt (7 11), etc. All that can be said safely is that chs. 1–3 are certainly the work of Micah, and that the rest of the book has been more or less subjected to editorial revision, and perhaps to the incorporation of a few fragments belonging to a later date.

MICHAIAH, mai-kê'yā. See MICA, III.

MICHAL, mai'cal (מִיכַל, mīkhal, an abbreviated form of 'Michael'): The name of the younger daughter of Saul, the only instance where the name is given to a woman. Her first appearance presents her as anxious to become the wife of David. This is an unparalleled instance in the Bible of a woman openly avowing her love for a man and her desire to marry him (I S 18 19-21). Saul's remark upon deciding to abet her desire indicates that he judged her to be a person of peculiar disposition. When she next appears it is in a ruse by which she saves the life of her husband (I S 19 12 f.). The third time she is mentioned it is as restored to David (II S 3 13), and the last, as a mocker of his uncontrolled enthusiasm in a religious dance (II S 6 16). 'Michal' in II S 21 8 is evidently a mistaken reading for 'Merab' (q.v.). A. C. Z.

MICHMAS, mic'mas (מִכְמָס, mikhmās): The form in Ezr 2 27 = Neh 7 31 of a name which is spelled elsewhere as in the next article. C. S. T.

MICHMASH, mic'mash (מִכְמָשׂ, mikhmās [not מִכְמָשׁ, mikhmāsh, as generally read]): A place in Benjamin, 7 m. N. of Jerusalem, the modern Mukhmās, 2,000 ft. above sea-level on the hill, N. of the narrow and deep Wâdy es-Suwēnīṭ, a part of the pass which leads from Bethel on the table-land of Ephraim down to Jericho. Jonathan had driven the Philistines from Geba (I S 13 3) on the height S. of this pass, and with Saul and their followers had encamped there, over against the Philistines in Michmash (I S 13 16). The valley between is called the "pass of Michmash" (I S 13 23). This height is represented by Isaiah as being taken by the Assyrians in his prophetic description of the coming attack on Jerusalem (Is 10 28). By descending from Geba and ascending the southern side of Michmash, Jonathan and his armor-bearer surprised the Philistines and put them to flight (I S 14 1 ff.). After the Captivity members of the Jewish community lived in M. (Ezr 2 27; Neh 7 31, 11 31). It was the residence of Jonathan Maccabæus, 156–152 B.C. (I Mac 9 73). Map III, F 5. C. S. T.

MICHMETHAH, mic'mē-thā (הַמִּכְמְתָה, ha-mikhmᵉthāh): The article shows it is not a proper name, but an appellative. A place on the border between Ephraim and Manasseh, E. of Shechem (Jos 17 7, 16 6), not yet identified. C. S. T.

MIDDIN, mid'din (מִדִּין, middīn): A city in the wilderness of Judah (Jos 15 61). Site unknown. E. E. N.

MIDIAN, mid'i-an, MIDIANITES, mid'i-an-aits: According to Gn 25 2, מִדְיָן, midhyān, was one of the sons of Abraham by Keturah, i.e., Midian was one of a number of tribes in NW. Arabia who were reckoned, genealogically, as closely related and descended from a more remote ancestral tribe, Keturah. The numerous references to the Midianites in the O T all imply the same general locality, NW. Arabia, as their home, although they seem to be viewed as made up of a number of clans (Gn 25 4) who ranged over a wide extent of country, from the region E. of the Sinaitic Peninsula (Ex 2 15 f.) northward as far as the territory E. of Gilead (Nu ch. 22; Jg ch. 6 f.). The references are not all of the same character and may be best explained as referring to different branches of the same people at different periods of Israel's history. Since Keturah is represented as only a concubine, or, at best, a second wife, of Abraham, the kinship of the Midianites to the Israelites was considered by the latter as less close than that of the Ishmaelites (descended from Sarah's maid Hagar). In Moses' day the relations between Israel and Midian were most friendly. It was among a small tribe or clan of these people that Moses found refuge when he fled from Pharaoh, and one of the daughters or Reuel or Jethro, the "priest" and chief of the clan became his wife (Ex 2 16 ff.). This same person Jethro (or his son?), called also Hobab (Nu 10 29 ff.; Jg 1 16, 4 11), is also called a Kenite, so that the Kenites were possibly a Midianite clan. When the Israelites were dwelling in Moabite territory the attitude of the Midianites, according to one line of tradition, was hostile (Nu 22 4, 7, 25 15, 18, 31 1-12). This hostility manifested itself again in later years after Israel had gained possession of Canaan (Jg chs. 6–8). The Midianites are variously represented as a peaceful pastoral people (Ex 2 16 ff.), as traveling merchants (Gn 37 28, 36), and as marauding Bedouin (Jg chs. 6–8). In all this there is nothing inconsistent with the well-known habits of large Arabian tribes. They seem to have lost their identity at an early period. A late trace of them may be detected in the town Madyan (Μοδίανα) mentioned by the geographer Ptolemy as situated on the NW coast of Arabia. E. E. N.

MIDWIFE: In the Orient the help of a medical expert is not always required at childbirth, the place of the physician being taken either by experienced women relatives or friends, or by a special class of semiprofessionals called "midwives." In ancient times this class must have been even more extensively resorted to (Gn 35 17, 38 28; Ex 1 15 ff.) than is the case at present. A. C. Z.

MIGDAL-EL, mig'dal-êl" (מִגְדַּל־אֵל, migdal'ēl), 'tower of God': A city of Naphtali (Jos 19 38). Site unknown. E. E. N.

MIGDAL-GAD, mig'dal-gad" (מִגְדַּל־גָּד, mighdal-gādh), 'tower of Gad': A city of Judah, in the Shephelah (Jos 15 37), which has not been identified. There is a Mejdel about 2½ m. NE. of Ashkelon, with foundations, cisterns, and rock tombs. C. S. T.

MIGDOL, mig'dol (מִגְדּוֹל, mighdōl), 'tower': The name of one or more places in Egypt where there was a fortress. We should use the marginal reading of Ezk 29 10, 30 6, where Migdol is on the northern boundary of Egypt. Jewish refugees were found in M. and in two other frontier cities. The best-known M. (Gr. Μάγδωλος) was 12 m. S. of Pelusium. Probably another M. is mentioned in Ex 14 2; Nu 33 7, near the border of Egypt, where the Israelites left the country. C. S. T.

MIGHTY MEN. See MAN.

MIGHTY ONE: This term is a rendering of (1) gibbōr, a human being of exceptional physical stature and strength (Gn 10 8; Jer 46 5; Jl 3 11); (2) 'addīr, 'honorable,' of a superhuman being (Is 10 34); (3) Ēl, 'God' (Ezk 31 11); (4) 'abbīr, a brute of monstrous size (Jg 5 22); (5) tsūr, 'rock' (Is 30 29). A. C. Z.

MIGHTY WORK. See WONDER.

MIGRON, mig'ron (מִגְרוֹן, migrōn): 1. The name of the place where Saul encamped in or near Geba (I S 14 2). It should probably be translated "threshing-floor." 2. A place between Aiath and Michmash, on the line of march the prophet lays out for the approach of the Assyrian army (Is 10 28). It is perhaps the modern ruin Makrûn, N. of Michmash. Map III, F 5. C. S. T.

MIJAMIN, mij'a-min (מִיָּמִין, miyyāmīn): 1. The ancestral head of one of the great priestly families, constituting the sixth course of priests. The term is also used for representatives of this family (I Ch 24 9; Neh 10 7, 12 5. Miniamin in vs. 17 and 41). 2. One of the "sons of Parosh" (Ezr 10 25, Miamin AV). E. E. N.

MIKLOTH, mik'loth (מִקְלוֹת, miqlōth): 1. The ancestor of a Benjamite family living near Gibeon (I Ch 8 32, 9 37 f.). 2. An officer under David (I Ch 27 4). E. E. N.

MIKNEIAH, mik-ni'yā (מִקְנֵיָהוּ, miqnēyāhū): A Levite musician (I Ch 15 18, 21). E. E. N.

MILALAI, mil'a-lai (מִלָּלַי, mīlălay): A Levite musician (Neh 12 36). E. E. N.

MILCAH, mil'cā (מִלְכָּה, milkāh), 'queen': 1. Counted as a daughter of Haran and wife of Haran's brother Nahor; but according to the genealogical mode of writing history, her name in reality represents a tribe. Such amalgamations are probably represented by these references: Gn 11 29, 22 20, 23, 24 15, 24, 47. 2. One of the 'daughters of Zelophehad" (Nu 26 33, 27 1, 36 11; Jos 17 3). In fact, these "daughters" were towns. Milcah has not been identified (see ZELOPHEHAD). E. E. N.

MILE. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 2.

MILETUS, mai-li'tus (Μίλητος, Miletum in II Ti 4 20 AV): A town on the Carian coast of Asia Minor, the seaport of Ephesus. It was colonized by Ionian Greeks under Neleus. At an early period it became a flourishing seaport and commercial center, its ships visiting every part of the Mediterranean and particularly the Euxine Sea, on whose coasts it founded seventy-five cities. After the Persian victory off the island of Lade (494), Miletus was sacked, its male citizens slain, the rest transported to Susa and Ampe (at the mouth of the Tigris). Later, it regained some of its prosperity. In 479 it joined the Athenian league, from which it afterward revolted, and defeated the Athenian fleet off Miletus in 412. It was captured by Alexander in 334, from which time its importance waned, though in the time of Paul it had recovered some prosperity. It did not cease to exist until several centuries after Christ. It was here that the Apostle bade farewell to the elders of the Ephesian Church (Ac 20 15-17), and at a later visit, because of illness, left behind his companion Trophimus (II Ti 4 20). The alluvial silt deposited by the Mæander has changed the whole coast line of the Latmic Gulf (now an inland lake), so that the fever-stricken site of Miletus is several miles inland. There are few remains of the city—a large free standing theater being the most conspicuous ruin. J. R. S. S.

MILK. See FOOD, § 6.

MILL, MILLSTONE: In olden times the mill (rēḥayīm, late Heb. ṭeḥōn, ṭaḥănāh) was an indispensable household utensil. As the meal needed for baking was prepared daily, the sound of the mill was heard regularly wherever there was a dwelling (Jer 25 10; Ec 12 4). The mill consisted of two stones of either heavy or porous basalt, 17–19 ins. in diameter, and when new about 4 ins. thick. The lower stone (pelaḥ taḥtīth, Job 41 24[16]), which was generally extra hard and somewhat convex on top, had in the middle a small round peg of very hard wood. The upper stone (pelaḥ rekebh, Jg 9 53, or simply rekebh, i.e., 'rider,' Dt 24 6) was concave on the under side. It had in the middle a funnel-shaped hole in which the peg of the lower stone fitted loosely. Into this hole the grain for grinding was poured. The upper stone was revolved by means of an upright pin near the rim. The grinding was done usually by female slaves (Ex 11 5; Is 47 2), probably also by prisoners (Jg 16 21; La 5 13). The meal, which poured out at the rim of the lower stone, was gathered in a cloth spread out under the mill. Whether anything like the durra mill of the Arabs was used by the Israelites in Palestine is doubtful, though probably this may have been the case when they lived in the desert. This mill consisted of two stones, the lower concave, the upper one round. The grain was shaken into the lower stone and crushed by the rubbing of the upper one. In later times, large mills worked by an ass came into use (cf. the μύλος ὀνικός of Mt 18 6). W. N.

MILLET. See PALESTINE, § 22.

MILLO, mil'ō (מִלּוֹא, millō'): 1. The Millo (always with the article), in Jerusalem, seems originally to have been a part of the Jebusite fortifications (II S 5 9 = I Ch 11 8). If the word is Hebrew, it apparently means a 'fill [of earth],' and referred to some important earthwork guarding the N. approach to the citadel. This 'fill' was extended (across the Tyropœon Valley?) by David and Solomon (II S 5 9; I K 9 15). See also JERUSALEM, § 20. 2. The house of Millo ('Beth-millo' ARV mg.). An unknown place (or family?) near Shechem (Jg 9 6, 20). It is possibly the same as "the tower of Shechem" (Jg 9 47 ff.). 3. The house of Millo, where Joash was slain (II K 12 20), was presumably in Jerusalem and connected with 1, above.

MINA. See MONEY, § 7.

MIND. See MAN, DOCTRINE OF, § 9.

MINE, MINING: The term "mine" (referring to metals) is used in EV but once (Job 28 1 "vein"). Here it renders mōtsā', 'outgoing.' For the knowledge and use of metals among the Hebrews, see METALS. E. E. N.

MINGLED PEOPLE: The rendering of the Heb. 'ērebh (from 'ārabh, 'to mix') in I K 10 15; Jer 25 20, 24, 50 37; Ezk 30 5. The same word is rendered mixed multitude in Ex 12 38 and Neh 13 3. In Ex 12 38 the reference is to the non-Israelite people of uncertain or mixed descent who accompanied the Israelites in the Exodus from Egypt. In Jer 25 20 and Ezk 30 5, the mixed populations of, or dependent upon, Egypt are meant. In Jer 50 37 the various nationalities represented in Babylon are intended. The reading in Jer 25 24 is probably a late gloss, while in I K 10 15 "kings of Arabia" should probably be read (according to the || in II Ch 9 14).

MINIAMIN, min'i-a-min (מִנְיָמִין, minyāmīn): 1. A Levite under Hezekiah (II Ch 31 15). 2. See MIJAMIN, 1. E. E. N.

MINISTER, MINISTRY: In the O T the nouns 'minister' and 'ministry' are always used in the religious sphere, except in I K 10 5 = II Ch 9 4. The Heb. verb shārath, rendered "minister," means 'to serve,' but is not used of the service of slaves. A "minister" was thus one who 'served' in attendance on the sanctuary, whether a priest or one of the lower orders. See CHURCH, §§ 6 and 7, and SYNAGOGUE, § 2. E. E. N.

MINNI, min'ai (מִנִּי, minnī): A kingdom mentioned in connection with those of Ararat and Ashkenaz by Jeremiah in his denunciation of Babylon (Jer 51 27). The Minni of this passage corresponds to the Mannâ of the Assyrian inscriptions. The kingdom lay between the lakes of Urumiah and Van. The people were probably Indo-Europeans, and closely related to the Medes. Their capital was Zirtu, or Izirtu. The later Assyrian kings frequently invaded this territory, but held it with difficulty. J. A. K.

MINNITH, min'ith (מִנִּית, minnīth): The northernmost city taken during Jephthah's Ammonite campaign (Jg 11 33). Its exact situation is unknown, but could scarcely be so far S. or W. as the PEF map indicates. If the text of Ezk 27 17 is correct (but see Davidson, in Camb. Bible), M. was famous for its wheat. L. G. L.

MINSTREL: This term is applied to professional musicians (αὐλητής, Mt 9 23 AV, but "flute-players" RV) employed at funerals (cf. MOURNING AND MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 5). In more ancient usage, minstrelsy was associated with the art of divination (nāgān, II K 3 15), furnishing an accompaniment of plaintive melody to the process of self-excitation. See also MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 2 (b). A. C. Z.

MIPHKAD, mif'kad, GATE OF. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

MIRACLES (the rendering of one Heb. and several Gr. words. For the etymological discussion of these see WONDER): (1) The belief in 1. Miracles in General. miracles has been wide-spread. It has been the normal accompaniment of the belief in communications from God to man. If certain individual men were chosen to be the vehicles or organs of such communications, then it was but natural that they should be expected to show their credentials, and these credentials took the form of endowment with unusual powers, as a mark of special Divine favor. (2) There appear to have been persons attached to temples, whose business it was to recount the miracles wrought by the god, to interpret dreams inspired by him within the sacred precincts, and the like. Their proper name was ἀρεταλόγοι, and their function was called ἀρεταλογία (Schol. in Juv. xv, 15; arithologi sunt, ut quidam volunt qui miras res, id est deorum virtutes loquuntur). By extension, the term came to mean 'professed story-tellers,' especially tellers of travelers' tales, with an ample supply of the marvelous. In this way arose a form of literature which is satirized by Lucian in his Vera Historia and Philopseudes. More serious, indeed perhaps the most elevated specimen of its kind, is the Life of Apollonius of Tyana, by Philostratus (circa 220 A.D.; Apollonius himself died about 97 A.D.). Apollonius is a Neo-Pythagorean philosopher, who in his travels visits the Brahmins in India and the Gymnosophistæ in Ethiopia, the supposed repositories of the highest wisdom. The description of the Brahmins is characterized by much that is marvelous; but Apollonius himself has the power of predicting events, of exorcising demons, of putting down ghosts and Lamiæ. On one occasion he causes a pestilence to cease by indicating the appropriate sacrifices; he is transported from place to place; he can at will release himself from fetters. The sage had been often called a magus (so, e.g., by Origen); but the Life claims for him the higher rôle of a philosopher. And yet the wonders ascribed to him are very much of the nature of magic, another wide-spread phenomenon in the life of the first three centuries. It would, however, be a mistake to think of all that passed under this name as pure imposture and delusion. Ramsay in particular has rightly pointed out that "no strict line could then be drawn between lawful, honorable scrutinizing of the secret powers of Nature and illicit attempts to pry into them for selfish ends, between science and magic, between chemistry and alchemy, between astronomy and astrology. The two sides of investigation passed by hardly perceptible degrees into each other" (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 78). It is permissible to think that among the best representatives of pagan religion, in the priesthood and in connection with the oracles, there was a nucleus of real insight and knowledge of the processes of nature, along with something that might be called at times a genuine inspiration.

(1) The early chapters of Genesis stand rather apart, as falling under the head of what may be called 'symbolic history.' Putting these aside, the miracles of the O T fall into four groups: (i) The miraculous narratives of the Hexateuch, including the Exodus, the wanderings with the giving of the Law from Mt. Sinai, and the conquest of Canaan; (ii) the Elijah- and Elisha-narratives; (iii) the supernatural element in the lives of the prophets; (iv) a few miracles that may be called 'literary,' like those in the Books of Jonah and Daniel. (2) With the exception of a few fragments (e.g., in Nu ch. 21), the oldest portions of the Hexateuch are probably separated from the events by not less than four centuries. It would follow almost inevitably that the story has come down to us very largely in the form of folk-lore. It need not be on that account, and is not, any the less a vehicle of Divine revelation—as it is conspicuously in such passages as Ex chs. 3, 20, 24, 34, etc. Neither is there any reason to question the strong belief which dominated the whole history of Israel, that the deliverance from Egypt was a great providential interposition, and the nucleus of the Pentateuch legislation a special work of Divine inspiration. At the same time, the details of the narratives as we have them show evident signs of the kind of shaping that would be natural to folk-lore. This appears, e.g., in the artificial numeration of the Ten Plagues, and in the highly poetic description of the giving of the Law from Sinai, modeled upon the standing symbolism of Hebrew theophanies (the storm-cloud, fire, lightning, and thunder, as in Ps 18, etc.), and in the equally poetic description of the battle of Bethhoron (Jos ch. 10). (3) The histories of Elijah and Elisha are much nearer, indeed quite near, to the events. And yet the difference is one of degree rather than of kind. Here, too, an element of folk-lore has entered in, especially in the case of Elisha (e.g., II K 2 19-25). But, along with this, not only are the general narratives at a high level, as the history of a crisis at once of sacred and of secular history, but they also embody incidentally notable revelations, as to Elijah at Horeb, to Elisha's servant at Dothan, in the story of Gehazi, etc. (4) From a religious point of view, the culminating instances of the supernatural in the O T are in connection with the writing prophets; for instance, the visions which accompanied the call of the leading prophets (Is ch. 6; Jer ch. 1; Ezk ch. 1), the communion which they are represented as habitually holding with God, and the peculiar insight into His counsels with which they were endowed. But there are also definite predictions, literally fulfilled (e.g., the destruction of Sennacherib's army, or Jeremiah's denunciation of the false prophet Hananiah). It was never intended that we should take literally such things as Jonah and the whale, or the celestial journeys of Ezekiel (Ezk 2 12, 8 3, 11 1, 24, 37 1, 43 5). That these things should have been taken literally at different periods in the history of the Church does not affect the matter; because from the first the stress lay upon the moral lessons conveyed, and not upon the reality of the occurrence as history.

3. Miracles in the N T.

(1) The miracles of the N T group themselves according as they occur, (i) in the Gospels, (ii) in the Acts, (iii) or as they are alluded to in the Epistles. Under each of these classes the attestation of the N T miracles is very strong. (2) Miracles are ascribed to our Lord practically in all the documents that criticism can distinguish. The main body is found in the Mark Gospel; but two (the Centurion's Servant and the Dumb Demoniac) appear to be directly narrated in the second document, which is often called the Logia, besides many allusions. Miracles occur also in the matter peculiar both to Lk and to Mt. One miracle, the Feeding of the Five Thousand, is common to all Four Gospels; and the same is true of the great miracle of the Resurrection. (3) Besides the wide diffusion of the evidence, direct and indirect, there are also special features which enhance its historical value. One is the careful distinction that is drawn (and, except in Jn 10 41, tacitly drawn) between Christ and the Baptist; no miracles are ascribed to the latter. It is also noticeable that miracles have no exaggerated estimate put upon them (Mt 12 39; Jn 4 48, 20 29). Cf. also JESUS CHRIST, § 12. (4) The miracles of Acts are naturally seen at their best in the so-called 'We-passages.' These acquire an increased importance from the recent adhesion of so prominent a scholar as Harnack (Lukas der Arzt, 1906) to the view which, though questioned in Germany, has been almost universal in England, that Luke himself is not only the author of these passages, but of the rest of the Acts and of the Third Gospel. We may safely set down these miracles as recorded by an eye-witness. (5) Paul was not only an eye-witness of events that happened in the Church of his time, but was himself a leading actor in those events. Several allusions in his Epistles (esp. Ro 15 19; II Co 12 12) show that he fully believed that he had himself worked miracles on a considerable scale. Besides this experience of his own, he speaks with evident knowledge of miracles regularly worked by others (I Co 12 9 f., 29 f.; Gal 2 5). Nothing can be more certain than that what were thought to be miracles were a standing phenomenon in the early Church. (6) It is also certainly true that the disciple was not above his Master, or the servant above his Lord.

Not only do the miracles of the Apostolic Age point back to those of Christ, but it may be said with some confidence that without miracles the claims of Christ would never have been accepted as they were. (7) In regard to the miracles of the Gospels the present writer has elsewhere summarized and formulated his own opinion to the effect that the most judicious course is to accept them as they stand, but perhaps with a note of interrogation in brackets and in the margin. By this he means that the question in regard to them, a question that can not be perfectly solved, relates not to the broad fact that miracles were really performed by Christ—for this he regards as certain—but only to the way in which the description of them is to be adjusted to present-day ideas and convictions.

4. The Rationale of Miracles.

(1) The great difficulty that confronts us at the present moment is that which has just been mentioned, the difficulty of exactly correlating and harmonizing the ideas of the twentieth century with those of the first. Two conclusions seem to emerge from the historical investigation on the one hand and from the philosophical on the other. (i) Miracles, or what the Christians of that day entirely believed to be such, certainly happened. (ii) And yet these miracles are not at all likely to have been of a kind really to violate the laws of nature. We may lay it down as most probable that there is somewhere in the nature of things a possible adjustment of the facts historically verified with a reasonably interpreted philosophy of nature. (2) The most penetrating minds of antiquity were conscious of this, even though at that time such a philosophy was but rudimentary. Thus St. Augustine, De Civ. Dei, xxi, 8: "Omnia quippe portenta contra naturam dicimus esse; sed non sunt. Quo modo est enim contra naturam, quod Dei fit voluntate, cum voluntas tanti utique conditoris conditæ rei cuiusque natura sit? Portentum ergo fit non contra naturam, sed contra quam est nota natura." This is admirably stated, not only for its time, but as a hint beyond its time, as a hint to ourselves; the whole context is well worth reading. (3) With these opposing, or complementary, principles in our mind, we might be tempted to expect that it would not be found impossible so to restate the Biblical miracles in modern language as at one and the same time to do justice to both sides; on the one hand, not to question too deeply the ancient statement, and, on the other hand, to let it be seen that there is no real necessity to assume a positive violation of the natural order. (4) Perhaps this is a great deal to expect. It would in any case be only in a limited number of instances that such a balanced statement would be feasible. And yet there is one whole group of cases which holds out much promise that it might be successfully dealt with. The 'We-passages' in the Acts contain a number of miracles; we have seen that the narrative proceeds from an eye-witness, and we believe that it is wholly trustworthy. But when we come to look in detail at the miracles in this document, there really is not one that need cause any difficulty. Once assume a Divine Providence that hears and answers prayer, and watches over those whom it employs for the carrying out of its purposes, and it is not necessary to assume beyond this any such interference with the natural order as would really amount to a violation of it. The incident of the soothsaying girl at Philippi is psychologically intelligible. The earthquake that breaks open the doors of the prison is only timed to a particular moment. Paul himself perceived (Ac 20 10) that Eutychus was suffering from nothing worse than concussion of the brain. The incidents of the shipwreck were providentially ordered, but none of them 'against nature.' And the same would be true of all that happened on the island of Melita. It is not contended that all the accounts of miracles in the Gospels and the early chapters of the Acts would be as tractable as these; but we are encouraged to believe that, if they had been set down under as fresh an impression, they would not have been intractable. If it is said that such miracles are not real miracles, we reply that a special providence is a real miracle for the purpose which such things were intended to serve. The events of which we have been speaking discharged all the functions of miracles for those who witnessed them; and we have no reason to demand or look for more than this. The objection turns upon a definition of miracle that is unwarranted and should be given up. (5) In the case of such miracles as these no further demand is made upon us than the rejection of the Epicurean or agnostic theory, that God does not interest Himself in the affairs of men. When once we assume the contrary of this proposition—and countless answers to his prayers compel the Christian to assume it—the rest follows easily enough. We are reminded of the pointed reply of Sir Oliver Lodge (Hibbert Journal, i, 51) to the objection commonly brought against prayer for rain, that such prayer involves no greater disturbance of the natural order than "a request to a gardener to water the garden." Man has no power of reversing or violating natural law, but he has abundant power of deflecting, directing, and combining particular laws so as to carry out his purposes. And, if man possesses this power, how much more God? (6) It is in this direction that the key to miracle is to be sought, so far as miracles are historically verifiable—in the direction of those higher attributes of personality that are characteristic of man (in his measure) and also of God. The only limits that can be put to Divine power are those of consistency with itself; and we must not be too hasty in supposing that what appears to us at first sight inconsistent need be really so. At the same time, full allowance should be made for the remarkable endowment of human personality, and especially for the extent to which spirit has shown itself capable of working upon matter. There are latent possibilities, even in ordinary humanity, that are as yet very imperfectly explored. But the personalities with which we associate miracles were none of them ordinary; and One, with whom we associate the chiefest miracles, marks the supreme point that humanity has ever reached. (7) A distinction is often drawn between miracles wrought upon conscious beings, and acting (it may be presumed) through their consciousness, and others that are alleged to have been performed upon inanimate nature. There is doubtless a real significance in this distinction. We must, however, admit that it certainly was not present to the minds of the Biblical historians, and that miracles of the one class are not much less common than those of the other, or inferior to them in attestation. There is, in particular, one text which furnishes strong ground for thinking that our Lord Himself must have been conscious of the power of acting upon inanimate things as well as upon men; and not only so, but that He assumed the existence of the same power in His disciples. The text is couched in a form of solemn asseveration: "Verily I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard-seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you" (Mt 17 20; cf. Lk 17 6). This is a form of evidence that is difficult to resist.

LITERATURE: For § 1 the chief authority is R. Reitzenstein, Hellenistische Wundererzählungen (Leipsic, 1906); cf. also Pauly-Wissowa, s.v. "Aretalogus." The literature on Apollonius of Tyana is abundant (Baur, Zeller, Kayser, Baltzer, Göttsching, J. Réville, Whittaker) and instructive. Books and monographs on Miracles in general, and on the Biblical Miracles, are almost innumerable, but a large proportion of them is disappointing. J. B. Mozley's Bampton Lectures for 1865 were ably written, but are not very helpful at the present day. The present writer believes that he has been helped most by the writings of Mr. Illingworth, Dr. Fairbairn, Sir O. Lodge, the Cambridge Essays; Barth, Hauptprobleme d. Lebens Jesu[3] (1903), to which he owes the quotation from St. Augustine, and Traub in Religionsgesch. Volksbücher. Abp. Trench, On Miracles, still retains its value as a scholarly retrospect of opinion on the miracles of the N T. Cf. also Bruce, The Miraculous Element in the Gospels (1886). W S.

MIRIAM, mir'i-am (מִרְיָם, miryām): 1. The sister of Moses and Aaron (Ex 15 20). Like her two brothers, her sense of Divine things was keen, and her zeal for Jehovah, His cause and people, intense. The passage Ex 2 4 f. shows that she took part in the saving of Moses' life. A pæan of victory over the safe crossing of the Red Sea is ascribed to her (Ex 15 20 ff.). Later, she claimed equal honor with Moses, and was smitten with leprosy, from which, however, she was restored by his intercession (Nu 12 1-16). Her death was mourned by Israel as a public calamity (Nu 2 1). 2. Another of the name, from the tribe of Judah (I Ch 4 17). A. C. Z.

MIRMAH, mẹr'mā (מִרְמָה, mirmāh, Mirma AV): A Benjamite (I Ch 8 10). E. E. N.

MIRROR: This is the rendering of the following Heb. and Gr. terms: (1) mar'āh (Ex 38 8); (2) re'ī (Job 37 18); (3) gillāyōn (Is 3 23); (4) ἔσοπτρον (I Co 13 12; Ja 1 23). In these passages the RV has "mirror," the AV "glass," "looking-glass." The ancient mirror was made of polished molten metal, usually from an alloy of copper and tin. Later, silver mirrors came into use. They were round, oval, also square, and often provided with decorated handles and backs. The mirrors used by the Hebrew women (Ex 38 8) were of brass. In Job 37 18 the firmness and glitter of the molten mirror are included in the comparison with the sky. The reflection in a metallic mirror was indistinct (I Co 13 12). The verb κατοπτρίζειν is used in the middle voice (II Co 3 18) and means 'reflect as in a mirror' (so ERV, ARVmg.) or "behold as in a mirror (the Gospel) the glory of Christ" ARV. The meaning of gillāyōn (Is 3 23) is uncertain; the LXX. renders "transparent garments." See also GLASS. C. S. T.

MISGAB, mis'gab (מִשְׂגָּב, misgābh): Apparently a town in Moab (Jer 48 1); but the text seems to be corrupt, and probably the original reading was quite different. E. E. N.

MISHAEL, mish'a-el (מִישָׁאֵל, mīshā'ēl), 'who is what God is': 1. The head of a Kohathite family (Ex 6 22; Lv 10 4). 2. One of Ezra's assistants (Neh 8 4). 3. The Heb. name of one of Daniel's companions to whom the Babylonian name Meshach was given (Dn 1 6 ff.). E. E. N.

MISHAL, mai'shal (מִישָׁאל, mish'āl, Misheal AV): A town of Asher (Jos 19 26) assigned to the Levites (21 30). Probably the same as the Mashal of I Ch 6 74. Map IV, B 6. E. E. N.

MISHAM, mai'sham (מִשְׁעָם, mish'ām): A Benjamite (I Ch 8 12). E. E. N.

MISHEAL, mish'ẹ-al. See MISHAL.

MISHMA, mish'ma (מִשְׁמָע, mishmā'): 1. The ancestral head of an Ishmaelite clan (Gn 25 14; I Ch 1 30). 2. The ancestral head of a clan of Simeon (I Ch 4 25 f.). See also MIBSAM. E. E. N.

MISHMANNAH, mish-man'nā (מִשְׁמַנָּה, mishmannāh): A Gadite, one of David's soldiers (I Ch 12 10). E. E. N.

MISHRAITES, mish'ra-aits (מִשְׁרַעִי, mishrā'ī): A post-exilic family of Kiriath-jearim, which traced its ancestry to Caleb, son of Hur (I Ch 2 53). E. E. N.

MISPAR, mis'par (מִסְפָּר, mispār, Mizpar AV, called Mispereth in Neh 7 7): One of the leaders of the Return under Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 2). E. E. N.

MISREPHOTH-MAIM, miz"rẹ-fŏth-mê'im (מִשְׂרְפוֹת מַיִם, misrephōth mayim): A place apparently near Sidon (Jos 11 8), and viewed as marking the boundary of the land of Israel (13 6). Site unknown. E. E. N.

MITE. See MONEY, § 9.

MITER. See PRIESTHOOD, § 9 (b), and DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8.

MITHKAH, mith'kā (מִתְקָה, mithqāh, Mithcah AV): One of the stations on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 28 f.). Site unknown. E. E. N.

MITHNITE, mith'nait (מִתְנִי, mithnī): The designation of Joshaphat, one of David's heroes (I Ch 11 43), pointing to Methen or Mathan as the name of his home, though no such town is mentioned in the O T. E. E. N.

MITHREDATH, mith'rẹ-dath (מִתְרְדָת, mithrᵉdhāth), 'given by Mithra': The treasurer of the Persian realm who, at the command of Cyrus, delivered to Sheshbazzar the vessels taken by Nebuchadrezzar from the Temple of Jerusalem (Ezr 1 8). A. C. Z.

MITYLENE, mit''i-lî'nî (Μιτυλήνη): The most important city of the island of Lesbos, situated on a promontory once itself an island. In the earliest times its people were highly cultured. It was the seat of science, art, and letters, having produced such persons as Pittacus, Alcæus, and Sappho. Its climate was soft and salubrious. It possessed two harbors, and strong fortifications. It submitted to Persia in 546 B.C. and joined the Ionian revolt. It later belonged to the Athenian confederacy, from which it revolted in 428 and was punished by Athens in a way that permanently crippled the island. J. R. S. S.

MIXED MULTITUDE. See MINGLED PEOPLE.

MIZAR, mai'zār (מִצְעָר, mits'ār), 'littleness': In Ps 42 6 M. seems to be the name of a hill situated somewhere between Hermon and the upper Jordan, and G. A. Smith (HGHL, p. 477, note) finds reminiscences of the name in several localities near Bâniâs. It is possible, however, that the word is an appellative (EVmg.), in which case, if we drop from the Heb. text one letter (which may have been accidentally repeated in copying), we may translate "I remember thee, thou little mountain (i.e., Zion), from the Hermons." L. G. L.

MIZPAH, miz'pā (מִצְפָּה, mitspāh; also, interchangeably, Mizpeh AV), 'watch tower': A term originally applied to places where a watch (garrison) was set up. Hence the name of several towns and regions. The original meaning is clearly preserved in II Ch 20 24 and Is 21 8, which are rendered "watch tower" both in the LXX. and in EVV Between the two forms of the name (in -āh and -eh) it is impossible to distinguish, except that "Mizpah" is everywhere accompanied by the article (except in Hos 5 1). The places named Mizpah and Mizpeh are: 1. In the Shephelah (Jos 15 38), probably the locality named in Onom. 279, 139, N. of Eleutheropolis (Map II, D 2), the modern Tell es-Safiyeh, a small village in the midst of cliffs of white limestone. 2. In Benjamin (Jos 18 26), called preeminently "the Mizpah." This place became the boundary-line between the Northern and Southern Kingdoms, and was fortified by Asa with stones carried from Ramah (I K 15 22; II Ch 16 6). It served also as the assembly-ground of the Israelites before the separation of the two kingdoms (Jg 20 1, 3, 21 1; I S 7 5, 10 17), was one of Samuel's stations as judge (I S 7 16), and later the residence of Gedaliah (Jer 40 6 ff.; II K 25 25). After the Exile it was the capital of a district (Neh 3 15), and in the Maccabæan age the headquarters of the uprising against the Seleucids (I Mac 3 46). It was situated on the way from Jerusalem to Shechem, and is to be identified with the modern Nebi-Samwil, where a Crusaders' church is supposed to stand over the tomb of Samuel. Map III, F 5. 3. A land occupied by Hivites in the vicinity of Mt. Hermon, probably westward from the base of the mountain, mentioned in Jos 11 3 in connection with the confederation of the kings defeated by Joshua near the waters of Merom, placed by Buhl (Geog. Pal. p. 240) at Kala'at eṣ-Subebeh, on Mt. Hermon above Banias. 4. The Valley of Mizpeh W. of Hermon, also mentioned in connection with the defeat of the allies, but as a place whither they fled (Jos 11 8). It was in the same general locality as 3. 5. In Gilead, the residence of Jephthah (Jg 11 29, 34), an ancient sanctuary whose origin is traced back to patriarchal times. According to Gn 31 49, Jacob gave it the name it bears in commemoration of the compact with Laban [JE]; but the sense in which the word mitspāh is used in this connection is slightly different from that in other places. Instead of an outlook-point, it indicates a place where God is invoked as a watcher (witness). Accordingly, it was a place invested with sacredness, and, on this ground perhaps, was resorted to in making covenants between clans, such as that of Jephthah with the eastern tribes when they combined against the Ammonites. The location of the spot is fixed by the fact that Jacob on his way to Canaan crossed the Jabbok after the covenant with Laban. This would place Mizpah N. of the river Jabbok. Sūf, NW of Jerash, is supposed by many to be the exact spot, but the identification is not quite certain. Map III, K 3. 6. In Moab, probably the town where David placed his parents under the protection of the king of Moab (I S 22 3). Site unknown. A. C. Z.

MIZPAR, miz'pār. See MISPAR.

MIZPEH, miz'pe. See MIZPAH.

MIZRAIM, miz'ra-im (מִצְרַיִם, mitsrayim): 1. The Heb. name of Egypt, or sometimes, more strictly, of Lower Egypt; see EGYPT, § 1. 2. The second son of Ham (Gn 10 6, 13). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 10. J. F. McC.

MIZZAH, miz'ā (מִזָּה, mizzāh): A clan chieftain of Edom (Gn 36 13, 17; I Ch 1 37). E. E. N.

MNASON, nê'sŏn (Μνάσων): A native of Cyprus and an early Christian disciple (Ac 21 16). According to the commonly accepted reading and interpretation of the verse, the house of M., in which Paul and his companions lodged, was in Jerusalem. But according to Codex Bezæ, he lived in a village between Cæsarca and Jerusalem, perhaps in Samaria. This makes the passage much more natural. J. M. T.

1. Name.

The name "Moab" (O T מוֹאָב, mō'ābh; Mesha Stone, מאב; Assyr. ma'ab, ma'aba, mu'aba) is derived, by one of the popular etymologies so common in the O T, in Gn 19 37 (cf. LXX.) from mō (=min), 'from,' and 'ābh, 'father.' But this can not be the real origin of the word, the etymology of which is no longer known. In the O T the name is pretty generally used of the people rather than of their land, and since the name passed out of use in the Greek period it is likely that it was always understood to be the name of a people, not a geographical term.

The territory that was occupied by the Moabites was the region immediately E. of the Dead Sea.

2. The Land of Moab.

On these fertile but well-drained uplands, extending N. from the wâdis that empty into the low country at the S. end of the Dead Sea to the southern borders of Gilead, and E. to the desert, the Moabites maintained themselves as a distinct people for over one thousand years. Their territory at no time much exceeded 60 m. in length and 30 m. in breadth, or about 1,500 sq. m. in area. Within this small compass was a population of probably at least 500,000 souls in its most flourishing days. Cities were numerous, immense flocks of sheep and goats grazed on the rich pastures, grain was raised in abundance, and the people were easily able to live off their land, asking little from the outside world. For a description of the topographical features, etc., see PALESTINE, § 13 (c).

3. The Earliest History.

The early history of M. is very obscure. In Israel's tradition the Moabites were viewed as a kindred people, descended from Lot, the nephew of Abraham (Gn 19 37; Dt 2 9, 18). M. therefore was one of the group of closely related 'Hebrew' peoples (Israel, Edom, Moab, Ammon), all of whom had a common ancestry, and had this also in common, that they pressed in from the desert upon the cultivated land occupied by the Canaanites and though becoming dominant, each in its own locality, adopted the language and absorbed much of the civilization of the people they conquered. The more ancient predecessors of the Moabites in some portions of their territory were called the "Emim" and "Zuzim" (Gn 14 5; Dt 2 10), but the racial connections of these peoples are unknown. The representations in Nu (chs. 21 ff.), Dt (2 8 ff., etc.), Jg (11 12-28), etc., imply that the Moabites had been well established in their territory E. of the Dead Sea some time before Israel conquered Canaan, perhaps as long as a century. A short time before the Israelites appeared on the SE. border of M., on their way from Horeb to Canaan, the Moabites had suffered severely at the hands of Sihon, an Amorite king, perhaps from W of the Jordan, who had conquered the N. half of Moab's territory (the portion N. of the Arnon), driving the Moabites out of their chief cities (Heshbon, Medeba, etc.), and founding an Amorite kingdom with his capital at Heshbon (Nu 21 21-30).

4. Moab and Israel in Moses' Time.

The Israelites thus found M. restricted to the S. half of the territory they called their own, the Arnon now forming their N. boundary (Nu 21 13). Israel traversed the eastern border of M., unmolested and probably even welcomed by the Moabites, who may have hoped to find in the Israelites allies who would assist them in regaining their territory from the Amorites. In this they were doomed to disappointment; for after the Israelites had conquered Sihon they proceeded to take possession of his territory for themselves. This brought about an estrangement on the part of Moab. Tradition preserved notices of various phases of this hostility, such as the attempt of Belak, King of Moab, to secure the aid of the soothsayer Balaam (q.v.) to place Israel under a curse (Nu chs. 22–24), or the attempt to entice Israel away from loyalty to J" by means of the degrading worship of Baal-peor (Nu 25 1-5). There is no record of actual war between the two peoples at this time. M. as the weaker was compelled to submit to the stronger confederation of Israelitic tribes and to see its choicest pasture-lands and many of its cities taken possession of by the tribes of Reuben and Gad (Nu 32 1-5, 34 ff.; Jos 13 15-28). The accounts of this occupation are not entirely clear and harmonious, but the general fact is well substantiated, both by Jg 5 15 ff. and by the Mesha inscription, line 10 (see MESHA). It is probable that it was mainly the Reubenites who settled in Moab's old territory, the Gadites locating originally farther to the N. Later, but perhaps not for a century or more, the Gadites seem to have supplanted the Reubenites, the latter having in some way lost their tribal identity.

5. Moab in the Period Between Moses and David.

After the main body of Israel had crossed the Jordan and was again broken up into separate tribes, each busy securing possession of its portion of the W Jordan land, the Moabites seem to have succeeded in regaining control of their old territory N. of the Arnon and at last, under their king, Eglon, ventured to cross the Jordan and attack the Israelites in the region W. of the lower Jordan. For a while this portion of Israel was held in subjection, but at length Eglon was assassinated by the Benjamite Ehud, under whose leadership the Moabites were defeated and compelled to retire to their own land. This put an end forever to attempts on the part of M. to occupy any territory W of the Jordan. Somewhat later, in the period of the "Judges," Jephthah the Gileadite appears to have conquered the Moabites, probably because of their attempt to control the region occupied by the Gadites (Jos 11 12-28, which seems to contain a separate account, from a different source, from that of the rest of the chapter). In the summary account of Saul's wars (I S 14 47) he is said to have fought successfully against M., but no particulars are given. To this same general period may be assigned the war between M. and Edom which is so obscurely referred to in Gn 36 35. According to the Book of Ruth, a Bethlehemite named Elimelech migrated to Moab in the Judges period. His sons married Moabite women, one of whom, Ruth, is the heroine of the beautiful story of the book and is represented as the ancestress of David. The reasons alleged against the historicity of this tradition do not appear to be well founded.

6. Moab Subject to Israel.

Although David was thus remotely akin to the Moabites, and had placed his parents under the protection of the king of M. during his troubles with Saul (I S 22 3), for some unknown reason, after he had become king of all Israel war broke out between him and Moab. In this war David was completely victorious and treated the conquered people with uncommon severity (II S 8 2). It may be that at this time many Gadite families moved into M., occupying its most desirable cities and pasture-lands (cf. § 4, above). If this is so, it will explain the statement of the Mesha Stone (150 years after David's time), line 10, "And the men of Gad had dwelt in Ataroth from of old," and perhaps also lines 17b, 18a, "And I took thence the vessels of Yāhweh and I dragged them before Chemosh," the reference being to vessels at sanctuaries of J″ established by David or by the Gadite worshipers of J″ On this view also, the confused character of the references Nu 32 1 ff., 33 ff., and Jos 13 8 ff. may be explained, the references to the Reubenites preserving the memory of the earlier Reubenite occupation, those to the Gadites relating to the later immigration of Gadites in the time of David.

The spirit of the Moabites was humbled, but not broken, and when the Davidic kingdom went to pieces, at the accession of Rehoboam (c. 933 B.C.), they once more became masters of their old territory N. of the Arnon, and freed themselves from the yoke of Israel. They seem to have maintained their independence until the reign of Omri (c. 888–875 B.C.). This energetic and able monarch reduced M. once more to subjection to Israel (Mesha Stone, lines 4–8), a condition of vassalage which lasted during the remainder of the reign of his son Ahab. The O T contains no account of this conquest of M. by Omri, but does state that the annual tribute Mesha was accustomed to pay was the wool of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams (II K 3 4), incidental evidence of the great wealth of the country in this respect.

Mesha was an able, patriotic monarch, and at the death of Ahab, according to the O T (II K 1 1, 3 5), revolted from subjection to Israel. The Mesha Stone seems to imply that the revolt took place in the days of Ahab, but as it says merely "his [Omri's] son," it is uncertain whether Ahab or his son Jehoram is really intended. At any rate, the O T account of Jehoram's attempt, aided by Judah and Edom, to bring Mesha once more under the yoke of Israel (II K 3 4-27) shows that the crisis of the conflict did not come until Jehoram's reign. Mesha's story deals with the earlier stages of his revolt and can be read in his own words on the Mesha Stone, lines 1-20 (see MESHA). His constructive work in developing and organizing his kingdom is partially told in the remainder of the inscription. The war with Jehoram may have occurred after the inscription was made. Jehoram's attempt was unsuccessful, although Mesha felt himself reduced to the extremity of sacrificing his eldest son to Chemosh, and it was probably the superstitious awe aroused by this terrible deed that led the Israelites to give up the attempt. Nothing further is known of the history of M. in this period, the notice in II Ch 20 1-30 being of questionable historical value, while that in II K 13 20 simply reflects the general hostility between the two peoples in that period.

7. Moab in the 8th–6th Centuries B.C.

We next hear of M., incidentally, in Am 2 1-3, where, with other nations, it is condemned by the prophet of J″ for its unrighteous conduct, in this case for its inhuman treatment of the king of Edom. We know nothing of the event referred to. The nature of this reference in Am seems to imply that M. was at that time (760–750 B.C.) an independent kingdom with its capital at Kerioth. In II K 14 25 the contemporary king of Israel, Jeroboam II, is said to have "restored the border of Israel from the entrance of Hamath unto the sea of the Arabah" (i.e., the Dead Sea). This does not necessarily imply Israelitic control of Moab, but only that Jeroboam II restored Israel's supremacy in the E. Jordan land as far as the old N. border of Moab (the N. end of the Dead Sea). In Is 15 1–16 12 there is a most interesting oracle regarding M. Very forcibly it depicts the anxiety and terror of M. because of an impending invasion from the N. The Moabites appeal to Jerusalem for aid (16 1 ff.), but in vain, because in the past M. has only been proud and haughty toward Judah. Yet it is with much sympathy for the destruction and desolation of this kindred people that the prophet of J″ foretells its doom. What this threatened or actual invasion was is uncertain, as is also the date of the oracle which was probably uttered by a prophet earlier than Isaiah (cf. 16 13 f.). It is quite possible that the conquests of Jeroboam II (c. 785–745 B.C.) E. of the Jordan seriously threatened M., but he apparently did not actually overrun the country. The oracle may have remained yet unfulfilled in Isaiah's day (c. 740–690 B.C.), as is perhaps implied by 16 13 f.

M., like the other small states in Syria, was compelled to yield to the irresistible encroachment of Assyria. Salamanu, King of Moab, like Ahaz of Judah, paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser III in 734 B.C. when that monarch humbled N. Israel and Damascus. Sargon (722–705 B.C.) found M. hostile, but his successor, Sennacherib (705–681 B.C.), speaks of the Moabite king Chemoshnadab as a willing vassal (unlike Hezekiah). Sennacherib's successor, Esarhaddon (681–668 B.C.), received contributions for his building operations from Mutsuri of Moab, and the instinct of self-preservation against the Arabs led the Moabites to the same loyalty to Asshurbanipal (668–626).

Thus M., by recognizing the general supremacy of Assyria, maintained itself in prosperous semi-independence for upward of a century. It does not seem to have been seriously implicated in the events connected with the downfall of the Assyrian Empire (606 B.C.). While at times it appears to have been inclined to join a confederacy to resist Nebuchadrezzar's authority in Syria (Jer 27 3), its general attitude toward Judah was hostile and therefore probably friendly to Babylon (II K 24 2; Jer 9 26, 48 1-47; Ezk 25 8 ff.; Zeph 2 8 f.). The Moabites rejoiced, as did Edom, in the fall of their long-time rival Judah, although some of the Jews found refuge in M. during the war with Babylon (Jer 40 11). This hostility was never forgotten, and the counter-feeling in Judah manifested itself in legal prescriptions, prophecy, and psalms (Dt 23 3; Ps 60 8, 83 6, 108 9; Neh 13 1, 23; Jer ch. 48, etc.; cf. last reff.).

Little is known of M. subsequent to the time of the downfall of Judah. It probably gradually succumbed to the advance of the Arabian tribes, and eventually the territory was occupied by the Nabatæan Arabs. Whatever remained of the ancient Moabites became absorbed in the general population of their conquerors.

The national deity of M. was Chemosh (see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 18). The popular religious conceptions of the Moabites were quite similar to those of the Israelites. Some parts of the Mesha inscription read like parts of the O T (cf. lines 3–5, 8, 12–14, 17–19, 32). But the higher ranges of religious thought which so distinguished Israel were altogether foreign to the Moabites. Chemosh remained to the last a mere local, national, nature-deity, whose worship did not exclude that of other deities such as Nebo, Ashtar-chemosh, Baal-Peor (=Chemosh?).

8. Religion and Civilization of the Moabites.

The civilization of the Moabites was comparatively high. Their cities were numerous and prosperous. Twenty-five or more Moabite cities are mentioned in the O T. The people were experts in vine culture (cf. Is 16 8) and sheep-raising. The Mesha inscription is evidence that at least some of the people were able to read and write, using the ancient Canaanite or 'Phœnician' alphabet, and also for a considerable knowledge of industrial arts (lines 21–27). It is altogether probable that the Moabites were in no important respect (except religion) behind Israel in their attainments in civilization.

I. HISTORICAL SKETCH.

Whatever serves as a medium of exchange is money. Metal stamped by official authority to guarantee its weight, purity, and value, for the purpose of currency, is called coin.

1. In Pre-exilic Times.

Though coinage was not known to the Hebrews until after the Exile, the phases of the growth in the use of money, beginning with primitive barter, are to be found in the records of their history (Gn 20 14, 21 27). At the time of the patriarchs silver and gold are represented as already current, being exchanged by weight (Gn 20 16, 23 15, 33 19). The first transaction by money proper was the purchase by Abraham of the cave of Machpelah, when he "weighed to Ephron the silver four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant" (23 16). Joseph is sold for twenty pieces of silver, but even in the height of his power in Egypt, when silver fails, grain is bought with cattle and land (Gn 47 14-17). Long before Israel came upon the stage of history a varied commerce had passed between Babylonia and Egypt by trade-routes across Syria, and the Tell-el-Amarna correspondence from the 14th cent. B.C. onward makes mention of gold, silver, and precious stones among articles of exchange. The standards of weight and value derived from Babylonia had been fixed centuries before the Hebrews conquered Palestine. During the period of the conquest of Canaan silver money was in circulation (Jg 9 4, 16 5, 17 2 ff.), and occasional mention is made of gold in the shape of earrings and other ornaments which were employed as money (Jg 8 24 ff.). But gold being used rarely, copper and iron never, silver so outdistanced all other media that money came to be called "silver" (keṣeph).

1. Pre-exilic History.

The form of money varied. In Egypt it seems to have been usually rings or ornaments which served the desire for display and were easily kept. This type of money was also current among the Canaanites and Hebrews, though it does not seem to have penetrated to Babylonia (Gn 24 22, 42 35; Ex 12 35; Job 42 11). Another money-ornament was the wedge (lit. "tongue," called so, doubtless, because of its shape) of gold (Jos 7 21). The word qᵉsīṭāh, which occurs in three passages (Gn 33 19; Jos 24 32; Job 42 11), is translated "piece of money," though some suppose it to have been a weight; but the Revisers were probably right in their rendering of the word, even if there is insufficient evidence for the theory that the qᵉsīṭāh had stamped upon it the figure of a lamb, in order to denote its value. As a rule, money circulated in ingots or bars (I S 9 8). These pieces of silver or gold conformed to a general standard, their weight and size being approximately uniform, for there is no evidence in the O T of any regulations as to the exact quantity or quality of metal in a piece of money. In ordinary transactions the weighing of the money was not required, though it was resorted to for large or precise amounts, and the Israelite is repeatedly warned against false weights and measures (Lv 19 36; Dt 25 13-16; Am 8 5). The balance and weights were carried in a bag by the trader as part of his necessary equipment (Dt 25 13 ff.; Pr 16 11; Is 46 6; Mic 6 11).

2. Form.

The value of money consequently was determined by its weight, the unit of value and the unit of weight being identical (sheqel, 'weight' or 'coin,' from shāqal, 'to weigh'). Babylonia was the home of the weight and money system which prevailed throughout Western Asia. In this region there were two standards—"the common norm," used universally in trade, and "the royal norm," a slightly higher scale employed in payments to the royal treasuries. The former is all that we need to take into account for the O T, though possibly there is a reference to the royal standard in II S 14 26. Furthermore, the money of both norms was of two weights, the one twice the other—"heavy" and "light." Wherever the Phœnician trade predominated—and consequently in Syria and Palestine—the Phœnician shekel, both light and heavy, was in common use. The Babylonian shekel, both light and heavy, was in use in Babylonia, Persia, and Asia Minor. The Phœnician shekel, both light and heavy, stood to the Babylonian shekel both light and heavy, in the proportion of 2 to 3. Owing to the relation of gold to silver, which stood in the awkward proportion of $13\frac{1}{3}$ to 1, it became necessary for purposes of easy reckoning to adjust the weight of the silver unit of exchange, the shekel, by increasing or diminishing it, as compared with the gold shekel. In Babylonia the silver shekel was made equal to $\frac{1}{10}$ of the gold shekel. Since the Phœnician shekel, however, weighed but $\frac{2}{3}$ that of the Babylonian shekel, it took 15 Phœnician shekels to equal 10 Babylonian shekels. During the prosperous period of Israel's history money continued, as in earlier days, to be estimated by weight in ingots of generally fixed denomination (II K 5 5).

2. From the Exile to the Roman Rule.

As far as is known, coinage was first devised by Gyges, King of Lydia in Asia Minor, who about 700 B.C. issued bean-shaped coins of electrum, an alloy blended of gold and silver, stamped on one side with a rough impression. Under one of his successors, the celebrated Crœsus (568–554 B.C.), electrum gave way to gold and silver, and the crude type was gradually improved by the Greeks of Ionia. Probably after the death of Crœsus at Sardis this Lydian coinage passed to the East, and was not known to the Jews until after their return from the Exile; for it was under the Persian dynasty that coins came into use in the East. "Throughout the vast territory, bounded on the north by offshoots of the Taurus, on the northeast by the Euphrates, and on the east and south by the deserts of Arabia, the royal gold coinage of Persia probably passed current down to the age of Alexander the Great." This world conqueror (336–323 B.C.) next influenced the money of Syria and Palestine by introducing into his dominions an international gold and silver currency based on Attic standards. Many of his coins have been found in these countries. After Alexander, Egyptian money circulated among the Jews, chiefly Ptolemaic silver shekels, followed by coins minted by cities like Tyre or Sidon, which had received this right from the Seleucid kings, or by coins of the Seleucids themselves, such as Antiochus Epiphanes, the great enemy of the Jews, whose money is well known.

4. Coined Money.

A new stage in the history of money among the Jews begins with Simon Maccabæus (143–135 B.C.), "high priest and ethnarch of the people of the Jews," to whom first the privilege of issuing coinage was granted by Antiochus VII (Sidetes, 138–129, I Mac 15 1-6). At this point, however, much disagreement exists among numismatists as to whether or not any of the coins are extant. Madden sees specimens in the silver shekels and half-shekels illustrated on p. 26.[1] Others believe that these coins belong to the first revolt of the Jews 66–70 A.D. (See Kennedy, in HDB, "Money," § 5.) Should the latter view be correct, the earliest extant coins of the Jews are small copper pieces bearing the name of John Hyrcanus (135–105 B.C.).

3. In New Testament Times.

When the Romans became rulers of the world they effected great and beneficial changes in commerce

[1] See ill. (p. 26) of silver shekel of Simon Maccabæus. Obverse, the inscription "shekel of Israel" in Hebrew, a cup, and a numeral letter, e.g., year 1 of the new era—Reverse, a central device, possibly Aaron's rod, with "Jerusalem the Holy."

by restraining disturbers of the peace, imposing a common law on the world, uniting the empire by a system of magnificent roads, and introducing a universal coinage, at least in the higher values. The Roman aureus, a gold coin worth about $5, or one guinea, and the denarius, a silver coin worth about 19 cents, or 9½*d.*, were the standards throughout the empire in which the imperial taxes were payable. No provincial or dependent countries, or cities, were permitted to mint gold coins; though some cities, such as Tyre, Sidon, and Ascalon, were allowed to issue silver money, chiefly the heavy shekel, or tetradrachm, which also came from the imperial mints at Antioch and Cæsarea of Cappadocia. Most of the silver that circulated in Palestine until the death of Nero consisted of this tetradrachm, or stater, and the Roman denarius. The dependence of the Idumæan rulers of Palestine upon Rome is shown by the fact that none of the Herods was allowed to strike any but bronze coins, though Herod the Great had vast trade and wealth. On the other hand, the very small coins which they issued are a pitiful token of the poverty of the people under these foreigners. The Greek type and inscriptions upon all the coins of Herod I bear testimony to his paganizing tendency. When the kingdom was divided among the sons of Herod, they continued to issue copper coins for the districts over which they ruled, Judæa, Galilee, and Trachonitis; and Herods Agrippa I and II also minted their own bronze coins. On the deposition of Archelaus in 6 A.D., the Roman procurators of Judæa issued bronze money, but without any device that might offend the religious susceptibilities of the Jews. Usually it was a palm-tree, or some other simple figure, with the name of the reigning Cæsar and the year of his reign in Greek characters. These copper coins were common in Jerusalem during the time of the Gospels and the earlier parts of Acts. With the first revolt of the Jews (66–70 A.D.) a bronze and silver coinage was issued by them bearing the names of Eleazar and Simon, and various devices, such as a palm-tree, the temple, grapes, a vine leaf with an inscription, e.g., "First year of the Redemption of Israel." See also § 5 above. Upon the capture of Jerusalem in 70, Vespasian and Titus commemorated their victory by striking coins in Judæa with the inscription in Latin "Judea Capta," with the figure of victory and the emperor's head. At Rome also somewhat similar gold and silver coins were issued. Silver and bronze coins, restamped with Jewish symbols and lettering, during the second revolt of the Jews, under Simon Bar Kochba (132–135 A.D.) mark the last of this people's melancholy attempts at national independence.

II. Money and Coins.

As we have seen, the shekel was the unit of weight and money. For ordinary weighing 60 shekels made one mina, and 60 minas one talent; but for weighing precious metals only 50 shekels were counted to a mina and 60 minas to a talent, i.e., there were 3,600 shekels in the ordinary talent, and but 3,000 shekels in the talent of gold or silver. Bearing in mind what has been said above as to "heavy" and "light" coins, and confining ourselves to the "common standard" of commerce, we get this resultant system for money, in all cases approximate:

7. Old Testament Coins.

	Heavy.	Light.
Gold shekel	252 gr. Troy = 16.3 gm.	126 gr. Troy = 8 gm.
Phœnician or Jewish silver shekel of 15 pieces	224 gr. Troy = 14.5 gm.	112 gr. Troy = 7.2 gm.
Babylonian or Persian silver shekel of 10 pieces	336 gr. Troy = 21.8 gm.	168 gr. Troy = 11 gm.
Gold mina = 50 shekels	12,600 gr. Troy = 818 gm.	6,300 gr. Troy = 400 gm.
Phœnician or Jewish silver mina	11,225 gr. Troy = 725 gm.	5,660 gr. Troy = 360 gm.
Babylonian or Persian silver mina	16,800 gr. Troy = 1,090 gm.	8,400 gr. Troy = 550 gm.
Gold talent = 3,000 shekels	757,000 gr. Troy = 49 kgm.	379,000 gr. Troy = 24 kgm.
Phœnician or Jewish silver talent	673,500 gr. Troy = 44 kgm.	339,600 gr. Troy = 22 kgm.
Babylonian silver talent	1,008,000 gr. Troy = 66 kgm.	504,000 gr. Troy = 33 kgm.

The values of these denominations in American and British currency are approximately as follows:

	Heavy.				Light.
Shekel of gold	$10.00 =	£2	1*s.*	0*d.*	$5.00 =	£1	0*s.*	6*d.*
Phœnician or Jewish silver shekel	0.67 =	0	2	9	.33 =	0	1	4½
Babylonian silver shekel	1.00 =	0	4	1	.50 =	0	2	0½
Mina of gold	33.00 =	6	16	8	16.50 =	3	8	4
Phœnician or Jewish silver mina	50.00 =	10	5	0	25.00 =	5	2	6
Talent of gold	30,000.00 =	6,150			15,000.00 =	3,075
Phœnician or Jewish silver talent	2,010.00 =	410			1,005.00 =	205
Babylonian silver talent	2,980.00 =	615			1,490.00 =	307

In the O T the mina does not occur in pre-exilic times, money being reckoned in shekels and talents of silver and gold. Also, as we have seen, the heavy Phœnician shekel was the standard for Palestinian exchange, while in Asia Minor and the East the light Babylonian standard was the commercial norm. So in the O T the ordinary money was:

Gold talent =	$30,000.00	Gold shekel =	$10.00
Silver talent =	2,010.00	Silver shekel =	.67

(Ex 30 13, 15, 38 26; Lv 5 15, 27 3, 25; Nu 3 47, 50, 7 13; cf. also Mt 17 24, 27, where a shekel [Gr. stater] served for both Jesus and Peter). It may be assumed with confidence that the shekel of the Sanctuary was the ordinary heavy Phœnician silver shekel, about 67 cents in value, and was probably called sacred, because it was connected with the worship of the Sanctuary.

8. The Shekel of the Sanctuary.

"Silver," "piece of silver" (Jg 9 4, 16 5, 17 3 f.; II S 18 11 f.; Zec 11 12), denotes the silver shekel, not a coin, but the bar of this weight current in Palestine; silverling (Is 7 23) is also a shekel of silver.

Daric, translated "dram" in AV I Ch 29 7; Ezr 2 69, 8 27; Neh 7 70-72, is probably in these passages not a coin but a weight, the drachma = $\frac{1}{100}$ mina, because the daric did not circulate in Palestine until after the Return from the Exile (536 B.C.). Some, however, think that in Ezr 2 69 the gold stater, or light shekel, of Crœsus is meant. See above, under 2. The name daric is of uncertain origin, but it was a gold coin first issued by the Persian Darius Hystaspes (521–485 B.C.)—properly called the "daric stater," or light shekel, in weight 130 grains, and in value $5 or £1 0*s.* 6*d.* In Neh 5 15, 10 32, the shekel of silver was probably the siglos (σίγλος) = $\frac{1}{20}$ of the daric, and so in value about 25 cents, or one shilling sterling. These Persian gold and silver coins probably were the earliest stamped money to circulate in Palestine.

Gold—the aureus of 126 grains, in value about $5 = £1 0*s.* 6*d.*
Silver—the denarius = $\frac{1}{25}$ of the aureus, nearly 20 cents = about 9½ pence.

9. New Testament Coins.

Bronze — the sestertius = ¼ denarius, or 4 asses = nearly 5 cents or 2½ pence.
The dupondius = ½ denarius, or 2 asses = 2½ cents or 1¼ pence.
Copper—the as = $\frac{1}{16}$ denarius (originally = $\frac{1}{10}$) = 1½ cents or ¾ pence.
Copper—the semis = $\frac{1}{32}$ denarius = ⅜ cent or $\frac{3}{10}$ pence.
Copper — the quadrans = $\frac{1}{64}$ denarius = $\frac{3}{100}$ cent or $\frac{3}{20}$ pence.

Talent (Mt 18 24, 25 15) is the Greek, or Roman-Attic, silver talent of 60 mina, which circulated in the empire = 6,000 denarii, or drams, about $1,160 or £240.

Pound (Lk 19 13 ff.) μνᾶ, mina, i.e., $\frac{1}{60}$ talent = $19.40, or £4. Silver, commonly used in the N T for "money" (Mt 10 9; Ac 3 6, 20 33; I P 1 18; Ja 5 3), but "piece of silver" in Lk 15 8 is the rendering of drachma, which also is probably meant in Ac 19 19. This Attic drachma, officially equal to ¾ denarius, or 12 asses, was in ordinary trade equivalent to the denarius, i.e., about 20 cents. A different coin, however, seems to be mentioned in Mt 26 15, 27 3, 5 f., 9, i.e., the heavy silver shekel (cf. Ex 21 32; Zec 11 12 f.), at this time the tetradrachm minted at Antioch or Tyre. It is also called "shekel" (Mt 17 27 RV), "piece of money" (AV), and was equal to 4 denarii, about 75 cents. Since the Temple tax was a half-shekel, one piece of money was used to pay for two persons.

Penny—(a) So rendered in the AV of Mt 18 28; Mk 12 15; Rev 6 6, etc.); pence (Mk 14 5; Jn 12 5); pennyworth (Mk 6 37; Jn 6 7); but well translated "shilling" in ARV By the term δηνάριον, denarius is meant, a standard Roman silver coin of about 60 grains Troy = 3.8 grams, and in value nearly 20 cents, or a little over 9½ pence. The ARV marginal note on Mt 18 28 is not quite correct. It bore the head and titles of the ruling Cæsar, and was the coin in which the imperial tribute was paid. It was also the day's wage for the laborer. (b) In ARV "penny" is used (Mt 10 29; Lk 12 6) to translate ἀσσάριον; Vulgate, dupondius, farthing AV. This was probably a coin struck in Antioch and equivalent to the Roman as, about 1½ cents, or ⅜ pence.

Farthing is used (Mt 5 26; Mk 12 42) for κοδράντης, Lat. quadrans (chalkous being its current equivalent in Syria and the Greek provinces). It was equivalent to ¼ as, about $\frac{3}{100}$ cent, or $\frac{3}{20}$ pence. This was the smallest Roman coin, possibly not circulating at this time in Syria. See also under "penny" (b).

Mite is used (Mk 12 42; Lk 12 59, 21 2) for λεπτόν, which is almost certainly the name of a coin (though see Madden, p. 303 f.), apparently equal to half a quadrans, and the same as the Jewish perutah of the Mishna, with a value of about $\frac{2}{100}$ cent, or $\frac{3}{10}$ pence. It was the smallest Greek coin. For details on this difficult matter see Kennedy, in HDB, III, 429, and Hill, EB, "Penny," § 3 f.

The present-day value of the money, either of the O T or the N T, is exceedingly difficult to estimate, for the face value by no means represents its modern purchasing power. In Jg ch. 17 Micah of Ephraim promised the Levite ten pieces of silver, i.e., ten shekels a year and "a suit of apparel and victuals"; but no data are given for land and food values. The nearest approximation may be made from the fact that in the time of our Lord the denarius was the ordinary daily wage of the laborer (Mt 20 2-14; cf. also Lk 10 35).

MONSTER: The rendering of the Heb. tannīn, a word meaning literally 'the large fish of the sea' ("sea-monsters," Gn 1 21, etc. "whales" AV), and also used of serpents (Ex 7 9 f., etc.). The same term served to designate the mythological monster, or "dragon" (AV), that plays such a rôle in the Babylonian creation myths (Ps 74 13; Is 51 9; cf. Jer 51 34, see COSMOGONY § 4). As such, it was frequently used by the prophets, perhaps contemptuously, for Egypt (Is 27 1; Ezk 29 3, 32 2). See also SEA-MONSTER and PALESTINE § 26.

MONUMENT: The rendering in Is 65 4 of nātsār ("secret places" RV, "vaults" RVmg.). It is evidently used here as a synonym of sepulcher or tomb. The passage, however, is obscure. Some form of the worship of the dead, or necromancy, is referred to. In the general sense of a simple memorial the word does not appear in Biblical usage.

A. C. Z.

MOON: The rendering of the Heb. yārēaḥ (from a root meaning 'to wander'), and lᵉbhānāh ('white,' or 'pale'). The new moon was ḥōdhesh ('new'), and the full moon kese' ('covered,' i.e., with his cap). To the early Semites, the ancestors of Israel, dwelling in the desert, the moon must have seemed of almost equal importance with the sun. Traveling was done largely by night. The moon's phases were great natural phenomena, by which time could be measured. The moon and the tides were seen to have some connection, a fact observed very early by the Arabs living near the coast and engaged in commerce. The moon thus came to hold a prominent place in all thought and speculation concerning the heavenly bodies, their influence upon the earth and in the affairs of men, and especially in the astral religion of the Semites, which was so highly developed in Babylonia. For illustration of their estimation of the moon see Gn 1 16 f.; Dt 4 19, 33 14; Job 31 26; Ps 81 3 RV, 104 19, 121 6, 136 9. See also ASTRONOMY, § 2, and SEMITIC RELIGION, § 33. (Cf. The place indicated seems to have been marked by a sacred tree, or grove, in the plain E. of Shechem, whose priests gave oracular information and advice. It is probably the same as "the augurs' oak" (Jg 9 37 ARVmg.), and possibly is also the "oak" of Gn 35 4 and Jos 24 26. 2. The Hill of Moreh (Jg 7 1) is apparently Jebel ed-Duḥy ("Little Hermon"), on the opposite side of the Valley of Jezreel from Gilboa and the spring of Harod (cf. Jg 6 33 with 7 1). L. G. L.

MORESHETH-GATH, mōr'esh-eth-gath" (מוֹרֶשֶׁת גַּת, mōresheth gath): The birthplace of the prophet Micah (Mic 1 14). It lay (according to Eusebius and Jerome) a little E. of Eleutheropolis (i.e., Gath). E. E. N.

MORIAH, mo-rai'ā (מֹרִיָּה, mōriyyāh): The knoll or hillock on which, according to tradition, Abraham offered up Isaac in sacrifice. But the name is used simply as a general designation of the region (Gn 22 2). See also JERUSALEM, § 18. A. C. Z.

The Heb. form of 'Moses' (מֹשֶׁה, mōsheh) is derived in Ex 2 10 apparently from the Heb. root māshāh, 'to draw out.' But from the earliest times another etymology has been sought for it, assuming its Egyptian origin. Josephus (Ant. II, 9 6) makes it from mō, 'water' (Egyptian), and ses, or uses, 'saved' (cf. also Philo, Vit. Moys. 1 4). This was commonly accepted, until Lepsius and Ebers suggested another, which, in spite of the objections raised by Cheyne (EB s.v.), is to be preferred. It identifies the name with the Egyptian mes, or messu, 'child,' or 'son' (Brugsch. Wörterb., p. 698, extractus [ex utero]), often found in Egyptian proper names in combination with some Divine appellation (Ah*mes*, Thot*mes*, Ra-messu, etc.).

1. Name.

The personality of Moses is thoroughly identified with the Exodus and the making of Israel as a nation. The understanding of the people's life is very much embarrassed by the denial of the historicity, either of his person or of the event of the Exodus. Both, however, are known to later ages through the documentary sources J E D P, which have been interwoven into one story, and this, for the practical purpose of securing an adequate idea of Moses, it is unnecessary to unravel (cf., in general, HEXATEUCH). Neither is it necessary, nor even possible, to separate the idealizing element infused into the account by a grateful and admiring people. On the other hand, it is quite possible to exaggerate this element by comparison with misleading analogues (Solon and Lycurgus), though one may fall into error by denying it altogether. For a just estimate of the character and work of the hero, it is necessary to take into account not only what he appears to be in the outward events of history, but also what he became in the beliefs of his people. This latter element in the picture offers a fairer test of his power than might a dry, annalistic enumeration of his traits and deeds.

2. Historicity.

Moses was born near the capital city of Egypt (Memphis?) of Hebrew parents, Amram and Jochebed, just at the time when the oppression of the Hebrews by the Egyptians had reached its severest form. His father was a Levite and had two other children, Aaron and Miriam. According to the Law, which prescribed the death of every male Israelitic child, he was to be put to death as soon as born (Ex 1 22). But he was saved from this fate by a clever plan of his mother[1] in the

3. Birth and Preservation.

[1] Jos. Ant. II, 9 3 gives the story that Jochebed was moved to this by a supernatural revelation of the future mission of the child.

carrying out of which he passed under the care of Pharaoh's daughter. According to some ancient writers (Artapanus, quoted by Eus. Præp. Ev. IX, 27, and Philo, Vit. Moys. 1 4), this princess, named Merris (but Jos. Ant. II, 9 5 says Thermuthis, Θερμουθις, and some rabbis, Bithiah [I Ch 4 18]), was married, but childless, and saw in the helpless Hebrew infant the fulfilment of her yearnings and prayers. Adoption was common in Egypt (cf. Brugsch, Gesch. Aeg., 884 f.).

4. Early Life and Education.

The childhood[1] and youth of Moses were spent in the palace of the princess. He was instructed "in all the wisdom of the Egyptians." Manetho says (ap. Jos. Cont. Ap. I, 26 9, 28 12) Moses served as a priest of Osiris at Heliopolis under the name of Osarsif. Tradition represents him as a young man of exceptionally attractive appearance and manly strength. According to Philo (Vit. Moys. 1 5), the princess did not reveal to him his true relationship to her. But from Ex 2 11 it is clear that he was not ignorant of his Hebrew character. In fact, his sympathy for the sufferings of his brethren, breaking out in an impetuous deed of bloodshed, compelled his flight from the land. According to Josephus, he early showed signs of military genius. Taking command of the Egyptian army, he repulsed the Ethiopians from the very gates of Memphis, drove them back to their own capital Suba (later Meröe), and captured that city by the aid of the princess Sharbin, who fell in love with him, and accompanied him back to Egypt (Ant. II, 10).

5. Moses in Midian. Revelation of Yāhweh.

The next period of his life was passed in Midian. This period, like the preceding, is said to have covered forty years [P]. In the land of Midian Moses found refuge with Jethro (also called "Reuel, the priest," Ex 2 18). Entering into the house of this leader through a marriage with his daughter Zipporah, he was given the superintendence of his flocks. In the course of his duties in connection with Jethro's flocks, Moses received the Divine commission to become the ruler and deliverer of his oppressed brethren. The message came to him through the experience of the burning bush (q.v.) at Mount Sinai. At the same time, he received a new revelation of God as Jehovah (Yāhweh), the God of the Covenant (Pledge), which was to transcend the former knowledge of God as the God of power (El Shaddai). The name is certainly more ancient than the date of Moses, as it constituted a component part of his mother's name. And underlying its specific sense, which associates it with the Covenant, it includes the fundamental notion of self-existence and self-consistency, thus leading up to the higher idea of a God who keeps faith with His people. There are traces of the recognition of J″ by the Kenites and other tribes in the Sinaitic peninsula (cf. Budde, Rel. of Isr. to the Exile, 1898, pp. 1–38). But at the burning bush the expansion and transformation of this knowledge constituted a new era in the history of the name.

6. The Commission of Moses.

The commission of Moses was one calculated to stagger the bravest man. Neither did he fail to realize its difficulty. He shrank from it, feeling his weakness, especially in the art of persuasive speech. To overcome this difficulty he was directed to take his brother Aaron into his confidence and use him as his spokesman (prophet). His task at once resolved itself into the two stages, first of leading the people to accept him as leader, and then inducing Pharaoh to let them go out of Egypt (Ex ch. 4). As far as the people were concerned, their hardships led them to give ear, though cautiously and slowly, to his declaration that the hour for deliverance was come. It was otherwise with the king who ruled over them. Naturally he would not permit a race of hard workers to slip out of the land, where monuments of astounding magnitude and difficulty had been erected in the past by the use of the accumulated muscular force of many human beings.

7. The Plagues.

The efforts of the deliverer were now directed to the work of producing on the Egyptian king the impression that the will of the God of the Hebrews could not be withstood. This task was not easily accomplished. It required ten manifestations of the Divine power called "plagues" (Ex 7 20–12 36; see PLAGUES), in all of which there appeared a common attack upon the gods of the Egyptians and a common design to show the great power of J″ as against the impotence of the native deities. These plagues also proved effective in inspiring courage and fortitude among the Hebrews themselves, stemming the often rising tide of disaffection among them and preventing them from falling back into a condition of hopelessness when their request for freedom was denied by Pharaoh (Ex 5 20 f.). The repeated shocks thus inflicted on the king had their effect. By the tenth plague he found himself overawed and defeated, and gave the Hebrews over into the hands of Moses, who forthwith led them through a way least to be expected, toward the wilderness of Midian (see ISRAEL, HISTORY OF, § 3 (2)).

8. Organization in the Wilderness.

But if the task of getting Israel from under the yoke was a difficult one, that which confronted Moses on the Asiatic side of the Red Sea was much harder. To marshal the clans into some sort of community of action required the gifts of a general and legislator. How Moses proved himself equal to the occasion is told in the fourfold story of the Pentateuch. His first experience was in a conflict with Amalek (Ex 17 8-16). Next came the covenant at Sinai (Ex 19 2–24 16), with the Decalogue as its special ethical center. How necessary Moses' personal presence among the people had become is made clear by the incident of the golden calf (see CALF, GOLDEN), showing that even Aaron was not fully dominated by the new light on the religion of J″ (Ex chs. 32–34). Just before the Israelite tribes left Sinai, Jethro joined them, and, acting upon his suggestion, Moses established a form of government for the people. It was simple enough, and there is no reason to think that it was unsuited to the circumstances. But with all its simplicity it must have been more or less of an ideal not easy to enforce (Ex ch. 18; Nu chs. 11, 16, 17).

[1] The analogous tales of wonderful preservation of persons destined to become great (Semiramis [Diad., 2 : 4], Perseus [Apollod., II, 4 : 1], Cyrus [Herod., 1 : 113], Romulus [Livy, 1 : 4]) do not affect the credibility of this account. The only case that could have served as a model is that of Sargon I (cf. Maspero, Gesch. d. Morgenl. Völker, p. 194).

9. Training of Israel.

From Sinai Moses led Israel to the borders of the promised land. The only incident recorded of this portion of his life is the affair of Miriam and Aaron, who claimed the same prophetic gifts and, therefore, equal authority with him. Their claim was the germ of anarchy. Division of authority at this time would inevitably have led to disorganization. Hence the severe penalty inflicted on Miriam, which, however, Moses removed by his magnanimous intercession (Nu 12 12). On the eve of the attack on Canaan, Moses sent a deputation to inspect the land and the people. The report brought back by the majority was discouraging (see SPIES). Discontent arose, so that the people were not ready for the task of entering and possessing the land. It became evident that a new generation must be raised and trained in the wilderness, and thus hardened and prepared for the work. The story of the years following is simple. It is summed up in the picture of a great leader confronted by a people unaccustomed to the freedom of self-government, and fretting at the hardships they were called on to endure. The incident of Dathan and Abiram (see KORAH), the Reubenites, who together with Korah the Levite rebelled against Moses, is perhaps one of several such uprisings. As against these, it is clear that Moses must have in every case vindicated and strengthened his authority.

10. Death of Moses.

As the discipline of the wilderness was coming to its close, the end of the mission of Moses came with it. Moses made an effort to reach the promised land through Edom, but as this proved futile, because of the refusal of the king to let them pass through his land, Moses led Israel to the east side, reaching the frontiers of Moab. Here the men of the tribes of Gad and Reuben and a large number of Manasseh asked leave to stay (Nu ch. 32), and were given this permission, on condition, however, that they should first assist their brethren of the other tribes in conquering the country beyond the Jordan. The final scene in the great leader's life came when he received the summons to go up into Mount Nebo (in Abarim, q.v.; see also NEBO), and there, after viewing the land of promise in its entire length and breadth, he died satisfied upon the heights of Pisgah. He was buried "in the valley, in the land of Moab over against Beth-peor, but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day" (Dt 34 5 f.).

11. Character and Greatness.

Naturally tradition seized upon this element of mystery and wove supernatural legends out of it (cf. Assumption of Mos.; Jude ver. 9). It was natural, too, that, standing as he does at the very beginning of the united life of Israel, and furnishing for that life fundamental principles, he should be made the center and, later, the author of a great number of literary productions. How much or how little he wrote is not known. Ps 90 (a "Prayer of Moses") and the contents of the Pentateuch have been ascribed to his pen. It is a tribute to his greatness that this should have been done. But his distinctive characteristic, shining above all intellectual qualities, was his realization that only through obedience to spiritual and moral laws, the laws of the only true God, Yāhweh, could the new people accomplish a national task and achieve a world-destiny. He was the first of the great prophets. "He brought J" to Israel and Israel to J" "

MOSES, ASSUMPTION OF: An apocryphal book, based upon the account of the death of Moses (Dt 34 5 f.).

1. Apocalyptic Writings in Moses' Name.

Here it is said that Jehovah "buried him, but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day." Evidently upon the ground of this statement, legendary representations arose of the great leader's passing into heaven in an exceptional manner. Early Christian writers allude to at least four books that might have contained elaborations of this legend. These are The Apocalypse of Moses, The Assumption of Moses, The Ascension of Moses (Orig. de Princ. 3, 2, 1), and the Testament of Moses (Stichom. Niceph.). But these may be only different names of one or two works.

2. Rediscovery of the Assumption.

In any case, it is probable that there were at least two works bearing on the subject, which have been fused into the one now extant, under the single title Assumption of Moses. This pseudepigraph was brought to light in modern times, first in Latin, in 1861 by Ceriani (Monum. Sacr. et Profan., fasc. I, pp. 55–64), and has since been edited, with an introduction and notes and with an English translation, by Professor Charles (1897).

3. Contents.

The work begins with an exhortation by Moses, addressed to Joshua to preserve his writings (ch. 1). This is followed by the prediction that Israel would forsake J" and be divided into two nations (ch. 2), but should awake to the enormity of her crime and repent (ch. 3); the two tribes should be restored, and the ten preserved among the Gentiles (ch. 4); they should repeatedly fall away (ch. 5), should be oppressed by Herod (ch. 6), and fall under the dominion of wicked leaders (ch. 7); the Romans should subjugate them (ch. 8), but a great Levite, Taxo,[1] should appear to restore a better condition of things among them (ch. 9). For this deliverance a song of hope is inserted at this point (ch. 10). Joshua, to whom this revelation is made by Moses, laments and refuses to be comforted (ch. 11), but is exhorted by Moses to take up his work of conquering and destroying the Gentiles (ch. 12). At this point the book comes to an abrupt end.

[1] This is a cryptogram made by gematria from Eleazar (תכסוך = אלעזר), by taking in each case the letter preceding in the Heb. alphabet. But the final ק is evidently lost by textual corruption.

In the ancient patristic allusions to the Assumption of Moses, the words of Jude ver. 9 are said to be quoted from this book; but as they do not appear in the extant text, it must be inferred either that there was a confusion of names or that the part of the book from which the quotation was made has been lost (Schürer), or that our work is a Testament of Moses, with portions of the original Assumption incorporated into it (Charles).

4. Identification.

The Latin text is a translation from a Greek original, and this again is believed by many to have been rendered from a Hebrew or Aramaic original (cf. Hilgenfeld's attempted restoration into Greek in Messias Judaeorum, 1869, pp. 435–468).

5. Original Language.

MOST HIGH. See GOD, § 1. A. C. Z.

MOTE (κάρφος): As used in Mt 7 3 f., Lk 6 41 f., this term means a 'dried twig,' or 'chaff.' The original meaning of the English word "mote" is somewhat similar. See also BEAM. J. M. T.

MOTH. See PALESTINE, § 26.

MOTHER. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 5.

MOUND (ṣōl'lāh', what is 'raised up'): A heap of earth, timber, etc. (Jer 6 6, 32 24, 33 4; Ezk 4 2, etc., "mount" AV), designed to facilitate a siege. See also BESIEGE. A. C. Z.

MOUNT, MOUNTAIN (הַר, har, ὄρος), 'mount' or 'mountain range,' 'mountainous region,' as distinguished from the lowland: The RV has, more uniformly than AV, "hill-country" for 'mountainous region,' and uses "mountain" more correctly than AV, which often has "hill" for an isolated high elevation. The more correct use of "mount" is for specific mountains, as Sinai (Ex 19 11, 18; Nu 3 1, etc.), Hor (Nu 20 22, etc.), Hermon (Dt 3 8; Jos 11 17, etc.), Carmel (I K 18 19, etc.), Zion (Is 4 5, 10 12, etc.), and others. "Mountain," in sing. and pl., is used for high elevations in general. In Ps 68 15 f. [16 f.], "mountain of Bashan" is the mountain range of the Jebel Hauran; with this meaning it is more often translated "hill-country." "Mountain" is often used in parallelisms with "hill," and in contrast with "valley." See HILL, HILL-COUNTRY. Various references to mountain are of interest. "Mountain (AV hill) of God" (Ps 68 15 [16]) means a majestic mountain; cf. the simile in Ps 36 6 [7]. "M. of God" in Ex 4 27, 18 5, etc., refers to Horeb (Sinai). "Mount of congregation" (Is 14 13) is the dwelling-place of the gods in the far North. The mountains first appeared at creation (Ps 104 6 f.), are one of God's chief works (Ps 65 6 [7], 90 2), Am 4 13, they feel God's displeasure (Is 42 15; Ps 104 32; Jg 5 5; Mic 1 4; Is 5 25, etc.); are called to witness God's dealings with His people (Mic 6 2; Ezk 36 1, etc.). They leap in praise of J" (Ps 114 4, 6). Mountains are hiding-places (Jg 6 2; Ps 11 1), abodes of animals (I Ch 12 8; Song 4 8); in them sheep go astray (Nah 3 18; I K 22 17; Jer 50 6); good places for grazing (Ps 50 10; Job 39 8). Among the many figurative uses are Israel's overcoming its foes (Is 41 15); overwhelming calamities (Jer 13 16); stability, though not as unchanging as God's love (Is 54 10). In Dn 2 35, 45 the Aramaic טוּר, ṭūr, 'mountain,' is used. In Is 29 3 mutstsābh is 'siege-works' as in RV, and in Jer 6 6, 32 24, 33 4; Ezk 4 2, 17 17, 21 22, 26 8; Dn 11 15 ṣōl'lāh is a 'mount' or 'mound' (as in ARV) thrown up in besieging a city. C. S. T.

MOURNING AND MOURNING CUSTOMS: Upon news of the death of a relative or an important personage, people rent their garments (II S 1 11) and put on the mourning-garment of sackcloth, saq (II S 3 31, 21 10). As to what this garment was opinions differ. Some (Kamphausen and others) think it was very much like a corn-sack, open at both ends; others think that it was originally nothing more than a loin-cloth, which in prehistoric times was the customary and, in fact, the only article of clothing worn by Israel's ancestors. Consequently, in later times it was worn only as a religious duty, i.e., on extraordinary occasions, in mourning festivals, processions, etc. Even the late book The Ascension of Isaiah (2 10) speaks of the loin-cloth as a mourning-garment. Since old modes of dress, as they pass out of use, easily take upon themselves, from their very antiquity, a holy character, it is not surprising that the prophets chose the saq as a piece of clothing. It is also probable that as time passed and civilization developed, the dimensions of the saq were enlarged (cf. Schwally, ZATW, XI, 174 f.).

1. The Mourning Garment.

As a sign of grief it was the custom to sprinkle ashes on the head, as the Arabs do to-day (II S 1 2; cf. Mic 1 10). It is probable that originally the ashes were those of the burned body (II Ch 16 14, 21 19), or dust from the grave (see W R. Smith, Relig. of the Semites, p. 413 f.).

2. Dust or Ashes on the Head.

In Jer 16 6, Dt 14 1 ff., Lv 19 27 f. the practise of making cuttings in the flesh is presupposed as common. The prohibition of this custom was not due to the feeling that it involved a disfigurement of the body created by God, but to the conviction that it was a cultus-usage irreconcilable with the religion of J" (cf. I K 18 28). Evidently, the purpose was by means of blood to propitiate the spirits of the dead, and to persuade them to enter into fellowship, to a certain degree, with the living.

3. Cuttings in the Flesh.

In like manner, the prohibition of the kindred custom of shaving the head or beard (Lv 19 27; Dt 14 1 ff.) dealt with an old cultus-usage dating from a time when the worship of the dead was common in Israel. It was, in reality, an offering of hair brought to the dead—a practise in vogue also among the Egyptians, Arabs, Greeks, and other peoples. Wellhausen suggests that probably the original meaning of the custom was that thereby the offerer confessed himself to be dedicated to the deity. The covering of the head in times of grief (cf. II S 15 30; Jer 14 3; Est 6 12) Schwally compares with Elijah's reverent covering of his head when God appeared to him (I K 19 13). The custom would thus be due to a feeling of awe and reverence in the presence of the dead, as was probably the custom of removing the sandals (cf. Ex 3 5 with Is 20 2 f.; II S 15 30). Whether the covering of the beard (Ezk 24 17; Jer 14 3; II S 15 30) is to be understood as due to a weakening of the earlier custom of cutting off the beard (so Benzinger) seems doubtful. In view of the fact that the spirits of the dead were also feared as powers that could work injury to man, it is not improbable that a number of the above-mentioned customs, including that of covering the beard, were due to an effort to render oneself inoffensive and thus protect oneself against harm.

5. Lamentations.

Such mourning customs were usually accompanied by loud cries of sorrow. The relatives cried "Ho! Ho!" and with loud lamentations preceded the body to the grave, often accompanied by professional female (at times male) mourners (Jer 9 16 f.; Am 5 16), musicians or minstrels (Mt 9 23, "flute-players" RV), who chanted the mourning-song (qīnāh), or played mourning-tunes which had a peculiar rhythm and were always sung in a monotonous strain. The same custom is observed to-day in the neighborhood of Damascus, in the Hauran, and elsewhere. There is direct reference to the lament over the dead in Zec 12 10 ff., which can not be understood as meaning the simple natural outbreak of sorrow, but must refer to the established cultus-usages of which each nation had its peculiar forms.

6. The Meal for the Dead and Offerings to the Dead.

The period of fasting was closed (or, in case it extended over several days, interrupted) by a feast for the dead (Hos 9 4; II S 3 35; Jer 16 7 f.; Ezk 24 17, 22). Besides such a feast, there were also offerings to the dead. In fact, the feast probably was an outgrowth of the custom of presenting offerings to the dead. The requirement in Dt 26 14, that when one brings his tithes he shall affirm that he has not "given thereof for the dead," can have reference only to offerings to, or meals in honor of, the dead. The latter had also a cultus significance, inasmuch as such food was considered unclean (Hos 9 4). Survivals of such a practise are met with in much later times. Tobias (To 4 17) is enjoined to lay food only on the tombs of the just, and not to give any such honor to sinners, while the son of Sirach ridicules this custom as he asks: "What profit is an offering to a shade? Good things poured out upon a mouth that is closed are the offerings of meat laid upon a grave" (Sir 30 18 f.). The burning of spices, of which we find mention in late references (Jer 34 5; II Ch 16 14, 21 19) should also be viewed as a form of offering to the dead. It is, of course, to be understood that no claim is made that in later times there was any clear knowledge of the original nature of these mourning customs. As with many other customs, even more so with these, the practise survived long after the root from which it sprang had withered away. W. N.

MOUSE, MICE. See PALESTINE, § 24.

MOUTH: This term translates the following Heb. and Gr. words: (1) gārōn, 'throat' (Ps 149 6, "throat" RV). (2) hēk, 'palate' (Job 12 11, 20 13, "palate" RV; Pr 5 3). (3) 'ădhī, 'ornament' (Ps 32 9, "trappings" RV; 103 5, "desire" RV). (4) peh, 'mouth' (Gn 4 11; Ex 4 11; Job 3 1). (5) pūm, Aram. 'mouth' (Dn 4 31, etc.). (6) pānīm, 'face' (Pr 15 14). (7) t'ra', 'gate' (Dn 3 26, "door" RVmg.). (8) λόγος, 'word' (Ac 15 27, "word of mouth" RV). (9) στόμα, 'mouth' (Mt 4 4; Lk 1 64). Most of these terms have, besides their literal usage, also a figurative one in which "mouth" is often equivalent to 'words,' 'speech,' 'judgment,' 'wisdom,' and, in general, the character of a person as put into articulate expression. A. C. Z.

MOVING THINGS: The rendering of sherets (Gn 1 20) and remes (Gn 9 3 AV). In Gn 1 20, however, this phrase is changed in RV to "living creatures." The difference between the two Heb. synonyms is that the first (sherets) conveys the idea of swarming and the second (remes) that of gliding or creeping. A. C. Z.

MOW, MOWER, MOWING. See, in general, under Reaping, AGRICULTURE, § 5. In Am 7 1 "king's mowings" has reference to a special cutting and gathering of grass for the king's cattle. A. C. Z.

MOZA, mō'zȧ (מוֹצָא, mōtsā'): 1. A son of Caleb by his concubine Ephah (I Ch 2 46). 2. A descendant of Saul (I Ch 8 36 f., 9 42 f.). C. S. T.

MOZAH, mō'zā (מוֹצָה, mōtsāh): A city of Benjamin (Jos 18 26). Map II, E 1. E. E. N.

MUFFLERS. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8.

MULBERRY-TREE. See PALESTINE, § 21.

MULE (פֶּרֶד, peredh; fem. פִּרְדָּה, pirdāh, properly, the term mule means the offspring of a he-ass and a mare, but the Heb. term probably includes that of the stallion and she-ass): An animal much used in the East, both in ancient and modern times. Mules, known in Egypt and Assyria long before, were introduced into Israel by David, whose riding animal was a mule (I K 1 33; cf. II S 13 29, 18 9). From David's time on they seem to have been quite common, and their importation was an important item in the commerce of the day (I K 10 25; cf. Ezk 27 14). They were used for riding and also as pack-beasts of burden (cf. II K 5 17). On Gn 36 24 and Est 8 10, 14, cf. RV. E. E. N.

MUNITION: The term renders the Heb. mᵉtsādh, mᵉtsōdhāh (Is 33 16, 29 7), 'stronghold,' and mᵉtsūrāh, 'bulwark' (Nah 2 1). A. C. Z.

MUPPIM, mup'pim (מֻפִּים, muppīm): The ancestral head of one of the clans of Benjamin, and the clan itself (Gn 46 21; called Shephupham[n], or Shupham, in Nu 26 39 and I Ch 8 5, and Shuppim in I Ch 7 12). E. E. N.

MURDER. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2.

MURMUR, MURMURING: With one or two exceptions all the instances in which these terms occur in the Bible have reference either to the frequent complainings of the Israelites against Moses in the Wilderness (Ex 15 24, 16 8, 17 3; Nu 14 2, etc.) or to the fault-finding of the Jewish religious leaders with Jesus (Lk 5 30; Jn 6 41, etc.). In no case is there anything technical or peculiar in the expressions used. E. E. N.

1. Hebrew Music in General.

The use of music in some form is practically universal among all peoples. Its primary application is in ordinary social life, as a diversion and an aid to merry-making; but it often appears also in religious ceremonies and in connection with soothsaying and necromancy. Its instruments are generally developed with much ingenuity. It is, therefore, not surprising that musical customs and implements were well known to the ancient Hebrews. Yet, although the O T speaks frequently of singing and dancing, and gives the names of nearly twenty instruments, the details of the whole subject are obscure. We have no exact information as to the practical methods of singing, and almost no pictorial representation of instruments or players. On many points we are forced to draw mere inferences from the better-known usages of Egypt, Babylonia, and Assyria, as reported on their monuments, or from those existing to-day in Palestine and adjacent countries.

2. Summary of Principal References.

Without attempting an exhaustive summary of the references, especially those regarding merely vocal effects, some of the clearer and more representative applications of music may well be distinguished at the outset. These fall into four classes. (a) Singing, dancing, and playing on instruments are frequently cited as natural features of social jubilation, as in the stories of Jacob (Gn 31 27), Miriam (Ex ch. 15), Israel at Sinai (Ex 32 6, 18), Jephthah (Jg 11 34), David (I S 18 6), in general (Jer 31 4; Ezk 33 32), among the profane and riotous (Job 21 12; Ec 2 8, 7 5; Is 5 12; Am 5 23, 6 5), at Babylon (Is 14 11), at Tyre (Is 23 16; Ezk 26 13, 28 13), and in contrast with times of despair (Job 30 31; Pr 25 20; Is 24 8). The instruments chiefly mentioned are the drum, the harp and psaltery, and two kinds of pipe. Jubal is named as "the father" of players on the harp and pipe (Gn 4 21). In one instance drums and harps are named, apparently in association with war (Is 30 32). (b) Music as an adjunct to prophetic ecstasy is but seldom mentioned, though in a way to imply familiarity with such use (II K 3 15; Ps 49 4). Akin to this is the use of music in the case of Saul to overcome mental depression (I S 16 16-23). (c) A distinctly religious use of music is first stated in connection with David's bringing up of the Ark (II S 6 5, 15). The Temple usages are occasionally mentioned in the early histories (I K 10 12) and a few of the prophets (Am 8 3, 10; Is 30 29; Ezk 40 44). The later histories go into the matter with much greater fulness, attributing the organization of the musical establishment to David, speaking of its use under Solomon, Asa, Jehoshaphat, Jehoiada, Hezekiah, Josiah, and after the Exile, giving lists of its members, etc. (I Ch 6 31-47, 9 33, 13 8, 15 16-28, 16 4-6, 41-42, 25 1-31; II Ch 5 12-14, 7 6, 9 11, 15 14, 20 21-22, 28, 23 13, 29 25-28, 30 21, 34 12, 35 15; Ezk 2 41, 65, 70, 3 10-11, 7 7, 24, 10 24; Neh 7 1, 44, 67, 73, 10 28, 39, 11 22-23, 12 27-43, 46-47, 13 5, 10; with an interesting note on a procession in Ps 68 24-25). It must be confessed that the distribution of the references leaves the question of the amount of music in the First Temple doubtful, while it plainly indicates its prominence in the Second, after the Exile had given a knowledge of Babylonian customs. To these are to be added the rather numerous passages in the Psalms where instruments are mentioned (33 2-3, 43 4, 47 5, 57 8, 71 22, 81 2-3, 92 3, 98 5-6, 108 2, 137 2-4, 144 9, 147 7, 149 3, 150 3-5), besides the frequent allusions in the poems to the custom of song. The instruments oftenest named are harps, psalteries, two kinds of trumpets, cymbals and drums, but none of the wind varieties appears in the older references. (d) The use of trumpets for signaling, usually for war, but also in religious or civic observances, is very frequently indicated, both as a historic fact (as in the stories of Saul, Absalom, Solomon, etc.), as a ceremonial rule (as in Lv ch. 25), and as a figure for prophetic utterance (as in Jer, Ezk, Am, Hos, etc.). An altogether peculiar reference is incorporated into the story of Nebuchadrezzar's image (Dn 3 5, 7, 10, 15), upon which comment is made below under INSTRUMENTS.

3. Instruments.

The instruments named are representative of the natural groups that are observed everywhere; namely, those that are struck or shaken (percussive or pulsatile), those that are blown with the breath (flatile), and those with strings that are twanged. The Hebrews are not known to have had any form of viol—a stringed instrument played by the friction of a bow—though on this point our information may be defective. (This word in Is 5 12 AV and Am 6 5 properly renders nebhel, 'psaltery.' Sec 3 (b), below.) (1) Of instruments struck or shaken there are four or five. (a) The tabret or timbrel, tōph, was probably a small bowl-shaped drum, or possibly a hoop-shaped tambourine. Of seventeen references, a decided majority are in connection with merry-making (as Gn 31 27; Jg 11 34; Is 5 12; Jer 31 4), and the rest religious, in the hands of the prophet-gild (I S 10 5), or of worshipers (as Ps 68 25, 150 4). It appears usually with the harp, often with the psaltery or pipe, rarely with the cymbals or trumpets. (b) The cymbals, tsetsᵉlīm, mᵉtsiltayim, were either hollowed metal cups held in the hands or little plates fastened to the fingers (castanets). All the ten or more references are in religious use, and all but one (II S 6 5) in the later histories (as I Ch 16 5; Neh 12 27), or in Ps 150—the latter case with intimations of a noisy sound. In one passage (I Ch 15 19) they are described as made of brass. They occur usually with the harp, psaltery, and trumpet, and with song. (c) Some pulsatile instrument (RV castanets), mᵉnaʿanʿīm, which occurs only in the story of the upbringing of the Ark (II S 6 5), was probably the Egyptian sistrum (a loop-shaped metal frame with loose, jingling rods). (d) Bells or jingles, m'tsillōth, as part of the trappings of horses, are once named (Zec 14 20). (2) The flatile instruments represent both the flute and the trumpet classes. (a) The pipe, ḥālīl, was either a direct flute or flageolet, or possibly an oboe, doubtless made of cane or wood. Of the five references, one shows use by the prophet-gild (I S 10 5), and the rest are social (as Is 5 12). (b) Another pipe (organ AV), ūgābh, is supposed to be some form of Pan's-pipe or syrinx (a set of graduated tubes of cane). Of the four references (all with mention of the harp), that with Jubal's name (Gn 4 21) seems generic for all kinds of wood-wind instruments, and the rest are poetic (Job 21 12, 30 31; Ps 150 4). (c) Still a third pipe, neqebh (Ezk 28 13), is a doubtful word, perhaps signifying something of the jewelry class. (d) The ram's horn or horn, qeren, is but rarely mentioned (Jos 6 5; I Ch 25 5; Dn ch. 3), but was probably common as a rude instrument for signals and noisy demonstrations. (e) The curved trumpet, shōphār, was probably derived from the foregoing, but possibly was often made of wood as well as of horn. The nearly forty references all concern the giving of signals, except some late ones (II S 6 15; I Ch 15 28; II Ch 15 14; Ps 47 5, 81 3, 98 6, 150 3). (f) The straight trumpet, ḥătsots'rāh, was probably always of metal. This is distinctly named over fifteen times, of which some refer to signaling, but in the later histories almost wholly in connection with the Temple ritual (as I Ch 16 6, 42; II Ch 29 26-28; Ezr 3 10, etc.). It would seem that this in later times became the characteristic instrument of the priests. (3) The stringed instruments are decidedly prominent, but their exact form is in doubt. (a) The harp, kinnōr, was probably a lyre rather than a true harp, and therefore analogous to the modern Arab kissar. Over thirty-five references imply that this was universally employed in both secular and sacred connections. In two-thirds of these it is associated with the psaltery, in about one-third of them with the cymbals and the drum, and in about the same number with one or the other trumpet. (b) The psaltery, nebhel, was probably not a psaltery, which term properly belongs to one variety of the zither, but either a triangular harp, perhaps resembling the Greek trigon (as the early Christian Fathers understood), or, still better, some form of lute and therefore analogous to the common Egyptian nefer. In about twenty-five references it is nearly always associated with the harp, which would seem to imply that the two were not of the same class, but complementary. We are absolutely sure from monumental evidence (outside of Palestine) that the Hebrews used a lyre, though that this was actually called kinnōr can not be fully demonstrated. (4) Collective terms for instruments occur in some cases, especially the expression "implements of song" (I Ch 15 16; II Ch 5 13; Am 6 5, etc.). Stringed instruments are supposed to be suggested by n'gīnāh (Job 30 9; Ps 69 12, 77 6; Is 38 20; La 3 14, 5 14, and in the captions to Pss 4, 6, 54, 55, 61, 67, and 76 and the colophon to Hab ch. 3), and by minnīm (Ps 150 4 45 8); and similarly pipes by n'ḥīlōth (caption of Ps 5). In three cases (Ps 33 2, 144 9, 92 4) the word 'āsōr, 'ten,' occurs, in the first two with nebhel, in the last absolutely. This is usually understood to designate a ten-stringed variety (instrument of ten strings, Ps 33 2, 144 9, 92 4 AV; "psaltery of ten strings," Ps 33 2, 144 9 RV), which, if correct, militates against the view that the nebhel was a lute. Again, in three cases (I Ch 15 21 and captions to Pss 6 and 12) the word sh'mīnīth, 'eighth,' occurs, in the first with kinnōr, in the others absolutely. This is often regarded as indicating playing or singing in octaves, but, since the notion of this interval as an "eighth" is unlikely in the extreme at this period, this also may be a reference to the number of strings. Again, in three or four cases (I Ch 15 20 and in the captions of Ps 46, and probably 49—the last by a transfer of the text from the end of 48) the word 'ălāmōth, 'maidens,' appears, in the first with nebhel, in the others absolutely. This perhaps refers to some treble effect. To this same class of expressions belongs gittīth (captions of Pss 8, 81, and 84), which may be the designation of some sort of instrument. It must be confessed, however, that the interpretation of all these technical terms, as of others cited below, is extremely uncertain, as the text may be corrupt or the reference may be to facts or usages now entirely unknown. (5) The terms used in the story of Nebuchadrezzar's image (Dn 3 5, 7, 10, 15) are so peculiar as to require special comment. The AV and the RV both read cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer. Of these the first, qarnā, is the emphatic form of qeren, horn; the second, mashrōqīthā, is probably a form of flute or pipe; the third, qīthros or qitharos, is plainly the Greek κίθαρις, a lyre; the fourth, sabb'kā, is the Greek σαμβυκή, a triangular harp (probably Oriental in origin); the fifth, p'santerīn, is perhaps the Greek ψαλτήριον, another harp, or, better, the Persian santir, a dulcimer; and the sixth, sūmpōn'yāh, is evidently the Greek συμφωνία, probably some kind of bagpipes. The last three terms of the EVV should therefore be corrected, since sackbut (an old English form of trombone) is strikingly inapt, and dulcimer is misplaced or wholly wrong. The occurrence of several loan-words from the Greek is naturally regarded as one of the signs of the late date of the passage and of the whole book.

4. Musicians as a Class.

It is likely that somewhat early in Hebrew history musicians were recognized as a distinct class in the community. Certainly this was true when the official ministrants of the Temple were fully organized. "Singing men and singing women" are named (II S 19 35; cf. Ec 2 8), as if well known, especially as helpers at festivities, probably also as professional mourners (Ec 12 5; Mt 9 23). Attached to the Temple, at least in later periods, were singers and players, both men and women, set apart from among the Levites. The Chronicler gives extensive details about their organization and activity (I Ch chs. 6, 15, 16, 25; II Ch chs. 5, 20, 29, etc.), but they are elsewhere mentioned (as II K 12 13; Am 8 3, 10; Ezk 40 44), especially at the end of the Exile (as Ezr ch. 2; Neh chs. 7, 12, etc.). Their first institution is attributed to David, under the advice of Gad and Nathan (II Ch 29 25, etc.), and they are said originally to have been divided into Kohathites, Asaphites, and Merarites (I Ch 6 31-48), the supervisor being Chenaniah (I Ch 15 22) and the leaders Asaph, Heman, and Ethan (or Jeduthun). Their total number is given as 288, arranged in twenty-four courses (I Ch ch. 25). In the Temple their station was at the east of the brazen altar (II Ch 5 12); they served also on occasion with the army (II Ch 20 21-22, 28). At the Return the number of Asaphites is given as 128 or 148 (Ezr 2 41; Neh 7 44), and the total as 200 or 245 (Ezr 2 65; Neh 7 67), with Jezrahiah as supervisor in Nehemiah's time (Neh 12 42). Provision was then carefully made for their free maintenance, as for the priests and other Levites (Ezr 7 24; Neh 11 23, 12 47, 13 5, 10-13).

5. Actual Effects.

As to the actual styles and forms of music used, we are thrown back almost exclusively upon conjecture. We infer that vocal effects were those emphasized, instruments being used only for accompaniment. Song was doubtless in unison, loud and harsh, mostly in rather irregular cantillation or recitative, though sometimes strongly rhythmic, the melodies being based upon modes or scales differing from those of modern European music and very likely provided with manifold melodic embellishments, as in Oriental singing to-day. The parallelism of Hebrew poetry suggests that singing was to some extent antiphonal. From the instruments named, we infer that rude harmony was not impossible; certainly, there must have been crashes of concerted sound. It is a mooted question whether or not the traditional cantillation of modern synagogues sheds any light upon these ancient usages. This is improbable, or, if it does, there are no certain criteria for identifying the ancient material. (On chant, Am 6 5 AV, cf. RV.) That vociferous praise was made prominent in Hebrew worship after the Exile is evident, however, so far as we can now see, its historic significance lies, not in what it was artistically, but in the fact that its existence and the records of it have afforded a warrant for the free application of music in Christian worship.

6. Musical Titles and Directions.

In the Psalter occur several expressions (besides those already noted) whose meaning is obscure, but which are probably musical or at least liturgical. In the captions of about fifteen psalms are what are usually thought to be the titles or first words of well-known melodies to which the psalms were to be sung. These are 'al-tashḥēth, 'Destroy not' (Pss 57, 58, 59, 75); shūshan-'ēdhūth, 'Lily of the testimony' (Ps 60); shōshannīm-'ēdhūth, 'Lilies of the testimony' (Ps 80); shōshannīm, 'Lilies' (Pss 45, 69); 'aiyeleth hashshaḥar, 'Hind of the dawn' (Ps 22); yōnath 'ēlem reḥōqīm, 'Dove of the distant terebinths' or 'Silent dove of those afar off' (Ps 56); and perhaps mūth labbēn, 'Death of——?' (Ps 9), though this last may well be a corruption in the text. The attempt to connect these expressions with any particular melodies is, of course, futile. As against the idea that they are titles of melodies is the fact that no special metrical similarity appears between different psalms with which the same title is found.[1]

[1] To the present writer it seems not impossible that these titles indicate not a melody, but some passage, ritual occasion, or object by which the poem was suggested or with which it was used. For example, 'Destroy not' is the opening of a notable prayer in Dt ch. 9, with which it is not hard to associate the four psalms in question. The 'Lily' titles recall the ornamentation of the two brazen pillars and the brazen sea in the Temple (I K 7 15-26), possibly hinting at a customary place of rendering. As it stands, the 'Hind' title reminds one of the opening of Ps 42, but the pointing of the word for "hind" may be corrupt. It is curious that the 'Dove' title presents verbal similarities to Ps 55 6-7, and the title may be a subscription to 55, as Thirtle holds with regard to all the titles of this class.

7. Early Christian Music.

The N T references to music are few and mostly unimportant. Jesus and the Disciples sang the Hallel at the Last Supper (Mt 26 30; Mk 14 26). Among the early converts singing had a place as a method of social worship (Ac 16 25; I Co 14 15, 26; Eph 5 19; Col 3 16; Ja 5 13). And in the Apocalypse and elsewhere musical symbols are used in describing the coming of the Last Day and the praises of heaven. The instruments named are the cymbal, κύμβαλον (I Co 13 1); the pipe or flute, αὐλός (Mt 9 23, 11 17; Lk 7 32; I Co 14 7; Rev 18 22); the trumpet, σάλπιγξ (Mt 6 2; I Co 14 8; He 12 19; Rev 1 10, 4 1, 18 22, and, as the signal of the Last Day, Mt 24 31; I Th 4 16; I Co 15 52; Rev 8 2-13, 9 1, 13-14, 10 7, 11 15); and the harp or lyre, κιθάρα (I Co 14 7; Rev 5 8, 14 2, 15 2, 18 22). Of these, the flute and the lyre were the most characteristic types of the Greek world in general. We infer that the first Jewish converts brought over with them the habit of psalmody from the synagogues, to which the new conceptions of Christianity soon demanded additions. The precise musical forms used doubtless varied in different countries, the Jews using such styles and melodies as they already had, and the Greeks adapting the more elegant and artistic methods of the Hellenic world generally. At Corinth we perhaps catch a glimpse of the Greek custom of 'rhapsodizing' or extempore cantillation (I Co ch. 14). Some distinction may have been made between "psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs" (Eph 5 19; Col 3 17), the first being properly O T songs, the second probably similar formal poems of a Christian quality, and the third perhaps freer and more popular songs. It is often thought that in the N T are preserved not only some late Jewish psalms (Lk 1 46-55, 68-79, 2 14, 28-32), but also some fragments of the new hymns of the Early Church (as Eph 5 14; I Ti 3 16; II Ti 2 11-13; Rev 4 8, 11, 5 9-10, 12-13, 7 12, 11 15-18, 15 3-4, 19 1-2, 5-8).

LITERATURE: Among the monographs on the subject are J. Stainer, The Music of the Bible (n. d.), and J. Weiss, Die musikalischen Instrumente . des A Ts. (1895), but on the technical details general music histories, like Ambros, Fétis, Naumann, etc., should be consulted. MYRA, mai'ra (Μύρα): A city on the southern seaboard of Lycia, one of the twenty-three republics, which, after 189 B.C., formed an independent Lycian league. Over this the Lyciarch presided. Myra, being one of the six chief cities of Lycia, had two votes in the general assembly of the league. Theodosius severed Lycia from Pamphylia, and Lycia became a separate province, with Myra as its capital. Its site contains the ruins of a magnificent theater and rock-cut tombs, some entirely free-standing, bearing inscriptions in the Lycian language, written in an alphabet peculiar to Lycia. None of the inscriptions are very old, but they prove that the Lycians were Aryans, though they do not settle the entire question of nationality. Myra was the seat of the worship of the sailors' god, whose functions have been assumed by St. Nicholas (Bishop of Myra, at the beginning of the 4th cent.), the modern patron saint of sailors. Myra was a port on the direct route between Syria-Egypt and Rome. Strong westerly winds prevail throughout the summer and carry ships easily to Syria or to Egypt. On the return voyage ships from Egypt-Syria worked N. and E. of Cyprus and hugged the coast—because of the land breezes—past Myra to Cnidus. This explains the course of Paul's ship (Ac 27 5). J. R. MYSTERY (μυστήριον): In the simplest and most natural sense a mystery is something beyond the comprehension of the human understanding. As such, it is an inevitable factor in religion, which, from the nature of the case, associates the soul with God and the world of transcendental realities. Consequently, even in the most strictly scientific age, mystery in religion must abide. To eliminate it is to destroy the very essence of religion. All the more forcibly was its necessity felt in the ancient world when toward exploring this unknown element no means were available, and when every effort to peer into its obscurity was followed by a greater sense of awe. This condition gave rise to a twofold development, i.e., first, the observation of problems in religion, and, second, the invention of a series of conventional forms or rites, supposed to embody knowledge somehow obtained in this field. The mysteries of the first class include such matters as the suffering of the just man and the prosperity of the wicked, the destiny of human beings after death, etc. Such mysteries constitute the subject of the Wisdom writings generally (Job, Pss 73, 139, etc.).

But the Biblical use of the word is rather in harmony with the second definition. A mystery is knowledge imparted to, and possessed by, a limited circle of initiates in an organization. Among the non-Israelitic religions of ancient times there was hardly one in which worship was not in some portion of it turned into mystery. Toward this end the first step was to establish a line, on one side of which should stand the few initiated privileged characters, and on the other the great outside multitude. The subject-matter of knowledge by which the few were distinguished was next reduced to a system of symbolical representations. To pass from the ranks of the uninitiated into the circle of the initiated, one must receive the necessary instruction from the consecrated priest (hierophant = 'revealer of sacred secrets'), and must be conducted through a course of significant actions, including sacramental guaranties which secured him his privileges both in this life and in the future. The Eleusinian mysteries in ancient Greece were the maturest and fullest expression of the type, but others, both more ancient and elaborate, are known to have existed (e.g., the Orphic mysteries).

The O T knows no mysteries of this type. The symbolical meaning of its ritual, including such features as the Holy of Holies with its cherubim and mercy-seat, the rites of the Day of Atonement, etc., are not peculiar secrets for the few, but the expressions of a living religion common to the whole people. The spirit of democracy ran too high among the Hebrews to admit of the growth of such a system. But when Israel came in touch with Greek life, the idea was adopted and gained ground (cf. Wis. 14 15, 23, 12 5).

In the N T the idea of mystery appears first as that of a secret known to God, and known by men only as revealed to them from above. Thus in the Synoptic Gospels the kingdom of God has its mysteries (Mt 13 11; Mk 4 11; Lk 8 10). There is nothing in this of a ritual element or of exclusiveness. It is not the designed withholding of knowledge, but the obtuseness of men that keeps them from fully appreciating some of the teachings of Jesus, and renders these mysteries (cf. also I Ti 3 9, 16). Paul, more than any other N T writer, makes use of the figure of mystery in its Greek sense for the purpose of bringing into view the exact nature of the Gospels. And yet he uses the term not uniformly and with a mechanically fixed meaning, but with a considerable freedom. When he employs it, for instance, in the apocalyptic passage in II Th 2 7, it is in the sense of something that was still kept from the idle multitude, but soon to be made manifest. This is comparatively simple. On the other hand, in I Co 2 7, 15 51 he speaks as an initiate who instructs the uninitiated (cf. also I Co 4 1; Col 1 26, 4 3; Eph 3 3 f.). So also in the "interpretation of tongues" (I Co 14 2) he who speaks with tongues occupies the place of a hierophant, communicating knowledge to the small and select circle. Inasmuch as the Gospel is a message communicated by God in accordance with His sovereign grace to the circle that will accept it, the term 'mystery' seems eminently expressive of this aspect of it. Hence it is "the mystery" (with or without the attached phrase "of Christ," Eph 3 4; Col 4 3, or "of God," I Co 4 1; Col 2 2). No amount of investigation or search could have brought this to the knowledge of man. In the Apocalypse the general sense is analogous to that of the Pauline usage, but from the nature of the case it involves the employment of elaborate symbolism (Rev 1 20, 10 7, 17 5, 7).

NAAMAN, nê'a-man (נַעֲמָן, na'ămān), 'pleasant': 1. A Syrian general under Ben-hadad, perhaps also his political adviser or prime minister (II K ch. 5). Jewish legend identifies him with the young man who drew a bow at a venture and mortally wounded King Ahab (I K 22 34; Jos. Ant. VIII, 15 5). He was afflicted with leprosy. Through an Israelitic slave girl in his household he came to hear of the wonderful powers of the prophet Elisha in Israel, and, procuring an introduction from Ben-hadad to the king of Israel, he went in search of the healer. The king of Israel at first suspected a snare and an occasion of hostilities on Ben-hadad's part, but was induced to send Naaman to the prophet, at whose hands the Syrian general found his cure. He was also converted by this experience into a worshiper of J″; whereupon the problem arose as to his conduct in Syria. In the performance of his official duties, he must go into the temple of Rimmon and bow before the idol-god. He wished it understood that this was not a violation of his devotion to J″. Further, in accordance with the notion that each god had exclusive jurisdiction of the land where he was worshiped (cf. I S 26 19), he requested that he might take with him two mules' burden of Israelitic earth, upon which, as on a shrine of J″, he might offer his worship. 2. A grandson of Benjamin (Gn 46 21) and eponym of a family, the Naamites (Nu 26 40). 3. A son of Ehud (I Ch 8 7). A. C. Z.

NAAMATHITE, nê'a-ma-thait″ (הַנַּעֲמָתִי, ha-na-'ămāthī): A gentilic noun with the article, applied to Zophar, one of Job's friends (Job 2 11, 11 1, 20 1, 42 9), signifying that he was an inhabitant of Naamah (but not the town in Judah of that name).

NAAMITE, nê'a-mait. See NAAMAN, 2.

NAARAH, nê'a-rā (נַעֲרָה, na'ărāh): I. The ancestress of several Calebite clans (I Ch 4 5 f.), and originally probably a clan-name. II. A place on the border of Ephraim (Jos 16 7, Naarath AV; I Ch 7 28, Naaran AV). Map III, G 5. E. E. N.

NAARAI, nê'a-rai (נַעֲרַי, na'ăray): One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 37; called Paarai in II S 23 35). E. E. N.

NAARAN, nê'a-ran. See NAARAH, II.

NAARATH, nê'a-rath. See NAARAH, II.

NAASHON, nê'a-shon. See NAHSHON.

NAASON, na-as'on (Ναασσών, the O T Nahshon, q.v.): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 32). E. E. N.

NABAL, nê'bal (נָבָל, nābhāl), 'foolish,' 'reckless': A wealthy sheep-owner of the clan of Caleb (I S 25 2 f.), which owned the country about Hebron. He lived in Maon and pastured his flocks in Carmel. When N. was shearing sheep, David, in hiding from Saul, sent to him for a contribution. Churlish in disposition, and at the time intoxicated, he insultingly refused. His wise and comely wife, Abigail, however, went with bountiful gifts to meet David, who was on his way to attack N. Later N. heard from Abigail of his danger, and of her action, and soon after died from a shock. His widow, Abigail, then became the wife of David (I S 25, 30 5; II S 2 2, 3 3). C. S. T.

NABOTH, nê'both (נָבוֹת, nābhōth): A Jezreelite, probably one of the leading men of the city (I K 21 9; cf. Jos. Ant. VIII, 13 8), whose judicial murder furnished the occasion for Elijah's prophetic denunciation of Ahab (I K ch. 21). The coveted vineyard ("field" in II K 9 25) was near the palace (LXX. "threshing-floor") in Jezreel; but the sacredness of paternal inheritance was so firmly established (I K 21 3; cf. Nu ch. 36) that even Jezebel did not dare annex the land until Naboth (and his sons, II K 9 26) had first been executed upon a perjured charge of blasphemy (cf. Ex 22 28).

NACHON, nê'con (נָכוֹן, nākhōn, "Nacon" RV): The name of the threshing-floor, or of its owner, where Uzzah was smitten for touching the Ark (II S 6 6), called "Chidon" (I Ch 13 9). The place was named by David Perez-uzzah (II S 6 8). See NACON.
C. S. T.

NACHOR, nê'cōr (Ναχώρ, the O T Nahor, q.v.): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 34). E. E. N.

NACON, nê'con (נָכוֹן, nākhōn, Nachon AV), 'fixed': This word is read as a proper name in EV of II S 6 6, and the structure of the sentence in Heb. seems to demand a proper noun here. But the word nākhōn is a very improbable form for a proper noun. The LXX. reads "Nodab." The ‖ text in I Ch 13 9 reads "Chidon," which is a more probable reading, and possibly gives the correct form of the name. The site of the "threshing-floor of Nacon" is unknown. E. E. N.

NADAB, nê'dab (נָדָב, nādhābh), 'generous,' 'noble': 1. The eldest son of Aaron (Ex 6 23); see ABIHU. 2. A son of Jeroboam (I K 14 20) and king of Israel for two years (15 25). While besieging Gibbethon, a Philistine town, he was assassinated by Baasha, who exterminated the house of Jeroboam after he became king (15 27 f.). 3. A Jerahmeelite family (I Ch 2 28 f.). 4. A Gibeonite name (I Ch 8 30, 9 36). C. S. T.

NAGGAI, nag'gai (Ναγγαί, Nagge AV): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 25). E. E. N.

NAHALAL, nê'ha-lal (נַהֲלָל, nahălāl), NAHALLAL, na-hal'lal, and NAHALOL, nê'ha-lel (נַהֲלֹל, nahălōl): A city of Zebulun (Jos 19 15), long held by the Canaanites (Jg 1 30), and later counted a Levitical city (Jos 21 35). Map IV, D 7. E. E. N.

NAHALIEL, na-hê'li-el (נַחֲלִיאֵל, naḥălī'ēl), 'brook of God': A brook on Israel's march from the upper waters of the Arnon to the plains of Moab (Nu 21 19). Its identification with any particular brook in that region is uncertain, though the Wâdy Zerḳa Mâ'in has many advocates (see Map II, H 2). E. E. N.

NAHAM, nê'ham (נַחַם, naḥam), 'He comforts': A descendant of Judah (I Ch 4 19). E. E. N.

NAHAMANI, nê''ha-mê'nai (נַחֲמָנִי, naḥămānī), 'comforted': One of the leaders of the Return (Neh 7 7; omitted in Ezr 2 2). E. E. N.

NAHARAI, nê'ha-rai (נַחֲרַי, naḥăray), and NAHARI (נַחֲרִי, naḥrī): One of David's heroes, the armor-bearer of Joab. His home was at Beeroth (II S 23 37; I Ch 11 39). E. E. N.

NAHASH, nê'hash (נָחָשׁ, nāḥāsh), 'serpent': 1. A king of the Ammonites, whose intolerable conditions for the peaceful surrender of Jabesh-gilead brought Saul to the rescue, and inaugurated the successful struggle for the independence of Israel (I S 11 1 ff.). His kindness to David elicited a return of kindness on David's part to his son Hanun, who rudely insulted David's messengers (II S 10 2; I Ch 19 1). It is probable that the same Nahash is alluded to in II S 17 27 as the father of Shobi, who brought needed supplies to David during his retirement at the time of Absalom's rebellion. 2. The father of Abigail and Zeruiah, sisters of David (II S 17 25; I Ch 2 16). "Nahash" here, however, may be a textual error for "Jesse," or Jesse may have married the widow of N., or N. a widow of Jesse. If this N. were the same as the king of Ammon, it would be easy to account for the kindnesses interchanged between David and him, and at the same time unnecessary to assume more than one of the name in all the accounts. A. C. Z.

NAHATH, nê'hath (נַחַת, naḥath): 1. One of the "dukes" or clan-chieftains of Edom (Gn 36 13, 17; I Ch 1 37). 2. One of the ancestors of Samuel (I Ch 6 26, called "Toah" in ver. 34 and "John" in I S 1 1). 3. A Levite overseer under Hezekiah (II Ch 31 13). E. E. N.

NAHOR, nê'hōr (נָחוֹר, nāḥōr, Nachor AV; Jos 24 2; Lk 3 34): 1. The grandfather of Abraham and son of Serug (Gn 11 24 f.). 2. The brother of Abraham and son of Terah (Gn 11 26-29). His marriage to Milcah and the genealogy of his children are given for the double purpose, first, of showing the relationships of the patriarchal families, as his son Bethuel was the father of Rebekah and Laban (Gn 24 15); and secondly, as an ethnographical datum indicating the kinship of the Semitic peoples. Abraham was counted the ancestor of the south and N. of the north Semites. A. C. Z.

NAHSHON, nā'shon (נַחְשׁוֹן, naḥshōn): The "prince" (Nu 1 7, 16, 44) of Judah. He was also an ancestor of David (Nu 1 7 ff., 10 14; Ru 4 20; I Ch 2 10). The same person is probably meant in Ex 6 23, Naashon AV E. E. N.

NAHUM, nê'hum (נַחוּם, naḥūm), 'comfort': 1. The Prophet. One of the minor prophets. The only description of N. we have is found in the single word the Elkoshite (Nah 1 1). This appears to be derived from the name of a place, Elkosh; but a place bearing this name is nowhere else mentioned. A late tradition identifies it with Alkush, a locality near Nineveh, where the prophet Nahum is also said to have been buried. But every consideration within and without the book militates against this identification. Another tradition, supported by Jerome, makes Elkosh a town in Galilee (Elcesi, or Helkesai). But this, too, fails to harmonize with the internal marks of the book, which show the prophet to have been a Judæan (cf. 1 15). The town Elkosh was probably on a lost site in southern Judah, near Eleutheropolis.

2. Date. The date of Nahum's ministry can be easily fixed within certain limits. On the one hand, he looks upon Nineveh as still standing. As its fall did not take place before 606 B.C., this date furnishes the latest limit of Nahum. On the other hand, in 3 8-10 the city of Thebes is spoken of as already captured by her enemies. As Thebes was taken by the Assyrians in 663 B.C., this is clearly the earliest limit. Whether Nahum prophesied in the earlier or later half of this period of fifty-seven years depends upon whether he viewed the fall of Thebes as a very recent event or a somewhat remote one; partly also upon the significance of the condition of weakness and decay which he pictures in the Assyrian Empire. Such a condition, growing rapidly worse, was already in full view in the middle of the 7th cent. B.C. The probabilities are, therefore, in favor of the earlier dating of Nahum's ministry, and the year 650 may be taken generally as its central point. The relation of Manasseh to Assyria furnishes a suitable occasion for the warmth of feeling displayed in it on the part of a faithful Israelite.

3. Book: Contents. The contents of the book present J" coming in wrath and power to take vengeance on the enemies of Judah (1 1-15). From this general proclamation, which, however, portrayed the destruction of the enemy as total and irreparable, the prophet passes to the more particular denunciation of Nineveh and the announcement of her day of doom (2 1-13). The picture is drawn vividly. The destroyer of Nineveh is at her very gates, her defenders are in flight, and can not be rallied (ver. 8), and her devastation and ruin are evidently complete. The reason for this fate is the sin of the city (3 1-7). It will rouse itself to a desperate resistance and struggle, but in vain (3 8-19).

There is a difference in form and tone between the passage 1 2–2 2 and the remainder of the book. The section 1 2-10 has an alphabetic arrangement of verses, which, though not carried through, has given ground for the conjecture that it originally extended to 2 2. But if so, an alphabetical psalm, whose general thought harmonizes with Nahum's prophecy, has been prefixed to that prophecy. The prophecy then strictly began with 2 3. In such a case, in order to bring it into still greater harmony with Nahum's words, the psalm itself, or else its last portion, must have dropped out, and another ending (1 11, 2 2) must have been attached to it. These conclusions are, of course, based upon meager data, and can not be regarded except as tentative (cf. Bickell, Beiträge z. sem. Metrik. 1894; per contra, Davidson, in Camb. Bible). No doubt the text of Nahum has been greatly tampered with, and yet the general vigor and vividness of the prophet's style largely overcome the obscurities created by textual corruption.

4. Integrity.

The striking peculiarity of Nahum's thought is its fixed gaze on the enemies of God's Chosen People. The prophet evidently has no fear for the people themselves. At all events, he alludes neither to their sin nor to any impending wrath to be visited upon them. Presumably, the destruction of Assyria meant to him the deliverance of Israel from a source of distress and a menacing danger.

5. Characteristic Point of View.

LITERATURE: Commentaries by Orelli (on the Minor Prophets); A. B. Davidson (in Camb. Bible, 1896); G. A. Smith, The Book of the Twelve Prophets (in the Expositor's Bible, 1898); Farrar, Minor Prophets (in Men of the Bible Series).

2. One of the ancestors of Jesus (Lk 3 25, Naum AV). A. C. Z.

NAIL: This word renders the Heb. yāthēdh, the 'peg' or 'pin' used to hold the tent-ropes (Jg 4 21 ff., 5 26; "tent-pin" RV), or to bind together the beams of a house (Zec 10 4); also a peg driven into the wall on which things may be hung (Ezr 9 8; Is 22 23, 25); further, ordinary metal nails (I Ch 22 3, etc.), except in Dt 21 12 and Dn 4 33, 7 19, where the meaning is obvious. E. E. N.

NAIN, nê'in (Ναίν; mentioned only in Lk 7 11): The modern village, which is still called Nein (Map IV, D 8), is beautifully situated on a small, elevated plateau at the foot of Little Hermon, but the mud-built hamlet is squalid and filthy. Numerous ruined houses show that it was formerly much larger, and in the hillside there are rock-cut tombs; but no traces of walls or of very ancient buildings have been found. The little mosque in Nain is called "The Place of Our Lord Jesus," a survival, apparently, of the name of an earlier Christian chapel commemorating the miracle. L. G. L.

NAIOTH, nê'yoth (נָיוֹת, nāyōth, or נְוָיוֹת, n'wāyōth): A place "in Ramah," where David and Samuel dwelt while in hiding from Saul (I S 19 18–20 1). The absence of the article (see esp. I S 20 1) seems to indicate that the word is a proper name; but, if so, its original signification and the character of the locality indicated are alike unknown. For criticisms of the Heb. text and conjectures as to the etymology, see Driver (Notes on Heb. Text of the Books of Samuel) or H. P. Smith (in Int. Crit. Com.). L. G. L.

NAKED: In the following instances the word "naked" needs some explanation. In Ex 32 25 the RV renderings "broken loose," "let them loose" express the sense of the Heb. pāra' much better than the AV "naked." The same may be said of II Ch 28 19. In Hab 3 9 the reference is to the protective covering of the battle-bow, which was removed before going into action. In Is 20 2 f. and Mic 1 8, the reference is to the mourning custom of stripping off the outer clothing and arraying oneself in sackcloth. In these two instances the sackcloth was to be dispensed with, not necessarily as an evidence of greater mourning, but simply of deeper and more intense feeling. See also MOURNING AND MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 1, under Sackcloth. For the use of "naked" in Mk 14 51 f., Jn 21 7, and Ac 19 16, see DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 2. E. E. N.

NAME: Among the Israelites, as among other peoples of antiquity, great importance was attached to names, whether of places, persons, or deity. This is evidenced by the many instances in the O T of explanation of the origin of names, and although these explanations with their accompanying philological interpretations are in many cases only superficial and popular, they show clearly how important names were considered to be. The derivation and primary significance of the Heb. word shēm, 'name,' are uncertain. It is used nearly always of some definite proper name. Occasionally, it signifies 'renown' or 'fame' (I S 18 30; II S 8 13). In this brief discussion we shall consider, first, person-names, then place-names, and, finally, Divine names.

1. Importance Attached to Names.

So far as the O T gives us light on the subject, it appears that a child was named usually at birth by the mother (Gn 4 1, 25, 19 37 f., 29 32 ff., etc.), although this was by no means always the case. The father often (Gn 4 26, 16 15, 21 3, 35 18; II S 12 24 f., etc.) and, in one case at least, friends (Ru 4 17) are mentioned as giving the name. While in later times a child was named when circumcised (Lk 1 59, 2 21), this seems not to have been the case in early (O T) days. In later life it was also possible for a person to receive a name, sometimes called his surname, which was used alongside of, or supplanted, his original name. In all, or nearly all, such cases the new name was imposed by a superior, or due to a change of status which seemed to demand a new name. Examples of such changes are: Abram to Abraham, Sarai to Sarah, Jacob to Israel, Joseph to Zaphenath-paneah, Eliakim to Jehoiakim, Mattaniah to Zedekiah, Daniel to Belteshazzar, Simon to Cephas, etc. In the earliest times names seem to have consisted of but one significant word (simple or compound), an appelative term of some sort (see next section). But in a closely settled region it would become necessary to distinguish individuals bearing the same name, and thus arose the habit of adding "son of" so and so to the person's name. Another way was to add a gentilic indicative of the place to which the person belonged. In such a designation as "Heleb the son of Baanah the Netophathite" (II S 23 29), both "the son of Baanah" and "the Netophathite" belong to Heleb as indicating exactly who he was. Both patronymics and gentilics are very common in the O T. When Palestine became bilingual, as was the case in N T times, many Jews bore two names, their native Hebrew or Aramaic name, and a Greek or Roman one, which was sometimes the equivalent of the Aramaic (e.g., Cephas = Peter), in other cases not so (e.g., John [Heb. yōḥānān], Mark [Lat. Marcus]). Many Heb. or Aramaic proper names also became Hellenized, e.g., Joshua (Heb.) = Jesus, Eliakim = Alcimus, etc. Since the reasons governing the choice of names are given in so many cases, it may be inferred that names were generally chosen, especially in the earlier times, because of some special circumstance or condition at birth which the name selected seemed capable of commemorating or symbolizing. Esau was so called (apparently) because he was either 'red' or 'hairy,' Jacob, because he had his brother by the 'heel' (Gn 25 25 f.), Isaac, because Sarah 'laughed' (Gn 18 13; cf. 17 17) at the promise of his birth (cf. also the reasons for the names given to Jacob's sons, Gn 29 32 = 30 24, to the children of Hosea, Hos ch. 1, or of Isaiah, Is 7 1, 8 1 ff.). In later times there was a tendency to make use of the same set of names in the same family This had become a well-established custom in N T times (cf. Lk 1 59-61), but it can not be traced certainly further back than the post-exilic age (cf. Gray, Heb. Proper Names, pp. 1–9).

2. How Names Were Given.

Since Heb. names were in early times appelative designations, it follows that there could be easily many different kinds of names. In the present brief discussion perhaps the most convenient subdivision to make in the first place is, according to their structure, into simple and composite.

3. Kinds of Names.

(1) Simple Names. No exhaustive classification of names consisting of but one element will be attempted here. Animal names were especially common in the oldest parts of the O T: e.g., Leah, 'wild cow'; Rachel, 'ewe'; Deborah, 'bee'; Nahash, 'serpent'; etc. Trees and plants also furnished names: Elon, 'oak'; Tamar, 'palm'; Rimmon, 'pomegranate'; etc. Personal characteristics were determinative in some cases: e.g., Esau, 'red' (?); Laban, 'white'; Heresh, 'dumb'; etc. The feelings of the parents showed themselves in other names: e.g., Rehum, 'pitied'; Baruch, 'blessed'; etc. From these and other fields the Hebrews drew the material for a very large proportion of their proper names. By means of endings added to the simple words they greatly increased the number of possible names. A final i changed a place-name into a gentilic person-name: e.g., Jehudi, 'man of Judah.' In some cases the final i stood for the personal pronoun 'my': e.g., Naomi, 'my delight.' Much more frequent was the use of the endings an, am, on, om, in some cases probably with a diminutive significance: e.g., Samson = Shimshōn = 'little sun' (?), from Shāmāsh, 'sun'; Nahshon, 'little serpent'; etc.

(2) Composite Names. Taking all the O T names together, early and late, the great majority consists of composite names, i.e., names composed of two elements. By far the greatest number of these have, as one element of the compound, a Divine name or its equivalent. With composite names should also be classed those that, though apparently simple, consist really of a sentence: e.g., Joseph, 'he [God] shall add'; Japhlet, 'he [God] causes to escape'; Jashub, 'he shall return,' etc. In most names of this kind the understood subject is God, though other subjects are very common. In theophorous names—i.e., names in which a Divine name forms one part of the compound—quite frequently we meet with indirect rather than direct references to Deity. The syllables ab or abi, ah or ahi, am ('am in Heb.) or ammi, dad or dod, meaning respectively, 'father,' 'brother,' 'uncle,' and 'kinsman,' as used in proper names, probably refer to Deity: e.g., Abijah = 'J" is father'; Abiel = 'El [God] is father'; Abitub = 'the father [God] is good'; Ahihud = 'the brother [God] is glorious'; Ammishaddai = 'Shaddai is uncle'; Eliam = 'God is uncle'; Eldad = 'El [God] is kinsman'; etc. In names of this class when both elements refer to the Deity, sometimes the subject is placed first, as in Eliam, sometimes last, as in Ammiel, which is identical in meaning with Eliam. Another class of theophorous names consists of the names compounded with melek (EV melech, 'king'), baal ('owner,' 'lord,' and frequently used as a proper name for Deity), adon(i) ('lord'): e.g., Ahimelech = 'the uncle [God] is king'; Malchijah = 'J" is king'; Baaliada, 'Baal knows'; Adonijah, 'J" is lord.'

The names of Deity proper, Ja, Jah, Jeho, all shortened forms of Yāhweh (Jehovah), El and Eli (Ele) and Shaddai (quite rare), as used in compound names, are to be taken as subjects of the sentence which the name makes. The predicate may be any of the semi-divine names noted above, or an adjective, or a noun, or some part of a verb. The possible combinations are very many and the Hebrew vocabulary is exceedingly rich in proper names thus formed. If the reader will select the proper names beginning with "E" and "J," he will discover this for himself. He should also bear in mind that there are as many, or perhaps more, cases in which the name of the Deity forms the second instead of the first part of the compound.

These facts throw an interesting side-light on the conceptions of Deity entertained by the ancient Israelites. They not only thought much about God, but also thought of Him as very near and well disposed toward them. They spoke of Him as 'father,' 'brother,' 'uncle,' 'kinsman,' and expressed this faith in the names they gave their children.

Since it is now possible to arrange our O T literature in chronological order, it is also possible thereby to gain some light on the history of personal names in Israel. This subject has been investigated, especially by Prof. G. B. Gray, whose conclusions appear to rest on careful and accurate tabulations. In general, it may be said that the use of animal-names as person-names was most common in the earliest periods; that the tendency to use names with a religious significance was not so marked in the earlier period as it afterward became; that while names compounded with El—the general name for God—were in use from the earliest to the latest times, names compounded with Ja, etc. (short for Yāhweh, Israel's national Deity), were rare before David's time, but became common after that; that theophorous names compounded with ab, ah, am, dad (dod), melech, adon, and baal—i.e., practically all the semi-divine names used in compounds—had ceased to be formed by the time of the Exile; that those compounded with Ja, etc., and El gradually became the favorite class of names, being used almost exclusively in the later periods; and that the custom of giving religious names continually grew in favor, being the common rule in the late pre-exilic period, and in the exilic and post-exilic periods (for further details see Gray, op. cit., pp. 243 ff.).

4. History of Names.

5. Place-Names.

The Hebrew names of places are in many instances of uncertain meaning. This is mainly due to the fact that such names are of great antiquity, going back to the pre-Israelite period in Palestine and thus are really of Canaanite or even pre-Canaanite origin. Names of trees or plants, e.g., Tappuch, 'apple'; Tamar, 'palm'; Elah, 'oak' or 'terebinth,' etc., and of animals, e.g., Aijalon, 'stag'; Ir-nahash, 'serpent city,' etc., were frequently used. The natural features of a place—e.g., its fertility, its beauty, the color of the soil, or landscape—all these are found set forth in such place-names as Carmel, Shaphir, Adummim, Lebanon, Kedron, etc. The proximity of water was expressed by prefixes such as En- ('spring' or 'fountain'), Beer- ('well'), Me- ('water'). Elevation is found indicated in the many Gebas, Gibeahs, Ramahs, and (probably) Mizpahs. Compound place-names are also very common. Beth, 'house,' Hazor—i.e., a fixed instead of a movable (as customary with nomads) place of abode—Kir or Kiriath and Ir (both = 'city') are frequently found united with some other term to make the full name of a place. More significant, especially of the close association of religion with the life of the Israelites and of the Canaanites before them, are the frequent compound names in which the name of Deity forms one element. Such Semitic deities as Shamash, 'the sun,' Nebo, Anath, etc., appear in names like Beth-shemesh, 'house [i.e., 'temple' or 'shrine'] of the sun,' Mt. Nebo, Anathoth, etc. The two old deity names baal and el occur also in a number of compounds, as Baal-shalisha, Baal-gad, Baal-Meon, Beth-el, Jezre-el, Iphtah-el, etc.

6. The Divine Names.

To the ancient Israelite, great as was the significance he attached to his own and others' names, the names of God were of the highest importance. Even ordinary person-names were looked upon as being more than mere words; they almost possessed an entity of their own. Consequently, the Divine names were invested with a special and peculiar sacredness. In a vague way the Deity and His name were considered as inseparable. Of the 'Angel of the presence' it is said "my name is in him" (Ex 23 21). Such passages as Ex 30 7, 34 5 ff.; Dt 28 58, and many others, reveal the importance attached to the name Jehovah (Yāhweh). A place became sacred when He there 'recorded' His name (Ex 20 24; Dt 12 5; I K 8 29, etc.). Of the Divine names, Jehovah (Yāhweh) was the name par excellence, most holy and most rich in its significance for the Israelite. Of the origin and primary meaning of this name nothing positive can as yet be said, except that, in accordance with the statement of the O T (Gn 4 26 and in many subsequent passages), the name is probably very old, far antedating Moses. With this agrees the probable discovery of the name on ancient Babylonian inscriptions. It is not the origin, but the significance attached to the name that is the important thing in the thought and teaching of the O T. The famous passage in Ex 3 14 f. gives us what we may well believe to have been the Mosaic interpretation of the name—as indicative of the existence, not in an abstract metaphysical sense, but in a practical historical sense, of J". He is the God who is, who is in history, who is and will be with His people; a pregnant idea, the full significance of which could be unfolded only gradually and during the course of many centuries. The parallel passage, i.e., as indicating the significance of the name, in the J document in Ex 34 6 f. is essentially of the same character as the E passage in Ex 3 14 f. The name Yāhweh thus became the covenant name of God in Israel; the name above every other name in its meaning, and in the sentiments of loyalty and devotion awakened by it, to the Israelite. These sentiments came to expression especially in the religious poetry of the Psalms and in the fervid utterances of prophecy. As time went on, the sacredness of the name Jehovah (Yāhweh) was increasingly emphasized until at last it was considered profanation to pronounce it even in religious exercises. This avoidance of the name had probably become common usage in N T times. In reading the Scriptures, for Yāhweh was substituted either Adonai ('Lord') or Elohim (God), and at last even in writing the text the vowels of Adonai were attached to Yāhweh, making it appear as if it were pronounced Y'hōwāh, whence the Eng. "Jehovah."

7. Divine Names in the N T.

Other Divine names used by Israel were 'Elyōn, 'the highest' (Gn 14 18 ff.; Nu 24 16, etc.); Shadday, rendered 'almighty,' although its exact meaning is unknown (Gn 17 1; Ex 6 3, etc.); both of these names are often found combined with El; other rarer and probably only descriptive names were 'abhīr, 'mighty one' (Gn 49 24), tsūr, 'rock' (II S 23 3, etc.), and the like. The term Adonai ('ădhōnay), 'Lord,' is not strictly a proper name but rather a title. Still, the combination 'ădhōnay Yāhweh, "Lord Jehovah," like Yāhweh tsᵉbhā'ōth, "Jehovah of hosts," was so common as to be looked upon practically as a proper name (see LORD).

By N T times so excessive was the formal reference rendered to Divine names that even the words for God (i.e., El, Θεός, etc.) were rarely spoken by the devout Jew. Substitutions such as 'heaven' were frequently used, where 'God' was meant. This tendency is seen even as early as the books of Esther and I Mac. (See Kingdom of God, § 1.)

Perhaps as much by way of protest against such transcendentalism as for other reasons, Jesus used the suggestive and most significant term "Father" for "God," emphasizing thereby both His supremacy and His love for men, His children. On the other hand, in early Christian circles something of the reverence and awe attaching to Yāhweh among the Jews was transferred to the name "Christ" or the compound "Jesus Christ," which even in the Apostolic Age had come to be regarded as a proper name instead of a definitive expression (Jesus the Christ). Cf. the pregnant expressions "in the name of Christ," "in the name of Jesus Christ," "in the name of Jesus," which occur so frequently in the N T writings and the emphasis on the name in baptism (Mt 28 19; Ac 2 38; Ro 6 3, etc.). This name had now become the name that is above every other name (Ph 2 9 f.).

NAOMI, nā-ō'mi (נָעֳמִי, nā'ŏmī), 'my sweetness': The wife of Elimelech (Ru 1 2, etc.). Widowed and bereft of her children in the land of Moab, whither they had all removed during a severe famine, she returned with her devoted daughter-in-law Ruth, whose history gives Naomi her importance in the Biblical narrative. A. C. Z.

NAPHISH, nē'fish (נָפִישׁ, nāphīsh): The ancestral head of an Ishmaelite clan (Gn 25 15; I Ch 1 31, 5 19, Nephish AV). It is likely that there was some connection between this Ishmaelite clan and the Nephisim (Ezr 2 50 Nephusim AV), or Nephushesim (Neh 7 52 Nephisheshim), of post-exilic days, who were counted as Nethinim (q.v.). Note also the collocation with Meunim (q.v.). See also ISHMAEL. E. E. N.

NAPHTUHIM, naf'tu-him. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

NAPKIN. See BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, § 1.

NARCISSUS, nār-sis'ŭs (Νάρκισσος): A person mentioned incidentally in Ro 16 11 ("the [household] of N"). Perhaps the reference is to a notorious favorite of Claudius, who had been put to death upon the accession of Nero, about three years before Ro was written (Tacitus, Annals, xi–xiii, passim). After the death of N. his confiscated slaves doubtless became part of "Cæsar's household" (cf. Ph 4 22), but might still have been designated by the name of their former master. L. G. L.

NARD, SPIKENARD: A variety of bearded grass (Nardostachys Jatamansi, of the order Valerianaceæ) native to India, from which was extracted a fragrant oil much used in the East (Song 1 12, 4 13 f.; Mk 14 3; Jn 12 3). The meaning of the adjective πιστική (in the N T reff.) is much disputed. On the whole, the balance of evidence seems to be in favor of 'genuine,' or 'pure,' though 'liquid' has strong advocates. See also OINTMENT AND PERFUMES, § 3. E. E. N.

NATHAN, nē'thăn (נָתָן, nāthān), 'He [God] gives': 1. A prophet to whom David looked for guidance in the administration of the spiritual side of his government (II S 7 2; I Ch 17 1; I K 1 8 ff.). N., however, was more than a public servant, as he took occasion to rebuke the king for his sin against Uriah (II S 12 1). He was very influential in promoting and securing Solomon's accession to the throne (I K 1 8 f.), and his sons Azariah and Zabud were promoted by Solomon to important positions (I K 4 5). 2. A son of David and ancestor of Jesus (II S 5 14; Lk 3 31). 3. The father of Igal, one of David's valiant men (II S 23 36), or brother of Joel (I Ch 11 38). 4. A son of Attar, a Jerahmeelite (I Ch 2 36). 5. A contemporary of Ezra (Ezr 8 16). 6. One who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 39). 7. The head of a family, possibly the same as 2 (Zec 12 12). A. C. Z.

NATHANAEL, nă-than'ă-el (Ναθαναήλ = Heb. nᵉthan'ēl, 'God has given'): N. is not mentioned by this name in the lists of Apostles in the Synoptics, but figures among the early disciples in the Johannine tradition. In 1 46 he is associated with Philip of Bethsaida. According to the slightly different tradition in 21 2, he is "of Cana of Galilee." Beyond the statement of Jn 1 47 f. that he was without guile and the account of his acceptance of Jesus as the Messiah, nothing further is said of him in the N T. He is frequently identified with Bartholomew (q.v.), e.g., by Ewald, Meyer, Westcott, and others; but the only apparent reason for such identification is the association of Bartholomew with Philip in the lists of Apostles. Even this is not true in Ac 1 13, where the name of Thomas is inserted between that of Philip and Bartholomew. N. has also been identified with "the disciple whom Jesus loved" (by Spareth, ZWT, 1868). J. M. T.

NATHAN-MELECH, nē"thăn-mī'lec (נְתַן־מֶלֶךְ, nᵉthan-melekh), 'Melech gave' ("Melech" may be the name of a god, or simply 'a king'): An official in the time of King Josiah, who had a chamber in an annex of the Temple, near which stood the "horses . . given to the sun," which were removed by Josiah (II K 23 11). C. S. T.

NATIONS. See GENTILES.

NATURE, NATURAL: (1) In Dt 34 7 "natural force" is the rendering of the Heb. lēaḥ, 'moist,' 'full of sap,' thus indicative of physical vigor. (2) The Gr. φύσις, well rendered by "nature" or, in the phrase κατὰ φύσιν, by "natural" (Ro 11 21, 24), is used in the N T to express several shades of meaning: (a) The inherent character of a person or thing, the principles according to which normally it is governed (Ro 1 26, 2 14, 11 21-24; I Co 11 14; Gal 4 8); (b) as equivalent to 'by birth' (Ro 2 27; Gal 2 15); (c) acquired characteristics which have become fixed (Eph 2 3); (d) that which is peculiar or distinctive as marking one class of beings from another (II P 2 12, 1 4; cf. Ja 3 7, where it is rendered "kind"). (3) The term γένεσις, 'birth' or 'origin,' is once rendered "natural" (Ja 1 23, lit. 'of his birth'), and once "nature" (in the peculiar passage Ja 3 6, on which see COURSE). (4) ψυχικός (from ψυχή, 'soul,' i.e., the animate, sentient entity) is rendered "natural" in I Co 2 14, 15 44, 46, in each case in contrast with "spiritual." Since the ψυχή was often viewed as the principle of the animal or physical life alone, ψυχικός refers to the lower, merely animal nature, not as yet controlled or reanimated by the Spirit (cf. its use in Jude ver. 19). E. E. N.

NAUM, nē'ŭm. See NAHUM, 2.

NAVES: The AV rendering of the Heb. gabbīm (I K 7 33), which means the 'bends' of the wheel, i.e., the "felloes" (so RV). On the other hand, ḥish-shūrīm ("spokes" AV) in the same verse is correctly rendered "naves" in RV. E. E. N.

NAVY. See Ships and Navigation, § 2; also Trade and Commerce, § 1.

NAZARENE, naz″a-rîn′: The common rendering of the Gr. Ναζωραῖος is "of Nazareth" (Mt 26 71; Lk 18 37; Jn 19 19), but in Mt 2 23 and Ac 24 5 the word evidently has a different sense. In Mt 2 23 N. seems to be regarded as interchangeable with "Nazirite" (q.v.), possibly because both were viewed ordinarily as persons of inferior class. In Ac 24 5 "N." is the equivalent of 'Christian,' or 'follower of the Man of Nazareth.' A. C. Z.

NAZARETH, naz′a-reth (Ναζαρέτ, also Νάζαρα): A city in Galilee where Joseph and Mary, the parents of Jesus, lived, and, therefore, His own home in childhood and early manhood (Mk 6 1; Lk 4 23; Mt 13 54). Accordingly, He is called "Jesus of Nazareth" (Mk 1 9; Jn 1 45); also "Nazarene" (Ναζαρηνός, Lk 4 34; Ναζωραῖος, Jn 19 19; Ac 2 22). The town is located on the side of a hill (Lk 4 29), which commands a splendid view of the Plain of Esdraelon and Mt. Carmel, and is very picturesque in general. Map IV, D 7. In the days of Jesus it was held in contempt, but no reason is given for this (Jn 1 46). It is not mentioned in the O T, in the Talmud (though Jesus is named as "the Nazarene," Sanh. 43a, 107b; Soṭ 47a), or by Josephus. It possessed a synagogue, in which Jesus taught (Lk 4 29). Its modern name is En-Nasira. The Virgin's fountain, being the only one in the town, can safely be associated with the life of Jesus. Other 'sacred' spots (Mt. of Precipitation, etc.) are fictitious. A. C. Z.

NAZIRITE, naz′i-rait (נָזִיר, nāzīr, Nazarite AV, "consecrate" RVmg., Nu 6 2 f.): A separated or consecrated person, a 'devotee.'

1. Idea of Naziritism. Forms of consecration to God that go beyond ordinary requirements are of common occurrence in religious life. Among the Hebrews such forms were subjected to minute regulations (Nu ch. 6). The primary idea being devotion to the service of J″, the object of the regulations was to secure an impressive and complete separation from the rest of the world. The ceremony by which this was done was inaugurated with a vow, nedher nāzīr (Nu 6 2). The person making the vow might be either a man or a woman; but there is no record of any woman taking the vow for her own sake. The mothers of Samson and Samuel were both under Nazirite regulations during the period of their bearing their Nazirite sons. But there is no evidence that they continued under these regulations after the end of that period, or resumed the Nazirite life for any other purpose later.

2. Life of the Nazirite. From the moment of the taking of the vow the Nazirite was put into a class separate from common men. This follows from the term nāzīr, which, like qādhōsh, 'holy', implies the idea of separation from the world. The chief sign of the consecration was the cultivation of long hair. No razor must pass on the head of the Nazirite. The object of this provision was either to avoid profanation by the touch of a tool of human make, or the desire to offer the long locks as a sacrifice to God. In favor of the latter explanation may be cited the regulation in Nu 6 18, and the fact that similar practises existed in other religions (Moore on Jg 13 5, in Int. Crit. Com.). In favor of the former is the quite prevalent conception that anything touched by common tools was profaned thereby (cf. the profanation of stones by the chisel, Ex 20 25; cf. I K 6 7). A sacrificial victim must never have borne the yoke or have been used in ordinary labor (Nu 19 2; Dt 15 19; in this case the shears are analogous to the razor on the Nazirite's head). Another feature of the Nazirite's life was total abstinence from wine and all other strong drink (Nu 6 3 f.). In order to secure perfect conformity to this requirement, the prohibition was made to include all that grew upon the vine in any form or shape. This was either in order to be on the safe side against the ill effects of intoxicants, or because of some belief that the evil which appears in full force in wine was in the grape even though latent. The further prescription of ceremonial purity, especially by the avoidance of all contact with the dead, is self-explanatory. Any pollution of this kind would at once annul the vow and necessitate purification and the renewal of the whole ceremony (Nu 6 12).

3. Classes of Nazirites. Nazirites were of two classes: (1) Those who became such of their own free will and decision, and (2) those who were devoted by their parents. The law of Nu ch. 6 evidently refers to the former; for it contains a provision for the termination of the Nazirite life at the end of a period voluntarily fixed by the Nazirite himself. There is no reason to suppose that the prescriptions were different in the case of Nazirites devoted ex utero, except on this single point, that their Naziriteship was for life.

4. Naziritism in History. The first instance on record of a Nazirite is that of Samson (Jg 13 5, 7, 14). The next is that of Samuel (I S 1 11), who was not only a Nazirite but also a prophet. During the period of the monarchy there must have been Nazirites, especially of the self-devoted class, in comparatively large numbers. Amos rebukes the people for enticing the Nazirites to drink wine (Am 2 12). As late as the days of Jesus, the Nazirite vow was observed by many. John the Baptist was in all probability a Nazirite of the second class (ex utero, Lk 1 15; cf. also I Mac 3 49). The case of Paul's vow is another illustration (Ac 21 23). That the Nazirite vow antedates the law of Nu ch. 6 in history, there can be no doubt. The practise is assumed as already common and simply needing regulation. The Nazirite life was almost purely a religious and ceremonial one. For, while it secured abstinence from intoxicants, it did not affect the moral life in other matters. Nazirites do not seem to have been restrained from giving way to their passions (cf. Samson's relations to Philistine women). A. C. Z.

NEAH, nî′ā (נְעָה, nᵉ'āh): A city of Zebulun (Jos 19 13). Site unknown. E. E. N.

NEAPOLIS, nę-ap'o-lis (Νεάπολις): The seaport of Philippi in N. Macedonia, lying opposite the island of Thasos. It shared in the prosperity of the larger city, 10 m. inland, and was the point where the great Egnatian Road across Macedonia reached the sea. An aqueduct and other remains identify it with the modern Kavalla. On his second missionary journey, in obedience to the vision he had received, Paul crossed from Troas, landing at Neapolis, and proceeded thence to Philippi, where he began his European work (Ac 16 11). R. A. F.

NEARIAH, nî"a-rai'ā (נְעַרְיָה, n'aryāh): 1. The head of a family descended from David (I Ch 3 22 f.). 2. A Simeonite leader (I Ch 4 42). E. E. N.

NEBAI, nî'bai. See NOBAI.

NEBAIOTH, nę-bê'yoth (נְבָיוֹת, n'bhāyōth): One of the 'sons' of Ishmael (Gn 25 13, 28 9, 36 3; I Ch 1 29), the genealogical way of stating that N. was a N. Arabian clan or tribe. The wealth of this tribe in cattle is referred to in Is 60 7, where, as in the Gn passages, it is closely associated with Kedar. The same association of N. with Kedar is found in the Assyrian inscriptions of Asshurbanipal (668–626 B.C.), where the two are spoken of as Arabian tribes (cf. *KAT*³, p. 151). It is usual to identify N. with the Nabatæan Arabs, so well known to later history. But it is difficult to see how נבית and נבט can be closely connected. It is more probable that the Nabatæans appeared later on the scene, displacing the earlier Nebaioth, Kedar, etc. (cf. *KAT*³, p. 151 f.). E. E. N.

NEBALLAT, nę-bal'at (נְבַלַּט, n'bhallaṭ): A city occupied by Benjamites after the Exile (Neh 11 34). Map III, D 5. E. E. N.

NEBAT, nî'bat (נְבָט, n'bhāṭ): Used only in the phrase Yārobh'ām ben Nebhāṭ. The father of King Jeroboam, the first king of the Northern Kingdom (I K 11 26, and often). C. S. T.

NEBO, nî'bō (נְבוֹ, n'bhō): 1. A town E. of the Jordan, fortified and occupied by Reubenites (Nu 32 37; Is 15 2; Jer 48 22). It was besieged and captured by King Mesha of Moab, who destroyed the altar of J" in it, and put its inhabitants to death (see Mesha Stone, lines 14 ff., under MESHA). According to Onom. 283, 142, it was situated 8 m. from Heshbon, which would point to the modern Et-teim, S. of Heshbon, as the site. 2. Supposed to be a town in Judah (same as Nob in Is 10 32), whose inhabitants (Ezr 2 29, 10 43; Neh 7 33) returned with Zerubbabel. In Ezr 2 29, however, they are called "the children of Nebo," which makes it questionable whether a city is meant, as "children of" is a phrase universally used of clans, and never in prose of the inhabitants of a town. On the supposition that Nebo is here a town, its site has been fixed at Beit Nûbâ, just N. of Ajalon, Map III, E 5, and 12 m. NW of Jerusalem (Buhl, Geog. Pal., p. 193). The conjecture that families from the Nebo E. of the Jordan had maintained their identity and name through the Exile and had become a post-exilic clan (Bennett in HDB) is plausible, but has no support in the text. 3. Mt. Nebo (הַר־נְבוֹ, har-n'bhō): A peak in the Abarim range (Nu 33 47; Dt 32 49, 34 1 [P]; in JE "Pisgah"), from which Moses viewed the promised land just before his death. Until recently Jebel Attarus, about 10 m. NW of Heshbon, was supposed to be Mt. Nebo. But a better knowledge of the ground leads to Nêbâ, half-way between Heshbon and the N. end of the Dead Sea, Map II, J 1. While this site also scarcely harmonizes with the literal interpretation of Dt 34 1 ff., the description here must be taken as that of the land as it afterward proved to be (cf. Driver, Deut in loco in Int. Crit. Com.). 4. A widely worshiped Semitic deity. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 28. A. C. Z.

NEBUCHADREZZAR, neb"yu-cad-rez'ar (נְבוּכַדְרֶאצַּר, n'bhūkhadhre'tstsar), NEBUCHADNEZZAR (Babyl. Nabu-kudurri-uṣur, 'Nebo, defend the boundary'): The king of New Babylon, or, better, Chaldea, 604–561 B.C. He was the son and successor of Nabopolassar, the founder of the Chaldean Empire, the dynasty being of Chaldean origin. He was the second king of that name, the first having ruled in Babylon, 1139–1123 B.C. The first notable act of N. was, as head of the army, the defeat of Necho II of Egypt at Carchemish in 605 B.C. (Jer 46 2). While on this campaign, N. was notified of the death of his father, and, after a hasty return, he secured the throne without contest. His campaign, however, won for him the control of Syria and Palestine, and the beginning of empire-extension toward the southwest. Out of his numerous inscriptions, the larger proportion deals with his religious achievements, reconstruction of temples, dedications to his gods, and his devotion to the whole religious system. His conquests and final destruction of Jerusalem, and his Babylonian exile of the Jews, are narrated in the O T only. During the final siege of the Jewish capital, N. met and defeated the army of Apries-Hophra, the ally of the Jews (Jer 37 5-8). After the overthrow of that city (586 B.C.), N. besieged Tyre for thirteen years (585–572 B.C.), but could not reduce it. A fragment of N.'s own inscriptions indicates that he was still at war with Egypt in his thirty-seventh year (567 B.C.). In his forty-third year he died and was succeeded by his son, Evil-merodach. Under N. Babylon became the most magnificent commercial, political, religious, and literary center of the Mesopotamian valley and of SW. Asia. Babylon was N.'s creation, and the Chaldean kingdom was centered in this city. I. M. P.

NEBUSHAZBAN, neb"yu-shaz'ban (נְבוּשַׁזְבָּן, n'bhūshazbhan; Babyl. Nabu-shizib-anni, 'Nebu, deliver me'): The name of the Rab-saris ('chief captain') in the Chaldean army at the fall of Jerusalem (Jer 39 13). The name is actually found in Babylonian inscriptions as that given to a son of Necho I, King of Egypt, as a mark of his submission to the king of Assyria. I. M. P.

NEBUZARADAN, neb"yu-zār-ê'dan (נְבוּזַרְאֲדָן, n'bhūzar'ădhān; Babyl. Nabu-zera-iddina, 'Nebu has given a seed'): The chief of the body-guard of Nebuchadrezzar at the time of the fall of Jerusalem, 586 B.C. (II K 25 8, 11, 20). He had charge of the captives after Jerusalem fell, and, in accord with the orders of Nebuchadrezzar, showed special favor to Jeremiah (Jer 39 11). Five years after the fall of Jerusalem he carried off 745 Jewish captives from Palestine (Jer 52 30). I. M. P.

NECOH, NECHO, NECO, nî'cō. See PHARAOH, § 7.

NECROMANCER, NECROMANCY. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 3.

NEDABIAH, ned''ə-bai'ā (נְדַבְיָה, nᵉdhabhyāh): A son of Jeconiah, the captive king of Judah (I Ch 3 18). E. E. N.

NEEDLE'S EYE: In the phrase "it is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye," etc., found in all the Synoptics (Mk 10 25 and ||s), the term is used in an entirely figurative sense to denote the extreme difficulty of entrance into the kingdom of God on the part of the rich (cf. Bruce in Exp. Gr. Test. and Swete's Com. on Mark, in loc.). A parallel figure is found in Mt 23 24. J. M. T.

NEEDLEWORK. See ARTISAN LIFE, § 14.

NEESING (from 'neese,' an old Eng. word, now obsolete, allied to 'sneeze'): The word occurs once (Job 41 18 AV, "sneezings" RV), and denotes the heavy breathing of the crocodile ("leviathan") basking in the sun (cf. RV). E. E. N.

NEGINAH, nę-gai'nā. See PSALMS, § 3.

NEGINOTH, neg'i-nəth. See PSALMS, § 3.

NEHELAMITE, nę-hel'ə-mait (נֶחֱלָמִי, נֶחֱלָמִי, neḥălāmī, neḥᵉlāmī): A gentilic or a designation of the town or district of the false prophet Shemaiah, an exile with the Jews in Babylon, who sent a letter to Jerusalem complaining of Jeremiah's letter to the Exiles. Jeremiah prophesied that Shemaiah would die in exile (Jer 29 24, 31 f.). C. S. T.

NEHEMIAH, nî''hę-mai'ā, and NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF. See EZRA AND NEHEMIAH.

NEHILOTH, nî'hi-ləth. See PSALMS, § 3.

NEHUM, nî'hum (נְחוּם, nᵉḥūm), 'comfort': The name of one of the leaders of the Exile, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh 7 7). In Ezr 2 2, the name is given as Rᵉḥūm, which is probably correct. C. S. T.

NEHUSHTA, nę-hush'tə (נְחֻשְׁתָּא, nᵉḥushtā'): The mother of King Jehoiachin (II K 24 8). E. E. N.

NEHUSHTAN, nę-hush'tan (נְחֻשְׁתָּן, nᵉḥushtān): The name of the brazen serpent destroyed by Hezekiah (II K 18 4). Although the statement in EV is quite simple and clear, the Heb. text is not free from difficulties. The derivation and meaning of the Heb. are uncertain. The derivation from nᵉḥōsheth, 'brass,' with the diminutive ending ān (expressive of contempt), is not so satisfactory as that from nāḥāsh, 'serpent,' although this leaves the significance of the ending tan undetermined. If we render the verb of the sentence "it was called" instead of "he called it," then nᵉḥushtān was the name by which the object was known to its worshipers. It was probably some form of serpent-worship that was carried on in connection with this object, which tradition, rightly or wrongly, identified with the serpent said to have been made by Moses (see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 32). That this object was worshiped in the Temple is not said, nor is it said that it was used as an image of J", as is often assumed. For various speculations concerning nᵉḥushtān see Cheyne in EB, s.v. E. E. N.

NEIEL, nę-ai'el (נְעִיאֵל, nᵉʿī'ēl): A town on the border of Asher (Jos 19 27). Site not certainly known. E. E. N.

NEIGHBOR: The rendering of 'amīth, 'equal' (Lv 6 2 [cf. He 5 22]), qārōbh, 'near one' (Ex 32 27), rēa', 'friend,' 'friendly companion,' more used in the O T than all the others put together (Ex 11 2; Lv 19 18, etc.), shākhēn '[fellow] inhabitant' (Ex 3 22), or 'fellow countryman' (cf. γείτων, Lk 14 12, etc.), ὁ πλησίον (Mk 12 31, etc.), and περίοικος (Lk 1 58). The necessity of living in villages, rather than in scattered farmhouses, for purposes of defense and the habitual residence at the same place, as distinguished from frequent removals, combine in the Biblical Orient to give the neighborhood idea a peculiar importance. The neighborhood takes a distinct place as a social unit between the family and the town as a whole, and neighbor comes to be next to kin. From this point of view, the relation was at the same time promotive of good and full of risks. Hence the provisions in the O T legislation bearing on social duties are often couched in the terms of neighborhood (Ex 20 16 f.), including even the law of love (Lv 19 18; cf. Lk 10 29), where the idea is used as a stepping-stone for the inculcation of the law of universal love. A. C. Z.

NEKEB, nî'keb. See ADAMI-NEKEB.

NEKODA, nę-kō'də (נְקוֹדָא, nᵉqōdhā'): 1. The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 48; Neh 7 50). 2. The ancestral head of a family who could not prove their genealogy (Ezr 2 60; Neh 7 62). E. E. N.

NEMUEL, nę-miū'el (נְמוּאֵל, nᵉmū'ēl): 1. The ancestral head of the Nemuelites, one of the clans of Simeon (Nu 26 12; I Ch 4 24), also called Jemuel (Gn 46 10; Ex 6 15). 2. The head of a Reubenite family (Nu 26 9). E. E. N.

NEPHEG, nî'feg (נֶפֶג, nepheg): 1. The head of a Kohathite family (Ex 6 21). 2. A son of David (II S 5 15; I Ch 3 7, 14 6). E. E. N.

NEPHEW. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 1.

NEPHILIM, nef'i-lim (נְפִילִים, nᵉphīlīm): A word of unknown etymology, rendered in the LXX. by γίγαντες, 'giants,' which was followed by the AV (Gn 6 4; Nu 13 33). In Nu 13 33 the rendering "giants"—i.e., a race of men of extraordinary size, otherwise known as "sons of Anak"—is satisfactory (see GIANTS). But in Gn 6 4, if the statement about the nᵉphīlīm was an integral part of the original text, superhuman or semi-divine beings are meant. E. E. N.

NEPHTHALIM, nef'tha-lim (Νεφθαλείμ): The AV form in the N T for "Naphtali" (Mt 4 13, 15; Rev 7 6). E. E. N.

NEPHTOAH, nef'to-ā (נֶפְתֹּחַ, nephtōaḥ): A place, more exactly "the fountain of the waters of N." (Jos 15 9, 18 15), which was on the border between Judah and Benjamin. It is identified with the spring Lifta in the bottom of a valley three-quarters of an hour NW. of Jerusalem, and also with Etam, now 'Ain 'Aṭân, SW of Bethlehem. C. S. T.

NEPHUSIM, nę-fū'sim. See NAPHISH.

NER, nęr (נֵר, nēr), 'light': Saul's uncle (I S 14 50). According to I Ch 8 33, however, N. was the father of Kish, and therefore Saul's grandfather. There may have been two different persons of the same name. But from Jos. Ant. VI, 6 it appears that I Ch 8 33 is based on confusion of readings. A. C. Z.

NEREUS, nî'rę-ʊs (Νηρεύς): A Christian greeted in Ro 16 15, apparently belonging to a family of which other members are mentioned (see JULIA). The name occurs in Roman inscriptions (CIL, VI, 4344). For the later Roman legend of the Acts of Nereus and Achilleus, which may have been suggested by inscriptions, see Lipsius-Bonnet, Apok. Apostelgeschichte, II, 106 f. J. M. T.

NERGAL, nęr'gal. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 29.

NERGALSHAREZER, nęr''gal-shār-î'zęr (נֵרְגַל שַׂר־אֶצֶר, nērgal sar'etser); Babyl. Nergal-shar-uzur, 'Nergal, protect the king': The Rab-mag (q.v.) of Nebuchadrezzar at the capture of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (Jer 39 3, 13). He was one of the officers who rescued Jeremiah from prison (Jer 39 13). He seems to have been both the uncle and the successor of Evil-merodach, popularly known under the name of Neriglissar (559–555 B.C.), who reigned almost four years. He was succeeded by his son, Labashi-merodach, who was murdered after a reign of nine months. I. M. P.

NERI, nî'rai (Νηρεί): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 27). E. E. N.

NERIAH, nę-rai'ā (נֵרִיָּה, nērīyāh), 'J" is light': The father of Baruch, Jeremiah's disciple (Jer 32 12 ff.). E. E. N.

NEST: Besides the literal and metaphorical applications of the original word (qēn, Nu 24 21; Jer 49 16; Ob 4; Hab 2 9; Job 29 18), the EVV also so translate a Greek term meaning 'lodging-place,' κατασκήνωσις (Mt 8 20; Lk 9 58). A. C. Z.

NET. See FISHING and HUNTING.

NETAIM, nê'ta-im (נְטָעִים, nṭā'īm): The name of a place, the seat of an ancient pottery, probably near Gederah (I Ch 4 23 RV, cf. AV). E. E. N.

NETHANEL, nę-than'el (נְתַנְאֵל, nthan'ēl, Nethaneel AV), 'God has given': The name of ten individuals in the O T—all occurring in late (post-exilic) documents as follows: 1. The "prince" of Issachar (Nu 1 8, 16, 2 5, etc.). 2. David's brother (I Ch 2 14). 3. A priest (I Ch 15 24). 4. A Levite (I Ch 24 6). 5. A son of Obed-edom (I Ch 26 4). 6. A prince of Judah (II Ch 17 7). 7. A Levite (II Ch 35 9). 8. One of the "sons of Pashhur" (Ezr 10 22). 9. A priest (Neh 12 21). 10. A musician (Neh 12 36). E. E. N.

NETHANIAH, neth''a-nai'ā (נְתַנְיָה, nthanyāh), 'J" gives': 1. A chief musician (I Ch 25 2, 12). 2. A prince of Judah and father of Ishmael, the opponent of Gedaliah (II K 25 23, 25; Jer 40 8, etc.). 3. A Levite (II Ch 17 8). 4. The father of Jehudi (Jer 36 14). E. E. N.

NETHINIM, neth'i-nim (נְתִינִים, nthīnīm): The Hebrew word etymologically signifies 'gifts'; it occurs frequently in post-exilic literature as a designation of the slaves of the priests and Levites, who performed the menial services connected with the Temple and its ceremonies. Josephus terms them ἱερόδουλοι, and the O T indicates that they were temple-slaves. They were the descendants either of Canaanites who had been reduced to forced labor or of captives of war. It was a custom in Israel to give prisoners of war to priests as their portion. This was done by Moses in the case of the Midianites (Nu 31 30, 47), and, according to Jos 9 23, the Gibeonites also were made temple-slaves. Among the names of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 43-54; Neh 7 46-56) there are several pointing to an alien origin, e.g., Meunim and Nephisim. The employment of aliens as temple-slaves is severely censured by Ezekiel (44 6 f.), and was prohibited in Herod's Temple. According to Ezr 8 20 the Nethinim were organized by David; with the other ecclesiastics they were exempt from taxation and resided in special cities (Ezr 7 24, 2 70,); after the Return, Ophel, opposite the water-gate, was assigned to them (Neh 3 26). Under Zerubbabel 392 Nethinim returned, while 220 accompanied Ezra. See also PRIESTHOOD, § 9, d. J. A. K.

NETOPHAH, nę-tō'fā (נְטֹפָה, nṭōphāh), 'dropping': A town in Judah mentioned with Bethlehem and Anathoth (Ezr 2 22; Neh 7 26), reinhabited by Jews who returned with Zerubbabel. From the name is derived the gentilic Netophathite (Neh 12 18 AV Netophathi), applied to two of David's heroes (II S 23 28, 29; I Ch 11 30). Before the Exile it was inhabited by Calebites (I Ch 2 54). It is identified by some with Khurbet umm-Toba, S. of Jerusalem; by others with Beit-Nettif, W of Jerusalem at the entrance to the Wâdy es-Sunt, or Vale of Elah. C. S. T.

NETTLE. See PALESTINE, § 21.

NETWORK: In Is 19 9 AV the Heb. ḥōray is rendered "networks," but RV reads "white cloth." It is possible that "the weavers shall turn pale" should be read. See also TEMPLE, § 16, and ALTAR, § 2. E. E. N.

1. Introductory. The Idea of Canon.

The idea conveyed by the word 'canon' is that of a collection of sacred writings regarded as authoritative. Its original meaning is that of a measuring-rod, hence a 'norm,' but its adoption by Christians was probably taken from the Alexandrian custom of using collections of Greek authors as models and calling them κανόνες. It is not possible to say whether the more prominent idea is that of the Scriptures as normative, or that of a defining list of Scriptural books; probably both ideas were present from the beginning. It should be noted that the phrase ὁ κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας was also used for "the faith."

The idea of a canon of Scripture, apart from the word 'canon,' was inherited from the Jews, and was at first expressed by other words. The earliest of these expressions is probably in II Clement, which speaks of τὰ βιβλία καὶ οἱ ἀπόστολοι; but more important is the usage of Clement of Alexandria and Melito of Sardis, who adopted the word διαθήκη and who distinguish the N T as ἡ νεά διαθήκη. From this is derived the adjective ἐνδιάθηκος, used by Origen and others in the sense of 'canonical.' In Latin this became testamentum, but Tertullian preferred instrumentum. Another phrase used by Origen was δεδημοσιευμέναι γραφαί, meaning especially, though perhaps not exclusively, Scriptures which could be read publicly in church; with these were, of course, contrasted the ἀπόκρυφοι γραφαί. The earliest use of κανών (in the form τὰ κανονιζόμενα) is in the Festal letter of Athanasius for 367, and from that time the word became popular.

In discussing the history of the N T it is essential to observe the distinction between the use of its writings and their reception into the Canon. Documents may have existed for many years before they became canonical, and quotation by an early writer does not prove that he regarded the book as Scripture. The failure to recognize this point has sometimes led to the assignment either of impossibly late dates for the origin of various books in the N T, or of impossibly early dates for their reception into the Canon. The present article is concerned with the question of canonicity, and only incidentally with that of origin.

2. The Teaching of Jesus the Earliest N T Canon.

The Canon of our Lord and of the Apostles was the Jewish Scriptures. In the N T "scripture," "scriptures," means the whole or portions of the Jewish Bible, perhaps including some apocryphal books. The only exception to this rule is II P 3 16, where there is at least a tendency to rank the Pauline writings as Scripture. II P is, however, almost certainly a pseudepigraph, and is not evidence for the first generation. At the same time, even in the earliest days of the Church, the O T did not stand as the sole authority; coordinate with it was the teaching of the Lord, as may be seen from the Pauline Epistles (e.g., I Co 7 10; I Th 4 15). Between this and the authority of the O T there was only a difference of form. The latter was an authoritative book, the former was the teaching of an authoritative person. It is uncertain precisely when the teaching of the Lord was collected into book-form, but for the present purpose the important point is that no step had been taken before the end of the 1st cent. to hand over the authority of the Lord and His teaching to documents describing Him or it, thus forming a canon.

3. Canonization of Writings Begun.

In the sub-Apostolic period this transference of authority began to be made, but quite slowly. The earliest instance is probably in the Ep. Barn. 4 14, which introduces the sentence "Many are called, but few are chosen" by "as it is written." This passage seems to be a direct quotation from Mt 22 14; but many scholars find difficulty in accepting this view, and think that a common apocryphal source lies behind both Mt and Ep. Barn. Much depends on the date assigned to Ep. Barn. If it was written c. 80 A.D. the former view seems less probable, but if Harnack's dating of c. 130 A.D. be accepted, there is much less to be said against it, and it ought perhaps to be adopted. A more certain instance is in the book known as II Ep. of Clement, where a document containing the sayings of the Lord is unquestionably placed on the level of Scripture. But the date of this book is very uncertain; it is not earlier than 135 A.D. and is probably later (cf. Harnack, Chron. I, 438). A little earlier in some localities there began to be marked the tendency to exalt the Apostles and their teaching. This can be seen especially in Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, c. 115 A.D. (cf. Ep. ad Magn. 7 1). Such a tendency of thought, however, could end only in the establishment of Apostolic writings as canonical by the side of the written sayings of the Lord, though as a matter of fact this process was not completed till the next generation.

4. Gospel Canon of 140–200.

Putting aside Ep. Barn. and II Clement, the first writer who places Christian writings definitely on a level with the O T is Justin Martyr, who (c. 140–150 A.D.) refers to "Memoirs" of the Apostles, called "Gospels" (Apol. I, 66), and in his description of an early Christian service (Apol. I, 67) ranks them with the writings of the prophets. This was the first step in the actual formation of the N T Canon. It is not easy, however, to define exactly what were the books referred to as the "Memoirs" of the Apostles. It seems almost certain that he knew and used all the Four Gospels and possible that he was acquainted with at least one other; but an important point, which has not yet been cleared up, is whether he used them as separate documents or in the form of a harmony. It is also likely that he was acquainted with at least some of the Pauline and other Epistles; but as he probably did not regard them as 'scripture,' further definition is for the present purpose unnecessary. Almost contemporary with Justin were Papias of Hierapolis and Marcion of Rome. Papias seems to represent a more conservative attitude in that he preferred oral to written tradition, and this perhaps suggests that the Church in Rome was more progressive than that in Hierapolis. He was acquainted with documents bearing the names of Matthew and Mark and probably also with the Apocalypse and perhaps other books of the N T; but the evidence is doubtful, and in any case does not prove that he regarded them as 'scripture.'

5. Canon of Marcion.

Marcion, on the other hand, went further than Justin. He established a canon consisting of "Gospel" and "Apostle," which seem to have been identical, the former with our Luke and the latter with the Pauline Epistles (omitting the Pastorals); though the text differed from ours and perhaps had been altered by him. This is really the earliest evidence for the use of the Epistles as canonical. There is plenty of earlier evidence for their existence; but until Marcion they do not seem to have been reckoned on the same level as the O T and the Gospels, so that in this respect the heretic anticipated the verdict of the Catholic Church.

6. Status of Gospels at Close of 2d Cent.

Thus the evidence of the first half of the 2d cent. suggests that before its close the Church in some localites, notably in Rome, had taken the step of canonizing Apostolic writings which contained accounts of the Lord's life and teaching. A tendency can also be observed which emphasized the importance of the Apostles, but it can not be shown that this had as yet led to the actual canonization of any of their writings. A considerable advance was made in the second half of this century. The authorities which we possess for this period show that the N T Canon was becoming settled, and that it consisted of Gospels and Apostolic writings. Points which were not settled were the restriction of the Gospels to the four which are now recognized, and the limits of the Apostolic writings. Before the end of the 2d cent., however, the Four Gospels, neither more nor less, were firmly established in the West and in Africa, and the writings of Irenæus show that an extensive system of symbolism was growing up around the number four. But in Alexandria Clement (c. 190) used other gospels besides the Four (e.g., that of the Egyptians), apparently without drawing any distinction between them, though the point is open to dispute, and in the East there is the negative evidence of Theophilus (c. 180) and the positive evidence of Tatian (c. 170), who introduced into the Syrian Church, not the fourfold Gospel, but the harmony based on it, which remained in general use until the beginning of the 5th cent. Tatian's evidence is especially valuable, as he came from Rome. It shows that, although the Four Gospels had there a preeminent position, the emphasis laid on the fourfold canon, as against either the recognition of more gospels or the redaction of them into a harmony, belongs to the period between Justin and Irenæus (c. 180–190), the latter of whom, although bishop of Lyons, may be taken to represent the Roman standard. The existence of the Alogi, who rejected the Fourth Gospel, is also a sign that the fourfold Gospel had for a time to face some opposition.

7. Status of Apostolic Writings at Close of 2d Cent.

Turning to the Apostolic writings, the kernel of the collection was everywhere the Acts and thirteen Pauline Epistles. The only possible exception to this was in the Syrian Church. It is not at all certain that Tatian introduced these writings as canonical along with his Diatessaron; but this is not for the present purpose of great importance, as it is probable that a little later the influence of the Greek Church of Antioch brought in the 'Separated Gospels' and with them the Acts and Pauline Epistles. Certainly, until the beginning of the 5th cent. the evidence is that the Syriac Canon contained no other Apostolic writings, such as the Catholic Epistles. It is, however, remarkable that among the Pauline Epistles the Syriac Canon seems to have at first included some spurious letters connected with Corinth, still preserved in the Armenian N T, which were probably extracts from the Acta Pauli. A problem of importance, but at present insoluble, is the origin of the collection of the Pauline Epistles. It is certain that the exchange of valued books by neighboring communities was an important factor, but how the unanimity was reached which fixed on thirteen epistles is unknown. Outside the Pauline Epistles the Canon was still far from fixed. Except in the East, I Peter, I John, and the Apocalypse were generally received; but there was a considerable literature on the fringe of the Canon, some of which has been since accepted and some rejected. For the West a valuable piece of evidence is the Canon discovered by Muratori, in 1740, the earliest known list of canonical books, which is attributed by some scholars to Hippolytus, though there is room for much doubt on this point. The evidence of this document, which originated in the Roman Church, together with that of Irenæus, Tertullian of North Africa, and Clement of Alexandria, may be exhibited in the following table, which fairly represents the Church opinion in the last quarter of the 2d cent. It should, however, be noted that the tabular form exaggerates the clearness of the evidence, which is not all equally satisfactory

	He	II P	Ja	Jude	II Jn	III Jn	Rev	Hermas	Barn.	I Clem.	Ap Pet.
Irenæus.. ..	No	No	No	No	Yes	No	Yes	Yes	No	?	No
Tertullian....	?	No	No	Yes	No	No	Yes	Yes	No	No	No
Clem. Alex...	Yes	No	No	Yes	Yes	No?	Yes	Yes	Yes	Yes	Yes
Mur. Canon..	No	No	No	Yes	Yes	No	Yes	No	No	No	Yes

It will thus be seen that at the beginning of the 3d cent. the N T Canon was fairly established with a fourfold Gospel, a collection of Pauline Epistles, and a less closely defined body of other Apostolic writings, as to which local opinion varied.

The work of the next period in the West was the definition and gradual enlargement of the list of Apostolic books. In the end Hebrews, II Peter, II and III John, and James won acceptance, owing chiefly to the belief that they had been written by Apostles, and that all Apostolic writings were authoritative. But the other books, though lingering on in some quarters, were dropped. A somewhat eccentric list, which seems to represent some such survival, is the so-called Claromontane Canon, found in Cod. D^{Paul}, which still retains Hermas and the Apocalypse of Peter, adds the Acts of Paul, and calls Hebrews the Epistle of Barnabas, as did Tertullian and Novatian. In Alexandria the greater vagueness of the Canon in Clement's time demanded more thoroughgoing measures, and Origen (189–254) introduced a new classification of books. He divided the extant literature which had claims to be Apostolic into three classes: genuine, rejected, and doubtful. His division seems to have been that the Four Gospels, Acts, thirteen Pauline Epistles, Hebrews (with some hesitation), the Apocalypse, I Peter, and I John were recognized as genuine; certain heretical books, such as the Gospel of the Egyptians, were classed as rejected; while II and III John, James, Jude, and II Peter were doubtful. He used Hermas as Scripture, but recognized that some Christians differed from him. Eusebius of Cæsarea (265–340) followed closely in Origen's footsteps, and this division of the books had much influence on the succeeding generation. One point is especially noteworthy: Origen included the Apocalypse among the genuine books, but he was not in sympathy with that kind of literature. His opponent Methodius, however, accepted also the Apocalypse of Peter. We may probably trace here the influence of the antipathy to apocalyptic literature, which grew more pronounced in the East in the succeeding generations. The Canon of the Eastern Church was ultimately the same as that of the Western, but the Palestinian and Syrian churches long rejected the Apocalypse (cf. the Decree of the Council of Laodicea in 363, the Stichometry of Nicephorus, and the List of Sixty Canonical Books). The Alexandrians hesitated; but, following the lead of Athanasius, in the end they accepted it, though not without controversy (cf. Eus. HE, VII, 25), and gradually the Alexandrian tradition gained ground, and the Apocalypse was generally accepted. Only the Syrian Church kept a more conservative position. Even at the beginning of the 5th cent. it did not accept the minor Epistles or the Apocalypse, and these were not added to the Syriac Bible until the 6th cent., while in some Nestorian circles they probably were never adopted at all. With this exception the Canon of the N T was generally fixed in its present form before the 6th cent. It is true that in outlying districts eccentricities were still to be found, such as an occasional use of the "Epistle to the Laodiceans" among the Pauline Epistles. In the Reformation an attack was made on some of the Catholic Epistles, but these points are not of the first importance, and are outside the scope of this article.

8. Completion of Canon. From 3d to 6th Cent.

LITERATURE: The subject may be studied especially in Zahn, Gesch. d. neut. Kanon (1888-92); but one should also read Harnack's Das N T um das Jahr 200 (1889), or the section on the Canon in his History of Dogma (Eng. transl. 1897); also Leipoldt, Neutestamentlichen Kanon (1907–8). Satisfactory statements of the main points are given in H. J. Holtzmann's Einleitung in d. N T (1893), pp. 75–204, and in Jülicher's Introduction (Eng. transl. 1904), pp. 459–566. An indispensable collection of texts is given in Preuschen's Analecta (1893), pp. 129–185. Westcott's History of the Canon of the N T (1875) is still valuable, though rather old and somewhat too apologetic. K. L.

NEW TESTAMENT, LANGUAGE OF. See HELLENISTIC AND BIBLICAL GREEK.

NEW TESTAMENT TEXT: The Bible did not fall from heaven as a ready-made book. It was written by men; men also have copied it. God has not been pleased to protect the text miraculously from all corruption. The autographs inscribed upon perishable papyrus, and not preserved with any special care, soon disappeared. Each copy brought into existence intentional and unintentional changes in the text. Even attempts to correct errors produced new mistakes.

1. N T Autographs Not Extant.

As we must interpret the Bible, i.e., establish its original meaning, through the intelligent use of our understanding, so we should also seek to restore its original text through scientific criticism. The consciousness of this duty has never entirely left the Church since the days of the great scholar Origen. The exegetes of the ancient Church debated text-differences with perfect freedom. Even in the Middle Ages it was well known that for the sake of accuracy correcting was necessary to copying, and various Bible Correctoria were actually in use. Only with printing could the idea arise that one text alone could be supreme, and this actually happened in the case of the text following the Erasmian edd. of 1516ff., i.e., Stephanus (1550) and the Elzevir (1624).

2. Origin of Textus Receptus.

But John Mill, as early as 1707, shattered the belief in the Divine origin and infallibility of this Textus Receptus through the 30,000 variations which he counted in eighty manuscripts. During the 19th cent. the greatest progress was made in this field, especially in two respects: (1) Through Tischendorf's discovery and publication of the most important old MSS. (1841–1869), which greatly increased the apparatus in size and value over the collections of Mill, Wettstein, Matthaei, Birch, Alter, and Scholz. (2) Through the development of a method by Lachmann (1831) and Westcott and Hort (1881) which, founded on Bentley's Proposal (1721), far outdistanced the earlier attempts of Bengel, Griesbach, and others. While, before his day, corrections were made only here and there in the Textus Receptus, Lachmann followed the right principle in deserting this text altogether and constructing one directly upon the ancient manuscripts and versions. It was Westcott and Hort, however, who showed in a masterly way how to estimate the historical worth of all these witnesses, and therefrom to reconstruct the text.

3. Rise of Modern Textual Criticism.

The best surveys of the extant materials for text criticism are given by C. R. Gregory, von Soden, and Scrivener. These are: (1) The Greek manuscripts, which are divided according to the character of the writing into Majuscules, or Uncials (4th–10th cent.), and Minuscules 9th–15th cent.), the former being designated in the lists by capital letters, the latter by numbers (another system has been proposed by von Soden). The most important manuscripts are the four that originally comprised the whole N T, viz.: the Vaticanus (B) and Sinaiticus (ℵ) of the 4th cent., the Alexandrinus (A) and Ephræmi Syri Rescriptus (C) of the 5th cent., and two bilingual (Greek and Latin) manuscripts, once in the possession of Beza, the Cantabrigiensis (D), containing the Gospels and Acts, and the Claromontanus (D or D_2), containing Paul's Epistles, of the 5th or 6th cent. (2) The Ancient Versions. Of these the most important are the Latin, the Syriac, and the Coptic—all of the 2d and 3d cents. Of secondary importance are the Gothic, Armenian, Georgian, and Ethiopic, of the 4th and 5th cents. These versions have been preserved only in late manuscripts, with many variations in readings, and should, therefore, be used only in the critical editions of Oxford and Cambridge (the Vulgate by Wordsworth and White, 1889 ff., the Old-Syriac by Burkitt, 1904, the Peshito by Gwilliam, 1901, the North-Coptic by Horner, 1898 ff.). As these versions were experiencing continual revision, on the basis of Greek texts, they reflect, in their variations, the development of the original text itself. (3) The Patristic Quotations. Since these, in the long process of manuscript copying, were often accommodated to the later text, it is necessary in their case also to use only the critical editions of the Vienna and Berlin Academy (see also Bernard's excellent study, The Biblical Text of Clement of Alexandria, in Cambridge Texts and Studies, vol. v. 5, 1899). If the versions serve to determine the readings which were referred to in the church of any given province, and thus help to localize a text, so the patristic quotations help to date it, by enabling one to follow back even to the 2d cent. a reading for which, among the manuscripts, there may be only late witnesses or, perhaps, no witness at all. Just as the text of manuscripts which include several parts of the N T differs in purity and character for the Gospels, Paul, Acts and Cath. Epp., and the Apocalypse, so the versions and the patristic quotations vary in value.

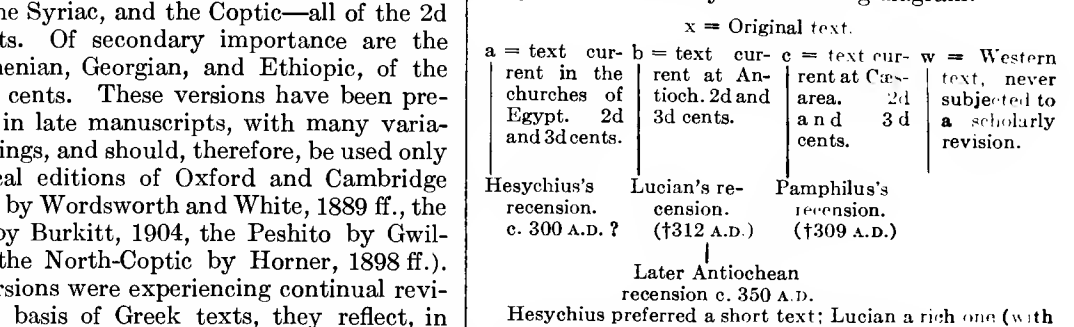
5. Principles of Criticism.

How is the value of the testimony offered by this material to be ascertained? It is not sufficient merely to add up the witnesses for and against a reading; they must be weighed. Nor does age decide; often witnesses of equal age stand opposed to each other. A late manuscript can have been derived from a very old one and contain a text better than that of an older manuscript that happens to be extant. The witnesses must be grouped genealogically, since the later manuscripts are to be referred back to earlier (extant or lost) originals (e.g., the so-called Ferrar Group, consisting of Gospel-manuscripts 13, 69, 124, 346, 543, 788, 826, 828, all derived from a Calabrian MS. of the 9th or 12th cent.). This principle can not be carried out so thoroughly with the N T texts as in the case of the classics, which were copied by and for learned persons. Most N T MSS. contain mixed texts, agreeing now with this, now with that group. Consequently it is the ever-changing grouping that decides. When ℵBD agree, their reading is generally correct. Less certain is the grouping ℵB against D, or ℵD against B, or BD against ℵ. In the Epp. of Paul ℵAC is stronger than BDG. Furthermore, the groups must be arranged according to the history of the text. It is comparatively easy to distinguish certain late recensions. Rejecting these, there remain the old types of text current in the several great geographical divisions of the Church, the Alexandrian, Antiochean, and Cæsarean (these three underlying the recensions respectively of Hesychius, Lucian, and Pamphilus), and the Western. This may be illustrated by the following diagram:



Hesychius preferred a short text; Lucian a rich one (with many conflate readings); Pamphilus a good style.

The fact that the Western text was never revised explains the indefinite and fluctuating character of the witnesses to this type of text. Westcott and Hort believed that in B we have the representative of a neutral text. At present, B is considered Alexandrian. On the other hand, the Western text has gained in importance; because it is now known that it was widely current in most ancient times, especially since the discovery, by Mrs. Lewis, in 1892, of the Sinai-Syriac text. Blass, Bousset, Burkitt, Largarde, Nestle, Wellhausen, and others are enthusiastic advocates of this Syro-Latin text. The truth is that the external witnesses alone do not decide. The history of the text shows that practically all the most important variants were widely current as early as the 2d cent. The 3d and 4th cents. produced only new combinations on the basis of material that was already at hand. The decision rests finally upon the internal probabilities. We have to ask, Which reading is the one from which it is most probable that the others were derived? For example, in I Th 3 2 Paul calls Timothy the "fellow worker of God" (D). At this offense was taken and it was corrected to "fellow worker," i.e., with us (B), or "minister of God" (ℵ). Later copyists, before whom lay both readings, combined them, in some instances mechanically, as "God's minister and fellow worker" (G), or, with more insight, as "God's minister and our fellow worker" (K L Chrys.). Hence the value of Bengel's Canon: Proclivi præstat ardua ("the more difficult reading is to be preferred"). Copyists are inclined to make readings smooth or more intelligible. Therefore the text that causes difficulty or gives offense is to be considered the more original; also nearly always the text that is shorter, simpler, or less elegant. The tendency to improve the style is especially noticeable in the quotations by the Fathers. Furthermore, the context and the style of the Biblical author must be taken into account. Copyists familiar with the Bible are easily misled into making similar passages more nearly alike. The first three Gospels were especially subject to this harmonizing process. Thus the shorter text of the Lord's Prayer in Lk 11 2-4 was often supplemented according to the longer text of Mt 6 9-13.

6. Importance of Textual Criticism for Other Disciplines.

B. Weiss is altogether right, therefore, in claiming that textual criticism can not be carried on safely apart from exegesis, nor may it be dissociated from literary criticism. If, for example, Mt and Lk used our Mk, as is now generally becoming recognized, they can be of service as the oldest text-critical witnesses for Mk. On the other hand, it is a service rendered to literary criticism if it be proved by textual criticism that some verbal parallels between Mt and Lk originally did not exist, that Mk 16 9-20 and Jn 7 53–8 11 do not belong to these Gospels, or that in Eph 1 1 the words "at Ephesus" were not in the original text. The text of the N T has also been influenced by dogmatic interests. The opposing parties in the ancient Church accused each other of falsifying the text, and even to-day we are able to detect in the MSS. at hand the intrusion of dogmatic corrections. For example, the Cappadocian fathers Basil and Gregory, who were strenuous advocates of the doctrine of the Trinity, read at I Co 8 6 an addition concerning the Holy Spirit; while the famous Trinitarian passage I Jn 5 7 was certainly inserted into the Latin text after Cyprian. A very slight scribal alteration in I Ti 3 16 had a far-reaching dogmatic significance (ΘC, 'God' for OC, 'who'). Cf. also the variants at Mt 1 16; Jn 1 18; Ac 20 28. It was in the interest of asceticism that in Lk 2 36 the "seven years" were shortened to "seven days," in Mt 3 4 the "locusts" were altered into "honey-cakes," and at Mk 9 29 to "prayer" was added "and fasting."

7. Value of Conjecture.

In spite of the large content of the tradition and the quantity especially of Greek MSS., it is not at all impossible that at some places the original text is lost and can be restored only through conjecture. So, for example, Origen conjectured that at Jn 1 28 "Bethabara" should be read for "Bethany," and Westcott and Hort, with others, consider that at Col 2 18 and 23 all extant texts are corrupt. Conjectural criticism is not to be rejected because of its abuse in the hands of some, particularly Dutch critics.

8. The External Form of the Text.

Our oldest MSS. are not punctuated, nor are there any spaces between the words. The punctuation and word-division of the later MSS. are not always to be taken as correct. From the 4th cent. onward attempts were made at chapter-division. The one now current was the work of Stephen Langton of the 13th cent. Our verse-division originated with the printer Robertus Stephanus, 1551. The super- and subscriptions to the different books, which vary greatly in the MSS., are none of them original. The notices as to the dates of the Gospels, the place of writing, and bearers of the Epistles are not earlier than the 4th cent.

9. Modern Versions.

The translations now in common use in Protestant churches were made, for the most part, in the time of the Reformation and are based upon the Erasmian Textus Receptus. As it then marked a great advance to set forth a translation based on the original Greek text in the place of the medieval ones that were derived from the Vulgate, so the present time demands a translation based upon a critically corrected text. A praiseworthy beginning has here been made by the English and American Revised Versions.

NICANOR, nai-kê'nǫr (Νικάνωρ): 1. A general of Antiochus Epiphanes and afterward of Demetrius I, defeated and slain by the forces of Judas Maccabæus at Beth-horon in March, 161 B.C. (I Mac 7 39-50; II Mac 15 36 ff.; Jos. Ant. XII, 10 5). The day of his defeat was celebrated annually as "Nicanor's Day." 2. One of the seven deacons appointed in Ac 6 5. For later legends concerning him, see Baronius, Annales, I, 34, cccxix. J. M. T.

NICODEMUS, nic"o-dî'mus (Νικόδημος): A Pharisee and member of the Sanhedrin, who visited Jesus by night when the latter opened His ministry in Jerusalem (Jn 3 1 ff.). His motive in coming to Jesus appears to have been perfectly sincere. As a well-meaning Pharisee, he must have been greatly interested in the agitation aroused by the preaching of John the Baptist, and Jesus' first public appearance in Jerusalem attracted his serious attention. With others, he was convinced that Jesus was "a teacher come from God," that is, one with a genuine Divine call and inspiration for His work. It was Jesus' miracles that had so convinced him. For his own satisfaction he sought an interview with Jesus and chose the night-time as perhaps most convenient, possibly in order to avoid criticism on the part of his fellow Sanhedrists. How fully the conversation between N. and Jesus is reported in the account in the Fourth Gospel is uncertain. But the salient points are evidently reproduced. N., though representing the best type of Pharisaism, was still a Pharisee with the general theological and religious conceptions of that sect. He probably inquired about the "kingdom of God" with no question in his own mind as to his own full right to membership therein. Jesus' answer to N. was intended to open his mind to the fallacy of the whole Pharisaic position, and He did this by pointing out that it is the spiritual condition of one's heart that determines his membership in the Kingdom and nothing else. When N. shows himself slow to take this in, Jesus gently rebukes him for claiming to be a "teacher of Israel" and not knowing these elementary ("earthly") things. The immediate result of the conversation is not known. We next hear of N. in connection with Jesus' visit to Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles, six months before His crucifixion and eighteen months after the conversation of Jn 3 1 ff. At this time N. stands out in the Sanhedrin for a fairer treatment of Jesus than that court was inclined to give Him (Jn 7 50 f.). Six months later N. and Joseph of Arimathea, another member of the Sanhedrin, cared for the body of the crucified Jesus and saw that it was decently buried instead of being exposed on the cross over the Sabbath (Jn 19 39). These last two incidents indicate a sincere appreciation by N. of the purity of Jesus' motives and respect, if not affection, for Him personally. That N. later became a Christian is not stated in the N T, but it is altogether probable. He was so viewed in early Christian legend (cf. Acta Pilati), and a late Apocryphal Gospel attributed to him was once current in Christian circles. E. E. N.

NICOLAITANS, nic"o-lê'i-tanz (Νικολαΐται): A sect of Christians mentioned in the Apocalypse (Rev 2 6, 16). Their words are said to have been abhorrent to the church at Ephesus; but their teaching to have been tolerated, contrary to the Lord's desire, by that at Pergamum. What their teaching or work was is not described, although the fact that they are named in the same connection with Balaam (2 14) indicates, in general, a form of antinomianism. As to how they got their name, there is a great difference of opinion. Some have suggested that 'Nicolaitan' is another name for Pauline Christian, and that the passage is an attack on Paul (Van Maanen, Paulus, 1891, II, pp. 244–251). But that Pauline Christians should be hated by the Ephesian Church is not to be thought of. It is more natural to take the name 'Nicolaitan,' according to its derivation, as a follower of Nicolas. As there is only one man of the name in the Apostolic Age (Ac 6 5), tradition early fixed on him as the founder of the sect, upon the assumption that he had apostatized. This, however, can not be regarded as certain. As a matter of fact, there was a sect of Gnostic Nicolaitans in the 2d cent. A.D.; but its connection with Nicolas of Antioch, the deacon, is probably fictitious. Either the heresiarch was another Nicolas or the sect took the name from a desire to trace its origin to an Apostolic man. A. C. Z.

NICOLAS, nic'o-las (Νικόλαος): One of the seven chosen to deal with the complaint of the Hellenistic widows, a proselyte from Antioch in Syria, and probably, as his name indicates, a Greek (Ac 6 5). Nothing further concerning him is certainly known; but Irenæus, Hippolytus, and other sources of tradition, probably on insufficient grounds, and not without strong dissent from other contemporary writers, connect the Nicolaitans (Rev 2 6, 15) with him. It is, however, quite possible that Nicolas returned to Syria, and, reverting to his former heathen life, became the leader of a libertinistic sect in Asia Minor. Others identify Nicolas with the Balaam of Rev 2 14 (Νικο-λαος = Bāla'-'am, 'Conqueror of the people') and take the name symbolically. R. A. F.

NICOPOLIS, ni-cep'o-lis (Νικόπολις, 'city of victory'): A city of Greece, where Paul planned to spend the winter and directed Titus to meet him (Tit 3 12). There were numerous cities of this name, but doubtless that in Epirus on the E. coast of the Ionian Sea, situated on the promontory opposite Actium, enclosing the Ambracian Gulf on the NW., is meant. After his victory over Antony in 31 B.C. Augustus founded this city both to commemorate that event and as a center of new Hellenic life, and under imperial patronage it soon grew in magnificence and political importance. Quadrennial games were instituted in honor of the Actian Apollo, and they ranked with the other four athletic festivals of Greece. The teaching of Epictetus also brought it renown. Paul probably found it a good center for evangelizing the west of Greece, and may have been arrested here before his second imprisonment. R. A. F

NIGER, nai'jẹr (Νίγερ): The gentile name of a certain Simeon, who was prominent in the early church life of Antioch (Ac 13 1). Nothing more is known of him. E. E. N.

NIGHT. See TIME, § 1.

NIGHT-HAWK. See PALESTINE, § 25.

NIGHT MONSTER: The rendering of the Heb. līlīth (Is 34 14, screech-owl AV). In Babylonian belief Lilith was originally a female evil demon, and then considered as particularly the demon of the night. The Biblical writers often made use of such popular beliefs in enforcing or illustrating their own higher teaching. E. E. N.

NILE: The classic name of the great river of Egypt. It is used from the days of Hesiod onward (Νεῖλος), but occurs nowhere in the Bible. Neither has it any Egyptian or Semitic cognates. Efforts to connect it with the Phœnician naḥal (Movers), or the general Semitic nāhār (Lepsius), have not been regarded as successful. The Egyptians called the river H'p (Hapi), and personified it in a god of human form, characterized by masculine and feminine features. This Nile god is also represented as wearing a bunch of aquatic plants and the girdle of a fisherman. In the Biblical text the Nile is mentioned simply as "The River" (hayy'ōr and y'or, modified from the Egyptian Iotr, Io'r, and with the article; also Shihor, Is 23 3, "Nile" RN; Jer 2 18, Sihor AV. By some the Gihon of Gn 2 13 is supposed to be the Nile.

The Nile has always occupied a distinguished place among the great streams of the world, primarily because it furnishes the basis of the life of Egypt. It has been truly said, "Egypt is the gift of the Nile"; for not only is the river essential to the productiveness of the soil as a means of irrigation, but it is the very source of that soil, which it brings in solution from the interior of Africa, and deposits on each side of its channel during its period of inundation. The exact length of the river was unknown to the ancients, its sources being regarded as shrouded in mystery. Its regular and periodical rise and fall were, however, accurately understood and utilized. At Cairo the inundation begins with the first days of June and reaches its height about the 1st of October; it then recedes until April. It changes its color from white, when low, to ruddy, and then to green, when it becomes unwholesome on account of decaying vegetable matter. As it falls it becomes ruddy again, and finally white. A. Nile God.

NIMRAH, nim'rā. See BETH-NIMRAH.

NIMRIM, nim'rim (נִמְרִים, nimrīm), or more exactly "the waters of Nimrim": The context in Is 15 6, Jer 48 34 suggests a well-watered and fertile region in Southern Moab. Eusebius identified N. with a town, Bennamercim, N. of Zoar. The name is found to-day in Wâdy Numêre, at the SE. end of the Dead Sea, and higher up, at the source of the Wâdy, are found the ruins of a town in what is still a well-watered and fertile region. C. S. T.

NIMROD, nim'rod (נִמְרֹד, nimrōdh): One of the great characters of Gn ch. 10. He was a son of Cush, and "began to be a mighty one in the earth" (ver. 8). Though the other sons of Cush (ver. 7) were peoples, Nimrod possessed all the marks of an individual. "He was a mighty hunter before Jehovah" (ver. 9). His imperial sway extended over "Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar" (ver. 10). "Out of that land he went forth into Assyria, and builded Nineveh, and Rehoboth-Ir, and Calah, and Resen between Nineveh and Calah (the same is the great city)" (vs. 11, 12). He is thus distinguished as a hunter, a ruler, and a builder of extraordinary ability. We find also in Mic 5 5 that the land of Nimrod is paralleled with the land of Assyria.

Various attempts have been made to identify this ancient Biblical hero with some of the legendary characters in early Babylonian inscriptions. The most plausible identification is that with the Babylonian national hero, Gilgamesh (formerly read "Izdubar"), when we consider the herculean tasks performed by him. From the view-point of the cities which he built and over which he ruled, the identification of him with Merodach, or Marduk, the patron deity of Babylon, is the more probable. This same deity is represented in the Babylonian inscriptions as having captured in a net the great dragon Chaos, and destroyed it. The presence in Assyria of many names in which this name Nimrod is preserved testifies to the real basis of the legends and traditions still extant. I. M. P.

NIMSHI, nim'shai (נִמְשִׁי, nimshī): The father of Jehu, King of Israel (I K 19 16, etc.). E. E. N.

NINEVEH, nin'ę-vę (נִינְוֵה, nīnᵉwēh): The last capital of the Assyrian Empire, located on the E. bank of the upper Tigris, opposite the site of the modern city of Mōsṣl. Its name in Assyrian literature is Ninuâ, or Ninâ, a designation of the Babylonian goddess identified with Ishtar. The building of Nineveh is attributed to Nimrod. Gn 10 11 f. reads: "Out of that land [Shinar] he went forth into Assyria and builded Nineveh, and Rehoboth-Ir, and Calah, and Resen between Nineveh and Calah (the same is the great city)." It is mentioned several times in very ancient inscriptions (about 2700 B.C.), but there is no authentic record of the date of its founding. From 885 B.C., the beginning of the reign of Assurnatsirpal, it was one of the residence cities of the Assyrian kings. But not until the time of Sargon II does it seem to have been promoted to the position of capital of the empire; even then this king built his great palace at Khorsabad, a suburb to the N. of the chief city. Sennacherib was apparently the first king who made this city exclusively his residence. His son and successor Esarhaddon, and his grandson Asshurbanipal, likewise made N. their royal capital, and erected therein palaces of stupendous and magnificent proportions.

1. Nineveh in Its Glory.

The glory of Nineveh waned with the decline of the Assyrian power. According to the report in the inscription of Nabonidus, it fell in 607–606 B.C. before the hosts of the Manda, who had poured over into this valley from the mountainous districts on the N. and NE. The prophecies of Nahum (ch. 2 f.) and Zephaniah (2 13-15) paint in realistic colors the tragedy that overwhelmed the great lion of the nations. The catastrophe was so disastrous and the results so complete that Xenophon with his 10,000 Greeks, who passed the ruins in the beginning of the 4th cent. B.C., could not ascertain what they represented. From that date almost to the middle of the last century, the identity of these ruins was a mystery to every traveler who saw them.

2. Nineveh Fallen.

It was in 1820 A.D. that Rich, an Englishman, resident at Bagdad, after careful examination of the ruins, was the first to conclude that they represented all that remained of ancient Nineveh.

3. Nineveh Uncovered. In 1842 Botta began excavations on this site, but soon transferred his activity to Khorsabad, about 10 m. to the north, where he uncovered parts of Sargon's palace. Between 1845 and 1850 Layard uncovered a part of the palace of Shalmaneser II at Nimroud, about 18 m. S. of Mōṣṣl, and identified beyond a doubt the site of ancient Nineveh just across the Tigris from Mōṣṣl, by bringing to light some of the palaces of its last three great kings. The actual ruins of Nineveh consist of two mounds separated by the stream Khosr. One of these, Kuyunjik, on the north, was found by Layard to have covered the palaces of Sennacherib (705–681 B.C.) and Asshurbanipal (668–626 B.C.); and the other, Nebi Yūnus ('prophet Jonah,' for a tradition says he was buried here), covered the palaces of Sennacherib and Esarhaddon (681–668 B.C.). These royal residences were built in magnificent proportions, and their ruins were found to be vast storehouses of valuable antiquities, including thousands of clay tablets, cylinders, bas-reliefs, statues, and other objects of genuine interest. The wall line of old Nineveh has been carefully traced, and the walled city has been found to have been about 3 m. in length and from 1 to 1½ m. in width, containing on a conservative estimate about 3 sq. m., or a little more than 1,800 acres of ground. If the statements of the Book of Jonah (3 3, 4 11) regarding Nineveh's size and population are to be considered, we must conceive of the capital as covering in the mind of the writer the whole stretch of territory embraced within these adjacent suburban cities, viz.: Calah, 18 m. S. on the E. bank of the Tigris, Resen, and Rehoboth-Ir, all, as we remember, included in the record of Gn 10 11 f. Then almost due N., about 10 m. distant, stood the palace of Sargon II, nearly as large as Calah, and to the E. about 7 m. another town still unidentified. The inclusion of these towns with the territory and populations would amply satisfy the largest requirements. (But see JONAH, BOOK OF.)

NISROCH, nis'rok. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 29.

NITER: The Heb. nether or Gr. νίτρον is not what is now called 'niter,' i.e., saltpeter (potassium chlorate), which would not suit the O T context, but a crude form of soda (sodium carbonate), properly known as natron, which, mixed with oil, served as soap (Pr 25 20; "soda" RV; Jer 2 22; "lye" RV). This substance is found diffused in nature, notably in the famous natron, or soda, lakes of Egypt; and a sodium carbonate of similar character occurs as an incrustation along the margin of such saline lakes. These two minerals were the sources of the soda salts of the ancient Egyptians. See also LYE. L. G. L.

NO, NO-AMMON, nō''-ê'mən (נֹא, nō', נֹא אָמוֹן, nō' 'ammōn): A great city in Upper Egypt known to the classical writers under the name of Thebes. Its Egyptian name was n't, n't-'m'n. Though Thebes was the capital of Egypt as early as the 11th dynasty, its period of glory really began with the New Empire (16th cent. B.C.). It was enlarged and embellished by the kings of the 18th and 19th dynasties, and even when their later successors moved their residence into Northern Egypt, Ammon worship with its powerful priesthood maintained for Thebes a controlling influence in the affairs of the state. Thebes, however, began to be weakened through repeated occupations of it by the Ethiopian conquerors in the 8th cent. It was captured both by Esarhaddon (670 B.C.) and Asshurbanipal (667 B.C.). In Nah 3 8 allusion is made to one of these events, though it is quite uncertain to which. In the days of Jeremiah (46 25) and of Ezekiel (30 14 ff.), it was still known as a populous city for which these prophets predicted final collapse. Its greatness passed away under the Ptolemies. Since then the site has been occupied only by a group of small villages on both sides of the Nile, which, however, abound in magnificent ruins, viz., Luxor, Karnak, and Medinet-habu. A. C. Z.

NOADIAH, nō″a-dai′ā (נוֹעַדְיָה, nō'adhyāh): 1. A Levite (Ezr 8 33). 2. A prophetess who opposed Nehemiah (Neh 6 14). E. E. N.

NOAH, nō′ā (נֹחַ, nōaḥ, Noe in the Gospels AV, 'rest,' but, according to the explanation of the Heb. writer, "comfort" in Gn 5 29): 1. The story of Noah is interwoven in that of the Flood (q.v.). The Noah (Sit Napišti) of the Babylonian flood-legend is immediately after the Flood glorified. Of this there is an echo in Gn 6 9 (cf. Gn 5 22). Noah is further said to have been the discoverer of the culture of the vine and of wine-making (Gn 9 20-29). 2. One of the daughters of Zelophehad (Nu 26 23; Jos 17 3). A. C. Z.

NOAH, APOCALYPSE OF: A lost apocalyptic writing, fragments of which have been incorporated in the Book of Enoch. The name and traditional character of Noah were, for obvious reasons, used by the apocalyptists in the same way as those of Enoch. But the nearness of the traditional dates of the two ancients and their similarity led to the merging of the Apocalypse of Noah into that of Enoch. That there was, however, a separate book bearing the name of Noah is attested by the Little Genesis or Book of Jubilees (10 13), in which the patriarch is explicitly said to have written such a book (cf. also Jub. 21 10). Accordingly, the only form in which the Apocalypse of Noah has been preserved is as a portion of the Ethiopic Enoch (chs. 60, 65–69 25, and 106, 107). This part of Enoch is more usually known under the name of Noachic Fragments. It bears unmistakable marks of having at one time existed in a separate form. Ch. 65, for instance, begins with Enoch as the speaker, but quite abruptly in ver. 5 the narrator appears to be Noah himself. In ch. 60 it is the 500th year that is cited as the starting-point; but Enoch was in his 365th year translated, and the Flood took place in the 500th year of Noah. These fragments can be put together into an approximate unity, but the complete reconstruction of the original book is, of course, not possible. They contain accounts of the Flood (chs. 60, 65–67 3), of the punishment of the sinful angels (67 4–69 25), and of the wonders accompanying the birth of Noah (chs. 106, 107). A. C. Z.

NOB, nob (נֹב, nōbh): A priestly city (I S 22 11, 19), the home of the descendants of Eli (I S 14 3, Ahijah =Ahimelech), with a sanctuary and ephod (21 1 ff.), perhaps founded after the destruction of Shiloh. David rested here in his flight from Saul at Gibeah, and later all the priests were slain by Doeg, at Saul's command, and the city destroyed. N. seems to have been between Gibeah and Adullam, where David hid himself (22 1). According to Neh 11 32 there was a Nob in Benjamin near Anathoth, and in Is 10 32 a place of the same name is mentioned which must have been on a hill immediately to the N. of Jerusalem. The same location would answer for the three references, although as yet no trace of a N. near Jerusalem has been found. Jerome mentions a Nûbe, near Lydda, the modern Bêt Nûbâ, 10 m. SE. of Lydda, but this place is too far N. and W. for the account in I S 21 ff. C. S. T.

NOBAH, nō′bā (נֹבַח, nōbhaḥ): I. The name of a Manassite clan which captured the town Kenath (the modern Ḳanawât), evidently on their NE. boundary, in the Hauran (I Ch 2 23) toward Aram. to which the clan gave its own name Nobah. II. 1. Nobah (Nu 32 42); see I. 2. A town on a road in Gilead, named with Jogbehah (Jg 8 11), perhaps the original home of the clan referred to in I, above. C. S. T.

NOBAI, nō′bai (נוֹבַי, nōbhay), in AV and RVmg. Nebai (the Q^e^re): One who sealed the covenant (Neh 10 19 [29]). C. S. T.

NOBLE: This term renders Heb. and Gr. words as follows: (1) 'addīr, 'mighty' (Jer 30 21, 'prince' RV; Nah 3 18); (2) gādhōl, 'great' (Jon 3 7); (3) ḥōr, 'free-born,' noble in the strict sense (I K 21 8; Ec 10 17, etc.); (4) yaqqīr, 'precious' (Ezr 4 10); (5) nāghīdh, 'leader' (Job 29 10); (6) nādhībh, 'liberal' (Nu 21 18; Ps 83 11), and (7) εὐγενής, 'well-born' (Ac 17 11; I Co 1 26). A. C. Z.

NOBLEMAN: The rendering of two Gr. words: (1) εὐγενής, 'well-born,' which is comparatively rare in the N T. In Lk 19 12 it may refer to Herod Antipas in his journey to Rome. In I Co 1 26 the word is used generically. (2) βασιλικός, which in Jn 4 46 is rendered "nobleman" and probably means an officer in the royal household. J. M. T.

NOD, nod (נוֹד, nōdh): The land of 'wandering' (cf. nādh, 'wanderer,' vs. 12, 14). It is represented as a land E. of Eden, in which Cain settled when he fled from the presence of J″ (Gn 4 16). C. S. T.

NODAB, nō′dab (נוֹדָב, nōdhābh): The name of a tribe mentioned with two Ishmaelite tribes E. of the Jordan, with whom Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh had war (I Ch 5 19). C. S. T.

NOE, nō′ę (Νῶε): The N T (Mt 24 37, etc. AV) form of the word 'Noah' (q.v.). E. E. N.

NOGAH, nō′gā (נֹגַהּ, nōgah): A son of David (I Ch 3 7, 14 6). E. E. N.

NOHAH, nō′hā (נֹחָה, nōḥāh), 'rest': The ancestral head of a Benjamite family or clan (I Ch 8 2). E. E. N.

This is the designation of that type of life in which the main source and means of support is the raising of herds of cattle or flocks of sheep and goats. Such a mode of life is purely pastoral when private ownership of land is recognized; but it becomes pastoral and at the same time nomadic when all land is held as common property and the pasturage and water needed by herd and flock are regarded free to the first comer in the same way as air, sunlight, and navigable waterways are viewed in modern civilization. It is thus that the shepherd community, finding the nourishment necessary for its flocks and herds exhausted in one region, moves to another, and a nomad life results ('nomad' = Gr. νομάς, from νέμειν, 'to graze'). The conditions for the development of this type of life are particularly favorable in the great inland territory of Arabia, which abounds in rocky plateaux and hill slopes, with a thin layer of soil ill adapted to purposes of cultivation, but yielding an annual crop of vegetation which can best be used as it stands as food for grazing animals. Thus from the earliest period the inhabitants of Arabia appear to have been nomads. In early history they made themselves felt as far as Egypt under the guise of an invading horde of shepherds, and for a time held the land under complete control (the dynasties of the Shepherd Kings, or Hyksos). The inhabitants of Arabia were for the most part a Semitic people, and Semitic tradition carries nomad life back to the very beginnings of the world's history. It represents Abel as a shepherd and ascribes the beginnings of migratory life to Jabal (Gn 4 20).

1. Origin and General Nature.

That the Israelites, after they had settled in Palestine, looked upon themselves as immigrants is shown by the very name they took to themselves. (See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, §§ 7 and 11, under Eber.) Abraham, though represented as leaving a city in Mesopotamia, spent his life in tents and was the owner of large flocks as well as the head of a roving tribe. Lot, Ishmael, Jacob, and Esau are also represented as heads of tribes wandering about the country with flocks and herds as their main possessions and means of subsistence. The standing and place of residence of the children of Israel in Egypt were fixed by the fact that they were shepherds, and in the transaction of locating them there lurks a suspicion that they might grow to be a public menace, due perhaps to the earlier experiences of the Egyptians with the Hyksos. Down to the days of the Exodus the Hebrews maintained their distinctive character, so that before Moses could assume the position of leader among them he needed to pass through a period of training as a shepherd under a nomad chief. The origin of a new nomadic tribe from an old one is illustrated in the story of the separation of Lot from Abraham (Gn ch. 12). As soon as the younger leader had gathered about him a band sufficiently large and capable of self-support and self-defense, questions of pasturage arose between his adherents and those of the older chief. Such differences might be settled amicably and fairly, as in the case of Abraham and Lot, or they might occasion bloody feuds and lasting animosities. In either case, the end would be the formation of new tribes parting from the old ones and seeking advantageous territories whereon to pitch their tents. Such tribes numbering from four to three hundred tents (families) are scattered over N. Arabia to-day. (See Cornill, Hist. of Israel, p. 36.)

2. The Hebrews Originally Nomads.

Palestine, in the larger definition of it as including Moab and the Negeb (S. of Judah), furnishes soil for the development of pastoral life unrivaled anywhere. But as it abounds also in tracts of land suited for agriculture, when Israel took possession of it, the nation ceased being a nomad people, engaged in agricultural pursuits, built villages and cities, and at the same time maintained flocks and herds as of old. The result was a civilization combining the features of both types of life, the settled agricultural and the nomadic pastoral. Arable lands everywhere were accepted as subject to private proprietorship; they were bought and sold, tilled and owned as in all settled communities. But large sections difficult or impossible to cultivate remained common territory. These were the hillsides and stony plateaux in the neighborhood of villages used in common by all the shepherds of the village in each case. The name "wilderness" is given such stretches of land down to the present day, but what is meant is simply a grassy, shrub-clad hillside or highland unimproved by cultivation. Though held and used by the men of a village in common, such pasture-lands are carefully distinguished from similar lands belonging to neighboring villages.

3. Pastoral Life After the Settlement.

The shepherd takes his name from the chief object of his care which is at the same time the chief item of his wealth, the sheep. This is, however, his chief, not his only possession. In fact, the Heb. and Gr. words (rō'eh, ποιμήν) go back to a more general conception of his character and represent him as a 'feeder' or 'tender' of pasturing animals. For besides sheep he keeps also goats and cattle (oxen, cows), and, in the purer nomadic condition, camels (Gn 12 16, 24 10 ff.; Job 1 3, 17, 42 12). The last-named, along with asses (Gn 34 5; I S 15 3; Job 1 3), served as beasts of burden, carrying the tents and other simple but necessary furnishings belonging to the tribe.

4. The Shepherd's Possessions.

Pasture-grounds, such as those described in § 3 above, are generally found adjoining gorges and ravines (wâdys). These with the rocky ridges that bound them are often irregular in their courses, sometimes converging and again diverging, crossing one another or abruptly lost in a maze of bewildering summits and depressions. The gorges are in the present day, for the most part, bare and rocky; but in ancient times they were more thickly wooded, a condition of things which furnished convenient lurking-places for the wolves, the jackals, the bears and, down to crusading days, also for the lions, which prowled about for stray members of flocks, and sometimes even attacked the flock and carried away a sheep or goat (cf. I S 17 34; Jer 5 6; Jn 10 12). From another quarter, the shepherd had to fear, as he does to-day, "the thief" who "cometh not, but that he may steal, and kill and destroy" (Jn 10 10). The "thief" of the present-day Palestinian pastoral life is the Bedawi, who regards the stealing of sheep an honorable pursuit. In the O T period it was the Amalekites, Midianites, etc., who gave the shepherd many an anxious hour.

6. The Shepherd's Means of Defense.

To protect his flocks and herds from these dangers, the shepherd provided a fold (cote) into which he gathered the sheep and goats. The fold differed according to the nature of the locality where it was to be used. If this was a level stretch, the fold was an enclosure surrounded by walls sufficiently high to prevent wolves and jackals from leaping over, and also surmounted with branches of thorny bushes to render climbing over them very difficult if not impossible. If, however, the locality was a hillside, a natural cave more usually served the purpose of a fold. Such is the case to-day with the cave of Pan at Cæsarea Philippi (Bāniās). Before the entrance to such a cave-fold was built a wall with a narrow door, and a guard-house commanding this door. In this guard-house the shepherds gathered by night and took turns in watching. As a general thing, for purposes of mutual protection and assistance, several shepherds combined to keep their flocks in the same fold (cf. the pl. in Lk 2 8, 15, 20). In the task of watching, the dog is to-day found to be of the greatest service. Because of his fidelity and capacity for training, this animal becomes a guardian, not only by detecting the presence of the prowling wolf and jackal, and giving warning through his prompt barking, but also by constraining the sheep and goats to take the path pointed out by the shepherd in cases in which, on account of large numbers, they miss the shepherd's own guidance. Dogs are also useful in searching for and rescuing straying members of the flock.

7. The Shepherd's Manner of Life.

The Eastern shepherd's day begins at early dawn. Its first activity is the calling of the sheep together. Each member of the flock has its name (Jn 10 3 ff.), commonly that of a flower or fruit, and each knows its name, or at least distinguishes the voice of its own shepherd from that of all others. As soon as the flock is gathered about him, the shepherd leads the way, the sheep and goats following him in file, with the dogs bringing up the rear. The shepherd himself is always armed with a long staff. When he has decided upon which patch of green herbage he will let his flock settle for the day, he leads the way to it, and the sheep dispose themselves about on the grass, while the goats climb the rocks in search of their own peculiar pasturage. At midday the shepherd guides his flock to some spring or well to water them; for unlike Europe and large portions of America, Palestine, by its dry and hot climate, makes it necessary to water pasturing animals regularly. After a season of rest following the watering, the flock is again led to the pasture-ground, and at night, with the same care and watchfulness for each individual, it is taken back to the fold. By this time some of the younger lambs may find it hard to keep up with the older and stronger sheep; these the shepherd carries in his arms, giving each one in turn some needed rest. This daily routine is interrupted only by the sheep-shearing (Gn 31 19, 38 13), which comes in the summer. At this season the shepherd gathers in his harvest of wool, one of the largest sources of his revenue. The occasion is accordingly celebrated with great festivities, which occur at the end of the shearing. Lambs and kids are slain and roasted night after night, and the whole village shares in the good things provided by its shepherd population (cf. II S 13 23 ff.). It is at this season that the freebooter, who has been of service in warding off attacks of thieves and marauders, can step in to claim some compensation for his informal and perhaps uninvited police protection during the year. Such was probably the ground on which David made his request for a gift from Nabal (I S 25 2 ff.).

8. Shepherd Life in Institutions and Literature.

No phase of life has left an impress on the ideas, institutions, modes of expression, and literary productions of the Hebrews deeper than that of the pastoral. The traces of its influence are found in the provisions of the Mosaic legislation (Ex 22 1, 30; Dt 7 13, 15 19, 28 4, 18, 31, 51), which was drawn up upon the assumption that the care of flocks and herds was a large and important part of the people's employment. The relation of the shepherd to the sheep served to bring to the consciousness of the Israelite the nature of the relation held by all leaders to the people led by them. The prophets never tire of reminding kings, priests, and princes of their duties by means of this comparison (Jer 23 4, 25 34 ff.; Ezk 34 2, 5, 8 ff.; Zec 10 2 f., 11 3, 5, 8, 15 f., 13 7). The incidents of the shepherd's daily experience furnish some of the most picturesque imagery of the Psalter (cf. Pss 23, 80; also Pss 44 11, 49 14, 78 52, 79 13, 95 7, 100 3) as well as the ground of some of the most touching prophetic appeals (Jer 50 6; Is 40 11; Ezk 34 6, 11 f.; Zec 13 7). The comparison of human beings to sheep was also used by Jesus Himself in His teaching (Mt 7 15, 12 11 f., 25 32 f.) and with most telling effect in His parables (Lk 15 4; Jn 10 2 ff.). Finally, the redemptive work of Christ, both on its passive and its active sides (Ac 8 32), was expressed in the ascription to Him of the title of "Shepherd" by His first disciples (I P 2 25, 5 4; He 13 20), and in this they were but voicing again His own claim (Jn ch. 10).

NOON, NOONDAY: Besides denoting a part of the day (see TIME, § 1), this word is also used in a metaphorical sense to designate a condition which affords extreme openness in conduct (boldness, Jer 6 4, 13 8), or clearness in vision (Job 5 14, 11 17).

NORTH. See EAST.

NORTH COUNTRY, THE (אֶרֶץ צָפוֹן, 'erets tsāphōn): A designation, used by the prophets, of the quarter from which invaders were to come, also from which the exiles would return, in some passages translated "land of the N." (Jer 16 15; Zec 2 6). At times, tsāphōn, "north," is used by itself with the same meaning (Jer 1 14 f., 25 26). It designates Assyria (Is 14 31; cf. Zeph 2 13); Babylonia (Jer 6 1, 15 12, 46 20, 24, 47 2; Ezk 26 7); various lands (Jer 1 13 f., 4 6, 10 22, 13 20, 25 9, 26); the quarter from which Cyrus would march against Babylon (Is 41 25; cf. Jer 50 3, 9, 41, 51 48); Babylon (Zec 2 6, 6 6, 8); various countries from which the exiles would return (Jer 3 18, 16 15, 23 8, 31 8; cf. Is 43 6, 49 12). The expression "king of the north" in Dn 11 6 ff. denotes successive kings of the Græco-Syrian kingdom of Antioch. C. S. T.

NOSE, NOSTRILS: (1) The Heb. 'aph, 'nose,' is used sometimes in the O T with a meaning other than its simple and literal one. (a) By synecdoche the "nostrils" are viewed as the seat of the "breath of life" (Gn 2 7, 7 22, etc.). (b) Anthropomorphically, the "blast" of God's "nostrils" is spoken of when the destructive wind or other nature forces, as His agents, are meant (Ex 15 8; Ps 18 8, 15, etc.). The expression in Ezk 8 17, "they put the branch to their nose," is obscure, but appears to refer to some foreign mode of worship condemned by the prophet. In Ezk 23 25, "take away thy nose," etc., refers to the mutilation of captives in war. (2) nāḥār, 'snorting,' is rendered "nostrils" (Job 39 20 AV, "snorting" RV), but its derivative neḥīrīm is properly rendered "nostrils" in Job 41 20. E. E. N.

NOSE JEWEL. See Dress and Ornaments, § II, 2.

NOVICE (νεόφυτος, 'newly planted'): Used in I Ti 3 6 in the sense of 'lately converted' and, therefore, inexperienced. In later times the word became a technical term ('neophyte') for new converts. E. E. N.

NUMBERS, BOOK OF: The fourth book of the Pentateuch, which carries on the history of Israel in the wilderness from the second to the fortieth year of the Exodus. In structure it resembles Gn and Ex (see Hexateuch, § 7), the same sources, JE and P, reappearing in it, and being continued to the close. P, as elsewhere, comprises chiefly statistical and legal matter; the bright, picturesque narratives belong to JE.

1. Composite Character.

(I) The section 1 1–10 28. The book begins with a long extract from P (1 1–10 28), the leading topics of which are the numbers and disposition of the tribes, both in the camp and on the march, and the duties of the Levites. Ch. 1 gives a census of the tribes, with the exception of that of Levi (whose numbers follow in ch. 3). The number of males above twenty years old is stated to have been 603,550. Ch. 2 describes the position of the tribes in the camp, and their order on the march. Chs. 3 and 4 state the number of the Levites (22,000 above one month old, 8,580 between thirty and fifty years of age), their position in the center of the camp about the Tent of Meeting, and their duties in connection with it. Chs. 5 and 6 contain laws on different subjects—the exclusion of the unclean (5 1-4), certain priestly dues (5 5-10, supplementary to Lv 6 1-7), the ordeal prescribed for the woman suspected by her husband of unfaithfulness (5 11-31), the obligations of the Nazirite vow (6 1-21), ending with the beautiful formula of priestly benediction (6 22-27). Ch. 7 describes, with unusual circumstantiality of detail, the offerings of the twelve princes of the tribes, at the consecration of the Tent of Meeting and the Altar. Ch. 8 is again a collection of laws—on the arrangement of the lamps upon the golden candlestick (8 1-4), the consecration of the Levites to their duties (8 5-22, connecting with 3 5-13), and the period of their service (8 23-26). Ch. 9 1-14 enjoins the celebration of the Passover of the second year, and lays down regulations for the observance, in certain cases, of a supplementary Passover. Ch. 9 15-23 describes the signals given by the cloud for the marching and the halting of the camp. Ch. 10 1-10 directs two silver trumpets to be made, to be used for starting the camps, and on certain other occasions. Ch. 10 11-28 narrates the departure of Israel from Sinai, and the order of their camps on the march.

2. Contents.

(II) The section 10 29–25. With 10 29 the narrative of JE is resumed (from Ex 34 28). In 10 29-32 Hobab is urged by Moses to act as the Israelites' guide through the wilderness. Ch. 10 33-34 describes the functions of the Ark in directing the stages of their march. In 10 35-36 there is preserved to us what must have been originally the old war-prayer, with which the Ark was taken out to, and brought back from, battle. Chs. 11 and 12 narrate the murmurings of the people at Kibroth-hattaavah, the appointment of seventy elders to assist Moses, the sending of quails to satisfy the people's hunger, the vindication of Moses' prophetic dignity, and the leprosy of Miriam. Chs. 13 and 14 contain the narrative of the spies sent out from Kadesh to explore and report upon the land. This narrative is composite, 13 17b-20, 22-24, 26b-31, 32b, 33, 14 1 (partly), 3 f., 8 f., 11-25, 31-33, 39-45 belonging to JE, and the rest to P. The two accounts differ in representation. In JE the spies go only as far as Hebron, in the S. of Judah (13 22-24); in P they go to the far N. of Canaan (13 21); in JE the land is fertile, but one which the Israelites are unable to conquer (13 27-31); in P it is a barren land (13 32); in JE Caleb is the only faithful spy, permitted afterward to enter Canaan (13 30, 14 24); P couples Joshua with him (14 6, 30, 38). Ch. 15 contains chiefly laws from P, 15 1-16 on the meal- and drink-offerings, 15 17-21 on the annual offering of a cake of the first dough, 15 22-31 on the sin-offering, to be offered for accidental dereliction of duty, 15 32-36 an account of the punishment of a Sabbath-breaker, 15 37-41 on the tassels (RVmg.) to be the distinguishing mark of the Israelite. Chs. 16 and 17, on the rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, is another composite narrative, the different strands of which vary materially in representation. (1) JE (16 1b-2a, 12-15, 25-26, 27b-34) describes a rebellion of laymen (Dathan, Abiram, and Reubenites) against the civil authority of Moses; (2) the main narrative of P (16 1a, 2b-7a, 18-24, 27a, 32b, 35) describes a rebellion of the people at large, headed by Korah, against the exclusive priestly rights of the tribe of Levi, as a whole, and the subsequent confirmation of the rights of the tribe (16 41-50, 17); (3) a secondary stratum of P (16 7b-11, 16-17, 36-40) describes a rebellion of Levites, under the leadership of Korah, against the exclusive priestly rights of the family of Aaron. Sections (2) and (3) thus differ, in that in (2) there is no trace of opposition between the priests and the ordinary Levites, while in (3) this opposition is strongly marked (so Nu chs. 3, 4, 8, 18 1-7). Ch. 18 (P) defines the duties and revenues of the priests and Levites; ch. 19 (also P) prescribes the ritual of purification, after defilement by a corpse, by means of water mingled with the ashes of a red heifer. Chs. 20–22 (P and JE) describe Israel's journey from Kadesh to the Steppes of Moab, on the E. of Jordan, with incidents of the way (e.g., the death of Miriam and Aaron, the brazen serpent, etc.). Notice here the ancient poetical fragments cited as historical authorities, 21 14 f. from the "Book of the Wars of Jehovah," 21 17 f. the Song of the Well, and the poem of the Ballad-singers (21 27-30). Chs. 22 2–24 give the history of Balaam (JE). The poems in chs. 23, 24, describing partly the splendid destiny in store for Israel, partly the fate reserved for some of its neighbors, are to be regarded as composed not by Balaam himself, but by a later hand, and placed in his mouth for the purpose of giving expression to thoughts deemed suitable to his position; 24 17-19 seem clearly to allude to the conquests of David. Ch. 25 (JE, 25 1-5; P, 25 6-18) records how the Israelites were seduced at Shittim into idolatry and immorality, and how the zeal of Phinehas was rewarded with the promise of the permanence of the priesthood in his family.

(III) The section 26–36. Chs. 26–31 all belong to P. Ch. 26 describes the second census of Israel (cf. chs. 1 and 2) during the wanderings; the sum total of males (from twenty years old) is given at 601,730, besides the Levites (from one month old), 23,000. Ch. 27 1-11 contains the law of inheritance of daughters. In 27 12-23 Moses is commanded to view Canaan before his death, and Joshua is instituted as his successor. Chs. 28 and 29 are a priestly calendar, prescribing the public sacrifices to be offered at every sacred season. Ch. 30 relates to vows, defining the conditions under which a vow was to be binding. Ch. 31 describes how, in accordance with 25 16-18, a war of extermination was successfully undertaken against Midian. The narrative contains much that is both historically improbable and morally repugnant. It is, in reality, not history, but Midrash, a story written with a religious purpose. No doubt there was a war of Israel against Midian; but the details handed down by tradition have been elaborated by the compiler into an ideal picture of the manner in which, as he conceived, a sacred war must have been conducted with the collateral aim of establishing the rule of the distribution of booty taken in war (31 25-30)—a rule which is elsewhere (I S 30 24-25) referred to David. That the Midianites were not in reality exterminated is shown by the fact that they afterward invaded Israel in large numbers (Jg chs. 6–8).

In ch. 32 (P and JE) Moses allots the land E. of Jordan to Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, on condition that they help the other tribes to conquer the territory W of Jordan. The closing chapters (33–36) are all from P Ch. 33 contains P's itinerary of the journeyings of the Israelites from Rameses to the Steppes of Moab. Ch. 34 defines the borders of Canaan (vs. 1-15), and nominates the tribal leaders who are to assist Joshua and Eleazar in the division of the land (vs. 16-29). In ch. 35 forty-eight cities are appointed for the residence of the Levites (vs. 1-8); six of these are to be, in addition, cities of refuge for the manslayer, and regulations for their use are laid down. Ch. 36 (supplementary to 27 6-11) provides that heiresses possessing landed property are to marry into their own tribe, in order to preserve the inheritance of each tribe intact.

3. Characteristics and Historical Value.

The most attractive parts of the book are those belonging to JE. Here Moses is brought before us, "in his solitary grandeur, patient strength, and heroic faith; steadfast amid jealousy, suspicion, and rebellion, and indicated by God Himself (12 8) as a prophet of transcendent privilege and power" (McFadyen, Introd., p. 45). Every reader will remember his noble prayer (11 29), that God would make all the people prophets, and put His spirit upon them all. The beautiful poems of Balaam are instinct with a high sense of Israel's national destiny. The poetical fragments preserved in ch. 21 introduce us to an interesting type of popular Hebrew poetry. In P the laws of ordeal in case of suspected adultery (ch. 5), of the Nazirite (ch. 6), and of lustration by the ashes of a red heifer (ch. 19) preserve archaic elements, with analogies in the institutions of many other primitive peoples, which have been assimilated to the religion of Israel, and appear here in the form and character which they finally assumed. In the historical sections of P there is a large artificial element, especially in chs. 1–10, where the numbers are in many cases historically impossible, and the general picture is at variance with that of JE, as well as with the data afforded by the subsequent history. The simpler nucleus, supplied by tradition, has been elaborated by the writer into an ideal picture of the organization which it was supposed that a sacred nation, marching through the wilderness, with its God in the midst of it, must have exhibited. In chs. 34 and 35 (the borders of the land, and the Levitical cities), also, there is much that is ideal; on ch. 31 (the war against Midian), see the remarks above.

9. Interpretation: Gematria

The method of counting among the Hebrews, as far back as it can be traced, was the common decimal system. The language contains names for nine units and the number ten, with compounds. The ten fingers of the two hands are believed to have furnished the starting-point and standard for the system.

1. Method of Counting. In the earliest period the writing of the numbers was that of spelling out in full. This is shown in the Moabite Stone and in the Siloam Inscription, and is the common practise of the O T. It was not until the post-exilic period that the necessity arose for the adoption of special abbreviated written signs for the numbers. In fact, the earliest traces of the use of such signs occur on Maccabæan coins, and consist of the letters of the alphabet. There is no evidence that the Hebrews ever invented, or adopted, a special system, such as was used by the Phœnicians (Schroeder, Phoeniz. Sprache, pp. 186–189, and Merx, Gram. Syr., table to p. 17). But the significance for subsequent generations of the introduction of numerals was very great. While, on the one hand, the processes of arithmetic were largely facilitated, and the convenience of the system led to a great development in the science of computation, on the other, in the written records confusion of numbers became very easy and common. There is no part of the documents transmitted by copying so much subject to corruption as the record of numbers.

2. The Writing of Numbers.

The Hebrews looked upon statistics somewhat as the other nations of the Orient. They occasionally took a census (Nu 1 2; Ezr 8 1; Neh 7 7). But there are indications also that they entertained superstitious thoughts about such enumerations (II S 24 2 ff.); and, upon the whole, it does not seem likely that in estimating and reporting numbers they tried to be very precise. On the contrary, the evidence is strong that figures, wherever given, except the smallest, were meant as general, or round, numbers, which for practical purposes within definite limits, varying with different individuals and peoples, seemed to produce quite adequate impressions, and were more convenient for use.

3. Approximation in Numbers.

But in addition to such convenience of approximation, among the Hebrews a distinction was drawn between some numbers regarded as sacred and others regarded as profane. Thus there arose a somewhat peculiar method of usage involving extensive and elaborate symbolism. In other words numbers were made to convey not only the ideas of arithmetic, but certain mystic significations.

4. Sacredness of Numbers.

The practical effect of the foregoing principles is such an interplay of ideas as to render all generalization on the subject untrustworthy. No rule can be laid down as to what should be regarded as precise, what approximate, and what sacred or symbolical numbers. And yet the absence of such a general rule does not preclude the recognition of the difference. In Gn 30 36 Jacob sets a three days' journey between himself and Laban (cf. Gn 42 17; I K 12 5, etc.). Here the number 3 can not have a religious or sacred significance; but in Nu 6 24-26, with the threefold repetition of the Divine name in the benediction, and in Is 6 3, with the threefold occurrence of the term "Holy," and in other similar instances, the number 3 must be viewed as somehow connected with the sacredness of the subject.

5. Difficulty in Interpreting Numbers.

Approximate, or round, numbers are more naturally apt to appear in the region of large figures. Such are 1,000 and 100. Both of these are found in the same connection in Lv 26 8 (cf. also Pr 17 10; Ec 6 3, 8 12; Mt 18 12; Dt 1 11, 32 30; I S 18 7; Is 30 17). In most of these cases, in addition to the approximation, there is an accessory design to enhance the impression by hyperbolical statement. This is all the more present when the number used is larger than 1,000, as in Dt 32 30, or in I Co 4 15, 14 19, and in Rev 5 11.

6. Approximation and Hyperbole Combined.

The symbolical, or sacred, numbers are 3, 4, 7, 10, 12, 40, 70, and their multiples. The right of 3 to appear in this list has been called in question. In the O T, taken by itself, the sacredness of 3 does not appear clearly. The case of the three choices given David (II S 24 13), the threefold prostration of Elijah on the dead child (I K 17 21), and the three daily prayers of Daniel (Dn 6 10) are not convincing. Those already cited (§ 5, above) from Nu 6 22-24 and Is 6 3 are more to the point. But if Babylonian influence be admitted, the sacredness of this number must be regarded as well established. Among the Babylonians the triad was the favorite sacred group. The primary gods of the pantheon were three (Anu, Bel, and Ea); they represent the three parts of the universe, heaven, earth, and the abyss. Moreover, the number 3 is the smallest of those that can not be divided into equal integers, and, as confronting one in so many common aspects of nature and life, would naturally assume a symbolical value. The number 4 early became a symbol of completeness. It is undoubtedly based upon the four directions which stand open to one, i.e., the right hand, the left hand, before and behind. From these, in the second place, arises the recognition of the four points of the compass ("four corners of the earth," Is 11 12, 45 5; Ex 7 2). But each of these corresponds to a wind (Jer 49 36). There are, therefore, four winds of heaven (Ezk 37 9; Rev 7 1). There are also four great rivers (Gn 2 10), and four is at the basis of the architectural plans of the Temple (cf. TEMPLE). Accordingly, in apocalyptic writings 4 is of frequent occurrence. There are four world kingdoms (Dn 7 3, 6, 17), four horns and four chariots in Zechariah's vision (Zec 1 18, 6 1), four living creatures, and four angels of destruction (Rev 4 6, 9 13-15). The number 5 is significant only as the half of a perfect number (Lv 5 16). The same is true of 6, which, however, derives its importance not so much from its being one-half of 12, but because of its nearness to 7. In the seven-day period of creation, the six days' work must be completed before the seventh day of rest, in order to make the perfect cycle (cf. Jos 6 3, 4, capture of Jericho). The significance of 7 has been variously derived, either from (1) its being reached by adding 4 and 3, (2) from the division of the lunar month into four seven-day sections (weeks), according to the phases of the moon, (3) from the fact that seven planets were recognized in the earliest Babylonian observation of the sky, or (4) from its combining two triads and a unit. Of these explanations the most probable, as far as Biblical usage is concerned, is the astronomical one (3), which was certainly widely diffused in Egypt and Mesopotamia. The Amarna tablets indicate that a sacred number was recognized among the Semitic peoples who had dealings with one another. Among the Hebrews 7 became the sacred number par excellence. The sacred times of the calendar were based upon it. Besides the weekly Sabbath, the seventh month, the Sabbatical year, the Jubilee year were determined by it. In other sacred relations it appears as the number of the priests who blew the horn at the siege of Jericho, in the number of days required for the capture of that city (Jos 6 4), the number of sacred locks (Jg 16 13-19), the frequent seven-day periods taken for deliberation or preparation (I S 10 8, 11 3, 13 8; I K 18 43; Ezk 3 15 f.), the seven pillars of Wisdom (Pr 9 1), the seven princes of Persia (Est 1 14), etc. In some of the above-named uses the symbolic value of 7 may have either suppressed its numerical value or been combined with it. The following, however, are select instances of predominant stress on the symbolical aspect: The number of times that Jacob bowed before Esau (Gn 33 3), the number of women who shall take hold of one man (Is 4 1), the number of unclean spirits taking possession of the cleansed heart (Mt 12 45), and the number of times that the disciple must forgive his offending brother (Mt 18 21, 23). The half of 7 ($3\frac{1}{2}$) has likewise a similar sacred significance (Dn 7 25, 12 7), of which the Apocalypse furnishes other instances (Rev 12 14; cf. also 1,260 days [$=3\frac{1}{2}$ years], 11 3, 12 6, and 42 [$=6 \times 7$] months, 11 2, 13 5). The number 10, as the highest of the series of units and at the same time the first of the second series, or, in other words, as the basis of the whole decimal system, could not but be vested with sacredness. Whether, as has been suggested, it acquired additional regard because it is the sum of 7 and 3 is doubtful. Like 7, it is used as both a round number and a sacred number, and in some of its uses, approximation and symbolic value are mingled, whereas in others either appears without the other. In Gn 24 10, 22, for instance, it is a round number (cf. also Jos 22 14; Jg 17 10, etc.). But in the Decalogue and in the decades of generations in Gn, in the parables of the Talents and of the Virgins (Mt 25 1; Lk 19 17), and in the apocalyptic usage (Dn 7 7; Rev 13 1), the notion of completeness is more clearly present. But its sacredness is most fully brought into view in the tithe system and its correlative ritual (Nu 18 24 ff.; Dt 14 22 f.; Neh 10 37 f.; cf. Nu ch. 7). The significance of 12 may be traced to the Sumerian subdivision of the year into as many months, or revolutions of the moon. Twelve also happens to be the product of 3 and 4; but, as in the case of 7, it is doubtful whether this fact has much to do with its sacredness. The tribes of Israel and of Ishmael (Gn 17 20, 30 22) were 12. That there was in this number something more than the fact of twelve patriarchs, the sons of Jacob (or of Ishmael), is manifest from the effort to maintain the number, in spite of natural defections from or additions to it. When one tribe (Levi) was withdrawn, another was artificially created by subdivision (Joseph into Ephraim and Manasseh). The same is true in the N T with the number of the Apostles. Twelve is doubled in Rev 4 4, 5 8, 11 16, probably by the addition of the number of the Apostles to that of the tribes. Multiples of 4 and 10, forty, and 7 and 10, seventy, naturally follow the significance of their components. Forty plays an important part in the chronology of the period of Judges and perhaps of the early monarchy. It is evidently used as a unit equivalent to a generation (Jg 3 11, 30, 5 31; cf. CHRONOLOGY OF O T). The duration of the wandering in the wilderness (Nu 14 33 f.) and the three periods of the life of Moses are also reckoned as 40 each. Seventy was the number of the elders of Israel (Ex 24 1), of the persons in the household of Jacob at the time of the removal to Egypt (Gn 46 27), of the duration of the Exile (Jer 25 11 f., 29 10), and of the "year-weeks" of Daniel (9 2, 24).

8. Multiples of Sacred Numbers. Multiples of 12 occur with the same regular meanings of approximation and sacredness in the twenty-four courses of the priesthood (I Ch ch. 24), the forty-eight Levitical cities (Nu 11 24), and the $12 \times 12 \times 1{,}000$ of the redeemed in Rev 11 5.

9. Interpretation: Gematria. This symbolical use of numbers gave rise in the later rabbinical age to the theory that all numbers are full of secret meanings, being the archetypes of the ideas of God in the creation of the world and, therefore, the molding principles of the universe (Philo, De Leg. Alleg. I, 4; II, 1; De Mund. Opif. 3, 17, 31). But, if this were true, then the converse of it must also be true, i.e., that each object has its fundamental number, and that the names of objects conceal in the numerical value of their letters the ideal nature of the objects themselves. Thus suggestions as to further mysteries in nature and religion were discovered in the numerical values of all words in the sacred text. This conception led to the building up of a system of rules by which these suggestions might be followed. Words were transmuted into numbers, and numbers back into other words, and the secrets supposed to be concealed in the text of the O T were laid bare. The system, from its mathematical basis, was called gematria (a corruption of γεωμετρία). The only clear case of gematria in the N T is to be found in Rev 13 18. The number of the Beast is here given as 666. From the context it appears very clearly that it was intended to be recognized as the name of a definite person by the inner circle of the readers of the book. At the same time, outsiders were to be left in the dark as to his identity. The innumerable interpretations attempted of the passage may, therefore, be sifted and reduced to a very small number by the exclusion of those that ignore this fundamental assumption. A. C. Z.

NUN, nun (נוּן, nūn): A man of the tribe of Ephraim, the father of Joshua (Ex 33 11; Nu 11 28, etc.), always "Nun" except in I Ch 7 27, where the Heb. has nōn, "Non" AV, which should probably be read, as in RV, "Nun." C. S. T.

NURSE, NURSING: The translation of two Heb. roots: (1) yānaq, 'suckle.' The fem. Hiphil ptcpl., mēneqeth means a 'wet-nurse' (Ex 2 7; Is 49 23, figuratively), and also a caretaker for a weaned child (II K 11 2; II Ch 22 11). Such a one often remained as a special servant to the mature woman (Gn 24 59, 35 8). Usually, mothers suckled their own children (Gn 21 7; I S 1 22 f.), but on occasion and in the wealthy and noble families a wet-nurse was employed (Ex 2 7 ff.). The Hebrew child, as are children in the East to-day, was suckled for two years (I S 1 22 f.), and the weaning was celebrated by a feast (Gn 21 8). (2) 'āman, 'support.' The fem. ptcpl. ō'meneth means a female caretaker in charge of children (Ru 4 16; II S 4 4). The masc. ptcpl. 'ōmēn means a foster-parent (Nu 11 12; cf. the figurative use in Is 49 23). King Ahab entrusted his five sons to such guardians (II K 10 1, 5, where the same word is translated "they that brought them up"). C. S. T.

NYMPHAS, nim'fas (Νύμφας): If the variant reading (Νύμφα), which has good direct textual support and is confirmed indirectly by MSS. having αὐτῆς in the same verse, be correct, N. was a Christian woman living in Laodicea (Col 4 15), whose house was used as a gathering-place for Christians (cf. Ro 16 3, 15). Perhaps she is especially mentioned here because the Colossian Epistle was to be read in her house (Col 4 16). J. M. T.

OAK. See PALESTINE, § 21, and SEMITIC RELIGION, § 38.

OAR. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

OATH: In its simplest form, the oath is an invocation of the omniscient God to witness the honesty of one's motives and intentions. Among the Hebrews, however, two varieties of it were in use, one of which was reserved for cases of greater solemnity. The simpler and more common of the two was called shᵉbhūa', 'swearing'; the more solemn 'ālāh, a 'self-invoked curse.' These appear in the N T as ὅρκος and ἀνάθεμα (Mt 26 72). The oath was taken in a formal way, although one of several forms might be chosen, such as "Jehovah is a witness between me and between thee forever" (I S 20 23, similar to Paul's asseveration in II Co 1 23; Ph 1 8; Gal 1 20), or "God do so to me and more also" (I S 14 44; II S 3 35), or "As Jehovah liveth" (I S 14 39, 19 6; for other forms cf. I S 3 17, 25 22; II S 15 21). In addition to the words of the oath, certain symbolical acts were performed for the sake of greater impressiveness. The simplest of these was the raising of both hands toward heaven (Gn 14 22), or only of the right hand (Dt 32 40). In exceptional cases the hand might be placed under the thigh of the person imposing the oath (Gn 24 2, 47 29), as a sign of regard for the mystery of generation, whose source was God. A more elaborate ceremony consisted in the division of a sacrificial victim, and the act of walking between the parts (Gn 15 10, 17; Jer 34 18). When an oath was imposed by another, the simple formula "Amen, Amen" on the part of the taker was sufficient (Dt 27 15-26). Judicial abjurations are mentioned in I K 8 31; Mt 26 63. In later times, instead of God, things associated with His person or service were invoked, such as heaven, Jerusalem, the Holy City, the sun, the earth, the Temple (cf. Dalman, Words of Jesus, I, 168). The abuse of oaths reached such a pass that Jesus expressed Himself sweepingly against all oaths, presumably, however, with a view of correcting the abuse (Mt 5 34). OBADIAH, ō"ba-dai'ā (עֹבַדְיָה[הוּ], 'ōbhadhyā[hū]), 'servant of J"': 1. The author of the short prophecy which bears the name of Obadiah. 2. The governor of Ahab's house, described as a God-fearing man (I K 18 3 ff.). 3. A son of Azel, of the family of Saul (I Ch 8 38). 4. A son of Izrahiah of Issachar (I Ch 7 3). 5. A Gadite who joined David at Ziklag (I Ch 12 9). 6. The father of Ishmaiah (I Ch 27 19). 7. A son of Hananiah and grandson of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 21). 8. A Merarite Levite (II Ch 34 12). 9. A son of Shemaiah of Jeduthun (I Ch 9 16; but in Neh 11 17 "Abda"). 10. An officer under Jehoshaphat (II Ch 17 7). 11. A son of Jehiel (Ezr 8 9). 12. One who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10 5). 13. The head of a family of doorkeepers (Neh 12 25). A. C. Z.

1. The Prophet. The author of this book gives even less information about himself than is customary with the others of his class. In fact, with the exception of his name, we know nothing of him save what we may indirectly gather from his writing. Josephus does, indeed, identify him with Obadiah, the governor under Ahab (I K 18 3 f.); but this is entirely inconsistent with the data reflected in the book regarding the setting in which it was produced.

2. Contents of the Book. The subject of the book is the doom of Edom. Evidently some great calamity in the form of an invasion had visited the country. The people, who were trusting in the alleged impregnable rocky fastnesses of their land (vs. 1-4), had been forced out of their homes; their towns had been plundered and thoroughly stripped of all that was of value (vs. 5, 6); and this had been done by those in whom they had reposed confidence as confederates. The prophet sees in the visitation the power of J" as a moving and directing cause (vs. 7-9). Moreover, the ground for the calamity was the unbrotherly treatment of Judah by Edom, after the siege of Jerusalem (vs. 10-14). The God of Israel was to visit a day of vengeance upon all the nations

(vs. 15, 16), lay Edom low, exalt Israel, restore the exiled to their home-land, and establish His kingdom among them (vs. 17-21).

3. Dates. In determining the date of the production, two facts afford help: First, the allusion in vs. 11, 12 to the capture of Jerusalem. This can be no other than that by Nebuchadrezzar in 586 B.C. For in this distress of Judah Edom gave its sympathy and applause to Babylon (Ps 137 7). Obadiah must then have uttered his words after 586. But, secondly, the relation of vs. 1-9 to the oracle of Jeremiah 49 7-22, while offering a puzzling complication, throws light on the literary relationships of the book. The similarity of these two passages is such as to preclude its being a mere coincidence. There would be no difficulty in the case if Obadiah could be assumed to have used the words of Jeremiah. For the date of the latter's oracle is given as 605 B.C. (46 2); but the unity and movement of Obadiah's thought and the general nature of the resemblance in the two passages point rather to Jeremiah's dependence on the minor prophet. This would raise the date of Obadiah to 605 or earlier—a result that does not harmonize with what has been said of the allusion to the capture of Jerusalem. The obvious solution of the difficulty must then be, either that both Obadiah and Jeremiah have made use of an older anonymous oracle, or that the text of Jeremiah has been amended later by the incorporation of Obadiah's words. But, if the allusion to the capture of Jerusalem gives the earliest date possible for Obadiah, opinions have differed greatly as to the latest. Some have fixed it as after the Return (circa 432 B.C., Nowack), and even as late as 312 (Hitzig). The question hinges on who the invaders of Edom were whose destructive work furnished Obadiah with the occasion for his prophetic discourse. Wellhausen is probably right in answering that they were Arab nomads. On the whole, 500 B.C. is the best latest limit for the ministry of Obadiah, and the book was probably written not much earlier than that date. Cf. Nowack in Hand Kommentar; G. A. Smith in Expositors' Bible; Horton in The New Century Bible. A. C. Z.

OBAL, ō′bal. See EBAL.

OBED, ō′bed (עוֹבֵד, 'ōbhēdh,' Ἰωβήδ, Ἰωβήλ), 'worshiper': 1. The son of Ruth and Boaz (Ru 4 17) and father of Jesse, the father of David (Ru 4 21 f.; I Ch 2 12; Mt 1 5; Lk 3 32). 2. A Jerahmeelite (I Ch 2 37 f.). 3. One of "the mighty men of the armies" (I Ch 11 47). 4. A son of Shemaiah and grandson of Obed-edom, of the Korahite family (I Ch 26 7). 5. The father of Azariah, a captain of a hundred, who aided Jehoiada against Queen Athaliah in setting Joash on the throne (II Ch 23 1). C. S. T.

OBED-EDOM, ō′bed-ē′dom (עֹבֵד אֱדֹם, 'ōbēdh 'ĕdhōm), 'worshiper of [god] Edom': 1. A Philistine of Gath, dwelling near Jerusalem. David left the Ark in his house for three months before he carried it to Jerusalem (II S 6 10 f. = I Ch 13 13 f., 15 25). 2. The ancestor of a family of doorkeepers (I Ch 15 18 ff., 16 38, 26 4 ff.; II Ch 25 24), perhaps the same as the preceding. 3. A family of singers in post-exilic times (I Ch 15 21, 16 5). C. S. T.

OBEISANCE (שָׁחָה, shāḥāh), 'to bow down,' 'prostrate oneself': This term was used especially of the act of homage before a monarch or superior, often with a descriptive clause, "bowed with his face to the earth" (I S 24 8 [9]), "bowed the head" (Gn 43 28), "fell on her face to the ground" (II S 14 4). RV has "did obeisance" (II S 9 6; I K 1 31) for "reverence" AV, and (I S 24 8; II S 14 22; I K 1 53) "bowed himself" and "do obeisance" for "humbly beseech thee" AV (II S 16 4). In many other passages "bow down" or some similar expression is used. In relation to a god it means 'worship.' C. S. T.

OBIL, ō′bil (עוֹבִיל, 'ōbhīl), 'camel-driver': The overseer of David's camels (I Ch 27 30). E. E. N.

OBLATIONS. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 17.

OBOTH, ō′beth (אֹבֹת, 'ōbhōth): A station on the journey from Kadesh-barnea to the plains of Moab, probably near the SE. boundary of Moab (Nu 21 10 f., 33 43 f.). E. E. N.

OBSERVING OF TIMES, Etc. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 3.

ODED, ō′ded (עֹדֵד, 'ōdhēdh): 1. Father of the prophet Azariah (II Ch 15 1, 8). 2. A prophet in Samaria (II Ch 28 9). E. E. N.

ODOR. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 15.

OFFEND, OFFENDER, OFFENSE: The English word offend means literally 'to strike against,' as an obstacle in the way, and is thus closely related to 'stumble.' The word is now used almost exclusively of injury or displeasure caused to one's personal feelings, but when the AV was made, the more objective senses of 'doing wrong to,' 'sinning against,' 'causing to go wrong' were conveyed by the word. Consequently, the RV has changed the AV renderings "offense" and "offend" in many cases in which they no longer adequately convey the sense of the original, although it has inconsistently retained them in not a few instances. These words render the following Heb. and Gr. terms: (1) ḥāṭā', 'to miss [the mark],' commonly rendered "to sin" (Gn 40 1; II K 18 14; Is 29 21; Gn 20 9 and Jer 37 18, "sinned" RV), and its derivatives ḥēṭ', 'sin' (Ec 10 14), and ḥaṭṭā', 'sinner' (I K 1 21). (2) mikhshōl (from kāshal, 'to stumble'), 'obstacle' (I S 25 31; Is 8 14, where J" Himself is spoken of as a "rock which is an obstacle [in the way]," a passage which is applied to Christ by Paul, Ro 9 33, and by Peter, I P 2 8; Ps 119 165, "occasion of stumbling" RV). (3) 'āsham, 'to be guilty' (Ezk 25 12; Hos 4 15, 5 15, 13 1; Jer 2 3, 50 7 and Hab 1 11, "guilty" RV), and 'ashmāh, 'guilt' (II Ch 28 13, "trespass" RV). (4) bāgadh, 'to deceive' (Ps 73 15, "dealt treacherously" RV). (5) pāsha', 'to rebel' (Pr 18 19). (6) ḥābhal (in Pi'el), 'to injure' or 'destroy' (Job 34 31). (7) ἁμαρτάνειν, 'to sin' (Ac 25 8, "sinned" RV), and ἁμαρτία, 'sin' (II Co 11 7, "sin" RV). (8) παράπτωμα, 'a fall' or 'lapse,' i.e., from truth, etc. (Ro 4 25, 5 15-20, "trespass" RV). (9) πρόσκομμα, 'stumbling-block' (Ro 14 20), προσκοπή, 'an occasion of stumbling' (II Co 6 3), and ἀπρόσκοπος, an adj., the negative of the preceding (Ac 24 16; I Co 10 32; Ph 1 10). (10) πταίειν, 'to cause to fall,' or 'to fall' or 'err' (Ja 2 10, 3 2, "stumble" RV). (11) ἀδικεῖν, 'to do unjustly' (Ac 25 11, "am a wrong-doer" RV). (12) σκάνδαλον, properly a 'trap' or 'snare,' and then 'that which causes to stumble or fall,' 'a stumbling-block,' and the derived verb σκανδαλίζειν, 'to cause to stumble.' These two terms occur most frequently in the Gospels (Mt 5 29 f., 11 6, 18 7; Lk 17 1, etc.) and are often rendered by "stumble," "stumbling," "cause to stumble," etc., in RV

OFFERING. See Sacrifice and Offerings, § 17.

OFFICER: This term appears in the AV as the translation of nine Hebrew and two Greek words. (1) nitstsābh (Niphal ptcpl.), 'one appointed,' 'deputy,' 'prefect,' used of Solomon's officers, who had charge of the commissariat, or oversight of his various building operations (I K 4 5, 7, 27 [5 7], 5 16 [30], 9 23; II Ch 8 10, Q^ri). In I K 22 47 it is translated "deputy" (of Edom). (2) nᵉtsībh, 'prefect,' 'garrison' (I K 4 19); elsewhere (except in Gn 19 26, "pillar"), translated "garrison" (I S 10 5, 13 3, 4, etc.). (3) ṣārīṣ, 'eunuch' (q.v.), and in the derived meaning of 'officer,' or, as some affirm, there is another (loan) word with this general meaning. AV renders "officer": of Pharaoh (Gn 37 36, 40 2, 7, 39 1 [married]); of Israelitic kings (I S 8 15; I K 22 9 =II Ch 18 8; II K 8 6); in Judah (I Ch 28 1; II K 24 12, 15 [perhaps of the royal household; they are mentioned with women and children; Jer 29 2 has "eunuch" in same account. Cf. Jer 34 19, 38 7, 41 16], II K 25 19 [military officer =Jer 52 25, where ARV has "officer"] RV has "eunuch" in mg. for all these passages except in Gn. Elsewhere in Kings, Is, and Jer ṣārīṣ is translated "eunuch," except II K 23 11, "chamberlain," an officer in the Temple area; in Est always "chamberlain" with "eunuch" in mg.; in Dn always "eunuch." The Rab-ṣārīṣ appears as a high military officer of Assyria (II K 18 17), of Babylon (Jer 39 3, 13). (4) pāqūdh, 'appointed over,' officer of host of Israel (Nu 31 14, 48, also II K 11 15, for which RV has "that were set over"). (5) pᵉquddāh, 'mustering,' 'oversight,' 'office.' In I K 11 18 (overseer of the Temple worship), Is 60 17 RV has (I Ch 26 30) "had oversight of." (6) pāqīdh, 'deputy,' 'overseer'; for special duties (Gn 41 34 RV "overseers"; (Est 2 3), deputy of the king (Jg 9 28), of the high priest (II Ch 24 11); in the Temple (Jer 29 26; cf. 20 1, where RV has "officer," AV "governor"). (7) rabh, 'chief,' officer of king's house (Est 1 8). The word appears in compound words, titles of Assyr.-Babyl. officers. (8) In Est 9 3 AV "officer" stands for the phrase 'they that did the king's business' (so RV). (9) shōṭēr, 'scribe,' 'arranger,' 'organizer,' apparently a subordinate officer; with "judges" (Dt 16 18; Jos 8 33, 23 2, 24 1); with "elders of the people" (Nu 11 16; Dt 29 10 [9], 31 28; Jos 8 33, 23 2, 24 1); in time of war used in conveying orders and organizing people for marching (Dt 20 5, 8, 9; Jos 1 10, 3 2). In I Ch 23 4, 26 29; II Ch 19 11, 34 11, similar subordinate officers are mentioned. In II Ch 26 11 RV has 'officer" for AV "ruler" (cf. Pr 6 7). (10) πράκτωρ (Lk 12 58), an officer of justice who inflicts punishment. In the parallel passage Mt uses ὑπηρέτης, originally 'under-rower'; then 'under-officer': used for officers or servants of the Sanhedrin (I Jn 7 32, 45 f., etc.; Ac 5 22 f.), elsewhere translated "attendant," "minister."

C. S. T.

OG, og (עוֹג, ʻōg): The king of Bashan, over whom, and his ally Sihon, Moses obtained a decisive victory at Edrei (Nu 21 33). This city and Ashtaroth were the capitals of Og's realm (Jos 13 12). He is said to have been a man of gigantic stature, "of the remnant of the Rephaim" (Dt 3 11). A black basalt sarcophagus (called "iron bedstead") of his was shown at Rabbah of Ammon. His defeat was always looked upon as one of the providential events of Israel's history (Ps 135 11, 136 20; Neh 9 2).

OIL: Olive-oil was one of the most necessary means of subsistence in Palestine. It was used both as a plain article of food and in cooking, in ways analogous to the use of butter among Occidentals. No house could conveniently dispense with the oilcruse (I K 17 14 f.); hence also the profuse employment of oil in sacrifice (see Sacrifice and Offerings, § 6). Another common service to which it was put was that of lighting (Ex 27 20, 25 6). Although torches often served as illuminants in the open air, the oil-lamp was far more convenient and available within the house (see LAMP). A third use of oil was that in personal adornment. The hair of the head was very often anointed with it, especially for participation in high social functions (Is 61 3; Ps 45 7). To this end it was often mixed with perfume. The custom of anointing kings and priests in the ceremony of their inauguration is probably due to this decorative use (see ANOINT). An honorific action is compared to oil (Ps 141 5). The medicinal preservative properties of oil were at least dimly known (Ja 5 14). See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 7 (7). These various uses stimulated the production of oil in great quantities; so that not only the demand for internal consumption was supplied, but a surplus was raised for exportation, justifying the classing of oil with corn and wine as a principal source of national wealth (Dt 7 13; Hos 2 8; Neh 5 11, etc.). Oil was ordinarily extracted from the olive by the application of pressure; but a finer quality was obtained by gently pounding the ripe fruit in a mortar (Terum 1 8 f.). This was the beaten oil of Ex 5 25, etc.

OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES: The word rendered 'spices,' bᵉsāmīm (Ex 30 23), ṣammīm (25 6), designates, properly, the ingredients used in the preparation of ointments, perfumery, etc.

The holy anointing oil (Ex 30 23 ff.) was composed of the following elements, in addition to olive-oil:

1. Anointing Oil.

(1) mōr dᵉrōr, i.e., the self-exuding myrrh (myrrha stacte), in distinction from that which is obtained by puncturing the bark of the Balsamodendron (terebinth, acacia); (2) qinnᵉmon bōsem, fragrant cinnamon; (3) qᵉnēh bōsem, fragrant calamus (Calamus odoratus); (4) qiddāh, probably cassia (Laurus cassia, L.).

For the incense offering also four kinds of spices were necessary (Ex 30 34).

2. Incense.

(1) nāṭāph, stacte, a variety of fragrant resin that exudes from its tree in drops (LXX. στακτή); (2) shᵉḥēleth, onycha, the so-called incense-claw, or devil's-claw, i.e., the operculum of several varieties of mollusks found in the Red Sea (LXX. ὄνυξ), which when burned emit a strong odor (as to the possibility of its meaning 'amber,' cf. ZDMG, XLIII, p. 354); (3) ḥelbᵉnāh, galbanum, a pungent gum from the milky sap of the Syrian fennel; (4) lᵉbhōnāh, frankincense, the white incense that the Hebrews procured from S. Arabia. Frankincense was used also as an addition to certain varieties of the minḥāh (meal-offering) and to the showbread (Lv 2 1 f., 15 f., 6 8, 24 7). The earliest mention of frankincense is in Jer 6 20, where it is spoken of as a foreign variety of sacrificial material. In fact, there can be no doubt that the use of incense in cultus-practise was unknown in primitive Israel. See also SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 15. As an article of luxury it could come into use only in a cultus which was strongly influenced by a well-developed civilization. Moreover, the prohibition (Ex 30 32 f.) of the use of the holy anointing oil for any profane purpose shows that persons were often not content with the pure oil alone for personal use, but mixed it with expensive fragrant ingredients, which were imported from foreign countries (I K 10 10; Ezk 27 22), and prepared either by female slaves (I S 8 13, confectionaries AV), or later by professional perfumers (apothecaries AV) (Ec 10 1; Neh 3 8; cf. Ex 30 35). An especially costly ointment was that made of pure nard-oil (cf. "spikenard" in Song 1 12, 4 13 f. and νάρδος πιστική in Mk 14 3 f.; Jn 12 3). See NARD.

3. Use on Festal Occasions.

It was customary for one to use ointment especially at feasts and in times of joy. The head was anointed with costly oil (Ps 23 5, 92 11; Ec 7 1, 9 8), sometimes so abundantly that it flowed down on the beard (Ps 133 2). Those who could afford it sprinkled their garments with powder, 'abqath rōkēl, and myrrh, mōr (Song 3 6), aloes, 'ăhālōth (Ps 45 9; Song 4 14), saffron, karkōm (Song 4 14), and cassia, qᵉtsī'ōth (Ps 45 9). Women also sometimes carried bags of myrrh, tsᵉrōr ha-mōr (Song 1 13), on the breast, and perfume-boxes (Is 3 20).

4. Use in Burial of the Dead.

The oil of the cedar is known to have been used, particularly on the bodies of the dead, since it was believed to have the effect of preserving them from corruption and decay. Cedar wood also was used by the Israelites, as by the ancient Babylonians, in certain cases as an incense offering (Lv 14 4, 49; Nu 19 6).

OLD: This term renders a number of Heb. and Gr. words: (1) 'āz (only Ps 93 2) with a prep., literally 'from that time.' (2) 'ethmūl, with prep. min, only Is 30 33, lit. 'from yesterday' = 'already.' (3) bālāh, bāleh (cf. bᵉlō', Jer 38 11, 12), 'to become old' by wearing out (Gn 18 12; Dt 8 4, 29 5; Jos 9 4, 5, 13; Ezk 23 43, etc.). (4) ben (Dn 5 31, Aram. bar), 'son of' (used of males), bath (Gn 17 17), 'daughter of' (used of females), in the common expression giving the age of persons or animals, e.g., "Noah was five hundred years old" is literally 'the son of five hundred years' (Gn 5 32; cf. Gn 7 6; Nu 1 3, 3 15, etc.). (5) zāqēn and derivatives, 'to be old' or 'aged' = πρεσβύτερος (Gn 18 11, 19 4; Jg 19 16, etc.), at times with the coordinate idea of wise (I K 12 6, 8, 13; II Ch 10 6, 8, 13). (6) yāshīsh, 'aged' (only Job 32 6; cf. 12 12, 15 10, 29 8). (7) yāshān, always rendered "old," the opposite of 'new,' 'fresh' (Lv 25 22, 26 10; Neh 3 6, 12 39; Song 7 11; Is 22 11). (8) 'adh, 'antiquity' (only Job 20 4). (9) 'ōlām (Aram. 'ālam, Ezr 4 15, 19), 'long duration,' 'antiquity,' is used in the sense of 'ancient,' especially in the Prophets (Gn 6 4; Dt 32 7; Ps 61 4; Is 46 9, 51 9; Am 9 11; Mic 5 1, 7 14, etc.). (10) 'āthēq, 'to advance' in years (Job 14 8; Ps 6 7 [8]). (11) ḥayyīm, 'life' (Gn 23 1 AV; cf. also the literal rendering in Gn 47 8 RV for the less exact "how old art thou" of the AV). (12) pānīm with prep. lᵉ, 'formerly,' Dt 2 20; I Ch 4 40; Ps 102 25 [26], all AV; elsewhere in AV and always in RV, except in Ps 102 25 [26], "aforetimes," etc. (13) qedhem, and derivatives, 'before in place' (often in poetry) comes to mean 'before in time' (Neh 12 46; Ps 44 1; La 1 7, etc.). (14) rī'shōn with prep. lᵉ, 'at the first' (only II S 20 18). (15) rāhōq, 'distance' of time (Is 25 1; Jer 31 3). (16) sēbhāh, 'hoary head,' parallel to (3) above, and often rendered "old age" (Gn 15 15, 25 8; Jg 8 32; I Ch 29 28; Ps 92 14 [15]). (17) yāmīm, 'days' (Nah 2 8, "days" RVmg.). (18) ἀρχαῖος, 'primeval' (Lk 9 8; Ac 21 16, etc.). (19) γέρων, 'old man' (Jn 3 4). (20) γηράσκειν, 'to become old' (Jn 21 18; He 8 13; cf. Lk 1 36), γῆρας, 'old age' (Lk 1 36). (21) παλαιός, and derivatives, 'old,' 'ancient' (Mt 9 16; I Co 5 7, etc.). (22) ποτέ, 'once,' 'at sometime or other' ("old time," I P 3 5 AV, "aforetime" RV; II P 1 21, "ever" RV). (23) πρεσβύτερος, 'elder' in years (Ac 2 17; cf. Lk 15 25), πρεσβύτης, 'an aged man' (Lk 1 18; Tit 2 2; Phm ver. 9), πρεσβῦτις, 'an aged woman' (Tit 2 3). (24) χρόνος, 'time' (Ac 7 23), lit. 'when the time of forty years was being fulfilled to him.' C. S. T.

OLD GATE. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

OLD PROPHET, THE: In I K ch. 13 an account is given of how an "old prophet" deceived a "man of God" from Judah who had announced the destruction of the altar and priests of Bethel where Jeroboam had established the calf-worship of J" for the Northern Kingdom. The emphasis placed on the efficacy of "the word of Jehovah" (vs. 1, 2, 9, 18, 20, 32), the mention of the "cities of Samaria" (ver. 32; cf. ver. 2), not founded until later by Omri, the namelessness of the chief personages, the definiteness of the prophecy as to the name Josiah, and the details of his deed, 350 years before the event (II K 23 16-18), are proof of the late date of the account as given. There is probably a kernel of historic fact at the basis of the tradition connected with Bethel. There may be some reference to the prophecy of Amos against Bethel (Am 3 14), and the destruction of the altar by Josiah (II K 23 16-18) may have recalled the tradition to mind. It is possible that "man of God" is considered a higher title than "prophet" (nābhī'; cf. Am 7 14), but the distinction is not brought out. The "old prophet" was not a false prophet (as Josephus, Targ. Jonath., and the rabbis claimed), but a real prophet (Ephrem. Syr., Theodore, etc.). It is difficult to understand his motive in deceiving the man of God. Thenius suggests that he was envious because he had not been sent to Jeroboam; Hengstenberg and Keil, that, having sinned by his silence in the face of Jeroboam's deeds, he wished to right himself both with himself and others by the companionship of the man of God. Whatever the motive, he later received a true word from J", and acknowledged the worthiness of the man of God. The narrative was evidently intended to teach the necessity of the unconditional obedience of the prophet to God's command, which should not in any way allow itself to be led astray. Thenius finds the additional truth that the spirit of God can speak even out of the mouth of the unwilling (cf. the case of Balaam). C. S. T.

I. The Collection of the Ancient Hebrew Literature.

1. Formation of the Pentateuch.

According to modern investigation, the process of the formation of the Pentateuch continued long after Moses' time, but finally came to an end in the time of Ezra. The studies of the present writer (cf. Einleitung, p. 243 f.) have led him to the conclusion that the Book of the Law, which was in Ezra's hand (Ezr 7 14) when he set out from Babylon, and which was read in public c. 444 B.C. (Neh 8 18), represented in combined form the main elements from which the Pentateuch was constructed, and not, as Budde claims (EB, col. 658), that it consisted simply of the so-called Priests' Code. The completion of the entire O T collection, however, did not take place at this time. Indeed, even Rupprecht (Einleitung, p. 476) does not venture beyond the statement that the O T Canon came into existence "at, or soon after, Ezra's time." But this position is also untenable. For in I Ch 3 19-24 the genealogy of Zerubbabel, who in 536 B.C. was leader of the first colony of returning exiles, is carried forward through nine, or at least six, generations (for proof, cf. writer's Einleitung, p. 273 f.), while in Neh 12 11, 22 Jaddua is mentioned as the last high priest known to the narrator, and, according to Josephus (Ant. XI, 8 7), Jaddus (Ἰαδδοῦς) was high priest at the time of Alexander the Great.

2. Collection of the Prophetic Writings.

There is, indeed, a reference in Is 34 16 to "the Book of Jehovah," but the author of this statement has not indicated how much this book contained. We find also in Dn 9 2 the statement that Daniel "understood by the books"—the reference being to the prophecy of the seventy years (Jer 25 11 and 29 10). The existence of a collection of books is thus attested, though the extent of the collection is not yet clearly stated. Nevertheless, the closing of the prophetic canon and the date of the collection of the prophetic writings are disclosed by the following facts: The Book of Daniel was not included in the Prophetic Books of the O T—the so-called Nebhī'īm—a fact that can be adequately explained only on the theory that the collection of prophetic books was already closed and in public use when Daniel was written. All other reasons which have been brought forward to account for the fact are unsatisfactory. That there is no explicit account of Daniel's prophetic 'call' is no more than we find in the case of Hosea, Joel, Micah, and others. The argument that Daniel was excluded because of its excess of visions would hold equally against Zechariah. The books of Isaiah and Jeremiah, as well as of Daniel, contain historical sections, and Jeremiah is not free from a portion written in Aramaic (10 11). In brief, the only reason for the exclusion of Daniel from "the Prophets" is that these circulated as a closed collection when Daniel originated. But the present Book of Daniel was written in the latter part of the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes (c. 165 B.C.), gathering together and elaborating the traditions of the deeds and sayings of a wise and pious man of exilic days named Daniel. The fact, therefore, that this book did not find a place in the collection of fifteen prophetic books shows that this collection was closed about 200 B.C.

3. The Collection of "the Writings."

The first reliable notice of the other main division of the old Hebrew literature (the Kᵉthūbhīm) is somewhat late. At the same time, the designations 'Law' and 'the Prophets,' or 'Prophecies,' in the Prologue (1 14), which the grandson of the son of Sirach prefixed to his Greek translation of his grandfather's "Sayings" in the year 133–132 B.C., can hardly be reckoned as doubtful, and the much-discussed verb in Sir 49 10 has now been found in the Hebrew Sirach fragments (cf. the Facsimile, 1901, or Strack's edition, 1903). The Hebrew text shows that the plural verbs of the LXX. παρεκάλεσαν, ἐλυτρώσαντο (Cod. Alexandrinus), and the Old Latin corroboraverunt, redemerunt, are correct. Not Ezekiel, but the Twelve Prophets (שנים עשר הנביאים) are the subject. But what were the contents of this third main division, to which the Prologue refers in the expressions "the other following books," or "the other books of the fathers" and "the rest of the books"? To this question neither these expressions themselves nor the other notices in the book of the son of Sirach furnish a satisfactory answer, for it is only to David's songs and Solomon's proverbs that reference is made in Sir 47 8, 17. To a certain degree, our knowledge of the collection of the main groups of O T books is further enlarged by the statement in II Mac 2 13. "It is related in the memoirs which refer to Nehemiah that, in founding a library, he gathered together the books about the kings, and the prophets, and the poems of David, and the letters of kings about 'sacred gifts.'" Passing by the books of the Pentateuch, which no one in Nehemiah's time would have had any occasion to collect, this notice makes Nehemiah the collector of: (a) The Books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, since the expression 'Kings' probably represents national leaders in general; (b) the prophetic books; (c) the Psalter, taken as a whole, and named after its chief contributor; (d) letters, similar to those contained in Ezr 6 1 ff. We also gain some additional knowledge as to the collection of the O T through Mt 23 35. For here not the Uriah of Jer 26 20-23, but Zechariah (II Ch 24 20), who was put to death long before (in the 9th cent. B.C.), is named as the last martyr-prophet of the O T. Consequently, the close of the roll of martyrs was determined, not according to their chronological succession, but according to the order of the O T books, inasmuch as Mt 23 35 presupposes that Chronicles is the last book of the literature under consideration.

4. The Completed Collection.

We get almost absolute certainty regarding the O T collection in the following passage from Josephus: "We have but twenty-two books, which contain the record of the past. Of these, five belong to Moses But the events from the death of Moses until Artaxerxes were recorded by the prophets, who succeeded Moses, in thirteen books. The remaining four contain hymns to God and precepts of human conduct" (Contra Apionem I, 8). In the opinion of the present writer, the thirteen books are the following: Job (in Sir 49 9, also, Job is perhaps called a prophet; cf. Ryssel, Com. ad loc.), Joshua, Judges with Ruth, Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, the Book of the Twelve (minor) Prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah with Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, Esther (of Xerxes' time) and Ezra–Nehemiah (in Artaxerxes' reign). Finally, by "the four remaining books" Josephus probably meant Psalms, Proverbs, the Song of Solomon, and Ecclesiastes. These words of Josephus, however, only bring us to the next step in our investigation.

II. The Mutual Relationship Between the Collection and the Canonization of the Old Hebrew Literature.

5. The Two Processes Not Wholly Independent.

Some writers, indeed, now claim that between the collection of the several parts of the O T and the establishment of the Canon of the Israelitic religion there was no connection whatever. According to this theory, all portions of the O T were collected as mere literature of no specially standard character, though perhaps not as wholly secular, and only later, after a definite date, were they recognized as authoritative. This extreme view of the purely accidental character of the canonicity of the entire O T is essentially that expressed by Lagarde in his statement that the collection handed down by tradition was the expression of the theology of the collectors (Göttingische gelehrte Anzeigen, 1891, p. 498). It should be self-evident, however, that in this view all the emphasis is laid on an arbitrary presupposition. Traces of the same extreme view are noticeable also in several other modern works (e.g., in Hölscher's Kanonisch und Apokryph. 1905, p. 1, etc.).

6. The Processes Identical in Part.

Many portions of the old Hebrew writings possessed a religious authority even from the time of their origin. Such were the legislative sections of the Pentateuch and the addresses of the prophets 'like unto Moses' (Dt 18 15). As to the first, this is evident from the reference of the prophets to the Law of J″ (Am 2 4; Hos 4 6, 8 12, etc.) and, in general, from the existence of an established religion, of which the prophets from the Exodus onward were the interpreters (Jer 7 25). Moreover, the original authority of the prophetic addresses is shown in the simple fact of their preservation, and also in the fact that older prophecies were taken up by later speakers and more fully elaborated—as, e.g., Mic 4 1-3 in Is 2 2-4, or Is 15 1–16 12 in 16 13 f., or Ob vs. 1-9, etc., in vs. 10 ff. and in Jer 49 7-22. That the prophetical writings were not recognized by the Samaritans as of religious authority was due, in the first place, to the recognition of the legal elements of the Covenant as alone having significance (see § 14, below). It is indeed true that the real religion of Israel was, from earliest times, what is called a "book-religion"; and yet it was of such a character that its fundamental statements, though written, were capable of being indefinitely developed. It was not from the first a closed religion, although it was a written one. The O T religion affords actual proof that a book-religion is not necessarily one from which the spirit has departed, and that, therefore, the advent of a religion as a book-religion need not involve its decadence. This must be asserted, unfortunately, against recent statements, e.g., those of F Max Müller, in his work Natural Religion (1890, pp. 449 ff.), to the effect that book-religions originate in the tendency to idealize the men of the past and are, therefore, degenerate in character.

7. The Two Processes Not Altogether Identical.

The normative and, therefore, unalterable character ascribed to the O T writings by all adherents of the established religion of Israel was not at first conceived of as pertaining to the external form. For if this had been the fact, how can we account for the differences between the two forms of the Decalogue in Ex 20 2-17 and Dt 5 6-18, or between such parallelisms of prophetic passages, e.g., in Is 2 2-4 and Mic 4 1-3, even when we allow for the great variety which obtained in orthography and linguistic forms? The same inference is to be drawn from all the other traces of development which the cultus underwent in the course of time. Compare, for example, the earlier regulations concerning the number of the altars of Jehovah (Ex 20 24-26) with the later ones (Dt 12 8, etc.). Similarly, the narrative sections of the Pentateuch and the historical books (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings) were not considered, from the first, infallible descriptions of their respective periods. Did not the Chronicler give a very divergent delineation of exactly the same times as are covered by these books? It is certain that he did not use the Books of Samuel and Kings as a fixed standard of judgment with regard to Israel's past (compare, e.g., his representation of Saul's reign in I Ch ch. 10 with that in I S chs. 10–31). In fact, for the period covered by the Books of Kings, he made use of additional sources for his record.

The earlier relative distinction between Collection and Canonization was later obliterated. This is evident from the following facts: (a) As the Books of Kings are handled with a certain freedom in Chronicles, so also, as late as II Mac (2 13, quoted above), the "books relating to the Kings" are distinguished from the prophetic books. But in the Talmudic passage Baba-Bathra (14b) not only is the Book of Joshua credited to Moses' first successor (Dt 18 15), but also the authorship of the Books of Judges, Ruth, and Samuel is ascribed to the prophet Samuel, and that of the Books of Kings to Jeremiah. The Massoretes, consequently, designated the Books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings as the n·bhī'īm ri'shōnīm, 'former prophets' (cf. especially the earliest Hebrew grammar, Diqdūqē ha-te 'amīm, ed. Baer and Strack, § 70). (b) Further, the significant passage of Josephus quoted above (Contra Apionem, I, 8) discloses the thought that all the books of the Hebrew O T had been written by the time of Artaxerxes (465–424 B.C.). The same thought is expressed negatively in the following words: "But from Artaxerxes to our own time all kinds of books have indeed been written, but these have not been considered worthy of like belief with the earlier ones; since, in the later times, the exact succession of the prophets has not obtained (διὰ τὸ μὴ γενέσθαι τὴν τῶν προφητῶν ἀκριβῆ διαδοχήν)." (c) In the earlier times the authority of certain documents was indicated merely through the manner of their preservation; namely, through their being laid up in the Ark of the Covenant (Ex 40 3), or beside it (Dt 31 26), or before J" (I S 10 25), so that the Law could be found in the Temple (II K 22 8), and the authority of the covenant conditions be acknowledged by submission to them under oath (II K 23 3; Neh 9 38, 10 29). But in later times it was customary to speak of "holy books" (ἡ ἱερὰ βίβλος, II Mac 8 23, αἱ ἱεραὶ βίβλοι, Jos. Ant. XX, 12, k·thābhē qōdhesh, Baba-Bathra 1 6, etc.), or of books which were "spoken through the Holy Spirit" (Baba Meqilla 7a), or of books which "defile the hands" (Mishna Yadayim 3 5, etc.). The last-mentioned expression is authoritatively interpreted in 4 6 of the same writing to mean that the power of anything to defile is in proportion to the esteem in which it is held. Probably it was after the analogy of the Divine holiness, which, according to the Rabbis, threatens to destroy men (cf. Is 6 5-7) that to holy things the capacity, at least, of defiling was ascribed. Some modern scholars, e.g., Budde (op. cit., § 3) and Hölscher (op. cit., p. 4 f.), claim that the holy books were viewed as 'taboo.' But at the date when the idea arose that the holy books made one levitically unclean the conception of taboo was no longer of any influence, at least in Israel, to say nothing of the fact that its existence in Israel at any time is not yet proved (cf. the writer's article "Reinigungen" in PRE,[3] 1905, p. 575).

8. The Difference Between the Two Processes Later Neglected.

III. The Limits of the Old Testament Canon.

9. Absolute Canonicity as to Certain Books.

The contents of the Canon were restricted at the two Synods at Jamnia (in SW Palestine), 90 and 118 A.D., to the thirty-nine books of the Hebrew O T. Still, doubts as to the absolute or relative canonicity of certain of these books were later expressed. (1) The absolute canonicity of certain books was brought into discussion in that their power to defile was questioned. (a) Of all the books Ecclesiastes was most discussed. The majority held (according to Mishna Yadayim 3 5)

"as to Ecclesiastes there exist differences of opinion," but Rabbi Jose went so far as to declare that "Ecclesiastes does not defile." In Mishna Eduyoth 5 3 we read, "Ecclesiastes does not defile according to the School of Shammai, but the School of Hillel says 'Ecclesiastes does defile.'" Pains were taken to quiet these doubts, even as late as the Baba Megilla (7a). (So also A. Gerson, Der Chacham Koheleth, 1905, p. 118.) (b) Nearly as strong were the objections to the sanctity of the Book of Esther; but these doubts also were allayed in the Baba Megilla (7a) by bringing forward the words of Est 2 22, "and the thing became known to Mordecai," since these words showed that the book "was spoken through the Holy Spirit." (c) As to the Song of Solomon, the judgment of the majority (according to Mishna Yadayim 3 5) was to the effect that it defiles, but Rabbi Jose nevertheless adjudged that there were differences of opinion regarding the Song. (d) The sacredness of the Book of Ruth also must have been questioned, otherwise its defiling character would not have been affirmed in Baba Megilla (7a). (2) The relative canonicity of certain books was brought into discussion in that the demand arose on many sides that they should be "hidden."

10. Relative Canonicity of Certain Books. This took place (a) in the case of two books whose 'defiling' character was undisputed: Ezekiel and Proverbs. A rabbi, Chanania, is said to have succeeded, after consuming 300 vessels of oil, in reconciling the differences that were found to exist between Ezekiel and the Pentateuch and thus prevented the 'concealment' of that book (Baba Sabbath 13b; cf. M. Friedländer, Der Antichrist in den vorchristlichen jüdischen Quellen, 1901, p. 8). "The Book of Proverbs also should be hidden, because its words obscure one another" (Sabbath 30b). It would seem from the use of this verb 'to hide' that nothing more than exclusion from public use was intended. As a matter of fact, later Jewish usage generally placed restrictions upon the reading of Ezekiel. Indeed, it was only when one was thirty years of age that he might read its opening and concluding portions (Jerome, Præf. in Hes.). (b) The sentence of hiding was also pronounced on books whose defiling character was questioned; namely, Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon (Sabbath 30b, etc.). In these cases the hiding was the certain result, in spite of Hölscher (op. cit., p. 61 f., note), and constituted nothing more than withdrawal from practical use. The attempt of Margoliouth to give the verb 'to hide' the sense of 'to destroy' (Expos. Times, 1904–05, p. 26b) is refuted in the same journal (p. 185 f.), and also by Hölscher (p. 59).

IV Steps in the Process of Canonization.

These are to be variously distinguished. There were steps in the process of canonization, both as to time (see above, § 1; also the point made vs. Hölscher, § 5)—for in the above-mentioned year 444 nothing but the book of the Law constituted a canonical document—and as to degree. For (a) the book of the Law was esteemed more highly than the prophetic writings, since it was viewed as the only book containing the covenant conditions (II K 23 3; Neh 10 29). The same superiority of the Law is recognized in many passages in later Jewish literature; for, according to Mishna Megilla 3 1, one may receive for sold books a book of the Law (Tōrāh); but, if one has sold a Torah, he must not receive books in return. Furthermore, the expression 'Torah' was used for the whole O T, because it designated its chief element (e.g., in the Mekhilta to Ex 12 6, and in Jn 10 34, where νόμος [law] refers to Ps 82 6, etc.). Consequently, the Massoretes spoke of the Prophets as the 'ashlemtā, i.e., simply the completion of the book of the Law (cf. also the Clementine Homilies 3 23 ff., 18 14), and it was the Law alone that the Samaritans recognized as canonical. (b) The prophetic books, in their turn, were placed on a higher level than the remaining portions of the old Hebrew literature, since they were brought together into one distinct body, even while collections of Psalms, Proverbs, etc., were in circulation. This agrees perfectly with the words of the Psalmist, "there is no more any prophet" (Ps 74 9; cf. I Mac 4 46, etc.), i.e., in his time. (c) That the books constituting the third main division of the old Hebrew literature were accorded a relatively lower degree of canonicity is evidenced even by their designation as kethūbhīm, i.e., simply 'writings.' They could only be considered Hagiographa ('sacred writings') when they were contrasted with books that were never reckoned as belonging to the last part of the O T, and their authors were designated prophets (as reproducing prophetic teachings) only in a secondary sense (cf. I Ch 25 5, etc.; Ac 2 30; To 4 12; Seder 'Olam Rabba 20 f.; Ep. Barn. 6 8, 13 4, 14 2, etc.).

11. Evidence of a Process of Canonization.

V Delimitation of the O T Canon Against Other Portions of Jewish Literature.

In the Mishna (Sanh. 10 1) we read, "To those who have no part in the 'olām ha-bā ('the future world') belong, according to Rabbi Akiba, also those who read in the ṣ'phārīm hitsōnīm" ('the books that are outside the canonical writings'). In the repetition of this statement, Jer. Sanh. 10 1 and Babyl. Sanh. 100b, the Book of Sirach is expressly reckoned to the ṣ'phārīm hitsōnīm; also all books that were written 'from that time and onward' (Jer. Sanh. 10 1), i.e., from the time of the cessation of prophecy. To this class belong also the fourteen books that were later called Apocrypha. Since these, however, are never in the Talmud actually termed g'nūzīm ('hidden'), their later designation in Christian circles as ἀπόκρυφα ('Apocrypha') was not directly taken over from Jewish usage. At the same time, the Church Fathers may possibly have intended to express the sense of the participle gānūz ('hidden') by ἀπόκρυφον. For Origen not only appealed expressly to Jewish precedent, and that at a time when Jewish sources used the expression gānūz, but also designated as Apocrypha such works as the Talmudists, on account of their contents, had excluded from the canonical books of their religion (so Hölscher, op. cit., p. 63 f.).

12. Exclusion of the Apocrypha.

VI. Various Attitudes Toward the Limits of the Canon.

13. Attitude of Hebrew Judaism.

The attitude of Hebrew (i.e., Palestinian and Babylonian) Judaism toward the Canon is evident from what has been said above. It is necessary only to add that the gulf which, according to this portion of Judaism, existed between the thirty-nine books of the Hebrew O T and the fourteen Apocrypha became greater after the time of the son of Sirach and his grandson. For the son of Sirach supposed himself to be able in his book "to pour out doctrine as prophecy" (24 33), and, though his grandson recognized in the work of his grandfather a source of ethical advancement, yet the book itself was never classed with the "writings" (see foregoing section), and, while it is stated in the Talmud that he who reads the book may read it "as one reads a letter" (Jer. Sanh., 10 1), it is also said that "it is for bidden to read the book of the son of Sirach" (Bab. Sanh., 100b). The difference between the opinion of earlier and later Judaism was, however, only relative, and it is an extreme view to claim that "the reaction took place after City and Temple were destroyed" (Hölscher, op. cit., p. 55).

14. Attitude of Samaritans.

The Samaritans, at the time of the establishment of their religion, which probably took place 432 B.C. (Neh 13 28), accepted only the Pentateuch as their canon. They referred the expression "a prophet" (Dt 18 15), which meant distributively a succession of prophets, to Joshua alone. It is not probable (contrary to Hölscher, op. cit., p. 16) that they rejected the prophetic writings because these contained so many prophecies against Ephraim.

15. Attitude of Hellenistic Jews.

The Hellenistic Jews, without due authority, changed the order of the O T Canon and enlarged it. Indeed, Hölscher (op. cit., p. 22 f.) claims that the attitude of the Alexandrian Jews with reference to the limits of the O T Canon was that of Judaism everywhere in the 2d cent. B.C. He can not, however, certainly show that the grandson of the son of Sirach actually placed the book of his grandfather on a level with the other books received from the forefathers. And even if this could be proved, it leaves out of account the following facts: The Hebrew Jews never included the Book of Daniel among the Prophets, but placed it among the "writings." This must have been the earlier judgment of Judaism; for in later times the conception nābhī' ('prophet') became more inclusive, even among the Hebrew Jews, since in Seder 'Olam Zūtā (ed. Meyer, p. 108) Ezra is expressly called a nābhī' But in the O T of the Hellenistic Jews Daniel is placed among the Prophets, which, according to all indications, was a later judgment. Hölscher also defends (p. 25) the Alexandrian combination of Judges and Ruth as early; but who can show that this combination existed 100 B.C.? Furthermore, he condemns the view "that official Judaism marked off a definite period of the past as the only normative time of revelation, i.e., up to the end of the era of the Prophets" (p. 76). But this was actually done by the responsible leaders of Judaism. For it was shortly after the Maccabæan time and with entire propriety that they were conscious of possessing no prophet (I Mac 4 46, 9 27, 14 41), and were not likely to possess one; for was any one to bring about the resumption of prophecy on his own responsibility? More than this, it is a law of historical investigation that a reflex of historical antecedents, the later and more indirect it is, is just to that degree the more uncertain and inexact. So that the Hellenistic Jewish enlargement of the religio-ethical literature of its people has only a relative value—even the N T having no citations from the fourteen apocryphal books. Consequently, the correct attitude toward the Apocrypha is that represented by Jerome in his Prologus Galeatus, which was reaffirmed by the Reformers, to the effect that the Hebrew Canon consisted of but twenty-two books (the thirty-nine of the English Bible), and whatever was outside of these was to be placed among the Apocrypha. The Roman Catholic standpoint, which, since the Fourth Session of the Council of Trent (1546), is in agreement with that of the Alexandrian LXX., has been recently, but to no purpose, championed by B. Poertner in his book Die Autorität der deuterokanonischen Bücher des A T (1893), also by Van Kasteren and others.

1. Paucity of Ancient MSS.

For centuries the Jews have maintained the curious custom of taking MSS. of the O T that have become stained or worn to a graveyard, and burying them with appropriate ceremonies beside some distinguished Rabbi. The result is that no ancient codices of the O T have come down to us, at least none older than the 10th cent. A.D. are known to exist. The earliest known copy of any extended portion of the Hebrew Bible is the codex of the Prophets preserved in the Royal Library at St. Petersburg. It belongs to the Babylonian recension, and was written in 916 A.D. The earliest complete MS. of the O T is another Babylonian codex at St. Petersburg, written in 1009 A.D.

In this state of things it is necessary to resort to the comparison of the characteristics of a group of closely related MSS. in order to determine the characteristics of their common ancestor; and by a comparison of other groups, the characteristics of other ancestors. These ancestors may again be compared, in their turn, to discover a still earlier prototype, and this, once more, may be compared with other prototypes discovered in the same manner. Thus, beginning with MSS. and printed editions, one may work backward along converging lines toward the original autograph, from which all extant textual material is descended. This process implies that we are able to arrange our documents in genealogical order; but before we can do this, we must know something about the process by which the recensions, versions, and families of texts of the O T have arisen. Accordingly, it is necessary at this point to trace in outline the history of the growth of the various forms of the O T text.

2. Necessity of Textual Criticism.

In their earliest period the Hebrews may have used the Babylonian script which, as the Tell-el-Amarna letters and excavations show, was in universal use in Western Asia during the age before 1000 B.C. Any works composed at this time must have been written in this script, and subsequently transcribed into the alphabetic writing, which entered Palestine c. 1000 B.C. In the latter characters the original autographs of all the O T books were undoubtedly composed; only the consonants were written, the vocalization being left to oral tradition. During the period from 1000 B.C. to the formation of the Canon the text was exposed to many vicissitudes in consequence of the Assyrian, Babylonian, and Persian wars, the fall of Samaria and of Jerusalem, and other national catastrophes. Internal evidence shows that it underwent extensive corruption, e.g.: (1) A number of passages are given twice in the O T (see Girdlestone, Deuterographs, 1894). In all these cases we find wide variation in the readings of the two recensions. (2) A number of poems of the O T are partly alphabetic. The object of the alphabetic arrangement is to assist memory, hence when we find it only partly carried out, we must assume that something has been lost out of the text. (3) Many passages of the O T demand the assumption of textual corruption from the fact that they yield no clear meaning. Thus I S 13 1 reads: "Saul was [forty] years old when he began to reign and he reigned two years." (4) Some evident mistakes in the text are found also in the earliest versions, so that they must have originated at a very early date. Many of them are explainable only on the hypothesis of the use of the old Phœnician character (see ALPHABET).

3. Earliest Form of Text.

During the period between the 5th and the 3d cent. B.C. the so-called "square character," used by the Aramaic-speaking peoples, drove the old Phœnician character out of general use, although it still appeared on coins of the Maccabæan period. As a result of this change the books of the O T were gradually transcribed from the old into the new letters, and in this process many new errors unavoidably came into the text. Some errors (found also in the most ancient versions) are explainable only through use of the square character, and therefore must have originated in this period. The recension that then became current in Palestine and that was there regarded as authoritative we may for convenience call the text of the Canon, inasmuch as this was the period during which the Canons of the Law and of the Prophets received their final form, and most of the Writings also came to be regarded as canonical. The descendants of this recension, through comparison of whose readings its text must be restored, are the text of the Ṣopherim (Scribes), the Samaritan Pentateuch, the early Targums, and the LXX. These four texts and their descendants must now be examined in turn.

4. Adoption of Square Character.

The most important line of transmission of the Hebrew text of the O T was in the MSS. prepared by the religious authorities in Palestine. Here in the 2d cent. of the Christian era a standard text was adopted that is the parent of all existing MSS. and of most of the versions of the O T. This is the so-called text of the Ṣopherim. The extraordinary similarity of the MSS., both of the Palestinian and of the Babylonian type—a similarity which extends even to the reproduction of errors and exceptional letters—and the close agreement of all the versions made since the beginning of the Christian era, prove the thesis of Lagarde to be correct, that all these recensions are descendants from a single prototype, the so-called text of the Ṣopherim (cf. Anmerkungen zur griechischen Uebersetzung der Proverbien, 1863, pp. 1–2). At some time in the 2d cent. the exigencies of controversy with Christians, and the desire to have a fixed basis of discussion between the Rabbis, led to the adoption by the Jewish authorities of an official standard of the O T. Since that time all copies have been made directly or indirectly from this codex, and variant codices have been destroyed. The result is that no ancient differences of reading have come down to us in this family, but only variants that have arisen since the standard codex was adopted. A memory of the adoption of this standard codex is preserved in various forms in Jewish tradition. In the Babylonian Talmud (Ṣopherim 6 4) it is recorded that three Temple MSS. were the basis of our present text, and that the principle followed was to regard that reading as correct in which two MSS. agreed. According to a tradition reported by Lagarde (Materialien zur Kritik und Geschichte des Pentateuchs, 1868, i, 230 f.), all existing MSS. of the O T are copies of a single codex that was rescued in the fall of Bitther, the last refuge of the Jews in the war of independence.

5. Text of the Ṣopherim.

Having adopted a standard text, the Jewish authorities provided for its accurate transmission by raising up a body of professional scribes to whom they entrusted the copying, pronunciation, and interpretation of the sacred records. These scribes are known as the Massorites (Massora = 'tradition'). Such elaborate rules were laid down for their guidance in copying that it became almost impossible for them to make mistakes. From that time to this the consonantal text of the Hebrew Bible has remained practically unchanged.

6. Palestinian Massoretic Text.

In the 7th cent. A.D., the vowel-points and accents were inserted in the text. Another standard codex was then prepared, which reproduced not only the consonantal text of the Sopherim, but also the traditional pronunciation of the Tiberian school of scribes. By the 10th cent. so many errors had come into this text that the famous scribe Ben Asher was moved to attempt the construction of a Massoretically correct edition. He prepared a standard codex of the O T in which the Palestinian, or Occidental, textual tradition received its final form. This codex has perished, but direct copies from it are preserved in the synagogues of Aleppo and Cairo. All Western MSS. are descendants of this codex.

7. Babylonian Massoretic Text.

Elias Levita (Massoreth ham-Massoreth) says: "The Occidentals in every land follow Ben Asher, but the Orientals follow the recension of Ben Naphtali." (Cf. Ginsburg, Introduction, p. 247.) In regard to the latter recension the following facts are known: While the Palestinian scribes at Tiberias were elaborating and fixing in writing their tradition concerning the correct pronunciation of the Scriptures, the Babylonian scribes at Nehardea and Sura were engaged in the same occupation. Their tradition differed somewhat from that of the Palestinians, as numerous early statements prove. Their labors culminated in the 10th cent. in the standard codex of Ben Naphtali, which, according to the statement of Levita, quoted above, was regarded as authoritative by the Babylonian Jews in the same way in which the codex of Ben Asher was regarded as authoritative by the Palestinian Jews. This codex has perished, and no immediate descendants of it are known. About the middle of the last century, however, codices, with supralinear punctuation and other characteristics reported of the Babylonian Massoretic text, began to find their way into Europe from the Crimea and from Yemen in southern Arabia. Since that time a considerable number of these have been acquired by the Library of the British Museum and other great libraries of Europe, so that now it is possible to say something definite about the Babylonian Massoretic recension. The MSS. date from the 12th to the 17th cent., and exhibit three slightly variant systems of punctuation, all of which differ from the Tiberian system in the signs used for the vowels and accents, and in being mainly supralinear. But in spite of these differences, the Massoretic tradition represented by them is practically identical with that found in Palestinian MSS. Nearly all have been conformed to Palestinian models, and do not represent the genuine Babylonian tradition. These codices, accordingly, are of small text-critical value. Only occasionally have they retained by accident a genuine Babylonian reading.

8. The Massora.

The Massora ("Tradition") is a sort of text-critical commentary written in the margin of most of the codices. It contains the observations and discussions of the Tiberian scribes during the period from the 2d to the 10th cent. of our era. It counts the number of sections, sentences, and words in books; it notes their middle sentences and middle words; it enumerates passages in which unusual forms occur; it calls attention to abnormal letters, spelling, vocalization, or accentuation, and warns the scribe against changing these. Words that it regards as incorrect it marks with a small circle, and inserts in the margin the Q're, or supposedly correct reading, the vowels of which are placed under the K'thibh, or form in the text. Similar in character are the Sebhirin ("opinions") that suggest an alternate reading to the one in the text. Variant readings of MSS. and of other rabbinical schools are also recorded. The Massora has been the means by which the extraordinary uniformity that now exists in the MSS. has been secured, and its authority must be final in deciding between variant readings of the Tiberian recension.

The Massora is printed in connection with the Bible text, as in the MSS., in the great rabbinic Bible of Jacob hen Hayyim (Venice, 1524–25), and in Buxtorf's rabbinic Bible (Basel, 1618–19). There are also a large number of treatises which contain the Massora classified in various systematic ways, either topical or alphabetic. The most important of these are the following: from the 10th cent., Aaron ben Moses ben Asher, Diqduqe hat-Te'amim (ed. Baer and Strack, Leipsic, 1879); from an anonymous author of the same century, Okhla we-Okhla (ed. Frensdorff, Hanover, 1864); Moses the Punctuator, Darke han-Niqqud wehan-Negināth (ed. Frensdorff, Hanover, 1847); Jekuthiel the Punctuator, 'En haq-Qore (ed. Heidenheim in Me'or 'Enayim, Rodelheim, 1812–21, and in Seder Yeme hap-Purim, Rodelheim, 1826); Elias Levita, Sefer Massoreth ham-Massoreth, Venice, 1536 (German transl. with notes by Semler, Halle, 1772; text, English transl., and notes by Ginsburg, London, 1867); Frensdorff, Die Massora Magna, Hanover, 1876; Ginsburg, The Massorah Compiled from Manuscripts, Lexically and Alphabetically Arranged (London, 1880–85, 3 vols. fol.).

9. Printed Editions.

All printed editions of the Hebrew Bible are based upon MSS. with the Tiberian system of vocalization. The earlier editions rest upon a direct collation of MSS. and, therefore, have text-critical value. The most important of these is the great rabbinic Bible of Jacob ben Hayyim ibn Adonijah, published by Bomberg at Venice in 1524–25, 4 vols. fol. This edition is based upon a careful collation of MSS and presents for the first time an accurate printed reproduction of the standard text of the Tiberian school. So well did Jacob ben Hayyim do this work that this edition has become the Textus Receptus of the Hebrew Bible down to the present day. All later printed editions are based upon this, either alone or in combination with the earlier editions. None of these later editions, accordingly, has independent text-critical value. Arias Montanus in his Hebrew Bible, with interlinear Latin translation (Antwerp, Plantin, 1571, one vol. fol.), first divided the Hebrew text into chapters, and inserted the Hebrew numeral letters in the text. He also added the Arabic verse numbers in the margin. From this edition and from the polyglots the practise of inserting chapter and verse numbers spread to all the later editions. Athias in his standard edition (1659–61) went so far as to invent enumerations in Massoretic style of the number of chapters, and inserted these among the genuine Massoretic summaries at the ends of the books. From him these notes have been copied by Jablonski, van der Hooght, and all the ordinary editions. The Massoretico-critical editions of Baer (Quinque Volumina, Leipsic, 1886) and of Ginsburg (London, 1894) are revisions of the standard text of Jacob ben Ḥayyim, 1524–25, designed to conform it more closely to the teachings of the Massora. They differ from Jacob ben Ḥayyim and from one another only in trivial matters of accentuation and vocalization, and they represent substantially the standard codex of Ben Asher of the 10th cent. The edition of Kittel (Leipsic, 1906) reproduces the text of Jacob ben Ḥayyim and gives in foot-notes the more important variants of the MSS. and versions.

10. Versions of the Text of the Sopherim.

Besides these two families of MSS. all post-Christian versions of the O T are based upon the text of the Sopherim and, therefore, are of some value in restoring the prototype of this recension. Here belong the Peshito, or Syriac version, the Greek versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion in the 2d cent., the fragments of the versions known as Quinta, Sexta, and Septima in the Hexapla of Origen, the asterisked passages in Origen's edition of the LXX. in the 3d cent., the Vulgate Latin version of Jerome in the 4th cent., the late Targums on Esther and some of the other Hagiographa in the 8th and 9th cents., and the Arabic version of Sa'adia in the 9th cent. (See Versions.) Here also belong citations of the Hebrew text in the Talmud, Midrashim, and other Jewish writings.

11. Samaritan Pentateuch.

Parallel with the text of the Sopherim, as a direct descendant of the text of the Canon, is the codex written in a modified form of the Phœnician character that is preserved by the Samaritans in their temple at Nâblûs. Its text is independent of that of the Sopherim, but unfortunately contains only the Pentateuch. It is printed in the Paris and the London Polyglots, and a new edition with critical apparatus is now being prepared by von Gall.

12. Targums.

Other representatives of a text earlier than the official edition of the Sopherim are the Targums, or Aramaic versions of the O T (see Targum). At first transmitted orally, they were later committed to writing. But since they were made from a text earlier than the official codex of the Sopherim, their readings often have critical value. The difficulties with them are, that they are free paraphases with extensive explanatory interpolations, and that they themselves have suffered much in textual transmission. The different Targums vary greatly in their value as critical apparatus, those on the Pentateuch and that on the Prophets being the best, whereas those on the Hagiographa are of later origin, and were never regarded as of equal authority with those on the Law and the Prophets. Most of them are too late to be of any great text-critical value, but it is possible, although they did not assume their present form until a late date, that they may contain reminiscences of a pre-Massoretic form of the text.

13. Greek Version.

The fourth main descendant of the text of the Canon is the Greek version, with all its numerous recensions and secondary versions. The text of the Greek Version has come down to us in several recensions, and only through comparison of these can one hope to restore its primitive form. These are: (1) The unrevised text, represented by the great uncials ℵAB and the kindred uncials and cursives. These show in the main the common text as it existed before the revision undertaken by Origen. (2) The revised text of Origen in the Hexapla, completed about 240 A.D. From this are derived the secondary versions of the Syro-Hexapla, the Latin Hexapla, the Palestinian Syriac, and the Armenian in part. (3) The revised text of Hesychius made at Alexandria in the 3d cent. From this are drawn the citations of the Alexandrian Fathers, and the secondary Coptic and Ethiopic versions. (4) The Lucianic recension made at Antioch in the 4th cent. On this depends the citations of the Antiochian Fathers, and the secondary Philoxenian, Gothic, and Slavonic versions. (5) That underlying the Vetus Itala, or Old Latin Version, which was a secondary translation from the Greek made in the middle of the 2d cent. It is an important witness to the original form of the Greek text before it underwent the revisions of Origen, Hesychius, and Lucian. (See Versions.) To this list we should perhaps add (6) Josephus, who bases his history upon a Greek text that stands midway between that of the uncials and that of Lucian. (See genealogical table at end of article.)

14. The Process of Text-Reconstruction.

In the light of these facts the process by which the text of the O T is to be reconstructed is as follows: (1) All extant Palestinian MSS. and printed editions, with their Massora and the remarks of medieval Jewish commentators, should be compared in order to discover the Tiberian prototype of the 7th cent. (2) All Babylonian MSS., with their Massora, should be compared in order to discover the Babylonian prototype of the 7th cent. (3) The Palestinian prototype and the Babylonian prototype should be compared with the restored originals of the Peshito, Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, Quinta, Sexta, Septima, Origen, Jerome, Sa'adia, Græcus Venetus, the later Targums, and citations in the Talmud, Midrashim, and other Jewish writings in order to determine the text of the standard codex of the Sopherim in the 2d cent. (4) The text of the Sopherim, being thus restored, it should be compared with the Samaritan, the Targums, and the original text of the Greek version, restored by a similar genealogical study of all their recensions and secondary versions, in order to discover the text of the Canon. (5) The final step in the process should be the restoration of the text of the original autographs. Where passages are duplicated in the O T, criticism has a basis for comparison; but where this is not the case, documentary evidence fails us, and we are compelled to resort to conjectural emendation of doubtful passages. Such criticism is always precarious; still conjectures that rest upon exact knowledge of the Hebrew language and thorough acquaintance with Hebrew literature are often extremely probable. It is needless to say that the elaborate process here sketched has never yet been thoroughly carried out for a single book of the O T.

Many years must elapse before the criticism of the versions shall be so complete that they can be used in the proper way for the emendation of the Hebrew text. Meanwhile textual criticism follows as far as possible the lines of research just indicated, but is compelled to be more or less eclectic and tentative. For genealogy of O T text see table below.

OLIVE, OLIVE-TREE. See PALESTINE, § 21, and FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 5.

OLIVES, MOUNT OF: The prominent hill to the E. of Jerusalem (q.v.), also referred to as "the ascent of the Olives" (II S 15 30), "the mount that is before [E. of] Jerusalem" (I K 11 7), "the mountain which is on the east side of the city" (Ezk 11 23), "the mount of corruption" (II K 23 13), "the mount that is called Olivet" (Lk 19 29, 21 37; cf. Ac 1 12), or simply "the mount" (Neh 8 15). The modern Arabic name is Jebel et-Tûr. The Mount of Olives is referred to but seldom in the O T. David passed over it on his flight from Absalom (II S 15 30, 32, 16 1); Solomon built high places here (I K 11 7; cf. II S 15 32), which were overthrown by Josiah (II K 23 13 f.). In Nehemiah's time there were many trees upon the mount (Neh 8 15; cf. also Zec 14 4; Ezk 11 23). Its connection with the life of our Lord, however, is too well known to need detailed mention here (Mt 21 1, 24 3, 26 30; Lk 21 37 and ‖s; Ac 1 12).

1. Names and Biblical References.

The Mount of Olives is a hill, or rather a range of rounded hills of cretaceous limestone, lying roughly parallel to the E. wall of Jerusalem, and separated from the city only by the narrow valley of the Kidron (see map with art. JERUSALEM). The ridge shows a slight concavity toward the city. It is continued to the NW. by Mount Scopus, and at the SW. is separated from the Hill of Evil Counsel by the Kidron gorge. Eastward the slopes of Olivet drop quickly to the wilderness. The central summit is half a mile E. of the Temple hill, 400 ft. above the bed of the Kidron and 100 ft. above the highest part of Jerusalem. It therefore affords a magnificent panorama of the Holy City (see plate, JERUSALEM FROM SCOPUS, NE. OF THE CITY), as well as of the surrounding country, including the wilderness, the Jordan Valley, the N. end of the Dead Sea, and the mountains of Gilead and Moab. The slopes of Olivet are cultivated and olive orchards are still fairly numerous, but the vegetation is by no means luxuriant. During late years a large number of buildings have been erected on the mount.

2. Description.

The range of Olivet is about a mile long, and it is usually considered as having four summits, which are named as follows, going from S. to N.: (1) The Mount of Offense is so called from a late tradition identifying it with the scene of Solomon's idolatry. This is the lowest summit (2,411 ft.), being of about the same level as the Temple site. Upon the steep W. slope of the hill cling the miserable hovels of the village of Siloam. (2) The Prophets is really a spur of (3), but has received a distinctive traditional name on account of the small labyrinth of rock-cut sepulchers which are known as 'The Tombs of the Prophets.' (3) The principal summit, that of The Ascension (2,641 ft.), lies directly opposite the Temple hill. The site is hallowed by very ancient traditions, which, however, are hard to reconcile with the statement of Lk 24 50, or with the fact that, in the time of Christ, the summit of the mount was covered with buildings. The small, octagonal Chapel of the Ascension is now in the possession of the Moslems, but Christians are allowed to celebrate mass there on certain days. Upon this summit is the native village of Kefr eṭ-Ṭûr; here also are the extensive buildings and conspicuous view-tower of the Russian monastery, besides a number of other edifices belonging to various religious orders and preserving doubtful traditions. (4) The Viri Galilæi is the most northerly and highest (2,723 ft.) of the four summits. It receives its name from a curious and impossible medieval tradition that the "men of Galilee" stood here when addressed by the two men in white apparel (Ac 1 10 f.). On the W slope of the central hill, near the bottom of the Kidron Valley, is the traditional Gethsemane (q.v.). The different roads past Olivet to Bethany and Jericho should be carefully noted upon the map.

OMAR, ō'mar (אֹמָר, 'ōmār): A clan chieftain—probably also a clan—of Edom (Gn 36 11, 15; I Ch 1 36). E. E. N.

OMEGA, o-mî'ga. See ALPHA AND OMEGA.

OMER. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 3.

OMRI, om'rai (עָמְרִי, 'omrī): The founder of the dynasty of which his son Ahab is the best-known member. Omri himself, however, was probably not the least inferior in the dynasty, either in ability or achievement. At the time when Zimri assassinated Elah and usurped the throne, Omri happened to be in charge of the king's army at Gibbethon (I K 16 16 f.). He hastened to the capital, Tirzah, besieged it, and compelled Zimri to take refuge in the citadel, where he perished in a fire incident to the siege. Omri was then recognized by the army as king in his stead. Some opposition was made to him by Tibni, but he evidently soon put this down. Omri's power to grasp the needs of the realm is illustrated among other things by his removing the seat of government from Tirzah and building a new and strongly fortified capital city at Samaria, a site much more suitable from both the administrative and strategic points of view. His reign of twelve years (c. 885–874 B.C.) was signalized by a strong foreign policy. Toward Syria he maintained an effective resistance, checking the aggressive movements of that kingdom against Israel. Moab, which had shaken off the yoke of Israel during the years immediately following the disruption, was again subjugated (STONE OF MESHA, lines 5 ff., under MESHA). O. was thus the first king of N. Israel to organize and establish the royal government on a firm basis; consequently, his name became known abroad as that of a great king, for even on the Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser II he is named as the ancestor (officially speaking) of Jehu (cf. Schrader, COT, I, 179). A. C. Z.

ON, on (אוֹן, 'ōn, Gn 41 45, 46 20; also called Bethshemesh, Jer 43 13, and by the Greeks, Heliopolis. Egyptian, Pa-Ra; the Heb. On, however, is from An Ann): A city situated near the S. end of the Delta on the Pelusiac branch of the Nile. It is reputed to be the oldest and the holiest city in Egypt. It was the site of a temple built by Amenophis I of the 12th dynasty and dedicated to the sun. In connection with the cult of the sun there was here a school of priests, reputed among the Greeks as the most learned in the world (Herod. II, 3). From the name of the high priest ("greatest in seeing," i.e., observing the stars) and from his sacrificial costume, which was decorated with stars, it would appear that the cult was more than sun-worship, and involved the adoration of the heavenly hosts in general. Politically, On was not of great importance. From its situation on the highway between Egypt proper and Arabia, the home of the Semites, it contained a Semitic population, which at times must have been quite large. The Potiphera named as Joseph's father-in-law belonged to the priests of the Sun Temple of On. In the intertestamental period the city was made the site of a Jewish Temple by Onias (q.v.). The modern site is the village El-Matariye, where an obelisk erected by Usertesen of the 12th dynasty stands to the present day. A. C. Z.

ONAM, ō'nam (אוֹנָם, 'ōnām): 1. The ancestral head of a Horite (Edomite?) clan (Gn 36 23; I Ch 1 40). 2. The ancestral head of a Jerahmeelite clan (I Ch 2 26, 28). See ONAN. E. E. N.

ONAN, ō'nan (אוֹנָן, 'ōnān): Probably a clan, of Canaanite origin, that lost its identity in the amalgamation of clans incidental to the growth of the tribe of Judah (Gn 38 4 ff., 46 12; Nu 26 19; I Ch 2 3). Possibly the same as ONAM, 2. E. E. N.

ONESIMUS, o-nes'i-mus (Ὀνήσιμος), 'profitable'; cf. Phm ver. 11 for a play upon the meaning of the word: A slave (Phm ver. 16) belonging to the household of Philemon, a Christian living in Colossæ (cf. Phm ver. 1; Col 4 9). After having stolen some of his master's property (vs. 11, 18) O. fled to either Cæsarea or Rome (see PHILEMON, EP. TO), where coming in contact with Paul he was converted, and sent back by Paul to his master, evidently in company with Tychicus, the bearer of the Colossian letter. O. probably carried the Ep. to Philemon with him when he returned to his master. For later legends concerning him, cf. Acta Sanctorum, II, 858–859. J. M. T.

ONESIPHORUS, on"e-sif'o-rus (Ὀνησίφορος): An Ephesian friend of Paul's who, according to II Ti 1 16 ff., sought and found the Apostle in Rome, and ministered to his bodily needs (the probable meaning of ἀνέψυξεν, lit. 'refreshed'), even at the risk of becoming implicated in the charges against him. Since only the household of O. is prayed for and saluted in II Ti 1 16, 4 19, it is possible that at the time when this Epistle was written he was already dead. J. M. T.

ONIAS, o-nai'as (Ὀνίας): The name of three (or four?) high priests of the post-exilic period (Jos. Ant. XI, 8 7; XXII, 2 5, 4 1-10, 5 1; III, 3 1-3). It may be derived either from 'Oni' (the same as 'Ono,' Neh 7 37), or from 'Nehoniah' by abbreviation. 1. Onias I, the son of Jaddua, who entered into correspondence and alliance with Areus, King of the Spartans (I Mac 12 7, 8, 19; the text, however, reads "Darius"), who reigned 309–265 B.C. Onias I must therefore have held office about 300–280 B.C. 2. Onias II (c. 252 B.C.), the grandson of the preceding. It is probable that he is the Onias named in Sir 50 1 (cf. Jos. Ant. XII, 4 1-3) as a father of the high priest Simeon. 3. Onias III, the grandson of Onias II. He was the champion of conservatism against the Hellenizing party during the reign of Seleucus IV (187–175 B.C.). In consequence of this conduct he was accused by his enemies. He went to Antioch to plead his cause in person before the king. He was compelled to remain in Antioch, and finally was murdered by the agents of his rival Menelaus (II Mac 3 1–4 38; I Mac 4 1-17; Jos. Ant. XII, 4 10, 5 11). 4. Onias IV, according to some the same as the preceding, who escaped death at Jerusalem, fled to Egypt (Jos. BJ, I, 1 1), and there (at Leontopolis) built a temple in fulfilment of Is 19 19. Others, however, though believing that there were only three of the name, maintain that 2 and 3 above were the same (cf. Guthe in EB, s.v.). A. C. Z.

ONION. See PALESTINE, § 23.

ONLY BEGOTTEN (μονογενής): This phrase expresses the conception of the unique relationship of Jesus Christ to God as given in the Johannine writings (Jn 1 14, 18, 3 16, 18; I Jn 4 9). The O T basis of the expression is to be found in Ps 2 7, where J" addresses the Messiah in the words, "Thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee." The filial relation of the Messiah to God is always in the background in later Judaism (Dn 3 25; see also MESSIAH); but it only assumes the aspect of uniqueness with the clearer and profounder insight into its nature secured by the author of the Fourth Gospel and I Jn. In other portions of the Scriptures, the words "beget," "begotten" are used in their literal senses. The term first-begotten (πρωτότοκος, He 1 6 AV first-born RV) presents the thought of the uniqueness, not in its transcendent aspect, but in its association with spiritual sonship as typified in Christ. (Cf. the same word in Rev 1 5.) A. C. Z.

ONO, ō'no (אוֹנוֹ, 'ōnō), 'vigorous': A Benjamite town of seemingly early date (I Ch 8 12, and mentioned in the lists of Thotmes III, c. 1600 B.C.), though noticed in the O T only in post-exilic writings. It was inhabited by members of the post-exilic Jewish community (Ezr 2 33 = Neh 7 37). It was in "the plain of Ono" that the enemies of Nehemiah wished him to meet them (Neh 6 2). The place is mentioned with Lod (Lydda) and is probably the village Kefr 'Ānā, NW. of Lydda. Map III, D 4. C. S. T.

OPHEL, ō'fel. See JERUSALEM, § 17.

OPHIR, ō'fer (אוֹפִיר, אוֹפִר, 'ōphir, 'ōphīr): A place or country from which gold was brought by the navies of Solomon and Hiram to Ezion-geber, Solomon's harbor at the head of the Gulf of Akabah (I K 9 26 ff., 10 11; II Ch 8 18, 9 10). Jehoshaphat later failed in an attempt to send vessels thither for gold (I K 22 48 f.). It was a land famed for the quality of its gold (I Ch 29 4; Is 13 12; Job 28 16; Ps 45 9 [10]; cf. Jer 10 9; Dn 10 5 "gold of Uphaz," and I K 10 18 "fine [mūphaz] gold," should probably be emended to read "gold of [from] Ophir") and "Ophir" (Job 22 24) by itself means fine gold. Its location has always been under discussion, and has been found in many countries. We know that it produced fine gold, was accessible by sea, therefore on or near the coast, that the voyage to O. and back to Ezion-geber required three years, if I K 10 22 refers to the same ships; and that "almug" (II Ch 2 8, 9 10, 11 "algum," wood and precious stones (I K 10 11), also silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks were brought back with the gold. It has been located in (1) Africa, on the eastern coast, as far north as the Red Sea (Carl Peters, Das Goldene Ophir Salomos, 1895), or in East Africa, in Mashonaland, opposite Madagascar. Mauch (a traveler in E. Africa) discovered in 1871, at Zimbaye, about 200 m. inland from Sofâla (cf. Sophir of LXX.) remarkable ruins, with which are connected reports of gold-mining as early as 1500 A.D. (2) In the farther East, where all the articles named are found in: (a) the old city of Supara or Upara on the Malabar coast in the region of Goa.

This identification has been made on the basis of the LXX. reading (Σωφηρά, Sophir) of I K 9 26-28. (b) The Malacca peninsula, where a Mt. Ophir, near Johore, is known as producing gold. (c) The east side of the Indus delta, where a nomadic people, Abhîra, were settled. Gold is found in Kashmir, farther inland; precious stones, sandalwood (almug-wood?), apes, and peacocks are also found in India. (3) In Arabia: (a) On the SW. coast (so Sprenger, Guthe) along the Red Sea, which was a gold-producing country and might furnish precious stones and almug-wood. The products mentioned in I K 10 22 could have been secured elsewhere, or, as many claim, the verse is a late insertion and its writer was confused as to the location of O. (b) The SE. coast of Arabia, along the Persian Gulf, for which E. Glaser (Skizze der Geschichte u. Geog. Arabiens, 1890, II, 353–387) makes a strong argument. Gn 10 29, 30 connects Ophir with Havilah (q.v.) and Sheba (q.v.), called "sons" of Joktan, who settled in Arabia. Many early authorities identify O. with S. Arabia, which was noted for its fine gold, called "apyron" (ἄπυρον) by the Greeks. This may be connected with the Elamite name (1000–800 B.C.) Apiria (Apii) = Ophir (?) for the territory between Susa and the Persian Gulf. Glaser claims that on account of the winds the voyage might easily have required three years. The ships would have gone down the Red Sea, eastward along the Somali coast, then along the Arabian coast and into the Persian Gulf. Gold, silver, almug-wood, and precious stones would have been secured at O., the other products at ports on the E. of the gulf, or even elsewhere. This view seems, on the whole, the most probable. C. S. T.

OPHRAH, ef'rā (עָפְרָה, 'ophrāh): I. A Jewish family name (I Ch 4 14). II. 1. A town on the NE. border of Benjamin (Jos 18 23). Jerome states it was Ephrem, 5 m. E. of Bethel. A company of Philistines from Michmash, S. of this place, set out on the Ophrah road (Is 13 17); other companies went to the W and E. and Saul commanded the S.; therefore the road to O. probably led to the N. and the O. of Jos 18 23 would be intended. It is identified with Ṭaiyebeh, 5 m. NE. of Bethel. Map III, F 5. 2. A town in Manasseh (Jg 6 11, 15), belonging to the family of Abiezer, the home of Gideon (Jg chs. 6-8). It had the altar "Jehovah-shalom" ('J" is peace') (6 24), and an ephod set up by Gideon (8 27). Gideon was buried there (8 32) and there his family was slain by his son Abimelech (9 5). It was W. of the Jordan, and not far S. (7 1) of the Plain of Jezreel (6 33-35, 8 18 f.), and probably N. of Shechem. The site has not been found, though identified with Fer'ata, 6 m. W. of Shechem. C. S. T.

ORACLE: (1) The rendering of dābhār, 'word,' i.e., the Divine word, as given through some appointed means, such as, in earlier times, the sacred lot, or a seer or "man of God," or in later times, a prophet (II S 16 23; here the earlier usage is meant). (2) The rendering of d'bhīr, a term used in the description of Solomon's Temple (q.v.), meaning the 'inner' or 'rear' part or chamber, and applied to the most holy place where the Ark was kept (I K 6 5, 16 f., etc.; II Ch 3 16, etc.). (3) In Pr 31 1 the Heb. text contains the enigmatic word massā', which is often used of prophetic oracles and is here rendered "oracle" ("prophecy" AV). While it can not mean 'oracle' in this passage, it may mean 'utterance' in the sense of a wisdom-poem. Some scholars think a proper name is intended and render "Lemuel, King of Massa" (cf. Gn 25 14). (4) The rendering of λόγιον, 'a little word,' and hence used of a brief utterance, and so of pagan oracles, since these were usually brief. In the N T this term is used of the O T as a Divine revelation (Ac 7 38, of the Mosaic Law; Ro 3 2; He 5 12; I P 4 11, where "oracles" is the subject of 'speak' understood, and the meaning is that the Christian teacher is to speak in the spirit and manner of, and in harmony with, the Scriptures, i.e., the O T). E. E. N.

ORATOR: In the O T this word is used once (Is 3 3 AV) to translate the Heb. lāḥash, more correctly rendered in RV by "enchanter." In the N T it renders the term ῥήτωρ, applied to one Tertullus (Ac 24 1) in the technical sense of 'advocate,' or 'pleader.' J. M. T.

ORCHARD: The AV rendering (Ec 2 5; Song 4 13) of pardēs, a Persian word meaning an 'enclosure,' i.e., a royal preserve, whether of forest (cf. Neh 2 8 RVmg.), or for hunting, or pleasure-grounds. Ec 2 5 RV reads "park." E. E. N.

ORDAIN: This is the rendering of words meaning (1) 'to will into being,' 'command,' 'decide,' or 'fix,' and, therefore, cause the occurrence of that which is ordained (kūn, Ps 8 2; maneh, Dn 2 24; yāṣadh, I Ch 9 22; pā'al, Ps 7 13; qūm, Est 9 27; ποιεῖν, Mk 3 14). (2) 'To set in order,' or 'arrange,' 'prepare' ('āmadh, II Ch 11 15; nāthan, II K 25 3; κατασκευάζειν, He 9 6; διατάσσειν, I Co 7 17; προετοιμάζειν, Eph 2 10). (3) 'To set apart,' 'designate,' for a special function or office, 'to appoint' (sūn, sūm, Ps 81 5; Hab 1 12; shāphath, Is 26 12; κρίνειν, Ac 16 4; ὁρίζειν, Ac 10 42; χειροτονεῖν, Ac 14 23; προορίζειν, I Co 2 7; τάσσειν, Ac 13 48; προγράφειν, Jude ver. 4). (4) 'To install' in office, or 'consecrate,' when the office is viewed as sacred (καθίστημι, He 5 1). The term 'ordination' does not occur in the Bible. The usual conception of ordination as the setting apart of the officers of the Church to their peculiar work by the ceremony of the laying on of hands (I Ti 4 14; II Ti 1 6) has the sanction of the Apostolic usage, but its significance is not explicitly given. There is no evidence that the act was more than the recognition of the call of the ministrant by the Christian community in which he was to serve, and concurrence in the call. The call itself came from the Holy Spirit (Ac 13 2), but sometimes through election by the people, or appointment by the Apostles (Ac 6 5, 14 23). See also CHURCH, §§ 3, 8. A. C. Z.

ORDER: In Ps 110 4 the Heb. dibhrāh has no technical significance. It means simply after the 'manner' of Melchizedek. In Lk 1 3 "in order" (καθεξῆς) is not a conjunction, but an adverb, meaning 'in succession,' 'separately' (cf. also Ac 11 4, 18 23). E. E. N.

ORDINANCE: A statutory prescription as distinguished from consuetudinary law. The principal Heb. and Gr. words thus rendered are ḥuqqāh, mishpaṭ, and διαταγή (Ex 12 14; Ps 119 91; He 9 1). See also, in general, LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE.

A. C. Z.

OREB, ō'reb (עֹרֵב, 'ōrēbh), 'raven': I. A Midianite prince slain by the Ephraimites, who at the command of Gideon had gone down into the Jordan Valley to cut off the retreat of the Midianites (Jg 7 25, 8 3; Ps 83 11). II. A place named after the Midianite prince (Jg 7 25; Is 10 26), located perhaps in the Wâdy Fâr'ah (see Moore, ad loc. in Int. Crit. Com. on Judges). C. S. T.

OREN, ō'ren (אֹרֶן, 'ōren), 'cedar': The ancestral head of a Jerahmeelite clan (I Ch 2 25). E. E. N.

OSNAPPER, os'nap-ęr (אָסְנַפַּר, 'oṣnappar; LXX. Ἀσενναφάρ; Lucian, Σαλμανασσάρης): A king who transported peoples to Samaria (Ezr 4 9 f.); probably the Assyr. king Asshurbanipal (אסר[בנפל, 668–626 B.C.) is meant. Sargon (722–705 B.C.) seems to have been the first Assyrian king to transport men from the East to Samaria in 721 B.C. and 715 B.C. (II K 17 24; cf. COT, 276 f.). Esarhaddon (681–668 B.C.) also sent colonists to Samaria (Ezr 4 2). Although no other mention is made of Asshurbanipal than in Ezr 4 10, he was the only Assyrian king who could have transplanted the inhabitants of Susa and Elam. Esarhaddon had brought to subjection the whole of Syria and Egypt, and his empire extended from Babylon to Egypt. Asshurbanipal, his son, received the Assyrian throne with the western dependencies; his brother Samaš-šum-ukim having been set over Babylon. A. quelled an uprising in Egypt, conquered the Elamite kingdom, and putting down the rebellion of his brother in Babylon became king of both Assyria and Babylonia (648 B.C.?). There seems to have been an uprising in Syria and Palestine at the same time, and according to II Ch 33 11 Manasseh was carried in chains to Babylon. The inscriptions mention Manasseh as a vassal of A., and the incident as recorded in Ch may well have been true, as A. probably resided at Babylon part of the time. He erected notable buildings, both palaces and temples, in various cities of his empire; but his greatest service to posterity was in collecting the very rich and valuable library of Babyl.-Assyr. literature, which was discovered at Nineveh by Layard and Rassam (1845–50, and later). OTHNI, oth'nai (עָתְנִי, 'othnī): A Levite gatekeeper (I Ch 26 7). E. E. N.

OTHNIEL, oth'ni-el (עָתְנִיאֵל, 'othnī'ēl): The son of Kenaz, a younger brother of Caleb (Jos 15 17). The first of the so-called judges of Israel. His courage had been tested, even before he assumed the judgeship, when at the invitation of Caleb he attacked and captured Kiriath-sepher, and received as a reward the hand of Caleb's daughter Achsah in marriage (Jg 1 11-15). Othniel's judgeship was occasioned by his success in repelling the invasion of Cushan-rishathaim of Mesopotamia (Jg 3 7 ff.).

A. C. Z.

OUCHES (Settings RV): (1) The settings for the precious stones on the shoulder-pieces of the high-priestly ephod (Ex 28 11, 39 6). (2) Pieces of gold work that served as fastenings for the golden cords of the breastplate (Ex 28 13 f., 25, 39 16, 18). The Heb. term mishbᵉtsōth means something 'mixed' or woven together, indicative of open or filigree work, rather than of a solid cup, or cap in the case of (1), and of a hook or button in the case of (2). E. E. N.

OUTGOINGS: This term is the translation of two Heb. words: (1) mōtsā', the place of the sun's going forth, the east (cf. Ps 75 6 [7]), and by zeugma (Ps 65 8 [9]), "the goings forth of the morning and evening" = 'the east and the west.' (2) tōtsā'ōth (fem. pl.), 'the point at which a boundary terminates.' Although the noun is a fem. pl., the Heb. verb is singular (Qᵉri pl.), and in the original text the noun may have been singular. It is used in Jos (17 9, 18, etc.) in giving the boundaries of the tribal divisions in Canaan, where RV renders "goings out," while elsewhere, in Nu and Jos, it is rendered "goings forth," "goings out." C. S. T.

OUTLANDISH: This term is the old Eng. translation for nokhrī in Neh 13 26 AV, where RV has "foreign." Elsewhere AV usually renders this word by "strange," "stranger" where RV has "foreign," "foreigner." C. S. T.

OVEN. See FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 2.

OVERSEER: (1) In most instances in the O T this is a correct translation of the Heb. terms pāqadh (noun and verb) and pāqīdh, as the root idea signifies 'to seek out,' 'to care for,' 'to inspect.' (2) In II Ch 2 18, 34 13 the Heb. mᵉnatsᵉḥīm might be rendered "foremen." (3) In Pr 6 7 the Heb. term shōṭēr is one which occurs many times in the O T, and always (in RV) rendered "officer," except in this place. (4) On Ac 20 28 see CHURCH, § 8.

OWL. See PALESTINE, § 25.

OWNER OF A SHIP. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

OX: Several Heb. words of different root-significance are rendered "ox" in the Eng. Bible. (1) shōr (apparently cognate with the Lat. taurus, Ger. stier, Eng. steer), the most generic word used irrespective of age or sex. (2) bāqār ('to break through'), the term thus meaning the 'plow-animal.' In addition to these two terms, which represent nearly all the O T instances, there are two others: par, 'bullock'; but in Ex 24 5 and Nu 23 1 (AV) "oxen," and 'alleph, 'allūph, 'eleph, meaning the 'tamed,' 'domesticated,' or 'taught' animal (Is 30 24; Jer 11 19; Ps 8 7, 144 14). For the uses to which oxen were put see AGRICULTURE, § 4; SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 5; and PALESTINE, § 24.

OZEM, ō'zem (אֹצֶם, 'ōtsem): 1. A brother of David (I Ch 2 15). 2. The ancestral head of a Jerahmeelite clan (I Ch 2 25). E. E. N.

OZNI, oz'nai (אָזְנִי, 'oznī): The ancestral head of the Oznites, a clan of Gad (Nu 26 16), called Ezbon in Gn 46 15. E. E. N.

P

PAARAI, pê'a-rai or -rê (פַּעְרַי, pa'ărī): One of David's heroes (II S 23 35), an Arbite (see ARAB, II). In I Ch 11 37 called "Naarai son of Ezbai."

PADAN-ARAM, pê"dan-ê'ram. See PADDAN-ARAM.

PADDAN-ARAM, pad"dan-ê'ram (פַּדַּן אֲרָם, paddan 'ărām, Padan-aram AV; "Paddan" alone in Gn 48 7 is doubtless due to a copyist's omission; Μεσοποταμία Συρίας, LXX.): A name used ten times in Gn (25 20, 28 2, etc.), probably always by the Priestly writer, to designate N. Mesopotamia, which is elsewhere called 'Aram-nahărayim, "Aram of the two rivers." The Assyrian word padânu means a 'plowed' [field] and is evidently translated in Hos 12 12 "the field of Aram," and so came to mean, apparently, an agricultural district. It is not impossible that Paddan-aram may indicate some particular part of Mesopotamia, such as the country around Haran, where the name Feddân (=Paddan) is still attached to two heaps of ruins. See also ARAM.
L. G. L.

PADDLE: A term found only in Dt 23 13 AV, for which RV substitutes "shovel." The Heb. term so rendered, yāthēdh, is the common term for a peg, or "tent-pin," and here denotes that the butt end of the spear should be shaped so as to be used conveniently for the purpose indicated. E. E. N.

PADON, pê'don (פָּדוֹן, pādhōn): The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 44; Neh 7 47).

PAGIEL, pê'gi-el (פַּגְעִיאֵל, pag'ī'ēl): The "prince" of the tribe of Asher (Nu 1 13, etc.).
E. E. N.

PAHATH-MOAB, pê"hath-mō'ab (פַּחַת מוֹאָב, paḥath mō'ābh): A family from which 2,812 (Ezr 2 6) or 2,818 (Neh 7 11) men, in two branches, Jeshua and Joab, returned with Zerubbabel, and, later, 200 with Ezra (Ezr 8 4) and perhaps 218 more of the Joab branch (Ezr 8 9). Hasshub, "son" of P.-M., helped in repairing the wall (Neh 3 11), and the head of the family sealed the covenant (Neh 10 14 [15]). Eight of the family had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 30).
C. S. T.

PAI, pê'ai. See PAU.

PAINT, PAINTING. See EYE-PAINT.

PALACE: This term is used in the AV as the translation of eight Heb. and two Gr. words: (1) 'appedhen, from the Persian apadâna, 'treasury,' 'armory.' In Dn 11 45 it means 'palatial tents.' (2) 'armōn, 'citadel'; not used before the establishment of the Kingdom of Israel, and means both 'citadel' (I K 16 18; II K 15 25, "castle" RV) of the king's house, and more generally 'castles,' 'palaces,' especially in passages of the Prophets, which speak of conquest (Jer 6 5; Am 1 4, etc.). (3) bīrāh, 'castle,' 'palace,' a late word from Assyr. bîrtu, 'fortress,' only in post-exilic lit., used for the Temple (I Ch 29 1, 19); for the fortress near the Temple (Neh 2 8, 7 2, "castle" RV), and for the fortress in (or which is) Shushan, the winter residence of the king of Babylon (Neh 1 1; Est 1 2, etc.; Dn 8 2). (4) bayith, 'house' (II Ch 9 11 RV); "king's house," the usual term for a royal palace. (5) bīthān, 'house,' "palace" in Est only (1 5, 7 7, 8). (6) hēkhāl, a loan-word from the Accadian e-gal, 'great house,' used for a royal palace (I K 21 1; Dn 1 4, etc.; Hos 8 4, "temple" AV); but also for the Temple, the palace of God, the supreme King (Is 6 1; I K 6 1, etc.). (7) harmōn, a word of uncertain meaning (Am 4 3 AV; cf. RV). (8) ṭīrāh, 'encampment,' 'settlement' (Song 8 9, "turret" RV; Ezk 25 4, "encampments" RV). (9) αὐλή, a 'court' and the house itself, "palace" AV (Mt 26 3 f.; Mk 14 54 f.; Lk 11 21; Jn 18 15). (10) πραιτώριον, 'the camp of pretorian soldiers,' 'the pretorian guard' (so Ph 1 13 RV). Their quarters in Rome did not include the royal palace, although when absent from Rome the emperor was 'in prætorio.' See also PRETORIUM.
C. S. T.

PALAL, pê'lal (פָּלָל, pālāl): One who helped on the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 25). E. E. N.

PALANQUIN, pal"an-kîn': The RV rendering of the Heb. 'appīryōn (Song 3 9; "chariot" AV), a word of foreign origin and of somewhat uncertain meaning.

I. NAMES, BOUNDARIES, AND AREA.

1. Names.

Palestine did not receive its present designation from the people of Israel, through whose occupation of its soil it has become famous, but was so named from the Philistines, the enemies of Israel. It is in Herodotus that we first find the expression Συρία ἡ Παλαιστίνη. He meant thereby either only the coast of the Mediterranean between Phœnicia and the Arabian Desert in the S. (I, 105; IV, 39; VII, 89), or also the interior country lying back of this coast (II, 109; III, 91). As time passed, the reference of the name to the interior became more usual. It is true that Josephus only rarely uses Παλαιστίνη (Palestine) for the land of the Israelites or of the Jews (Ant. I, 6 4 [§ 145]; XX, 12 1 [§ 259]). But Philo puts Παλαιστίνη for Canaan, and similarly upon coins issued under the authority of Vespasian (70 A.D.) we read: Palestina (Palæstina) in potestatem P. R. redacta. For the terminology of Christian writers the usage of Jerome (Com. on Ezk, 27) was influential. By Palestine was understood the land inhabited by the Israelites, or Jews, with no definite determination of its boundaries. This territory belonged, according to the O T, to the land of Canaan, but was not the whole of it. The Israelites well knew that they had not gained possession of all Canaan, for in Jos 11 17, 12 7, a distinction is made between the territory Israel had taken from Canaan and that which had not been conquered (Jos 13 2-6), and the well-known expression "all Israel from Dan even to Beersheba" (I S 3 20; II S 24 2, 15; I K 4 25 [5 5 in Heb.]) designated only the N. and S. limits of the territory actually possessed by Israel. In the O T Canaan does not represent a political unit but a geographical idea (like the term Germany), and never had fixed boundaries. This is the reason why the attempts in the O T to draw the boundaries of Canaan, especially on the N., differ so widely, as a comparison of Gn 10 15-19 with Dt 11 24; Gn 15 18 and Ex 23 31 with Ezk 47 15-20, 48 1 ff.; Nu 34 1-12 (cf. 13 21) will show. The E. Jordan land ('ēbher hayyarden) was never explicitly reckoned as belonging to Canaan, and later (from Ezekiel's time) was definitely distinguished from it. Canaan was called "the land of promise" (He 11 9; cf. Ac 7 5) or 'the promised land' after such passages as Gn 15 17; Dt 6 10; Ezk 20 42. On the contrary, other designations of the O T have a narrower sense. For example, such terms as "the land of Israel" (I S 13 9); "the land of the Hebrews" (Gn 40 15; Jos. Ant. VII, 9 6 [§ 219]; Pausanias, VI, 24); "Jehovah's land" (Hos 9 3; Jer 2 7); the "holy mountain" of J" (Is 11 9); "the holy land" (Zec 2 12 [in Heb.]; II Mac 1 7)—all mean only the land inhabited by Israel. It was "holy" for Israel, because it belonged to J" and He or His name dwelt therein; for Christians, because it was the theater of Jesus' activity or of sacred history in general.

The Egyptian inscriptions show acquaintance with the name Canaan, though they generally use the term Ḫaru (cf. in O T, the "Horites") for southern Syria. The term commonly employed by the Babylonians, Amurru (whence Amorites), signified generally Phœnicia and the Phœnicians. The Amarna letters limit this term to the Lebanon region and N. Phœnicia, and for the S. part of Syria use the term Canaan (Kinaḫni, Kinaḫḫi). Among the Assyrians, from the 8th cent. on, the term mat Ḫatti, 'land of the Hittites,' meant not only N. but also S. Syria. Later for this expression another is used, ebir nāri (Heb. 'ebher hannāhār, Aram. 'ăbhar nahărā'), i.e., the land W of ("beyond") the Euphrates, which term, from the time of Darius, was exactly the term used for the Persian satrapy of Syria (Neh 2 7, 9, 3 7; Ezr 5 3, 6, 6 6 ff.; cf. also II S 10 16; I K 4 24 [He 5 4]). To this correspond the expressions in I Mac 7 8, το πέραν τοῦ ποταμοῦ, and I Es 2 17, 24 f. ἡ κοίλη Συρία καὶ Φοινίκη (cf. Strabo, 16). Finally, Greek and Roman writers use the name Ἰουδαία, Judæa, in the sense of Palestine. Originally, this meant only the district about Jerusalem occupied by the post-exilic Jews; later, the kingdom of the Hasmoneans was so named (Jos. Ant. XIV, 11 2), then the kingdom of Herod (XVI, 2 1), then the Roman province under Vespasian (Bell. Jud. III, 7 3; VII, 6 1; cf. Ptol. V 16 1, 15 6-8).

If one understands by the term Palestine the land of Biblical history, i.e., of Israel's history, it will not be possible to think of fixed boundaries.

2. Boundaries. At the same time, the name indicates fairly well what might be spoken of as southern Syria, the natural boundaries of which are easy to determine. As on the W. it is limited by the sea, so it is on the S. and E. by the desert. But sea and desert, though often compared, have as boundaries very different meanings. The coast-line along the Mediterranean sea is sharp and changes little, but the transition from the cultivated land to the desert is gradual and the boundary-line changed according to the political conditions. Although deserts separated peoples from one another in those times, yet caravan routes were in existence still earlier as avenues of commerce to the open sea. Therefore it is more likely that foreign influences entered Palestine via the desert much earlier than they did from over the sea. On the N. the coast-plain comes to an end about 13 m. N. of 'Akkā; Rās en Nāḳūra and Rās 'ēl Abyaḍ (6 m. farther N.), spurs of Jebel 'el Umshaḳḳah (1,190 ft. high), rise abruptly from the sea and extend eastward to the W mountain boundary of Upper Galilee, which is united to Jebel eḍ-Ḍahr (c. 2,000 ft. high) by Jebel Hūnīn (3,000 ft.). Jebel eḍ-Ḍahr forms the watershed between the Nahr el-Liṭānī (the Litany) and the Jordan and leads on to the foot of Hermon, which, situated above the sources of the Jordan, stands out distinctly as a natural boundary for the land from the S. To the SE. begins the level territory of ancient Bashan, the most northern portion of the E. Jordan land with which the history of Israel was concerned.

3. Area. The area enclosed by these natural boundaries is not large. The sources of the Jordan at the foot of Hermon (at Tell el-Ḳāḍi) are distant in a straight line from Beersheba 143 m., from Kadesh-barnea, 187 m. The breadth narrows continually from S. to N. Through Tell Refaḥ—Beersheba—el-Kerak it is 112 m.; through Nebi Yūnus—Jerusalem—Meshetta 81 m.; through Carmel—Tiberias 62 m.; through Rās el-'Ain—Bāniās 47 m.—if 36° E. long. from Greenwich be taken as the E. limit toward the desert. Taking the breadth at Tell el-Ḳāḍi as the northern boundary and that at Beersheba as the southern, we have a total area of c. 10,000 sq. m. (26,108 sq. km.). Of this, according to the English survey (1872–77), c. 5,940 sq. m. (15,643 sq. km.) belong to W. Palestine, leaving a little over 4,000 sq. m. for E. Palestine, which has not yet been surveyed completely.

II. Topography.

4. Horizontal and Vertical Lines of Division. Palestine, like the rest of Syria, is primarily the western coast-frontier of the Syro-Arabian Desert, which extends as a plateau, with an average elevation of 2,400–3,000 ft., as far as the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf. The coast-line is remarkably unbroken. Only in one place does it show any deviation worth mentioning, namely, between Carmel and the cliffs of Acco ('Akkā) lying opposite. Here it bends to the E., forming a circular bay 6 m. long and 2 m. wide. On the S. side of the old city Acco there was an excellent natural harbor which was of greatest importance during the period from the Persian supremacy to the crusades. It is now neglected and filled up with sand brought by the Mediterranean current from Gibraltar and the Nile delta. The Turkish Government is now attempting to construct an artificial harbor at Ḥaifā, opposite Acco to the S., in order to give the railway to Mecca a secure connection with the sea. The rocky islands also that lie off the coast, under whose shelter the Phœnician harbors arose, appear on the S. coast only in the form of small rocky reefs which make the shore dangerous, e.g., at Joppa (Yāfā). The coast is mainly flat and sandy; in only a few places does it rise in cliffs from the sea (at Askalon, Yāfā, Ṭanṭūra, 'Atlīt, and Acco).

The vertical division of Palestine is more complicated. It arises from the great natural cleft or fault which begins at 'el 'Aḳaba, is widest and deepest in the Dead Sea and extends beyond Hermon through the Orontes Valley as far as Antioch. The deepest portion, i.e., the Jordan Valley and the Dead Sea, separates the general frontier of the Arabian Desert into two parts, usually termed the E. and W Jordan land. This fact has been of greatest significance for the history of the W. Jordan land, as it was thereby released from its immediate connection with the desert and given the opportunity for its own historical development.

These fundamental topographical lines that run from S. to N. show themselves principally on the W. slope of the highlands and in the course of the coast-line, to a lesser extent also within the highland region itself (cf. § 7, below). In only one place are these lines apparently broken, viz., by the low-lying Plain of Jezreel (Esdraelon), which broadens out from the northern foot of Carmel toward the sea and also issues on the E. into the upper Jordan Valley through easily traversed passes on both sides of the isolated Jebel eḍ-Ḍaḥī. Here, from remote antiquity, important trade-routes have traversed the land from E. and W.; here also has often been the battle-ground for the control of Palestine. To the S. of this plain the mountain system is very simple. In the interior the central ridge, on which most of the main road runs naturally from N. to S., frequently widens out into smaller plains or valleys which are of great importance for the settlement and cultivation of the land. At the same time the watershed, while it descends rapidly toward the Jordan, on the W., slopes much more gradually toward the sea. N. of the Plain of Jezreel the watershed draws nearer the western side of the Jordan Valley and makes possible a somewhat isolated highland region toward the sea, which may be taken as the transition to the Lebanon and Antilebanon ranges.

The surface of the E. Jordan territory is of a much more simple character. To the E. it extends to the desert highland, in a gradual rise or in rounded hills, furrowed by broad and deep watercourses. To the W. it breaks itself into countless spurs between which brooks and rivers have cut deep ravines. The descent to the Jordan is often very abrupt. While the average height of the E. Jordan plateau is somewhat higher than that of the W. Jordan land, still they run parallel to each other. Both are highest in the N. (in Galilee and Dschōlān, i.e., Golan). In the central region (Samaria and Gilead) there is a depression, and in the S. (in Judah and Moab) again an elevation. These topographical differences find mention also in the O T, where the different parts of the land are enumerated according to their natural characteristics: ḥōf hayyām, 'the seacoast'; hash-shĕphēlāh (in I Mac 12 38 Σεφηλά), 'the underland,' "the lowland" EV, the hilly region between the coast-plain and the mountains proper (often used to include the coast-plain also); hāhār, 'the mountain-land'; hā'ărābhāh, the Jordan Valley; hammīshōr, 'the plateau' (of Moab) (cf. Dt 1 7; Jos 9 1; Jg 1 9; Dt 3 10; II Ch 26 10).

5. The Accessibility and Isolation of Palestine.

In connection with the consideration of the topography of Palestine, questions arise as to the relative accessibility and isolation of the land and its suitability for the intercourse of its people with other lands. What the great geographer Carl Ritter wrote in 1852 (cf. Ritter, Ein Blick auf Pal. u. seine christl. Bevölkerung, 1852; Allgemeine Erdkunde, Bd. XV, i., p. 8 f.) concerning the general situation of Palestine, viz., that it was distinguished by its isolation from the rest of the civilized world and, at the same time, by its central position in the midst of that world, can be maintained to-day only with great reservations. It is true that Palestine lay midway between Babylonia and Egypt, the two most important seats of ancient civilization (cf. Ezk 5 8, 38 12). But its natural relation to both was different. Palestine is most closely connected with the Euphrates and Tigris region through N. Syria, while it is separated from the delta of the Nile by a broad stretch of desert.

The very ancient trade-route from the Euphrates (at Carchemish) to the Nile traversed the land from N. to S. It reached the Sea of Gennesaret either from the Orontes Valley over the Jebel eḍ-Ḍahr and the highland of Galilee, or it drew near the upper course of the Jordan via Damascus, crossed this and united itself with the former branch on the W shore of the Sea of G. Thence the road ascended the ridge of Tabor and then descended into the Plain of Esdraelon. At Megiddo, the mod. Tell-el-Matsellim, it left this to find its way to the coast-plain between the hills S. of Carmel through the Wādy 'Ara. Here it skirted the foot of the hills, drawing near the coast at Lydda (Heb. Lōdh), Ekron, and Ashdod, and passed on by Gaza and Raphia through the desert to the Nile delta. Even to-day this road is much used by caravans and for the herds which are driven to Egypt for sale, although nothing is done for its maintenance. Its tributaries will be mentioned later. A land traversed by such ancient trade-routes is not isolated; it is open to travel and constantly under the influence of outside civilization.

This old trade-route shows that Palestine in the N. and S. offered no serious hindrances to commerce, while at other places it presented attractive openings (cf. Jer 15 7). The Bedawin of the eastern desert, the "children of the east" (bᵉnē kedhem) of the O T, could without difficulty press forward to the W Indeed, the Jordan Valley and River, S. of the Sea of Gennesaret as far as the Jabbok, can be crossed in many places without danger. In its southern portion, between the Jabbok and the Dead Sea, it is deeper and broader and the fords are much fewer, so that here intercourse between the two sides is relatively restricted. In the S. the ascent from Beersheba is at first easy, but the mountains themselves offer difficulties to passage. Here is the region to which Ritter's term "isolation" is in truth applicable, viz., the southern part of the mountain range of W Palestine. As far as the neighborhood of Nābulus (Shechem) we can travel from N., W., and E. through open roads furnished by Nature herself; but the entire southern mountain-land is like a natural fortress. The heights have, in places, an elevation of nearly 3,600 ft. Only narrow, tortuous valleys shut in by steep, overhanging cliffs form the watercourses. The country as a whole is much more poorly supplied with water than is its northern part; consequently it is less fertile. The inhabitants of this mountain region were little affected by either the warlike or peaceful movements on the roads to the west. Large cities which depend on commerce for their prosperity were never found here, as the land has no commercial possibilities. It is certainly no accident that the most important history of the land took place in this southern part. The single open door to the sea (at Carmel) has been mentioned (§ 4). But this was of consequence only for the later history of the land, after seamen had learned to venture on the open sea instead of clinging to the coasts.

In concluding this sketch we shall speak of the natural characteristics of each section of the land.

6. The Negeb or "the South."

The Negeb or "the South" was the most southern part of Canaan according to the O T (Jg 1 9; Dt 1 7; Jos 10 40, 15 1 ff., etc.; Ezk 47 18 f.). The name (generally in the O T with the article) denoted (according to the Aramaic) probably 'the dry barren land.' Since the LXX. in some places rendered the word by νότος and λίψ ('South'), and the Vulgate followed it by using meridies or terra australis (and austrum), so the misleading expressions "South," "south-land" passed over into many modern versions. The Negeb comprised a territory which began at Beersheba, where the mountainous region ends, and stretched southward for about 55–60 m. On the E. and SE. it was bounded by the Wādy el-Fiḳra[1] and its upper branch the Wādy el-Marra. On the W and SW. it falls away to the lower level portion of the Wādy el-'Arīsh. Its form was, therefore, that of a triangle with the apex turned toward the S. The Wādy el-Fiḳra (with el-Marra) was the natural boundary toward Edom (Jos 15 1, 21-32), and by the Wādy el-'Arīsh, the O T "brook of Egypt," the S. border of Israel (and Canaan) was extended to the Mediterranean (Jos 15 3 f.; Ezk 47 19; Nu 34 5). It is true that in this flat waste region no fixed boundary-line can be drawn, yet the lower Wādy el-'Arīsh does mark a definite line between the Egyptian desert to the W and the arable region of Palestine to the S., as has been stated by Th. Kotschy and W. Barbey. On the African side the formation is that of a gravel bed overlaid with sand, while on the Asiatic side it is that of a hard clay subsoil under a thin covering of the same (cf. ZDPV, 1882, p. 220 f.).

[1] As the form Wādy is that preferred by the author it is so printed in this article.

The Negeb is a plateau, with its greatest elevation in the S. (3,000–3,500 ft.), seamed with countless wādys that carry off the waters of the winter rains; on the SE. and E. through the Wādy el-'Araba into the Dead Sea; on the SW. and W through the Wādy el-'Arīsh into the Mediterranean; on the N. and NW through the Wādy Bīr es-Seba' into the sea S. of Gaza. Only on the W. slope are any springs to be found, viz., 'Ain Ḳadīs, 'Ain el-Ḳadērāt, 'Ain el-Ḳusēme, and 'Ain el-Muwēliḥ. These constitute the most valuable asset in the whole region. The southernmost, 'Ain Ḳadīs, is the "Kadesh-barnea" of the O T, where the Israelites under Moses sojourned for a long period (Dt 1 19, 46; Jg 11 16 f.). It is on this side of the plateau that the traces of ancient civilization are most abundant, such as terraced hills, wells, and other structures for water, ruins of cities and castles, though the land has always been more a land of shepherds than of farmers and cities. To the N. the mountain-land ends in a well-formed low-lying plain (800–1,200 ft. above the sea) toward which the waters from S., E., and N. descend, and at Tell el-Fārī' pass on to the sea. In this lowland lie the ruins Khirbet el-Milḥ (or Meleḥ) and Khirbet Bīr es-Seba'. The former corresponds to the city of Salt (II S 8 13; II K 14 7), the latter to Beer-sheba, famous as a shrine, and for its wells (Am 5 5, 8 14; Gn 21 33, 26 23-33, 46 1). Three of the wells are again in use to-day. The watershed of the mountain region at first runs from S. to N., then from SW. to NE., to the Mt. Rās ez-Zuwēra, near the Dead Sea. Its ridge crossed an important road toward Elath on the Arabian Gulf of the Red Sea. Here we are to look for the "ascent of Akrabbim" (Nu 34 4; Jos 15 3), also Tamar, the fortress built by Solomon (I K 9 18 [Kethib]; cf. Ezk 47 19, 48 28 and Thamaro on the Peutinger Tables), the ruins of which have been identified with the modern Kornūb in the upper Wādy el-Jemen. It was during the control of the Romans here, who built two roads across the land to Petra and Aila, that the Negeb saw its best days. Recently Professor Dr. Al. Musil, of Olmütz in Vienna, has made a journey, rich in important results, through this little-known land. His map of Arabia Petra (Vienna, 1907) gives a radically new representation of the region.

Because of the general sameness in the natural character of this whole region (to which attention has been called, § 5, above) we should avoid dividing it, on the basis of merely historical considerations, into districts such as the hill-country of Judæa, Samaria, etc.

7. The Mountain Range from the Negeb to Shechem.

(a) We may begin our description with the S., on the border of the Negeb, with whose hills the mountain range of Pal. is connected through its watershed. This watershed extends westward from Rās ez-Zuwēra (§ 6, above) about 8 m. to Tell 'Arad and thence follows a northern direction parallel to the line of the great cleft (of the Jordan Valley). Its southern part is cut up into three successive terraces, forming acute angles with the main line of watershed, by three chains of hills which lift themselves out of the lowland near Khirbet el-Milḥ and Beer-sheba. These run from SW to NE., in the general direction of the watershed of the Negeb. The result is that between these hills the land slopes to the S., e.g., in the case of the tortuous Wādy el-Khalīl, from Hebron to the neighborhood of Beer-sheba. Furthermore, where these lines of hills cross the watershed, they form upland plains of different size which are remarkable for their fertility. Consequently, the slope from the crest of the range to the E. is broken into three great terraces. The southernmost of these plains is that of Hebron (Gn 37 14), which is shut in on the E. and N. by the crest of the range (here c. 3,300 ft. high). Hebron was considered a very old city (Nu 13 22; cf. Jos. BJ, IV, 9 7), which is quite credible when we consider its situation; for its upland plain is the point where four old roads unite, viz., from the N. (Shechem), from the W (Gaza), from the SW. (Egypt via Beer-sheba), and from the SE. (Edom via Tamar). It furnished also the last resting-place before a long desert journey, or the first after such. The second upland plain lay, not on the W., but on the E. side of the watershed, between Halhul (Jos 15 58), Khirbet Teḳū'a (Tekoa, Am 1 1), and Bethlehem, and is famous for the abundant waters of the Wādy el-'Arrūb, which were brought probably by Herod's engineers through the (still extant and used) conduit to the so-called Solomon's Pools (in the springy region S. of Bethlehem), and thence to Jerusalem.

The third upland plain is also situated mainly to the W of the watershed. In reality, it consists of a number of small plains that extend from Bethlehem as far as El-Bīre and Rāmallāh, c. 10 m. N. of Jerusalem. The portion SW. of Jerusalem is called El-Baḳ'a or El-Bukē'a, probably identical with the Valley of Rephaim of the O T (Is 17 5; Jos 15 8; II S 5 18, 22). These plains have their outlet to the W. through the Wādy bēt Ḥanīnā (N. of Jerusalem) or through the Wādy el-Werd (S. of Jerusalem) into the Wādy eṣ-Ṣārār, i.e., the Valley of Sorek (Jg 16 4). Through this alteration in the surface the main line of the watershed becomes less marked, is in the main somewhat flattened, so that one often crosses it without noticing it. Consequently, for purposes of cultivation and for residence, this part of the crest of the ridge possesses great advantages over the lofty chains of the Lebanons. While in the S., at Tell Zīf, SE. of Hebron, the elevation reaches 2,700 ft. and 3,340 ft. at Sīrat el-Bellā' (N. of Hebron), at Jerusalem it sinks to c. 2,650 ft., but rises again at Bethel to c. 2,890 ft.

(b) The main western slope is separated distinctly from the Shephelah range of hills (see § 4, above) by a depression running N. and S. A number of side valleys lead almost at right angles into the main valleys that run toward the W., and these taken together form a depression parallel to the great line of cleavage (N. and S.) which determines the formation of the present surface of the land. On the E. side of this depression the hills slope toward it quite gradually; the W side is mostly shut in by barren heights. This depression begins at the Wādy Malāḳe about 5 m. NW. of the village Bēt 'Ūr et-Taḥtā (Beth-horon the lower), where the Wādy el-Muṣlib empties from the S. It is continued southward in the Wādy el-Miḳtelī, and then broadens out at the Wādy Selmān into the Plain of Yālō (Aijalon, Jg 1 35; Jos 10 10 ff.; II Ch 11 10). This has an elevation of 650–800 ft., and is called to-day Merj ibn 'Omēr. In its midst lay the village Bēt Nūbā. The places 'Ashuwa' (Eshtaol) and 'Artūf indicate the line to the Wādy eṣ-Ṣarār. It continues southward thence in the Wādy en-Naṣīl and, S. of the Wādy eṣ-Ṣaut (cf. I S 17 2, 19), in the Wādy eṣ-Ṣūr (near Adullam and Keilah). This brings us to the large Wādy el-'Afranj, which leads from Hebron to Bēt Jibrīn, the ancient Eleutheropolis. From this point, in the direction of Beer-sheba, only a few traces of this elevated eastern edge of the Shephelah can be detected.

From the northern part of the crest of the mountains some spurs run out toward the W. which were used in olden times, especially by the Romans, as main routes of travel; since the valleys, owing to their narrowness, their many windings, and the numerous boulders in their upper courses, are unsuitable for roads. Thus, from El-Khaḍr, near Bethlehem, a spur branches out, on which the road runs that leads down to 'Ain Shems, the Beth-shemesh of Jos 15 10; I S 6 12. Another, from Nebi Samwīl (2,900 ft. high), NW. of Jerusalem—probably the Mt. Ephron of Jos 15 9—connects the villages Biddū, Ḳarjet el-'Ineb, and Sārīs, from which a road leads down into the plain and comes out finally at Joppa. A third spur extends from El-Jīb, the ancient Gibeon (Jos 9 8; II S 21 2; I K 3 4 ff.) to the upper and lower Beth-horon, along which in ancient times the most important road from the neighborhood of Jerusalem led down into the plain, and which was therefore the scene of many conflicts (Jos 10 10-14; I S 13 8; I Mac 3 15 ff.).

(c) The E. slope descends, as has been said, in three terraces (in two near Bethel), and is, in general, very steep. This makes necessary a brief notice of the differences of elevation. The crest of the central ridge is, on the average, about 3,000 ft. above the sea. The surface of the Dead Sea is 1,292 ft. below sea-level. Since these two are distant from each other in a straight line only about 15½ m., the descent averages about 286 ft. to a mile. Except in the case of the few sharply sloping plains near the watershed, the rains contribute nothing to the fertilizing of the soil. The water simply rushes on from stone to stone in its unchecked descent. This region is, therefore, generally speaking, uncultivable and desolate; its better parts only are visited in the spring by shepherds with their flocks. There was indeed a time when this wilderness from Tekoa to Bethel was inhabited by many thousands of men. From the 4th to the 7th cent. A.D., it was the favorite abode of recluses and monks who here, either in caves in complete isolation from others or under a communal leadership in the so-called lauras, or, later, in separate buildings, cœnobia or monasteries, dedicated themselves to prayer, meditation, and labor. We know the names of 50–60 lauras and cœnobia which stood some on the almost inaccessible cliffs of the deep valleys and others on the small level places of the steep slopes. The Mughārat Kharētūn near Tekoa, once identified with the Cave of Adullam, has preserved the name of the earliest founder of such establishments, Chariton (320–350). Of all these foundations, which have faded away since the conquest by the Arabs, but one remains, the monastery Mār Sābā, founded by Sabas in 478, in the awful solitude of the barren slope of the middle Kedron (Wādy en-Nār).

This whole region is called in the O T the Wilderness of Judah (Wilderness of Judæa in the N T)—a comprehensive expression indicative of many different things: pasture-land (I S 17 28, 25 1 ff.) for the protection of which towns and cisterns were constructed; also caves which served as hiding-places for fugitives and marauders (I S ch. 24; I Mac 2 28 ff., 9 33, 62 ff.). Cities, also, in the wilderness are mentioned in Jos 15 61 f., among them En-gedi, 'the goats' spring,' the modern 'Ain Jidī, 400 ft. above the Dead Sea N. of the mouth of the Wādy el-'Arēje; finally, absolutely barren mountains, valleys, and level surfaces. The different parts were named after near-by places, as the Wilderness of Maon (I S 23 24 f.), of Tekoa (II Ch 20 20), etc. For the northern part toward Bethel we know the names of specific localities, as the Wilderness of Gibeah (Jg 20 42 ff.), of Michmash (I S 13 8), of Ai (Jos 8 15), etc.

(d) We come back now to the highland which we have followed northward as far as el-Bīre. The upland plain now becomes smaller and completely disappears N. of Bethel between the heights which are crowded close together and surrounded by steep and deep valleys. We have here the most broken and consequently the most intricate part of the highland. The watershed verges in a somewhat tortuous way toward the E., approaching to within 9–12 m. of the Jordan Valley, as far as the height of et-Tuwānīk (SE. of Shechem). Consequently, the old road toward Shechem leaves the crest of the ridge, and making use of several long valleys, especially the Wādy el-Jīb, finds its way along the western slope. Its course northward takes it by Sinjil and Lebonah, leaving the old town of Shiloh (the mod. Khirbet Seilūn), in its quiet seclusion, about 3 m. to the E. The short distance between the watershed and the Jordan Valley makes the descent to the E. very abrupt. There are declivities from 2,000 to 2,400 ft. in depth. Among the tangled areas of mountains and valleys to the W. a long ridge is prominent that stretches westward from 'Ain Sinjā (the Jeshanah of II Ch 13 19) and Jifnā (the Gophnah of Jos. BJ, III, 3 3). On this lay the Roman road from Jerusalem to Cæsarea. Six m. N., near the village Sinjil, another long ridge appears. Between these two ridges the deep Wādy dēr Ballūṭ winds its way to the lowland. In its upper course, where the Wādy el-Jīb joins it from the N., it is flanked by precipitous hills, Burdsch Bardawīl, i.e., Baldwin (2,570 ft.), and Burdsch el-Lisāne (3,130 ft.). These, with the crowning hill to the E., Tell 'Aṣūr, lend a picturesque aspect to the region which is only enhanced by the fact that the slopes are often covered with olive-groves and other green trees. The road to Shechem again strikes the watershed, because this bends to the W. at almost a right angle from the peak of Tuwānīk, but in a deep low-lying saddle (1,800 ft.) that offers an open way to travel from S. to N. The same phenomenon repeats itself some miles farther N. between Mts. Gerizim (Jg 9 7; Dt 11 29 f.) and Ebal (Dt 27 12 f.; Jos 8 33). There the watershed ascends to the peak of Gerizim (2,849 ft.), then sinks into the little valley in which Nābulus (1,660 ft.) lies, thence ascends again to the top of Ebal (3,077 ft.)—plain indications that a more open and less bold type of mountain is at hand. The city Nābulus (Neapolis) is the successor of the more ancient Shechem, which lay, according to Eus. (Onom.), some distance farther E., near the modern village Balaṭa, where, in fact, we find the actual 'back' (shekhem), i.e., the watershed, of the land. This trough between Gerizim and Ebal is remarkable for its abundance of springs, and was certainly one of the earliest centers of population in the land. It widens out to the E. in the fruitful plain el-Makhna (1,800–2,000 ft. above the sea), famed for its wheat, which extends S. along the E. side of Gerizim about 6 m. and to the E. about 5 m. Two important roads lead hence westward to the sea, one of which, to Joppa, begins on the heights, but later makes use of the Wādy 'Azzūn, the other, to Cæsarea and Dor through the well-watered Wādy esh-Sha'īr. The N. foot of Gerizim is well covered with vegetation, but the peak is bare. Ebal has practically no vegetation. These facts serve to explain Dt 27 12 f., where Gerizim is designated as the mount of blessing and Ebal as the mount of cursing.

(5) Shechem, Shiloh, and Bethel, which are mentioned in the oldest narratives of the O T, remind us that this region came into the permanent possession of Israel very early. It is frequently mentioned under the name "Mt. Ephraim." To what part of the land did this designation originally apply? Ephraim is, strictly speaking, the name of the district occupied by that part of the tribe of Joseph which from it received its particular name. As this tribe expanded, the name "Mt. Ephraim" also went southward, so that even places in Benjamin were reckoned to "Mt. Ephraim" (Jg 4 5; I S 14 22; II S 20 21). But the most ancient sense of the term must not be determined by this later usage. Since Ephraim means 'fruitful land,' the name could not have referred originally to the rough and quite stony region near Bethel and Tell 'Aṣūr, and since, in later times, the southern part of the territory of Joseph was called Ephraim, it is not probable that the name originally designated the northern part, i.e., that which bordered on the Plain of Esdraelon. This region also is not such that the designation "mount" would be applied to it throughout. Consequently, it is likely that by "Mount Ephraim" was meant originally the less rough and stony region extending from Lebonah (el-Lubbān) to Yāṣīd (4 m. N. of Mt. Ebal). On this supposition the old account in Jos 17 14-18 becomes intelligible; Joseph enlarged his original possession, Mt. Ephraim (ver. 15), by first clearing away the forest on the hill (ver. 17 f.) and then settling there. The lay of the land shows that the higher-situated wood can be thought of only as S. of the territory already possessed, that is, in the wilder part of the hill-country.

8. The Highland N. of Shechem.

To the N. and NW of Ebal the above-mentioned breaking up of the mountain range becomes very perceptible. The hills are lower, the slopes more gentle, and the valleys broader. Indeed, the openings between the chains of hills are often so broad that fairly large plains spread out, e.g., the plain (sāhil) near the village 'Arrābe with Tell Dōtān, which corresponds to the place Dothan or Dothaim (Gn 37 14-17). To-day a road still leads from Dschenīn, at the S. angle of the Plain of Esdraelon to the great highway along the foot of the hill region. The rain-water runs more slowly over the less precipitous slopes and sinks deeper into the soil. On the watershed N. of Yāṣīd there is a basin surrounded by hills, the bed of which in the spring after heavy rains becomes a lake, the Merj el-Gharaḳ. The highest elevation of the W. slope is at Shēkh Beyāzīd (2,375 ft.), on the range extending W. of Yāṣīd. The hilly region Bilād er-Rōḥa (in some places c. 1,600 ft.) makes the connection with the Carmel range, which extends almost to the water's edge, with a height of 1,600 to 1,800 ft. In ancient times Carmel was famed for its caves (Am 9 3) and for the beauty of its verdure (Is 35 2; Song 7 5). To-day it is but sparsely wooded.

The watershed holds its course N. from Ebal to Yāṣīd (2,225 ft.), and then draws nearer the Jordan. The heights of Ibzīḳ (2,404 ft.) and Fuḳū'a (1,502 ft.) are distant from it only a little over 9 m. in a straight line. The E. slope of the hill region toward the Jordan is here of a very different character from what we find farther S. Between the valleys which run from NW to SE. there are a number of ridges, all having the same general direction and about 12 m. long, which approach near the Jordan in single peaks, e.g., Ḳarn Sarṭabe (1,244 ft.), Ras Umm el-Kharrūbe (690 ft.), and Ras Umm Zōka (830 ft.). The valleys between these ridges are quite broad and open, especially the southernmost, the Wādy Fār'a, the upper arms of which extend far up into the watershed, from the plain el-Makhna near Nābulus to Ṭūbās (Thebez) to the N. The road from Shechem to Bethshan on the Jordan runs past Thebez; another leads down the Wādy Fār'a to the Jordan at the ford ed-Dāmiye and thence into the E. Jordan land.

9. The Plain of Esdraelon.

Between the mountain region to the N. and S. in form like a right-angled triangle, lies the Plain of Esdraelon. The right angle touches the foot of Mt. Tabor (1,843 ft.), which with Jebel ed-Daḥī (1,700 ft.) and Jebel Fuḳū'a (1,710 ft.) forms the E. side as far as En-gannim (Jenin). The latter mountain forms the continuation of the watershed between the Jordan and the Mediterranean. It is the Mt. Gilboa (mod. Jelbōn), famed as the place of the defeat and death of Saul (II S 1 21). Jebel ed-Daḥī is a small isolated mountain with several peaks, among which Nebi ed-Daḥī (1,700 ft.) is the highest. Through the broad, fertile valley to the S. runs the Nahr Jālūd, which has its origin near the village Zer'īn, near the ancient Jezreel (I K ch. 21), and flows on to the Jordan near Bethshan (Beisan). Along its short course there runs an ancient and important road to the E. Jordan land. The northern narrower valley is drained by the Wādy el-Bīre, which descends from Tabor to the Jordan. The long side of the triangle corresponds to a line drawn from Jenin on the S. to the N. slope of Carmel. The plain lies 200–300 ft. above sea-level, with its slope to the W in the direction of the bay between Ḥaifā and Acco. It has always been inhabited only on the edges, since the central part is marshy and in winter impassable. The volcanic deposit which was poured into this plain for thousands of years from the volcano Jebel ed-Daḥī, together with the basaltic subsoil, which appears on the surface here and there on the edges of the plain, has, through its decomposition, given the plain its marvelous fertility. Through the western outlet flows the Nahr el-Muqaṭṭa', the Kishon of the O T (Jg 5 19-21; I K 18 40), in the spring often raging and dangerous, in the summer a sluggish brook.

10. The Highlands of Galilee.

The mountainous region N. of the Plain of Esdraelon divides itself naturally into two parts: Lower Galilee and Upper Galilee. The boundary between these is formed by a range of hills that begins some little distance from Acco and extends N. from Ramah (er-Rāme), including Nebi Heider (3,410 ft.), Jebelet el-'Arūs (3,480 ft.), and Ṣafed (2,790 ft.). Lower Galilee is divided by three parallel chains of hills, running from W to E., between which lie small plains. The heights along the N. edge of the Plain of Esdraelon form the first chain. Among them are the hills near Nazareth and Tabor (1,843 ft.). Its crest is isolated on all sides and is noticeable, especially from the E. Jordan land, because of its well-rounded summit. Only on the NE. is the mountain, here covered with basalt, connected with the main highland. The second chain is of smaller extent. To it belong Jebel Ṭur'ān (1,770 ft.) and the basaltic Ḳarn Ḥaṭṭīn (1,038 ft.), which overlooks the Sea of Galilee. To the S. lies the small Plain of Ṭur'ān, to the N. the larger Sāhel el-Baṭṭōf, called by Josephus (Vita, 45) Asochis, and in the O T (probably) Yiphtaḥ-'ēl, ("Iphtah-el," Jos 19 14, 27). The third chain is the longest. It begins at the village Shefā 'Amr to the W., grows higher and broader toward the E. (Jebel ed-Dēdebe [1,790 ft.], Ras Krūmān [1,900 ft.]), and ends in the steep hills overlooking the Wādy el-Ḥammām at the Sea of Gennesaret. Its caves, difficult of access, were the hiding-places of the "robbers" against whom Herod had to wage a hard struggle (Jos. BJ, I, 16 2, 4). The fastnesses (I Mac 9 2; read Μεσαδώθ = Heb. meṣādhōth) against which the Syrian general Bacchides operated in 145 B.C. are found here. To the N. of the chain extends the Plain of er-Rāme.

The watershed continues N. from Tabor with many turnings to W and E. On the whole, it gradually draws near to the Jordan Valley, and at Hūnīn (2,950 ft.), not far from the sources of the Jordan, identifies itself with the bordering range of Upper Galilee. It ends in the Jebel ed-Daḥī, which separates the Liṭānī on the W. from the Nahr el-Ḥāṣbānī to the E. To the W. of the watershed stretches the highland of Upper Galilee, an irregular quadrangle, wider in the S. than in the N. Jebelet el-'Arūs, W. of Ṣafed, forms the SE. corner. The western edge runs from the village Kisrā (2,520 ft.), over Tell Belāṭ (2,020 ft.) and Khirbet Belāṭ (2,467 ft.) to Jebel Jamle (2,624 ft.), N. of the medieval fortress Tibnin (2,412 ft.). The eastern line is somewhat broad in the S., viz., from Jebel Jermaḳ (3,922 ft.), the highest mountain of Galilee, to the heights of Ṣafed, known also as Jebel Ṣafed, and famous for its abundance of water (here lies the Mērōn [Merom] of Jos 11 5, 7), as also for its fertile upland plain. Several old roads lead from this place in different directions—one through the Wādy el-'Amūd S. to the Sea of Gennesaret, another through the Wādy el-Ḳarn W to the coast at ez-Zīb (Achzib, Jg 1 31), and another through the Wādy ed-Dubbe and the Wādy Selūḳiye N. to Nahr el-Ḳāsimīye and the region of Sidon. The inner part of the quadrangle is traversed by two chains of mountains. One extends from Jebel el-Ghābiye, SW of Ḳades (the Kadesh of Jos 20 7) to the NW. to Khirbet el-Yādūn, near Tibnīn; the other from Jebel Jermaḳ also toward the NW to Khirbet Belāṭ. Between both these lie several fertile, well-cultivated, also wooded, upland plains. SW of the second range the land is barren and waste, except the small depression el-Buḳē'a, near the village of the same name.

11. The Plains Between the Mountains and the Coast.

It is characteristic of Pal. and of southern Syria that plains, smaller or larger in size, extend between the mountains and the coast. Due to the convergence of the coast-line from W. to E. toward the mountains, they are of triangular shape, with the apexes toward the N. The Plain of Acco extends from the promontory Rās en-Nāḳūra (see § 2, above) to the N. foot of Carmel, 12 m. long from N. to S., and 4 m. broad at the S. end. The northern part is fertile and occupied by peaceful villages. The middle part is crossed by the Nahr Na'amān (the Belus of antiquity) and is marshy, because the sand-dunes at the shore choke the outlet of the stream. The southern part, near the lower Kishon, is also marshy, yet covered with a richer growth of grass, and on the coast near Ḥaifā a small grove of palms beautifies the landscape. The second plain consists of the narrow strip between Carmel and the coast, about 18 m. long and not more than 2–3 m. wide. Its S. boundary is formed by the Nahr ez-Zerḳā (the Crocodile river of Pliny, HN, V, 17), in the marshes of which, not far from its mouth, crocodiles are still to be found. The heights of Bilād er-Rōḥa (see § 8) extend in a spur, el-Khashm (554 ft.) to the plain. It is to these heights, perhaps, that the expression nāphath, or nāphōth dōr, refers—a region which in Jos 11 2, 12 23 is distinguished from the Shephelah and other parts of Pal., and is probably the same as the "heights of Dor" (mod. Ṭanṭūra on the sea-coast). S. of the Nahr ez-Zerḳā the level landscape becomes much broader. This region is known in the O T as Sharon (Heb. hash-shārōn), which probably means 'the plain,' and was famed for its abundance of water and luxuriant vegetation (Is 33 9, 35 2, 65 10 [here the text is corrupt]; Song 2 1). It was consequently well known for its excellent pasturage (I Ch 27 29). The water that drains down from the mountains is checked near the coast by a line of sandy or rocky hills, so that, in addition to the streams, there are a number of marshes and pools, water being easily reached also by digging. In some places these natural dikes have been opened by man to take away the excess of water. In this way, e.g., the Nahr el-Fālik, N. of Arsūf, arose. The landscape is not destitute of isolated hills or chains of hills; e.g., near Kerkūr E. of Cæsarea, and again SW of Kalansawe and to the NE. of Joppa. In Israel's time these were probably covered with forests, since as late as the crusades mention is made of woods in the Plain of Sharon. To-day only insignificant remnants remain. On the average the plain is about 230 ft. higher in the E. than in the W. At Cæsarea it is about 7½ m. wide, at Joppa about 12½ m. Its S. boundary runs from the mouth of Nahr Rūbīn (Map III, C 5), past the hill near er-Ramle (3 m. SE. of Lydda), to Laṭrūn (near 'Amwās [Emmaus, Map III, D 5]). During the past thirty years the cultivation of this plain has made great progress. Near Joppa the beautiful orange-groves have become very extensive. The German Templars, the Syrian Orphan-house at Jerusalem, and some Jewish societies have settled agricultural colonies near Joppa and Lydda, and these have made a decided impression on the native farmers.

S. of er-Ramle the Shephelah begins, regarding the E. border of which, near the central mountain range, mention has already been made (§ 7, above). The Heb. hash-shᵉphēlāh is generally rendered in the LXX. by ἡ (γὴ) πεδινή, more rarely by τὸ πεδίον, or transliterated by ἡ σεφηλά. The Vulgate renders it planities or campestria, "lowland" ARV. One must not think of the Shephelah as one great plain. On the contrary, this region, once the home of the Philistines, is divided into several plains separated by chains of hills. One is near 'Ḳir (Ekron) and Yebnā (Jabneh), on the lower course of the Wādy eṣ-Ṣarār, called at its mouth Nahr Rubīn. Another is near Esdūd (Ashdod) and 'Arāḳ el-Menshīye, on the lower course of the Wādy el-Afranj, which unites with the Wādy eṣ-Sanṭ (the "Valley of Elah," IS 17 2), and is called, at its mouth, Nahr Sukrēr. The chains of hills generally run E. and W., e.g., the one from Bēt Nettīf (1,515 ft.) past Shēkh Dā'ūd (590 ft.), el-Khēme (298 ft.), and Beshīt (197 ft.) to Jabneh (83 ft.). Or the second one from Bet 'Auwā (1,495 ft.) 8 m. W. of Hebron, near ed-Dawā'ime and past Shēkh 'Alī (1,367 ft.), Tell Ibdis (452 ft.), Chirbet 'Ejjis er-Rās (331 ft.) to Khirbet Yāsīn (114 ft.) near Ashdod. Another line of hills runs from Ashdod parallel to the coast to Sumsum and Der Esnēd, near Gaza. In the vicinity of the Wādy el-Ḥesī the hills extend W. for about 12 m. The most important are Tell en-Nejīle (541 ft.) and Tell el-Ḥesī (341 ft.). Near the Wādy esh-Sherī'a the Shephelah gradually blends with the level plain of the Western Negeb (see § 6, above). From this brief description it follows that the expression "plain of the Philistines" (Ob ver. 19), which is often used to-day, does not correspond to the character of the Shephelah. The O T understands by the term 'Shephelah' the whole hilly region as far as the sand-dunes and the rocky heights of the coast; so also the Onomasticon of Eusebius and of Jerome (296, 154; ed. De Lagarde). In Is 11 14 "shoulder [kāthēph] of the Philistines" stands for the Shephelah. In Jos 10 40, 12 8, 'ăshēdhōth, "slopes," means not the hills of the Shephelah, but the lower slopes at the foot of the mountain region. The expression in Jos 11 16, 'the Shephelah of the hill-country of Israel,' as though in contrast to a Shephelah of the Judæan hill-country, has no basis in the natural characteristics of the land. There is no Shephelah N. of Wādy Malāke (§ 7, above).

(a) Here the Jordan cleft will be discussed only in general and mainly from the point of view of its relation to the surrounding country. The depression begins on the W side of Mt. Hermon in the Wādy et-Teim, through which the most northern of the sources of the Jordan, the Nahr el-Ḥaṣbānī (so named from the city Ḥāṣbēyā, on Mt. Hermon, near which the largest spring breaks forth from a basalt cliff, 705 ft. above the sea), flows in a southerly direction.

12. The Jordan Valley and the Dead Sea.

After traversing the high Plain of Merj 'Ayūn (Ijon; cf. I K 15 20; II K 15 29) E. of the watershed, it rushes with rapid descent into the ravine of the Jordan, which takes its rise on the southern foot of Hermon, near the largest of the springs that form the source of the river. At Tell el-Ḳāḍī (Dan, Jg 18 28 ff.), an extinct crater, there are two springs whose waters flow into the Nahr el-Leddān, the "little Jordan" of Josephus (BJ, IV, 1 1). Further to the E., overlooking the village Bāniyās (Pancas, Jos. BJ, II, 9 1), several springs unite to form the third source of the Jordan, the Nahr Bāniyās. Here is to be found the deep grotto, sacred to Pan, from which, according to Josephus, the visible course of the Jordan has its beginning (Ant. XV, 10 3; BJ, I, 21 3; III, 10 7). The condition of the cave is much altered now, since, in all probability, an earthquake has broken the rocks of the roof and filled the cave to a large extent with the fallen blocks of stone. The three streams above mentioned unite about 5 m. S. of Tell el-Ḳāḍī at an elevation of 141 ft. above the sea. The descent of the Nahr el-Leddān averages 74 ft. to a mile, that of the Nahr Bāniyās 240 ft. The small plain through which the Jordan now rushes is called Ard el-Ḥūle (Οὐλάθα, Jos. Ant. XV, 10 3; XVII, 2 1; Ḥūlᵉtā in the Talmud; cf. Neubauer, La Géographie du Talmud, p. 27). This name originated before the beginning of the Christian Era. It is found also in other parts of Syria, e.g., between the Nuṣairier Mts. and the Orontes, W. of Ḥamā, and probably signifies 'a depression' or 'basin' (cf. Eli Smith in Robinson, Bibl. Researches, III, Append., pp. 139–179). This basin is about 15 m. long and 6 m. wide, is well watered, since many small streams empty into it from both E. and W., and consequently is very fertile, although covered with impenetrable thickets of reeds and papyrus. The S. end of this marshy tract is covered with water, forming a small lake, the Baḥrat el-Ḥūle, in shape like a pear, as the S. end is narrow owing to the encroaching hills. English scholars speak of its elevation as being 7 ft. above the sea, but this figure is somewhat uncertain (cf. Survey of W. Pal. Memoirs, I, 195). Its depth is from 10 to 17 ft., varying with the time of the year. On the whole, it is gradually growing less, as a comparison of its present circumference (from 3.6 to 3.2 m.) with the statements of Josephus (BJ, IV, 1 1) clearly shows. This author calls it the Sea of the Semechonites (the inhabitants of Semecho). Among the different names current in later Jewish tradition, one (סמכו) agrees with this name. (Cf. Monatsschrift für Gesch. u. Wissenschaft d. Judenthums, 1860, iii.) To-day the whole region is too swampy to be inhabited and is not traversed by any road. In the N. part of its course, the Jordan is crossed by only two old roads: near its source by one that comes from Tyre through northern Galilee and goes on by the S. foot of Hermon to Damascus, by the second, between the Baḥrat el-Ḥūle and the Sea of Gennesaret which, coming from Damascus, crossed the Jordan near the present bridge, Jisr Benāt Ja'ḳūb, descended into the Plain of Gennesaret, and thence led up from the seashore through the Wādy el-Ḥammām to the Horn of Ḥaṭṭīn, and reached the sea, either via the Plain el-Baṭṭōf or over Ṭur'ān, at Acco. This was called "the way of the sea" (Is 9 1; by the Crusaders via maris). The Baḥrat el-Ḥūle is 9 m. distant from the Sea of Gennesaret, and, as the latter lies 692 ft. below sea-level, the fall of the Jordan between the two seas averages about 75 ft. to a mile. Its bed is narrow and shut in by basalt cliffs. There are but five fords between Baḥrat el-Ḥūle and the Sea of Gennesaret.

(b) Both the course of the Jordan and the surrounding country S. of the Sea of Gennesaret take on an altogether different character. The banks of the river consist mainly of loose marl or clay, through which, in the spring, the stream often makes for itself new channels. Consequently, the river water becomes an increasingly dirty yellow as it flows on its course. On both sides the river-bottom is quite wide and correctly described in the common Arabic speech as consisting of two parts: (a) That immediately near the Jordan is called ez-Zōr. It includes the bed of the river, but applies particularly to the rank growth of trees, shrubs, and reeds along the banks, inhabited by wild beasts, and called "the pride of the Jordan" (Zec 11 3; Jer 49 19, 50 44). The stream is usually hidden from the view even of one close at hand by this dense growth, also by its high banks. But after the rainy season it rises so high that even the trees along its banks are under water. On the E. side, this green strip along the river-bank is often broader and more level than it is on the W. side. (β) The broader region making up the whole river-bottom, together with the deep depression covered by the water of the Dead Sea, the immense cleft extending from the Sea of Gennesaret to the Dead Sea and beyond is called el-Ghōr, i.e., 'the depression.' In the O T there is no similar name for this general region. The common term hā-'ărābhāh (Jos 18 18, etc.) denotes the dry, mostly barren tracts that prevail near the Dead Sea and about the lower course of the Jordan. The level, low-lying districts receive the name hā'ēmeq (Jos 13 27) and biq'āh (Dt 34 3). Greek writers were the first to use the term αὐλών, 'ravine,' 'valley,' 'hollow,' corresponding to the common Arabic term (Diodor. II, 48 9; XIX, 98 4; Jos. Ant. XVI, 5 2; BJ, I, 21 9; Eus. Onom. 214 f.). The W. part of the Jordan Valley is now accurately known through the map published by the English surveyors. The E. side, as far as the Jabbok, has been surveyed by the German Pal. Verein, but the map is not yet published; consequently exact information regarding this part of the valley is not available at present. S. of the Sea of Gennesaret the region around the Jordan is very well watered and cultivated, especially on the E. side. Here the Yarmūk (so named as early as the Talmud [Para 8 9], the Hieromices of Pliny, V, 18) carries into the valley as large a volume of water as the Jordan itself. There is an important passage of the Jordan 6 m. S of the Sea of Gennesaret (823 ft. below the sea), the "bridge of the junctions," Jisr el-Mejamī', so called because here the roads from Tiberias, Bēsān (Beth-shan), and from the E. Jordan land come together. Near the old bridge a new one has been built over which the railroad from Ḥaifā to Damascus crosses the Jordan. On the W side there is a very fertile and well-watered region in the neighborhood of Bēsān. It consists of a plain, part of which slopes down to the Jordan, which is traversed by the Nahr Dschālūd (§ 9), and by many small brooks that flow down from Jebel Fuḳū'a, which lies to the W It is in the form of a triangle, its N. side being 12–15 m. long, its E. side, as far as the mouth of the Wādy el-Māleḥ, 11 m. In I Mac 5 22 and Jos. Ant. XII, 8 5, it is called "the great Plain," a name elsewhere applied to the Plain of Esdraelon (§ 9, above).

From the mouth of the Nahr Dschālūd downward the river-bed is shut in by steep cliffs of marl, the layers of which are easily undermined and fall into the river, at times damming it up and stopping its flow. It is due to this that the course of the river changes so often and is so tortuous. Between the Wādy el-Māleḥ and the Wādy Abu Sidre the spurs of the western mountains approach so near to the Jordan that there is no room for a level bottom and, of course, no cultivation of the barren soil. Only the broad valleys of Karn Sarṭabe, especially the Wādy Fār'a (§ 8), had in ancient times well-watered settlements. On the E. side also the soil is barren and uncultivated. On this side the Nahr ez-Zerḳā, the Jabbok of the O T (Dt 2 37, 3 16), brings down a large quantity of water from the heights of the E. Jordan land, but only its edges are covered with a thick growth of vegetation. From Karn Sarṭabe the bed of the valley widens considerably, but does not become more fertile. Only in the neighborhood of Jericho, mod. Erīḥā (820 ft. below the sea), do we find a more attractive region, though its cultivation to-day is far behind that which it was in the time of Herod (cf. Jos. Ant. XV, 4 2; BJ, I, 18 5). The E. side, opposite Jericho, is now covered with vegetation and well cultivated. It corresponds to the hash-Shiṭṭīm of the O T (Nu 25 1), the "Abila of Peræa" of Josephus (BJ, II, 13 2). Here are to be found the ruins Tell Kefrēn (Abel-shittim, Nu 33 49) and Tell Rāme (Beth-haram). But these green spots are really oases, surrounded by barren country. Consequently, the all-inclusive name for this region in the O T is 'arbhōth, i.e., 'steppes'; 'steppes ("plains" RV) of Jericho' for the western part (Jos 5 10), and 'steppes of Moab' for the eastern part (Nu 22 1). The nearer the Dead Sea, the more salty and barren the soil becomes, due to the alkali of the sea, which has an effect some distance inland. In the O T, therefore, the name of the most southern district W of the Jordan, the "Valley of Achor," is the proverbial expression for a cheerless waste (Hos 2 15; Is 65 10). About 4 m. from the mouth of the Jordan the marl cliffs recede from its banks toward the base of the mountains, so that the N. end of the Dead Sea is surrounded by a level shore.

If we now raise the question whether the Jordan Valley is conducive to or hinders intercourse between the two sides of the country through which it runs, the answer must be different for different parts of the long stretch from the Sea of Gennesaret to the Dead Sea, which is about 68 m., with a descent from 682 below the sea at Gennesaret to 1,292 ft. at the Dead Sea. The upper part of the course, near Bethshan, offers no serious hindrance to such intercourse. The fords are here very numerous. It is otherwise, however, with the lower part of the course. At the mouth of the Nahr ez-Zerḳā there is the important old ford ed-Dāmiye, the O T ma'ăbhar hā-'ădhāmāh (I K 7 46; II Ch 4 17 f.; corrected text), in the place of which, during and after the rainy season, a ferry-boat is used. The bridge Jisr ed-Dāmiye, built in the 13th cent., is no longer used, as both the Jordan and Nahr ez-Zerḳā have changed their courses. Here the depth of the valley (1,144 ft. below the sea) and its width (8–9 m.) make the crossing a somewhat laborious undertaking. This is even more the case below the Zerḳā; for the valley grows continually lower and wider, and, in addition, there are no fords except near Jericho, where there are five. Ten years ago the Turkish Government built here a small bridge, which has made the crossing easier for riders and for beasts of burden.

(c) The Dead Sea is but the continuation of the Jordan cleft, in fact, its deepest part. The water of this solitary inland sea is deep blue and its surface lies 1,292 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean. Its depth varies greatly. N. of the low peninsula, el-Lisān, it reaches 1,308 ft. (2,600 ft. below the surface of the Mediterranean), but in the smaller southern part it is only from 3 to 20 ft. The level of the water in the sea varies, not only during the year (to the extent of 6–7 ft. according to the rainfall), but also during longer periods. To-day it seems to be rising, since in 1820 the southern extremity could be crossed on foot, which is now impossible, and a small island not far off the NW. shore has become invisible during the past few years. The shore of both the N. and S. ends is low and level. In the S. it is a briny marsh (es-Sabkha), only passable in midsummer. On the E. and W shores, however, high and steep mountains reach close to the water. These must be considered as the fragments of the original surface, which stood on the edges of the cleft. What was between them sank and now lies under the sea.

Here we touch upon the question of the origin of the Dead Sea, to which scientific investigation gives an answer altogether different from that furnished by the hints we find in the O T. According to Gn 13 10, 19 25, the Dead Sea originated simultaneously with the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah. In fact, in Gn 14 3 the plain, which is now covered by the waters of the salt sea, is called "Siddim" (perhaps originally hash-shēdhīm, 'plain of the demons'). These stories are remains of old Canaanite legends which were taken over by Israel and survived until a late period (Wis 10 6 f.; Jos. BJ, IV, 8 4). The theory has been advanced that the Dead Sea is an isolated remnant of the ocean that once rolled its waves into the Jordan Valley from the S. and after its subsidence left this salt sea in the midst of the mainland. But this theory is contrary to the fact that across the Wādy el-'Araba, the southern extension of the Jordan cleft, as far as the Red Sea, there lies a watershed (er-Rīshe) composed of chalkstone, 820 ft. above the sea-level, which has never been crossed by ocean waves. As a matter of fact, the Dead Sea originated simultaneously with the fault that formed the Jordan depression, and is to be viewed as the deepest part of this cleft.

The geologist who has recently investigated this question most thoroughly, Dr. M. Blanckenhorn, puts the disturbance that formed the Jordan Valley at the close of the Tertiary period. According to him, there was originally, on the site of the Dead Sea, a deep basin into which the water from all the surrounding country flowed. This somewhat shallow body of water became strongly impregnated with mineral salts from the hot springs which broke forth when the Jordan cleft was formed. At that time this sea covered the whole region from the height of er-Rīshe, in the Wādy el-'Araba, to near the Sea of Gennesaret. The basis of this theory is the fact that deposits from water much fresher than that of the present sea are found on the slopes of the Wādy el-'Araba, about 1,400 ft. above the present surface of the Dead Sea. Dr. Blanckenhorn distinguishes three rainy periods and three dry periods in the formation of the Dead Sea, which have left their traces in the deposits at different elevations around the edge of the sea. Through successive geological disturbances the basin gradually sank to its present depth. During the sixth period (the third dry period) the sea came to its present condition. This took place at the beginning of the alluvial period, as is evident from the disintegration of the diluvial material in the southern part of the old sea-bed, which came about when the crust that formed the bottom of the valley gave way under the force of earthquakes. In this way, it is thought, the shallow southern part of the sea was formed, while at the same time there was cut, in the Jordan cleft, the present river-channel with its surrounding territory, called ez-Zōr by the Arabs (see above). In this later period of the history of the Dead Sea Dr. Blanckenhorn places the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah. That these lay, not at the N., but at the S. end of the sea is certain, since Zoar (Gn 19 20 ff.) was near Sodom, and was situated to the SE. of the Dead Sea (cf. Jos. BJ, IV, 8 4; Onom. ed. De Lagarde, 261, 139; Muḳaddasi, in ZDPV, 1884, VII, 171; Fulcherius, in Bongars, Gesta Dei, I, 405), so that the old legend agrees with the conclusion of geology to this extent, that both indicate that the S. end of the sea was the scene of violent physical disturbances which might have deeply impressed themselves on the memory of early generations. The petrified wife of Lot, the "pillar of salt" of Gn 19 26, Wis 10 6 f., belongs to the formations which are continually making and disappearing in the neighborhood of Jebel Usdum ('Mt. Sodom'), the salt mountain at the SW corner of the sea, 590 ft. above the surface. From the mass of the mountain sections break off, in form like prisms, which, after being worn away, become isolated pillars of salt, and easily take on the appearance of human beings, especially that of women. Similar rock pillars, though existent for a much longer time, are to be found in the dolomite and sandstone formations near the Dead Sea. One sandstone rock on the E. shore S. of the mouth of the Wādy el-Mōjib is to-day called by the Arabs Bint Shēkh Lūṭ ('daughter of Sheikh Lot').

An Eastern Jordan Wady, or Brook-ravine (by Some Identified with the Brook Cherith, I Ki 17

13. The E. Jordan Land.

The E. Jordan plateau, which extends to the border of the desert (§ 4, above), is divided, in its W part, into four main regions. (a) The district N. of the Yarmūk. This extends much farther E. than the other divisions of the E. Jordan land, namely, from 18 to 30 m. E. of 36° E. long., which (§ 3, above) has been accepted as the E. boundary of Palestine. It has never received an all-inclusive name, because its individual districts show too distinctive characteristics and have never been firmly united politically.

Above the upper course of the Jordan and the Sea of Gennesaret rises the plateau of Jōlān, which has received its name from the city called in the O T Golan (Jos 20 8, 21 27). In the N. the foot of Hermon gives a fixed boundary, but there is none to the NE. and E. The valleys are broad and shallow. In the N. the watershed flows toward the Wādy el-'Ajam, S. of Damascus, and in the E. toward the region known as Jēdūr. If one should follow the line of extinct volcanoes which extend in a wide circle from the foot of Hermon to the SE., he would come to the Nahr el-'Allān, which is considered to-day as the E. boundary of the Jōlān. In fact, it indicates a significant change in the surface of the country, since E. of it the volcanic hills and great blocks of lava disappear and a broad, stoneless, level plain begins.

The S. and W. boundaries of the Jōlān are fixed—the Yarmūk, the Sea of Gennesaret, and, above this, the Jordan. In the O T the names given to this country are (Beth) Maacha and Geshur (Dt 3 14; Jos 13 11-13). To-day it is customary to distinguish between the rocky and the level Jōlān. The former is the N. half, a plateau with numerous craters in the NE. part, and covered with huge blocks and fragments of lava, abounding in springs and highly valued for its excellent pasture. The craters attain a height of 4,000 ft. or more (Tell esh-Shēkha, 4,243 ft.; Tell Abu en-Neʿdā, 4,123 ft.), and are still partly covered with oaks or scrub-oaks. Formerly, the region was heavily wooded, and a century ago was called Tulūl el-Hish, 'forest heights.' The level Jōlān, the southern half, begins with an elevation of about 2,300 ft., is less rich in springs, but is covered with a dark-brown volcanic soil of great productivity, although little used for agriculture. The ground slopes rapidly toward the Sea of Gennesaret on one side and toward the Yarmūk on the other. The territory in the angle formed by the Nahr el-'Allān, the Yarmūk, and the Sea of Gennesaret is called to-day ez-Zāwiye, 'the corner,' which corresponds to the Gr. name γωνία τῆς Βαταναίας, given to it by Eusebius (Onom. 242).

E. of Nahr el-'Allān there begins a stoneless plain in which there are a few small artificial mounds and volcanic hills, where are found villages or ruins of earlier habitations. The soil is reddish-brown, composed of disintegrated lava from the craters of the mountains to the E., Jebel Ḥaurān or Jebel ed-Drūz, mixed with volcanic ashes and sand. It is easily worked and holds the moisture of the rainfalls tenaciously—a fact of great importance for its cultivation, since the country is destitute of springs. The wheat produced here, with its translucent kernels, is a choice article of commerce. Trees are rare. In view of the fact that the plain is somewhat lower in the center than on the edges, it is called by the Bedawin en-Nuḳra, 'depression' (a word used of the hearth which the Bedawin dig in the center of the guest-tent). The name Ḥaurān is also common. From N. to S. this plain has an average elevation of 2,130 ft. It slopes to the W. and the wādis ed-Dahab and ez-Zādi carry the water in the rainy season to the Yarmūk. To the NE. the Nuḳra borders on the Lejāh, a remarkably rough and impassable region (see TRACHONITIS) and to the E. on the Jebel Ḥaurān, which in modern times, because of its occupancy by the Druses, is also called Jebel ed-Drūz, 'Mt. of the Druses.' Here is the source of the lava-beds of the Nuḳra; for the cone- or gable-shaped heights of the mountain are all extinct volcanoes and rise to a height of 5,900 ft., while the plain at their feet begins with an elevation of but 2,624 ft. This mountain, rising gradually from the W. to E., is probably mentioned in the Bible, as F. G. Wetzstein has noted (Das Batanäische Giebelgebirge, 1884). He compared the name "Zalmon" (Ps 68 14) with the mons Asalmanos (Ptol. V, 15) and the har gabh-nunnīm, 'mountain of gables' ("high mountain," Ps 68 15, "mountain of summits" RVmg.), he identified with the gable-like peaks and volcanic cones of the Ḥaurān range. These "mountains of Bashan" (Ps 68 15) were never in the possession of Israel, but the plain was; for this corresponds to the Bashan of the O T (usually ha-bāshān), Gr. Βασανῖτις, Βαταναία. The region seems then to have possessed other characteristics than it does now. We hear nothing of the rich produce of agriculture which is now reaped yearly, but, on the contrary, of strong, fat cattle (Am 4 1; Dt 32 14; Ps 22 12), and of the beautiful oaks (Is 2 13; Ezk 27 6), and even of lions and leopards which had their haunts in Bashan (Dt 33 22; Song 4 8). The wild beasts have long since disappeared from this region, and unfortunately the forests also, remnants only of which exist now in upper Jōlān. While in the O T Bashan is usually associated with pasture-lands (Jer 50 19; Mic 7 14), to-day it is mostly under the plow. This change is due to the fact that in ancient times the disintegration of the lava had not as yet made much progress, and the country was less passable, like the rocky Jōlān is at present. In the O T, Bashan denotes a region larger than the modern Nuḳra. It lay between Hermon on the N. and Gilead on the S. and between Edrei (mod. Der'ā) and Salcha (Salkhad) on the E. (Dt 3 8 ff.), yet so that the districts Geshur and Maacha lay W. of Bashan, between it and the Sea of Gennesaret (Jos 13 11-13). To the E. and S. the limits of the level volcanic region are, of course, unchangeable. To the E. were the "mountains of Bashan" (Ps 68 15, mod. Jebel Ḥaurān), and to the S. began the steppe (mod. el-Ḥamād) sharply distinguished from the volcanic region by its bright yellow soil. But to the N. and W the Bashan of the O T covered more territory than the mod. Nuḳra.

(b) S. of the Yarmūk lies the second part of the E. Jordan land, the 'Ajlūn, approximately bounded on the E. by the 36th parallel E. long., and reaching S. as far as the Nahr ez-Zerḳā, the Jabbok of the O T. In the first place, something must be said of the Yarmūk, the large river to the N. It drains a very large territory. From el-Jedūr in the NE. to the Lejāh and Jebel Ḥaurān in the E. and as far as the steppe el-Ḥamād and the district eṣ-Ṣuwēt in the SE., all watercourses unite in this river, which swells to a great stream after a rainy winter, though in summer it is nothing remarkable. From Jōlān come the Wādy er-Ruḳḳād and the Nahr el-'Allān. The Wādy el-Ehrēr, forming the upper course of the Yarmūk, takes its rise in Jēdūr. The Wādy el-Bajje gives an outlet to the Baḥrat el-Bajje, an old sea of small area with a cultivated island in it, near el-Muzērīb, and unites with the Wādy ed-Dahab near Tell esh-Shihāb. From the SE. the deep and imposing Wādy esh-Shellāle winds with many turns through the plateau, taking the name Wādy el-Warrān in its lower course. On the lower course of the Yarmūk, about 7 to 10 m. from its junction with the Jordan, lies the remarkable little plain of el-Ḥammi (577 ft. below the sea), mostly on the right bank, in which there are six hot springs, each different from the other in the character and temperature of its water (ZDPV, 1887, X, 59 ff.).

The ridge of the plateau lies some distance to the E. It rises from el-Ḥuṣn (2,204 ft.) southward, and the heights of Rās Imnīf, Rās el-Fanadīk, and el-Menāra indicate the line of watershed between the valleys that slope toward the Jordan and the tributaries of the Yarmūk that flow northward. This range, called Jebel 'Ajlūn, is still well wooded, the thick growth of oaks and firs being in some places impenetrable, while the soil is covered with moss. To the E. lies an undulating hilly region 7–9 m. in breadth, which slopes away from Tell el-Khanāṣire and the more southerly Riḥāb (the Rehob of II S 10 6, 8) toward the steppe el-Ḥamād on the one side, and on the other from Kafkafa to the Jabbok. This district is called Bilād eṣ-Ṣuwēt and is to-day still in the possession of the Bedawin (the Beni Ḥasan), but in the time of the Romans and in the first centuries of Mohammedan rule it was a seat of high civilization, well protected by roads and fortifications. The western foothills of Jebel 'Ajlūn sink, at first gradually, toward the Jordan and comprise many fertile, well-cultivated districts, e.g., at 'Ajlūn on the Wādy 'Ajlūn, where the olive thrives remarkably and where there are also many small clumps of wood. The slopes near the Jordan are mostly treeless, in some spots (as near Mukēs [Gadara]) well cultivated, in others steep and rocky. The streams that here empty into the Jordan are short and insignificant (in the wādys el-'Arab, Yābis, 'Ajlūn, and Rājib). From Sākib onward the above-mentioned ridge runs SW. and W under the name Jebel Mi'rāḍ. To the S. it falls precipitously toward the Jabbok and to the W toward the Jordan. On its N. side, 2 m. SE. of Rajīb (Ragaba), are the remains of old iron-works (Mughārat el-Warda), which remind one of the Iron Mountain of Josephus (BJ, IV, 8 2).

(c) The third part of the E. Jordan land is the Belḳā, between the Jabbok and the Wādy el-Mōjib (the Arnon) to the S. (d) A fourth part (the modern administrative district el-Kerak) lies between the Arnon and the Wādy el-Aḥsā (Ḥasā) in the S. The northern part of the Belḳā is taken up by Jebel Jil'ād, the Mt. Gilead of the O T. It rises precipitously out of the Valley of the Jabbok and over the Jordan Valley, and contains a number of fertile plateaux, partly covered with woods, partly with fields and vineyards. Its highest point is Jebel Osha' (Hosea; cf. Map III, J 4), near the Jordan Valley, from whose peak one may enjoy an instructive view of the western range and its slope to the Jordan. To the E. of it is a small plain, el-Buḳē'a (2,000 ft. above the sea), nestled in the mountain region, which is drained into the Jabbok by deep valleys. To the SE., Mt. Gilead is identical with the high watershed on which the springs of the Jabbok are found. It runs by the ruins Agbêhêt (Jogbeha, Jg 8 11, 3,443 ft.) through the old Ammonite territory from N. to S. This ridge sends its brooks to the Jordan, partly through the Wâdy Shu'êb, which leads down from Jebel Ôsha', and partly through the Wâdy Ṣîr, which unites with the Wâdy Ḥesbân (Heshbon) and enters the Jordan at Tell Ḳefrēn, opposite Jericho. The ridge continues S. to Ma'în (Baal Meon, Nu 32 38) and then, when it has sunk to a level of 2,853 ft., it divides between the short valleys, which run directly W with a steep incline to the Jordan, and the longer valleys, which at first begin in broad troughs leading southward, and then unite in the Wâdy Zerḳâ Ma'în, which cuts through the plateau with a deep gorge and breaks down into the Dead Sea at the hot springs Ḥammam ez-Zerḳa (the Callirhoë of Jos. BJ, I, 33 5). S. of Wâdy Zerḳâ Ma'în we lose trace of the ridge which we have followed in its tortuous course between the Jordan and the desert to the E., and to which the landscape owes its peculiar character. The plateau now has a different and much simpler aspect. It rises to the E. and forms a watershed on the other side of which the Arabian Desert begins—about 6 m. E. of the 36th parallel. It is cut up by a large number of small wâdys that soon unite to form larger valleys and finally meet in one main valley which leads through a deep gorge to the Dead Sea. The first of these main valleys in the Belḳâ, like the Yarmûk and Jabbok in the N., is the Wâdy el-Mojîb, the Arnon of the O T. With its large northern tributary, the Wâdy Heidân, or el-Wâle, it gathers the waters of the plateau W. of the desert from a region extending 50 m. along the edge of the desert.

The slope of the highlands toward the Dead Sea is extraordinarily steep along the northern half of the eastern shore. Between the rocks and the water there is not room for even a small foot-path. Since the crest of the range attains an elevation of from 2,600 to 3,300 ft., the difference between it and the surface of the sea is anywhere from 3,900 to 4,600 ft. Near the low peninsula el-Lisân the shore is wider. A road descends from the heights through a valley and leads along the beach, thence southward into the Wâdy el-'Araba. The character of the plateau remains the same.

Of the valleys which cut across it on their way to the salt sea, the most important are the Wâdy el-Kerak, the Wâdy Numêra, and the Wâdy el-Ḥasâ, or Aḥsâ, which in its lower course is called Wâdy el-Ḳurâḥî. The last-named is to-day the boundary between the administrative district el-Kerak and Jibâl to the S. It was probably in ancient times the boundary between Moab to the N. and Edom to the S., and so identical with the "brook Zered" (in its upper course, Dt 2 13 f.) and with the "brook of the willows" (in its lower course; cf. Is 15 7). To describe the territory of Edom lies outside the limits of this article.

III. Geology.

The rocks visible to-day belong generally to the upper chalk deposits, which are usually named Cenoman, Turon, and Senon. Some marbles are found, as the soft Rudist marble (Arab. malake) and harder Nerinean marble (Arab. mizzi ḥelu, the Santa Croce marble). The formation of this mountain region took place, therefore, in the chalk period in the Tertiary Era. Older strata are met with E. of the Dead Sea, where the original break of the Jordan cleft is visible. Here is found the so-called Nubian sandstone, and under it the permacarbonic chalk and sandstone, and under this the crystalline old volcanic mountain-base, with streaks of porphyry and diorite. The flinty character of the chalk was decomposed through the action of the water as early as the Tertiary Period, and cemented with a chalky shale. In this way the flinty breccia originated, which is frequently found as a surface formation near Jerusalem, in the Wilderness of Judah and in the 'Ajlûn, and is called nârî by the Arabs, because of its fireproof qualities. It was in the Tertiary Period also that those outpourings of basalt took place which spread themselves over the higher parts of the chalky plateau and on the many isolated table-mountains. This was also the origin of the basalt strata on the plateau E. of the Dead Sea, near Dibon and at Jebel Shîḥân, and of similar formations in the Plain of Esdraelon, and in Galilee, N. and NE. of Tabor, and in the neighborhood of Ṣafed. Of later origin were the lava streams which flowed down toward the Jordan and Dead Sea in the furrow-like valleys, and have become to-day partly eroded by the water, as, for example, in the bed of the Yarmûk. These furrow-like valleys are evidence of the stoppage of the lava in such places, which did not occur before the origin of the Dead Sea (cf. § 12, above). Such eruptions took place in the later part of the Diluvian Era, and therefore probably after the beginning of the human epoch. Whether any of the extinct volcanoes of the E. Jordan land were still active in historical times, in the narrower sense, can not be ascertained. The earthquakes of which we hear in the history of the land were not the result of volcanic eruptions, but were due to structural changes —that is, to vibrations which originated in the displacement of sections of the crust of the earth near faults. Several earthquakes are mentioned in the Bible (I S 14 15; Am 1 1; cf. Zec 14 5; Mt 27 51), and the prophets frequently made use of such occurrences in their representations of the Divine manifestations (Mic 1 3 f.; Is 13 13, 24 19 f.; cf. further C. Diener, Libanon, 1886, pp. 258 ff.).

14. The Rocks.

The old iron-works at Râjib in the E. Jordan land (cf. § 13, above) show that iron was taken from this region in the early days. That mining was not unknown in Pal. is also evident from Dt 8 9 and Job 28 1-11, but that these passages have that specific locality in mind can not be proved. Whether it would be profitable at the present day to mine iron in this land has not been investigated. In recent years attention has been drawn to the mineral treasures of the Dead Sea and its neighborhood, and it has been questioned whether it might not be profitable to develop these. The water of the sea contains, besides common salt, chlorid of potash, chlorid of magnesia, magnesium bromid, and iodid of potash. Occasionally, large quantities of asphalt appear on the surface. In the immediate neighborhood of the sea there are also found rock salt, chrome oxid, and pure sulphur; at some distance away, petroleum, pure asphalt, and asphalt-lime. The "slime pits" mentioned in Gn 14 10 are probably an indication that in early times, through the action of subterranean forces, the diluvian deposits were broken through and petroleum and asphalt springs, or wells, appeared in the neighborhood.

16. The Soil. The surface formation of limestone has long been subject to decomposition through the action of moisture and the atmosphere. The result is a red loamy soil, very rich and heavy. This is the specific virgin soil of the mountain-land. When it is adequately saturated with moisture, it gives a good yield in return for cultivation. In addition, there are a number of places (cf. §§ 9, 10, and 13, above) where the much richer volcanic soil occurs. Through the intense heat of midsummer the soil becomes very hard and cracked, and can be worked only after a thorough wetting. In the coast plain and the Jordan Valley there are considerable marl and sand. At the same time, the level districts of the coast are much more favorable for the production of humus than are the mountains. In the mountain region there is no great deposit of vegetable and animal material, which might be changed into humus through decomposition, and even if, in the autumn, some such material remains left upon the rocky surface, it is almost certain to be washed down in the winter by the heavy rains, to be deposited in part in the hollow places in the mountains, and in part in the deep valleys and low-lying plains. So it happens that in each year, with the wash from the mountain-sides, a great deal of fertile soil is brought down. In the E. Jordan land, in many places, conditions are more favorable for the formation of humus, as extensive wooded places still remain, and the surface rock is protected from erosion by the thick growth of the trees (cf. § 13 (b), above).

IV The Climate.

Since Pal. is situated between 31° and 33° N. lat., it belongs in general to the N. subtropic zone. The year divides itself naturally into a rainless, hot half and a rainy, cold half. The climate differs greatly in the different parts of the land. Along the coast it is milder and more uniform; in the mountain-land it is more severe and changeable. In the Jordan Valley it is really tropical, while in the E. Jordan land the greater distance from the sea and the nearness of the desert are important factors. Since we possess satisfactory meteorological observations for Jerusalem alone, we can apply the results of these only provisionally to the whole land.

17. The Temperature. The mean annual temperature on the coast is 20.5° C. (68.9° F.), in Jerusalem only 17.1° C. (62.8° F.). The temperature rises in the mountain region from April to May very rapidly from 14.7° C. (58.5° F.) to 20.7° C. (69.3° F.). It attains its greatest height in August, at 24.5° C. (76.1° F.). It falls in November to 15.5° C. (59.9° F.) and is lowest in February at 8.8° C. (47.8° F.). The hottest days, usually in May, June, and September, reach a temperature in the shade of 37° C. (98.6° F.) to 44° C. (101.2° F.). The coldest, in January, have a temperature of −4° C. (24.8° F.). Frost and ice are seen every year in Jerusalem. The latter, however, rarely lasts the day through. The differences of temperature within a day are often considerable, greatest in the months May–October, 12.8° C. (55° F.) to 13.1° C. (55.6° F.); smallest in December–February, 7.7° C. (46° F.) to 7.4° C. (45.3° F.). The monthly mean is 22.2° C. (71.9° F.). The dangers arising from these changes are somewhat lessened by the fact that in the hottest months there is the least amount of moisture.

18. The Winds. In the summer, especially in July and August, the so-called passat wind (a northerly, sometimes NW., sometimes NE. wind) blows over Pal. It is a dry wind, as it comes from a cooler into a warmer latitude and tempers the heat. In September and October, also in the spring until May, heavy E. and SE. winds are frequent, which make the heat almost unbearable because of their lack of moisture. In October and November the so-called antipassat wind comes up from the S., usually bringing with it, in Pal., as well as in other Mediterranean lands, abundant rains (§ 19, below), as it comes from a warmer into a cooler region. It continues until April and May, when it retreats once more to the S. The antipassat is generally a W. or a SW. wind (cf. Lk 12 54). Of greatest importance for the W Jordan land is the somewhat regular interchange between land and sea winds, which shows itself both in the yearly period and also in the course of each day. In the summer the hot air over the heated rocky land rises and flows into the upper regions of the atmosphere, toward the sea, while in its place comes the cooler air of the lower strata of the atmosphere from the sea to the land. In the winter, on the other hand, the sea sends to the land warm currents of air, the land sending its cooler air seaward. During each day also a similar exchange of atmospheric currents takes place. During the day warm currents flow seaward, while the cooler air of the sea comes over the land. In the night the reverse process takes place. In consequence of the meeting and interaction of these currents of air, at times violent whirlwinds arise. The E. and SE. winds are the ones most feared, since through their excessive dryness not only health is endangered and all growing things threatened (Ezk 17 10, 19 12), but also because of their violence, and in consequence of the dust and sand which they bring with them, they are actually destructive (Jer 18 17; Ezk 27 26; Job 1 19, 15 2; Heb. rūaḥ, qādhīm, "east wind"; the word shirocco [sirocco] is derived from the Arab. esh-sharḳī, 'easterly').

19. The Rainfall. The cooler rainy period of the year is that in which the antipassat wind prevails (§ 18). According to Biblical terminology, it is subdivided into three periods: (1) The "early rain," Heb. yōreh and mōreh, Gr. πρόϊμος (Ja 5 7), which, during October and November (December at the latest), makes the land moist, and thereby makes possible the beginning of the plowing. (2) The winter rain, Heb. geshem, heavy continuous rains, which soak the soil and fill the wells, cisterns, and pools. (3) The "latter rain,"

Heb. malqōsh, which falls during the latter half of March until the middle of May, fertilizes the summer crops, and causes the grain to ear. The average yearly rainfall in Jerusalem is 581.9 mm. (22.93 in.). On the other hand, at Nazareth, about 60 m. farther N. and nearer the sea, it is 611.7 mm. (24.10 in.). The rainy period is broken up by long seasons of drier weather, when, under the influence of the warm rays of the sun, everything starts to grow. The words in Song 2 11 have reference to the cessation of the winter rain. In Jerusalem the entire rainfall takes place in 52.4 days, 67.5 per cent. being in the months of December and January alone, while from May to September no rain falls at all. Consequently, after May the dry, hot season comes on which is so unfavorable for the growth of vegetation that in midsummer all the smaller plants wither away. Some compensation is afforded by the dew. The sea wind (cf. § 18, above) contains so much moisture that not only in the spring but also even in September and October a heavy dew falls each night (Song 5 2; Job 29 19). There is no dew, however, when the shirocco wind blows from the desert, as it dries up all the moisture in the atmosphere (I K 17 1; Hag 1 10). Thunder-storms do not occur when the passat winds blow, that is, in the summer-time. Thunder and rain during the wheat harvest, therefore, cause great terror (I S 12 17 f.). In the other months thunder-storms are not rare, frequently occurring in April and May. Snow (Heb. sheleg) is usual in winter among the mountains (II S 23 20). In the neighborhood of Jericho it is unknown. Hail (Heb. bārādh) (Job 38 22; Hag 2 17 f.) not unfrequently falls in the winter.

Whether the climate of Pal. has altered during historical times is a much-discussed question. The statements of the Bible, taken as a whole, harmonize with the climatic conditions that obtain at the present day. In one respect, however, a change has taken place. The forests in the W. Jordan land have about completely disappeared. In the earliest times, however, they were present here, as they are now in the E. Jordan land (cf. Jos 17 15; Jer 4 7, 29; Is 9 18; Ezk 20 46 f.; cf. also § 13, above). It is therefore probable that at the present time the variations of temperature are more extreme than was the case formerly.

20. Water-Supply.

The one large river of Pal., the Jordan, because of the depth of its river-bed (see § 12, above), is of no significance for the irrigation of the land. This, however, is not the case with the waters of its tributaries, where they come down from the mountains into the lower and more level parts of the Jordan Valley, e.g., E. of Jordan, the Yarmūk, the Nahr ez-Zerḳā, and the Wādy Kefrēn (or Ḥesbān); and W. of the Jordan, the Nahr Jālūd. This was the case in ancient times to a much higher degree than it is at present, as is evidenced by the ruins of extensive water-works in Bethshan, in the Wādy Fār'a, and at Jericho. The practise of constructing dams and using the water for irrigation purposes is presupposed as well known even in the O T (Ezk 17 7, 31 4; Ps 1 3, 65 10, 104 10; Ec 2 6; Sir 24 42). The remaining rivers of Pal. traverse the coast-plain, the subsoil of which is filled with water and needs drainage rather than irrigation (cf. § 11, above). The highland is almost exclusively dependent upon the rainfall (cf. § 19, above), and on springs. The latter are not found distributed evenly over the mountain region. They are numerous in Upper Galilee, on the S. and SE. edges of the Plain of Esdraelon and near Shechem. The southern part of the mountain country is poor in springs of any size. Not until we reach Hebron do we find them becoming more general, whence they flow northward into the Wādy el-'Arrūb and into the Wādy ed-Dilbe to the SW. It is seldom that a spring is well walled up, e.g., the one at Nazareth, although remains of old structures are frequently found near springs. At the present day they are also furnished with few conveniences, sometimes an old sarcophagus being used as a drinking-trough. Throughout the history of the land, both in peace and war, the springs have played an important rôle. Whoever had possession of them was master of the land. It is evident from what has been said that the water-supply from springs—that is to say, from the rainfall stored in underground recesses—is quite insufficient. Since at the present day practically no provision at all is made for collecting the rain-water on the surface, either by dams or in pools, the water for the most part runs away uncared for. Consequently, droughts and failures of the harvests are not rare in Pal., and if rain is delayed for a long period, many springs become dry. This explains why in the O T so much is said of drought and famine in the land of Israel (II S 21 1; I K 17 1 ff.; Am 4 7 ff.; Jer 14 2-6; Hag 1 6-9, 2 16 f.). The praise of the land as abundantly watered (Dt 8 7) is justified, when it is contrasted with the desert; nevertheless the characterization of it as entirely dependent on the rainfall (Dt 11 10-12) is altogether more correct. The well-known expression "a land flowing with milk and honey" (Ex 3 8, 17, 13 5; Nu 13 27, 14 8, etc.) does not signify the abundant return a land yields for its cultivation, for the honey spoken of is the honey of the wild bees (I S 14 25 f.; Dt 32 13; Mk 1 6), and milk is more closely connected with the pastoral pursuits. The expression probably refers to certain natural characteristics of the land, not to results brought about by the cultivation of the soil. It seems to have been used also of other lands (Nu 16 13), and probably was derived originally from a mythological source (cf. H. Usener in Rheinisches Museum für Philologie, 1902, Bd. 57, pp. 177–195).

V Flora.

The great variations in the character of the soil, in the distribution of water, and in temperature result in a correspondingly great variety in the forms and kinds of flora. In the lower Jordan Valley and by the Dead Sea, along with the subtropical flora, tropical plants are also found, as well as plants that belong to the steppe and desert. The fact that the greater part of the rainfall is limited to a few months, mainly December and January, and that in the following period, from May to December, there is little rain and the heat is intense, is not at all favorable to the flourishing growth of vegetation. The green variegated verdure which covers the land in the spring months of February and March lasts but a little while. For months the landscape is a monotonous gray, especially in the southern hill region of the W. Jordan land.

21. Trees and Shrubs.

The small forests that exist to-day W of the Jordan, on Carmel and Tabor, and in Upper Galilee, give no sure ground for conclusions concerning the appearance and condition of the wooded regions in earlier times in this part of Pal. (see § 19, above). The wooded regions of the E. Jordan land (see § 13, above) are evidence of what the condition once was throughout the land. The individual trees of these forests are not very high or large, nor do they stand very close together. The leaf-bearing trees show little of their stems, since the leafy branches begin generally but a little way from the root. Where lofty trees are found, there is almost no low-growing copse or undergrowth. This is found most frequently on the edges of the forest, or in places where the trees are fewer and on the sides of ravines. The spiniferous trees have a visible stem with almost no lower branches. A forest of leaf-bearing trees consists of several kinds of oak, the Prickly Evergreen, or Scarlet Oak (Quercus pseudococcifera), Arab. Sindjān, and the Valonia-oak (Quercus Ægilops), Arab. Mellūl, also Ballūṭ (or 'Afs); also of the Terebinth (Pistacia Terebinthus), Arab. Buṭm; the Mastic-tree (Pistacia Lentiscus); the Strawberry-tree (Arbutus Unedo and Arbutus andrachne), Arab. Ḳēḳab; the Wild Locust-tree (St.-John's-Bread) (Ceratonia Siliqua), Arab. Kharrūb; the Nettle- or Lotus-tree (Celtis australis), Arab. Mēs; the Wild Oil-tree—not the Olive, but the Oleaster—and the Oil-willow (Elæagnus angustifolia; cf. I K 6 23; Neh 8 15; Is 41 9). The spiniferous trees are represented by several varieties of Fir, Arab. Snōbar (Pinus Halepensis), especially the Carica. More rare is the Cypress (Cupressus sempervirens, or horziontalis). The leafy trees mentioned above are found most generally in stunted form, and often, as brushwood, cover wide stretches of territory, e.g., on the upper Wādy el-'Arrūb N. of Hebron, and on Mounts Tabor and Carmel. It is not improbable that this brushwood is the survival of earlier forests. There are also found, besides the Phillyrea media, the Storax (Styrax officinalis), the Blackthorn and Whitethorn, the Judas-tree (Cercis Siliquastrum), the Rock-rose (Cistus Creticus), the Furze (Genista), the Laurel, the Myrtle, the Caper-bush (Capparis spinosa), and many kinds of Willow, Arab. Ṣafṣāf. Along the brooks the Oleander and the Vitex Agnus-castus—the Abraham-tree—are frequently found.

Of these trees and shrubs not many find mention in the O T. The names for oaks and terebinths occur frequently, but it is difficult to distinguish closely between them. Probably the words 'ēlāh and 'allāh generally signify Terebinth, while 'ēlōn and 'allōn mean the Oak. By berōsh the Cypress was meant. By 'ēts shemen is meant the Oil-willow (see above). It is remarkable that we can not certainly identify the old names for the Fir or Pine. Probably the tidhhār (or te'ashshūr, Is 41 19) signifies these varieties. From this example it is evident how little we can learn from the O T itself of many things once existing in ancient Pal. Libneh signifies the Poplar; 'armōn the Plane-tree (or Maple?). Of shrubs, the resinous varieties are mentioned in the O T. The Balsam, ṣŏrī (Gn 37 25), is probably to be identified with the Pistacia Lentiscus or the Styrax officinalis. The Tragacanth (Heb. nĕkōth) was the exudate of the many Astragalus varieties, and the Ladanum (Heb. lōṭ) the fragrant resin of the Rock-rose (Cistus).

In the Lebanon and Antilebanon regions there are found several varieties of Juniper, while in the E. Jordan land and in Galilee the Juniperus excelsa and Oxycedrus are found. Of Thorns the O T gives us so many names that it is impossible to identify them certainly with any of the many varieties which are now found in the land.

The Jordan depression contains few trees, but shrubs are very numerous. The low thorny Acacia is represented by two varieties, the Acacia tortilis, Arab. Es-Sanṭ, and the Ac. Seyal, Arab. Ac. Seyāl. Thorn-shrubs, which grow as large as small trees, are represented by the Zizyphus Spina-Christi, the Zizyphus Lotus, Arab. Sidr, and by the Cratægus Monogyna, Arab. Sarūr. Both bear edible fruit. Another spiny shrub is the Balanites Ægyptiaca, Arab. Zaḳḳūm, from the walnut-like fruit of which the Arabs prepare the so-called Zacchæus-Oil, which they sell to travelers as Balsam of Jericho, hence the name False Balsam-tree. On the eastern side of the lower Jordan and near En-gedi, the Apple of Sodom grows—the Solanum Sodomæum, Arab. 'Oschr—whose beautiful-appearing fruit breaks with slight pressure and, to one's surprise, is found to be entirely hollow (cf. Wis 10 6 and Jos. BJ, IV, 8 4). The Juniper-bush (I K 19 4) (Retama Rætam) attains a height of more than 10 ft. In the neighborhood of water one meets with beautiful Tamarisks, and the banks of the Jordan (ez-Zōr; cf. § 12, above) have a thick growth of Poplar (Populus Euphratica), Arab. Gharab, which grows only in a tropical climate, of Tamarisks, of the willow-like Vitex Agnus-castus, Arab. Rishrāsh, and of many varieties of Reeds (Juncus and Arundo). The vegetation of the steppes is found not only in the Jordan Valley, but also in the Negeb (cf. § 6, above) and in the Desert of Judah (cf. § 7, above).

[The following list contains the names, Hebrew or Greek, and English, of all the trees and shrubs mentioned in the Bible. The botanical identifications are taken mainly from Tristram, The Natural History of the Bible, 1880[6].

Acacia, shiṭṭah (Ex 25 [5], etc., "shittim" AV), Acacia Seyal (in the Arab. desert); A. farnesiana, A. serissa, and A. tortilis (in Palestine).
Almond: (1) lūz (Gn 30 [37], "hazel" AV). Meaning uncertain. (2) shaqēdh. See Almond.
Almug and Algum, 'algūmīnīm (I K 10 [11 f.]; II Ch 2 [8], 9 [10 f.]). Uncertain, Sandalwood?
Aloes. See Aloes.
Apple, tappūaḥ, probably the Apricot.
Ash, 'ōren (Is 44 [14], "fir" RV), species uncertain.
Balm, tsŏrī (Gn 37 [25], etc.). The fragrant gum of perhaps several different trees.
Bay-tree. See Bay-tree.
Box, te'ashshūr (Is 41 [19], 60 [13]; Ezk 27 [6]). Some variety of Cedar or Cypress is probably meant, but the Box is possible.
Broom. See Juniper (below).
Camphire. See Henna (below).
Cassia: (1) qiddāh. See Ointments and Perfumes, § 1. (2) qetsī'āh (Ps 45 [8]). The Arab. Cassia (Laurus cassia).
Cedar, 'erez. See Cedar.
Chestnut. See Plane-tree (below).
Cinnamon, qinnāmōn. See Ointments and Perfumes, § 1.
Cypress: (1) berōsh. See Fir (below). (2) tirzāh (Is 44 [14], "holm-tree" RV), meaning uncertain.
Ebony, hobhnīm (Ezk 27 [15]).
Elm. See Oak (below).
Fig, te'ēnāh, σῦκον, Ficus carica.
Fir: (1) berōth and berōsh. Probably the Cypress is meant. (2) 'ōren (Is 44 [14], "ash" AV), meaning uncertain.
Frankincense, lebhōnāh. See Ointments and Perfumes, § 2.
Gopher-wood, gōpher (Gn 6 [14]). Probably some variety of Pine or Fir.
Grape. See Vines and Vintage.
Hazel, lūz (Gn 30 [37] AV); cf. Almond (above).
Heath, 'ar'ār (Jer 17 [6], "tamarisk" RVmg. 48 [6]). See Juniper (below); also see Heath.
Henna, kōpher (Song 1 [14], 4 [13]; "camphire" AV), Lawsonia inermis.
Holm. See Cypress (above).
Husks, the pods of the Locust- or Carob-tree.
Juniper: (1) rōthem (I K 19 [4], etc., "broom," Job 30 [4] RV). (2) 'ar'ār. See Heath.
Mulberry, bākhā' (bekhā'īm, pl. II S 5 [23]), meaning uncertain, perhaps the Trembling Poplar or Aspen.
Myrrh, mōr (Ps 45 [8]; Pr 7 [17]; Song 1 [13], etc.), Balsamodendron Myrrha. See Ointments and Perfumes, § 2.
Myrtle, hadhas (Neh 8 [15], etc.) Myrtus communis.
Nut: (1) 'ĕgōz (Song 6 [11]). The Walnut (Juglans regia). (2) boṭnīm (Gn 43 [11]). The Pistachio-nut.
Oak: (1) 'allāh, 'ēlāh, 'ēlōn, and 'allōn. Various species of Oak or Terebinth. (2) 'ēlāh (Is 6 [13], "teil-tree" AV; Hos 4 [13], "elm" AV). The word may be used generically, but the Teil or Terebinth is probably meant.
Oil-tree, 'ēṣ shemen (Is 41 [19], etc.; cf. Neh 8 [15] AV). Probably the Oleaster.
Olive, zayith, Olea Europœa.
Olive, Wild, ἀγριέλαιος (Ro 11 [17]) The ungrafted Olive-tree.
Palm-tree, tāmār, φοίνιξ, Phœnix dactylifera.
Pine, tidhhār (Is 41 [19], 60 [13]), meaning uncertain. Perhaps the Elm.
Plane-tree, 'armōn (Gn 30 [37]; Ezk 31 [8], "chestnut" AV), Platanus orientalis.
Pomegranate, rimmōn, Punica granatum.
Poplar, libhneh (Gn 30 [37]; Hos 4 [13]), Styrax officinalis (?).
Shittah-tree, shiṭṭīm. See Acacia.
Spice, Spicery: (1) bāsām, besem, bōsem. See Ointments and Perfumes, § 1. (2) ṣammin. See Ointments and Perfumes, § 1. (3) nekhō'th (Gn 37 [25], etc.). The gum of the Astragalus tragacantha and perhaps of other varieties of Astragalus.
Stacte, nāṭāph (Ex 30 [34]). The gum of the Storax. See Ointments and Perfumes, § 2.
Sycamine, συκάμινος (Lk 17 [6]), the Black Mulberry (Morus nigra).
Sycamore, shiqmāh, συκομορέα. Ficus Sycomorus.
Tamarisk, 'ēshel (Gn 21 [33], "grove" AV; I S 22 [6], 31 [13], "tree" AV). Tamarix gallica and T. pallasii.
Teil-tree. See Oak (above).
Terebinth (or Oak), 'ēlāh. See Oak (above).
Thick trees, 'ēṣ 'ābhōth (Lv 23 [40], etc.), i.e., 'trees with thick or abundant foliage.'
Thyme, θύϊνος (Rev 18 [12]), called Citrus (Citrinus) by the Romans (used for incense on account of its odor, and also for inlaying).
Vine. See Vines and Vintage.
Walnut. See Nut (above).
Willow: (1) 'ărābhāh (Lv 23 [40], etc.), not the Willow, but a species of White Poplar (Populus euphratica) is meant. (2) tsaphtsāphāh (Ezk 17 [5]), generic term. E. E. N.]

Tamarisk-Tree.

Meadows in the narrower sense of the word—that is, well-defined districts covered with grasses such as are found in more northern latitudes—

22. Grasses and Smaller Plants. are not met with in Pal. The nearest to anything of this kind is the district along the middle Kishon, at the western end of the Plain of Esdraelon (cf. § 9 above). Here every year grass is mowed for the use of the Turkish cavalry, but, on account of the marshy soil, the hay is of little worth. Smaller patches of meadow are given over to grazing, so that the grass does not attain its full growth. Many places of this sort are found in the Plain of Sharon. Near brooks, rivers, and marshes many varieties of Cane and Reeds are found. Particularly interesting is the Papyrus antiquorum, which still grows in Pal. near the Sea of Gennesaret and Lake Ḥūle, and in the Plain of Sharon, while it has completely disappeared from Egypt. Large areas of land, both in the plain as well as on the mountains W and E. of the Jordan, are clothed in the spring with the beautiful green verdure of the perennial grasses. Many different varieties mingle together and are interwoven everywhere with the variegated colors of a large number of herbs and flowers. This is the glorious spring beauty of the land, which unfortunately lasts but a little while. In June, or in July at the latest, it fades away under the rays of the sun, or because of the hot desert winds. Liliaceæ, Umbelliferæ, Leguminosæ, and Labiatæ are represented by many varieties. Hyacinths, Ranunculi, Tulips, Anemones (Anemone coronaria), and Adonis Roses (Adonis palæstinæ), Sword Lilies, Geraniums, and the Orchis mingle their various flowers in striking colors. The "rose" of Song 2 1, Heb. ḥăbatstseleth, is probably the Colchicum autumnale (according to some the Narcissus Tazetta). By the term shōshannā we should hardly understand the White Lily (Lilium candidum), rather the Iris, so common in Pal. (cf. ZDPV, xxi, 1 sq.). The Rose of Jericho (Sir 24 18 [14]) may possibly be the real rose, which was first introduced in Pal. probably during the Persian or Greek Era, but the Syriac translation reads instead the Oleander. What is called to-day 'Rose of Jericho' is a very homely crucifer, an Anastatica hierochuntina, which in a moist atmosphere opens the petals of its corona, in a dry atmosphere closes them. In the Middle Ages the Asteriscus pygmæus was probably considered the Rose of Jericho.

[The following list contains the names, Hebrew or Greek, and English, of all the smaller wild or uncultivated herbs and plants mentioned in the Bible. The botanical identifications are taken mainly from Tristram, op. cit.

Brier. See Thorns and Thistles (8)–(10), below.

Bulrush, gōme'. See Reed (2), below.

Calamus, qāneh (q. bōsem or ha-ṭōbh), Acorus calamus. See Ointments and Perfumes, § 1.

Caper-berry, 'ăbhiyyōnāh (Ec 12 5 RVmg.). See Disease and Medicine, § 7 (2).

Cockle, bā'shāh (Job 31 40), generic term for weeds (so RVmg.).

Coriander, gadh (Ex 16 31), Coriandrum sativum.

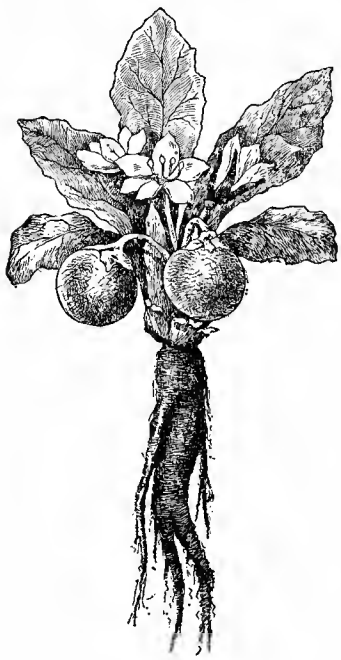
Flag. See Reed (4), (5), below.

Galbanum, ḥelbᵉnāh (Ex 30 34). See Ointments and Perfumes, § 2.



The Mandrake.

Gall, rō'sh. See Gall.

Gourd, Wild, paqqū'āh (II K 4 39). The Colocynth or perhaps the Squirting Cucumber.

Grass (Hay), ḥātsīr. See Grass.

Hemlock. See Gall.

Hyssop, 'ēzōbh, meaning uncertain; perhaps the Caper (Capparis spinosa). See Hyssop.

Lily, shūshan, shōshannāh, κρίνον; generic term for a number of flowers: Lilies, Irises, etc.

Mandrake, dūdhay, Mandragora officinalis. See Disease and Medicine, § 7 (5).

Myrrh, lōṭ (Gn 37 25, 43 11). Ladanum (the exudation of the Cistus villosus). See also § 22 (above).

Nettles: (1) qimmōsh (Pr 24 30 f., "thorns"; Is 34 13; Hos 9 6). The Sting-nettle (Urtica pilulifera). (2) ḥārūl (Pr 24 31; Job 30 7; Zeph 2 9). The Prickly Acanthus (?). Wild Vetches (RVmg.).

Papyrus, gōme'. See Reed (2), below.

Reed: (1) qāneh ('stalk'), κάλαμος (I K 14 15, etc.). Generic term. (2) gōme' (Ex 2 3, "bulrushes"; Job 8 11 and Is 35 7, "rush"; Is 18 2, "papyrus" RV. "bulrush" AV). The papyrus. (3) 'ārāh (Is 19 7, meadow[s], RV correctly). (4) 'āḥū (Gn 41 2, 18, "reed-grass" RV. "meadow" AV; Job 8 11, "flag"). The Edible Rush or the Flowering Rush. (5) sūph (Ex 2 3, 5, etc., "flags"; Jon 2 5, "weeds," i.e., Sea-weed). A generic term for marsh and sea vegetation. (6) 'agmōn (Job 41 20; Is 9 14, 19 15 all "rush"; Is 58 5, "rush" RV, "bulrush" AV Jn 51 32). Arundo Donax.

Rose, ḥābhatstseleth (Song 2 1; Is 35 1), meaning uncertain; perhaps the Sweet-scented Narcissus.

Rue, πήγανον (Lk 11 42). Generic term (Rutaceæ).

The Papyrus Plant. See Reed (2), above.

Rush. See Reed (2), (4), (6).

Saltwort, mallūah (Job 30 4, "mallows" AV). Atriplex halimus.

Sodom, Vine of (Dt 32 12). Perhaps the Wild Gourd (see above) is meant.

Sweet Cane. See Calamus.

Thorns and Thistles: (1) 'āṭādh (Jg 9 14 f., "bramble"; Ps 58 9, "thorn"). Rhamnus Europæum. (2) ḥōaḥ (II K 14 9, etc., "thorn," or "thistle"; Is 34 13, "bramble" AV). Generic term for Thistle. (3) dardar (Gn 3 18; Hos 10 8, "thistle"), τρίβολος in Mt 7 16. Probably the Star-thistle. (4) ḥēdheq (Pr 15 19, "thorns"; Mic 7 4, "brier"), meaning uncertain; perhaps the Solanum Sanctum. (5) qōts (Gn 3 18, etc., "thorns"), ἄκανθα in N T. Generic term for Thorn-plants. (6) shamīr (Is 5 6, etc., "brier"). A generic term for Thorn-plants. (7) na'ᵃᾱtsūts (Is 7 19, 55 13, "thorn-hedge"). The Thorn-tree or Sidra. (8) barqānīm (Jg 8 7, 16, "briers"), meaning uncertain. (9) ṣillōn (Ezk 2 6, 28 24, "briers"), meaning uncertain. 23. Fruits and Garden Products.

In almost all localities of Pal., whether in the mountains or on the coast-plain, one meets with gardens and groves of fruit-trees, although there is a great difference in the varieties of plants and the general appearance between those on the coast and those on the mountains. The famous gardens of Joppa are mostly devoted to Oranges, Citrons, Bitter- and Mandarin-oranges. More rarely does one see Almonds, Peaches, Bananas, and Dates. Of the numerous varieties of Agrumi which are met with to-day, even in the gardens of the mountain-land, few find mention in the Bible. It is only in the late Jewish tradition that the expression "the fruit of goodly trees" (Lv 23 40) is applied to the citron (Citrus medica, Heb. etrōg, Arab. trunj). The date attains its fullest maturity and beauty in the region of Gaza. It ripens indeed near Joppa and Ḥaifā, but the quality is somewhat inferior. Josephus extols the dates of Jericho (BJ, IV, 8 2 f.). At present only a few comparatively young trees are found there, which were planted about thirty years ago by the Russians in the garden of their hospice. On the other hand, palms are frequently met with along the E. bank of the Dead Sea at the mouths of streams. On the mountains the Palm is only for ornamental purposes, as its fruit does not ripen, although Josephus speaks of palms as common in the Plain of Gennesaret (BJ, III, 10 8). Of late years the interior of the country E. of Ḥaifā on the road to Nazareth has been largely planted with Mulberry-trees (Morus alba) for the purposes of silk culture. The blood-red juice of the fruit of the Morus nigra is mentioned in I Mac 6 34; but this tree is now represented only by individual specimens here and there. The Mulberry Fig—the Sycamore—was common in ancient Israel, not only in the Shephelah (I K 10 27), but also among the mountains (Am 7 14; Is 9 10). To-day it is more rare, though not entirely absent in the mountain region. Its wood rather than its fruit is prized, as is the case also with the St. John's-tree (Lk 15 16).

In the mountains the Olive-tree is the prevailing tree (e.g., the Mount of Olives near Jerusalem). Exceptionally extensive groves are found near Hebron, Bet Jālā and Bethlehem, in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, near 'Ain Kārim and Bēt Ḥanīna, near Jifnā and Sinjil, near Nābulus, and in the region of Ḥaifā. The most beautiful olive-trees to be seen are in the E. Jordan land near 'Ajlūn. In Pal. the cultivation of this tree is very remunerative, and Syria is probably the home of the olive. The Fig-tree is also found more frequently in the mountains than in the plains. It is not usually found in great numbers in any one place, though this is the case between Bethel and Nābulus, also near Bethlehem and Siloah. Usually single trees of this variety are found in the garden or near the house (cf. I K 4 25 [5 5]). It is remarkable for its vitality. With these trees it is usual also to find Pomegranates (Heb. rimmōn, Arab. rummān), the fruit of which attains in Syria an extraordinary size. Near Kefr Kennā, NE. of Nazareth, there is a beautiful orchard consisting entirely of pomegranate-trees. The Walnut-tree is found particularly near Hebron and Nābulus, the Quince near Hebron, Jerusalem, and Nazareth. The Apricot is not common, and our more common fruits, Apples, Pears, Cherries, and Plums, are also rare, though the pear is found near Arṭās and Mount Carmel.

A characteristic of the borders of the gardens, especially in the plains, is the Cactus Fig (Cactus opuntia), a native of America. This plant forms an impenetrable hedge with its broad, prickly leaves and branches, and from July to September it bears a quantity of sweet and nourishing fruit. Vegetables can be grown in gardens only in case they are frequently watered during the hot summer. This has been the custom in Pal. from earliest times (cf. § 20, above) not only with gardens, but also with fields. The most common garden vegetables are the following: Watermelons (Arab. baṭṭikh; cf. Nu 11 5), which are profitably cultivated in the German colony at Sorona and to the N. at El-Mukhālid; Cucumbers, both the larger and smaller varieties, are grown in great quantities. The smaller ones (Arab. khiyār), eaten raw, are great favorites with the Arabs. Paradise Apples (Arab. bandōra), Mallows (Arab. bāmiye, Hibiscus esculentus), the Eggplant (Melongena, Arab. badinjān), Onions, and Garlic are very common. Cauliflower, Lettuce, and Radishes do well. More rare are Turnips (Arab. lift), Carrots (jezar), Rutabagas (shamander), Kohlrabi, and Spinach. The green Wild Asparagus receives only slight attention. Anise, Mustard, Flax, Hemp, Sumach (Rhus Coriaria), and Cotton, as well as various grains, which belong properly to the subject of agriculture, need not be discussed here.

Anise, ἄνηθον (Mt 23 23). The Dill or Anethum graveolens
Barley, se'ōrīm. The most common grain in Palestine.

VI. Fauna

In ancient Israel the animal world was more closely observed than the plant world. Evidence of this is found in the attempts to classify the animals, which was done more carefully than was the case with the subdivision of the plant world, as found in Gn 1 11 f. and Ps 104 14-17. In Gn 1 20-25 we have the classification into aquatic animals, birds, and land animals. The last are subdivided into wild beasts, domestic animals, and creeping creatures. Similar groups are found in Dt 4 17 f.; Ps 104 11-26; Ac 11 6, 10 12. In Gn ch. 2, the wild beasts and birds are viewed as the creatures standing in most intimate relations with man. In Gn 1 22 the aquatic animals and birds are distinguished especially as receiving the Divine blessing, while in Gn 1 24 ff. the land animals are represented as created on the same day with man. From the food law (Lv ch. 11; Dt ch. 14), as well as from the many exhortations to have compassion upon the animals, it may be inferred that the animal world was the object of close observation. An important difference between the fauna of modern Pal. and that of Biblical times is found in the fact that to-day wild animals are very much more rare than in early times, as might be inferred from passages like II K 17 25. The lion, the hart, and the larger varieties of antelopes have completely disappeared. Bears are found only in the mountain-fastnesses of Hermon and Lebanon. Panthers are seen but seldom near the Dead Sea and in the E. Jordan land, while their smaller cousins, the Leopards, are found, e.g., on Mt. Carmel. The wild animals have been destroyed partly through hunting, partly because, with the destruction of the forests (§ 21, above), they have lost their hiding-places. Lions have not been found in Pal. since the crusades.

Recent investigations have made it certain that in the little land of Pal. several zoological regions overlap. N. Pal., together with Syria, belongs in reality to the Palearctic region, while S. Pal., especially the district around the Dead Sea, must be counted altogether with the so-called Ethiopic region, to which also the Peninsula of Sinai, Egypt, and Nubia belong. In addition, there are some varieties of mammals in Pal. which belong to Arabia, Mesopotamia, or India. The boundary between the representatives of the two above-named regions is to be drawn, generally speaking, from the southern foot of Carmel across to the southern end of the Sea of Gennesaret. There is hardly another land on the earth of so small a compass as Pal. in which the Mammalia are so varied. The following mammals belong to the Palearctic region: The Roe, Fallow Deer, Field-mouse (Arvicola), Dwarf Hamster, Dormouse, Squirrel, Zizel (Spermophilus), Mole, Hare (Lepus syriacus), Polecat, Stoat, Stonemarten, Fox (Vulpes syriacus), Wildcat (Felis chaus), Badger, and Bear. The Ethiopic fauna are represented by the Porcupine (Acomys), Jerboa, Fat Sand-rat (Psammomys obesus), Black-tailed Garden Sleeper (Eliomys melanurus), Hare (Lepus judææ, and also sinaiticus and ægypticus), Hedgehog, Cony (Hyrax syriacus, Heb. shāphān), Wild Goat (Capra beden, Heb. 'aqqō yā'ēl), Gazelle (Gazella dorcas and arabica), Wildcat (Felis bubastis), the Desert Cat (Felis maniculata), Lynx (Felis caracal), Panther (Felis pardus), Nile Fox, Ichneumon, Genet (Genetta vulgaris), and Wild Boar. Some of the mammals of Pal. must be reckoned probably as migrants from the eastern regions, namely, from India and Mesopotamia. Among these Nehring counts one of the varieties of the Field-mouse (Nesokia); the Wolf, since it is smaller than the European variety and is more like the graceful wolf of W. India; the Hyena and the Jackal, of which one variety with small ears seems related to the Indian, while the other with larger ears is like the Egyptian Jackal. Of Bats there are in Pal. several varieties.

For the breeding of animals the conditions in Pal. vary greatly. The reason is mainly that in the rainless period—about one-half of each year—there is a lack of green herbage throughout most of the country. On this account the breeder must be careful to arrange it so that the young are born in the spring, when throughout the land there is an abundance of green fodder. Since the climatic conditions were essentially the same in early times as they are now (cf. §§ 19–20, above), the care of animals then, as to-day, was regulated by these conditions. For a correct understanding of many of the cultus regulations, e.g., in reference to the offering of firstlings, it is of great importance to have clearly in mind this limitation, which the nature of the land lays upon the breeding of animals. These conditions affect especially the breeding of those animals such as cattle, sheep, and goats whose well-being depends upon the consumption of green fodder. Horses, mules, asses, and camels can more easily dispense with green food, and their care is consequently less difficult and attended with more success. The horses belong either to the native breed or to that of Erzerum in Asia Minor. Full-blooded horses are not raised in Pal. Mules are used generally as the beasts of burden. The Ass, especially in the poorer parts of the country, is everywhere used and is indispensable for agricultural purposes. The Camel, sometimes of the Arabian variety, sometimes that of Asia Minor, is superior to the mule in its ability to carry heavy burdens, and is highly esteemed because of its extraordinary usefulness, in spite of its ugly form and its surly disposition. Conditions for the breeding of cattle in Pal. are of the poorest. Buffaloes, whose milk and butter are noted, are found only in the well-watered regions, e.g., in the Jordan Valley. The native breed of cattle is small and ill-shaped. In the spring-time the quantity of milk produced is fairly large, but it is for the most part given to the calves, which are left with the cows a long time, frequently as long as eight months. After August the cows give but little milk. The breed found in the Lebanon region is better, and often used for cross-breeding with the native variety. The Mohammedans keep cattle for agricultural work, as well as for the sake of the milk. Christians and Jews reckon also on the sale of the flesh. The Turkish Government usually makes no count of cattle for purposes of taxation, only of sheep and goats. The breeding of these animals stands on a much higher plane in Pal. than does that of cattle, and results in much larger production. The Sheep found generally in S. Pal. are those of the large fat-tailed variety. In the northern districts there are other breeds which are somewhat smaller and more like the merino. The Fat-tailed Sheep is a good milk-producer, but its wool is not of great value. The Goats are generally black and remarkable for their long ears. There is also a variety with short ears. Their skin is of the greatest importance for the natives, especially near Hebron, since they make from it the vessels in which water, milk, wine, and oil are kept. Sheep and goats furnish the natives their supply of flesh, besides milk and cheese, and also clothing—so far as this is not made of foreign material—and shoes. These animals always find some pasturage, even in the dry months, and therefore give milk for a longer time and in proportionately larger quantities than do the cows. In the spring-time the surplus quantity of milk is converted by the peasants into liquid butter and cheese, which serve as nourishment during the dry months of the year.

Ape, qōph. See APE.
Ass, She-ass, Asses' Colt, Young Ass. See ASS.
Ass, Wild: (1) 'ārōdh. (2) pere' See ASS.
Badger, taḥash. See SEALSKIN.
Bat, 'ăṭallēph (Lv 11 [19], etc.). General term.
Bear, dōbh (I S 17 [34], etc.). Ursus syriacus.
Beast of the field, hayyath ha-sādheh (Lv 26 [22], etc., "wild beast" AV).
Behemoth, bᵉhēmōth (Job 40 [15]). Hippopotamus.
Boar, ḥăzīr (Ps 80 [13]). Wild Boar.
Bull, Bullock. See CATTLE (below).
Bull, Wild. See ANTELOPE (above).
Calf. See CATTLE (below).
Camel, gāmāl. See CAMEL.
Cattle, miqneh ('property'). General term for cattle as property. (1) 'abhīr, "bull." (2) pār, "bull," "bullock." (3) bāqār, "bullock," "cattle," "herd," "ox." (4) 'ēgel, "calf." (5) pār, shōr and bāqār (in fem.), "cow." (6) 'eglāh, "heifer." (7) (a) shōr, (b) 'eleph, "ox."
Chamois, zemer (Dt 14 [5]). Probably the Wild Sheep.
Cony, shāphān (Lv 11 [5], etc.). Hyrax syriacus. The Rock-badger.
Cow. See CATTLE (5), above.
Doe, ya'alah (Pr 5 [19], "roe" AV). The female Wild Goat (?).
Dog, kelebh (Ex 11 [7]. etc.). A species something like the Collie.
Dragon: (1) tannīn. See MONSTER. (2) tan (tannīm). See JACKAL (below).
Dromedary: (1) bēkher (f. bikhrāh) (Is 60 [6]; Jer 2 [23] AV). See CAMEL. (2) rekhesh (I K 4 [28]), "swift steeds" RV. See HORSE (below). (3) benē rakkammīm (Est 8 [10] AV, "bred of the stud" RV). Meaning uncertain, but probably swift horses of special breed are meant.
Fallow Deer, yaḥmūr. See ROEBUCK (below).
Ferret, 'ănāqāh. See GECKO, § 26, (II) below.
Fox, shū'āl (Jg 15 [4], etc.). Means both Fox and Jackal.
Gazelle, tsᵉbhī (Dt 12 [15. 22], 14 [5], 15 [22]; II S 2 [18]; I K 4 [23], "roe," "roebuck" AV). Gazella dorcas.
Goat (and kid): (1) 'ēz (Gn 27 [9], etc.). Generic term. (2) 'attūdh (Nu 7 [17], etc.). (3) sā'īr (Lv 4 [24], etc.). (4) tayīsh, "he-goat" (Gn 30 [35], etc.). (5) Kid, gedhī (Gn 27 [9], etc.).
Goat, Wild: (1) yā'ēl (I S 24 [2], etc.). The Ibex, Capra beden. (2) 'aqqō (Dt 14 [5]). Species unknown.
Greyhound, zarzīr mathnayim (Pr 30 [31]). Meaning uncertain.
Hare, 'arnebheth (Lv 11 [6]; Dt 14 [7]). Lepus syriacus and L. judææ.
Hart, 'ayyāl (Dt 12 [15], etc.). Generic term for Deer (?).
Heifer. See CATTLE (6), above.
Herd. See CATTLE (3), above.
Hind, 'ayyālāh, 'ayyeleth. Fem. of Hart (see above).
Horse (q.v.): (1) sūs (Gn 47 [17], etc.). Generally a chariot-horse. (2) pārāsh (Gn 50 [9], etc.). Usually for a riding-horse. (3) rekhesh. A high-bred and swift horse. See SWIFT STEEDS (below). (4) rammakh. A mare (?). See DROMEDARY (above).
Hyena. The "Valley of Zeboim" (I S 13 [18]) means probably the "valley of hyænas." See also SPECKLED BIRD OF PREY (§ 25, below).
Jackal: (1) tan (pl. tannīm) (Job 30 [29], etc.). See also DRAGON. (2) shū'āl, means also Fox. (3) 'iyyīm (Is 13 [22], 34 [14]; Jn 50 [39]), "wild beasts" AV, "wolves" RV. See WOLF below).
Kid. See GOAT (above).
Lamb. See SHEEP (below) and LAMB.
Leopard, nāmēr (Song 4 [8], etc.), πάρδαλις (Rev 13 [2]). Felis leopardus and F. jubata. Also the Panther.
Lion: (1) 'ārī, 'aryeh (Gn 49 [9], etc.). Generic. (2) kephīr (Ps 35 [17]. etc.). Young Lion. (3) lābhī' (Dt 33 [20], etc.). Generic. (4) layish (Pr 30 [30]). Generic. (5) λέων (Ps 5 [8], etc.). Generic.
Mole: (1) ḥăpharpārāh (Is 2 [20]). Meaning uncertain. (2) tinshemeth. See CHAMELEON (§ 26, below).
Mouse, 'akhbār (Lv 11 [29], etc.). Generic term.
Mule: (1) peredh, pirdāh. See MULE. (2) rekhesh. See DROMEDARY and HORSE (above), and SWIFT STEEDS (below).
Ox. See CATTLE (3), (7), above.
Ox, Wild. See ANTELOPE (above).
Porcupine, qippōdh (Is 14 [23], 34 [11]; Zeph 2 [14], "bittern" AV). The meaning of the term is not certain. Perhaps Hedgehog.
Pygarg, dīshōn (Dt 14 [5]). Specific species uncertain.
Ram. See SHEEP (below).
Roe, Roebuck: (1) tsᵉbhī. See GAZELLE (above). (2) yaḥmūr (Dt 14 [5]; I K 4 [23], "fallow deer" AV). Aleephalus buballs. (3) ya'ălah. See DOE (above).
Satyr, the rendering of sā'īr in Is 13 [21], 34 [14]. See GOAT (above), and SATYR.
Seal. See SEALSKIN.
Sheep (also Ewe, Goat, Lamb): (1) seh, individual term. (Goats, etc., small). (2) tsō'n, collective term, small cattle. (3) rāḥēl, "ewe." (q. v.) (4) kebhes. (5) keseb. "Lamb," general terms. (q. v.) (6) kar, a lamb in the pasture or "stall." (7) tāleh (I S 7 [9]; Is 65 [25]), a "sucking" lamb. (8) 'ayīl. (9) tsāphīr, "ram."
Swift Steeds, rekhesh (I K 4 [28], "dromedary" AV; Est 8 [10], "mule" AV). Swift horses.
Swine, ḥăzīr (Lv 11 [7], etc.), χοῖρος (Mt 7 [6], etc.). The Wild Boar.
Unicorn, rᵉ'ēm. See WILD OX (below).
Weasel, ḥōledh (Lv 11 [29]). Some think the Blind Mole (Spalax typhlus) is meant.
Whales, tannin (Gn 1 [21], "sea-monster" RV). See MONSTER.
Wild Goat. See GOAT (above).
Wild Ox, rᵉ'ēm (Nu 23 [22]; Dt 33 [17], etc.; "unicorn" AV). Bos primigenius, now extinct. The German Auerochs. It was still extant in Assyr. times and is represented on the inscriptions as once inhabiting the Mediterranean coast region. (Cf. Driver on Dt 33 [17] in Int. Crit. Com.)

The birds of Pal., as the mammals, represent several zoological regions, although the exact classification of the varieties is attended with greater difficulties, and the results are more uncertain. The Palestinian birds mentioned in the Bible, apart from some names of doubtful significance, are found to be the same as those of to-day. Birds of prey are: the Eagle, Vulture, Falcon, Sparrow-hawk, Kite, and Owl. The Raven family is well represented. Of marsh- and water-fowl there are the Heron, the White and Black Stork, the Pelican, Cormorant, Flamingo, Wild Goose, Swan, Marsh-hen, Snipe, Sandpiper, Crane, Bustard, Sea-gull, Storm-Petrel, and Grebe.

On the E. borders of the district el-Belḳā there appears once in a while an Ostrich from the Arabian Desert. Of the hen family there are, besides the Domestic Fowl, the Partridge (the Caccabis chukar, which ranges from Asia Minor to India, the Ammoperdix heyi, and the Frankolinus vulgaris), the Quail, and the Woodcock. Wild Pigeons are found in great numbers; although most of these visit the land only in course of their migration, yet many remain through the winter. In regard to the Turtle-dove, whose appearance to-day, just as in the times of Song 2 12, is a sign of the beginning of the warmer period of the year, it may be remarked that, besides the European variety (Turtur communis), which is referred to in Song 2 12, there are two other varieties, the Ethiopic (T. senegalensis), and the Collared Turtle-dove (T. risorius), which is a native of India. Night-hawks, Woodpeckers (Picus syriacus), Kingfishers, Hoopoes, and Cuckoos are not wanting, nor are varieties of Starlings, including the Pastor roseus and the Amydrus tristrami. Besides the common varieties of Lark there are also found the Alauda isabellina near the Dead Sea, and the Desert Lark, the Ammomanes deserti, and the Amm. fraterculus. Some varieties of Swallow remain in the land through the winter, particularly the Oriental Swallow (Hirundo savignii), also the Cotyle rupestris and obsoleta), and of Swifts the variety Cypselus affinis, while other varieties appear in the period from February to April, the Cypselus apus, probably the ṣūṣ of Jer 8 7, and the Common Swallow (Hirundo rustica). Garden warblers are present in great numbers, also the Finch and our House-sparrow, whose beautiful related variety, Passer moabiticus, deserves special mention. With these may be mentioned the Titmouse, the Blue Woodpecker, the Wren, the Wagtail, the Oriole, the Butcher-bird, and the Palestinian Nightingale, or Bulbul. The common Nightingale also visits Pal. and nests in April near the Jordan. The beautiful tropical bird Cinnyris oseæ, which is found on the Dead Sea, is also a representative of the fauna of India and Nubia. Of Thrushes there are several native varieties, and others which visit the land only in course of their migration.

The breeding of birds receives little attention. For water-fowls such as Geese and Ducks there is a lack of the necessary fresh water. Hens are common, but the variety is small. Turkeys are found among the Circassians and Christians. The breeding of Doves is carried on only in an indifferent way.

[The following list contains the names, Hebrew or Greek, and English, of all the birds mentioned in the Bible. The identifications are taken mainly from Tristram, op. cit.

Birds, Fowl(s), 'ōph, tsippōr. Generic terms.
Bittern, qippōdh (Is 34 11; Zeph 2 13 f. AV). See PORCUPINE § 24 (above). But Bittern is probably right.
Cock, ἀλέκτωρ (Mt 26 34, etc.).
Cormorant: (1) shālākh (Lv 11 17; Dt 14 17). Exact meaning uncertain. (2) qā'āth (Is 34 11; Zeph 2 14 AV). See PELICAN (below).
Crane: (1) 'āgūr (Jer 8 7, "swallow" AV). Grus cinerea. (2) ṣīṣ. See SWALLOW (below).
Cuckoo, shaḥaph (Lv 11 16; Dt 14 15, "sea-mew" RV). Meaning uncertain.
Dove, yōnāh, περιστερά (Gn 8 8; Mt 3 16, etc.). Generic term, including both wild and domesticated pigeons. See TURTLE-DOVE (below).
Eagle, nesher. Also means Vulture, probably the Griffin-Vulture. See EAGLE.
Falcon, 'ayyāh (Lv 11 14; Dt 14 13; Job 28 7; "kite" AV). Generic term, probably meaning Kite.
Gier-eagle: (1) pereṣ (Lv 11 13; Dt 14 12; "ossifrage" AV). Uncertain; the Sea-eagle, according to some. (2) rāḥām (Lv 11 18, "vulture" RV). The Egyptian Vulture.
Glede, ra'āh (Dt 14 13). Meaning uncertain.
Hawk, nēts (Lv 11 16, etc.). Generic term or possibly the Falcon.
Hen, ὄρνις (Mt 23 37; Lk 13 34). A general term for 'bird,' 'fowl,' etc.
Heron, 'ănāphāh (Lv 11 19; Dt 14 18). Generic term.
Hoopoe, dūkhīphath (Lv 11 19; Dt 14 18, "lapwing" AV).
Kite: (1) dayyāh (Dt 14 13; Is 34 15, "vulture" AV). Generic term. (2) dā'āh, a variant form of (1) (Lv 11 14 AV). (3) 'ayyāh (Lv 11 14; Dt 14 13 AV). See FALCON.
Lapwing, dūkhīphath. See HOOPOE (above).
Night-hawk, tāḥmās (Lv 11 16; Dt 14 15). Perhaps a variety of Owl.
Osprey, 'ozniyyāh (Lv 11 13; Dt 14 12). Meaning uncertain.
Ossifrage, pereṣ (Lv 11 13; Dt 14 12, "gier-eagle" RV). Lammergeier or Bearded Vulture (Gypaetus barbatus). The largest of the Vultures.
Ostrich: (1) ya'ănāh (Lv 11 16, etc., "owl" AV). (2) yā'ēn (La 4 3). (3) rānān (renānīm, pl.) (Job 39 13, "peacocks" AV).
Owl, ya'ănāh. See OSTRICH (above).
Owl, Great: (1) yanshōph, yanshūph (Lv 11 17; Dt 14 16; Is 34 11). Probably the Bubo ascalaphus. (2) qippōz (Is 34 15). See DART-SNAKE (§ 26, below).
Owl, Horned, tinshemeth (Lv 11 18; Dt 14 16, "swan" AV). Meaning uncertain.
Owl, Little, kōṣ (Lv 11 16, etc.). Generic term.
Owl, Screech-. See NIGHT MONSTER.
Partridge, qōrē' (I S 26 20; Jer 17 11). The Greek Partridge (Caccabis saxatilis).
Peacock(s): (1) tukkiyyīm (pl.) (I K 10 22). An Indian (Malabar) word. See PEACOCKS. (2) rānān. See OSTRICH (above).
Pelican, qā'āth (Lv 11 18; Dt 14 17; in Is 34 11; Zeph 2 14, "cormorant" AV). Pelecanus onocrotalus and P. crispus.
Pigeon. See DOVE (above).
Raven, 'ōrēbh. Generic term. Eight species are found in Palestine.
Screech-owl. See NIGHT MONSTER.
Sea-mew, shaḥaph (Lv 11 16; Dt 14 16, "cuckoo" AV).
Sparrow, tsippōr (Ps 84 3, 102 7). Birds in general, and especially of small birds (Swallow, Lark, etc.).
Speckled Bird of Prey, tsābhūā'. Meaning uncertain. See also HYENA, § 24 (above).
Stork, ḥăsīdhāh (Lv 11 19, etc.). Ciconia alba.
Swallow: (1) dᵉrōr (Ps 84 3, etc.). Generic term. (2) ṣīṣ and ṣūṣ (Jer 8 7, "crane" AV). The Swift (Cypœlus). (3) 'āgūr. See CRANE (above).
Swan, tinshemeth (Lv 11 18; Dt 14 16, "horned owl" RV). Meaning uncertain.
Turtle-dove, tūr, τρυγών (Gn 15 9, etc.; Lk 2 24). Turtur auritus.
Vulture: (1) rāḥām (Lv 11 18, "gier-eagle" AV). Vultur percnopterus. (2) dayyāh. See KITE (above).

26. Fishes, Reptiles, and Insects.

The waters in and near the Jordan Valley, with the exception of the Dead Sea, abound in fish. This is especially true of the Sea of Gennesaret. Josephus' statement that the Nile fish, Coracinus, was found in the spring at Capernaum (BJ, III, 10 8) finds support in the fact that to-day the Sea of Gennesaret, and also the neighboring warm springs and Lake Ḥūle, contain fish which are also found in the Nile, especially in the upper Nile (Clarias macracanthus, of the variety silurus, Chromis niloticus and C. tiberidis, etc.). The streams and brooks emptying into the Mediterranean are less abundant in fish. Tristram in his Fauna and Flora of Palestine (1884) counts forty-three varieties of fish for southern and middle Syria, among which are the Carp, Barb, Shote or Sheat-fish, and Blenny. Eels are found in the Kishon, but apparently not in the Jordan region. Of Serpents and Lizards there are in Pal. a very large number, since the extensive uninhabited stretches of country and the numberless clefts and holes in the rocks offer them welcome places of refuge. Tristram counts thirty-three varieties of serpents, among which are many poisonous ones, such as the Egyptian Naja haje (Cobra), the Vipera euphratica, the Daboia xanthina, the Echis arenicola (elsewhere only in Egypt), and the Cerastes hasselquistii. Among the lizards, of which, according to Tristram, there are forty-four species, mention may be made of the African Crocodile, which is found even to-day in the marshes of the Nahr ez-Zerḳā, S. of Carmel, which as early as Pliny (V, 17) was called the Crocodile river. Near the Dead Sea there is also the Land-crocodile, which Herodotus (IV, 192) mentions in Libya (Arab. Waran, or Waral), two species, Psammosaurus scincus and Monitor niloticus. The most Common Lizard is the Ḥirḏaun of the Arabs, the Horned Lizard (Stellio vulgaris), of which there are several species. Turtles are found everywhere on land and in the water. Insects are extraordinarily numerous, as is the case in all warm regions. It is sufficient here to mention Spiders, Scorpions, Wasps, Wild Bees, Flies, Gnats, Fleas, and Locusts. Of the sixty species many are harmless and hence little noticed. Greatly feared to-day, as in Bible times, is the migratory Locust (Œdipoda migratoria), which comes out from the interior of Arabia, and because of its voracity inflicts fearful destruction. The peasants of Pal. do not eat the locust, as the Bedawin do in case of necessity, and John the Baptist did out of voluntary asceticism (Mk 1 6). Pal. is well suited to the culture of Bees. For hives, the peasants make use of jars of baked or sun-dried brick, about 18 in. long and 6–9 in. in diameter. The German colonists cultivate bees after European methods. Concerning Mollusks, cf. Tristram, op. cit., pp. 178–204.

[The following list contains the names, Hebrew or Greek, and English, of all the Invertebrata, reptiles, etc., mentioned in the Bible. The identifications are taken mainly from Tristram, op. cit.

Ant, nᵉmālāh (Pr 6 6, 30 25). Generic term.
Bee, dᵉbhōrāh Dt 1 44, etc.). Wild bees are usually meant.
Beetle. See CRICKET (below).
Canker-worm. See LOCUST.
Caterpillar. See LOCUST.
Cricket, ḥargōl (Lv 11 22, "beetle" AV). Some variety of Locust is meant.
Flea, parʿōsh (I S 24 15, 26 20). General term, or the Pulex irritans.
Fly, Flies: (1) zᵉbhūbh (Ec 10 1; Is 7 18). Some species of Gadfly. (2) ʿārōbh (Ex 8 21, etc.). Generic term.
Gnat, κώνωψ (Mt 23 24). Possibly the same as the Mosquito.
Grasshopper. See LOCUST.
Hornet (or Wasp), tsirʿāh (Ex 23 28, etc.). Generic term.
Horse-leach, ʿălūqāh. See HORSE-LEACH.
Lice, kinnām, kinnīm (Ex 8 16 ff., etc.). Pediculi.
Locusts, Grasshoppers, etc. See LOCUST.
Moth: (1) ʿāsh (Job 4 19, etc.). The Clothes Moth (Tineidæ). (2) ṣaṣ (σής in N T) (Is 51 8). The Caterpillar of (1).
Palmer-worm. See LOCUST.
Scorpion, ʿaqrābh (Dt 8 15, etc.). σκορπίος in N T
Snail: (1) shabfᵉlūl (Ps 58 8). Generic term. (2) ḥōmeṭ (Lv 11 30). See SAND-LIZARD (below).
Spider: (1) ʿakkābhīsh (Job 8 14, etc.). (2) sᵉmānīth (Ps 30 28, etc.). See LIZARD (below).
Worm: (1) tōlāʿ, tōlēʿāh (Dt 28 39, etc.). Generic term. See also COLORS, § 2. (2) rimmāh (Ex 16 24, etc.). General term. (3) ṣaṣ (Is 51 8 AV). See MOTH (above).

Arrow-snake. See DART-SNAKE (below).
Adder. See SERPENT (3)–(6), below.
Asp. See SERPENT (3), below.
Basilisk. See SERPENT (6), below.
Chameleon: (1) tinshemeth (Lv 11 30, "mole" AV). Meaning uncertain. (2) kōaḥ (Lv 11 30 AV). See LAND-CROCODILE (below).
Cockatrice. See SERPENT (6), below.
Creeping things: (1) sherets (Gn 7 21, etc.; "swarms" Gn 1 20 RV). (2) remes (Gn 1 24, etc.). General term for fish, reptiles, etc. See CREEPING THINGS.
Crocodile, liwyāthān (Job 41 1).
Dart-snake, kippōz (Is 34 15; "arrow-snake" ERV; "great owl" AV). Serpens jaculus.
Dragon. See DRAGON.
Frogs, tsephardēaʿ (Ex 8 2, etc.). Rana esculenta.
Gecko, ʾănāqāh (Lv 11 30, "ferret" AV). A species of lizard.
Land-crocodile, kōaḥ (Lv 11 30, "chameleon" AV). The Monitor Lizard.
Leviathan, liwyāthān. See CROCODILE (above) and SERPENT (below). See also LEVIATHAN.
Lizard: (1) tsābh (Lv 11 29, "great lizard" RV; "tortoise" AV). Uromastix spineps. (2) kōaḥ (Lv 11 30, "land-crocodile" RV; "chameleon" AV). The Monitor Lizard. (3) leṭāʾāh (Lv 11 30). Generic term. (4) ḥōmeṭ (Lv 11 30) "snail" AV. Probably a species of sand lizard (so RV).
Serpent: (1) nāḥāsh. Generic term. (2) tannīn (Ex 7 9 ff.). Generic term. Also see DRAGON. (3) pethen (Dt 32 33, etc., "asp"; Ps 58 4, "adder"). Some species of poisonous serpent. (4) shᵉphīphōn (Gn 49 17, "adder"). The Horned Snake (Cerastes hasselquistii). (5) ʿakshūbh (Ps 140 3, "adder"). Some species of viper. (6) tsiphʿōnī and tsephʿa (Pr 23 32, "adder"; in Is 11 8, 14 29 ["basilisk" ERV], 59 5; Jer 8 17, "adder" RV, "cockatrice" AV). Perhaps the great Yellow Viper (Daboia xanthina). (7) ʾephʿeh (Job 20 16, etc.), "viper." Species unknown. (8) sārāph (Nu 21 6, 8; Dt 8 15, "fiery serpent"). Species unknown. See also SERAPHIM. The ref. in Is 14 29 is figurative, and that in 30 6 is mythological in character. See SERPENT. (9) liwyāthān, "leviathan." See SERPENT and LEVIATHAN. (10) ἔχιδνα (Mt 3 7, 12 34, etc.). The same as (7). (11) ἀσπίς (Ro 3 13). The same as (3).
Tortoise. See LIZARD (above).

VII. Historical Geography.

While it is possible to-day to trace the history of civilization in Egypt and Babylonia—at least in general outline—as far back as the fourth millennium B.C., as to the state of affairs in Syria during the third and fourth millenniums we are almost entirely ignorant. To only a small extent has the darkness been illuminated through investigations by geologists and archeologists during the past few decades. We know now that Pal., as well as all Syria, like other parts of the earth, had its Stone Age, on which followed a Bronze Age and an Iron Age. The monuments of the Stone Age consist of numerous articles made of flint, bone implements, polished axes and knives, rude pottery shaped without the use of the wheel, caves which served both as dwelling-places and as places of burial, the first attempts at stone structures, pillars, dolmens and cairns (megalithic monuments), and cup-shaped depressions hollowed out of the rock. To what peoples these belonged it is impossible to say From certain indications it would seem that they should not be counted as Semites. Whether the O T statements regarding the legendary Rephaim and Anakim (Dt 2 11) have reference to these people is uncertain. Proofs of a Bronze Age in Pal. have been brought to light chiefly through the excavations of the past fifteen years. Implements have been found made of bronze, copper, bone, and stone, red pottery with the surface scraped with a comb and in some cases painted, and pillars set up in rows. The cultivation of the olive and the vine was known. Human sacrifices were common. Plain indications of the influence of the Egyptian, Babylonian, and Ægean civilizations are evident. The population of the land during this period—which can be fixed as from 2500 to 1300 B.C.—was Semitic. The use of iron was known at the time of the incoming of the Philistines and of the Israelitic tribes, yet at the beginning of this period the use of bronze and flint was more common. The Iron Age is synchronous with the beginning of the historical period of the land. Our knowledge of the events of the Bronze Age is limited mainly to the notices that we find in the so-called Amarna letters, which are related to the Egyptian control of Canaan.

27. Earliest Civilization of Canaan.

The Egyptian supremacy which Thothmes III established about 1500 B.C. seems to have been on the wane about 1400, the time of the Amarna letters. The Hittites had pressed forward from the northern limits of Syria toward the S. and were ruling over a mighty kingdom, which extended from the Euphrates to the middle Orontes. In central and southern Syria there were only small kingdoms and federations of cities. The 'kings' ruled over their own city, and the territory immediately adjacent (cf. Jg 1 5-7; Jos 12 7-24). According to Jos 9 17, 10 2, Gibeon, Chephirah, Beeroth, and Kiriath-jearim were not under kings, but formed a sort of confederation. Without doubt, the natural characteristics of the land conditioned the historical circumstances of the inhabitants. The small stretch of territory between the desert and the sea was unfavorable to the development of a united national life, because of the great variation in the character of the soil (cf. § 4 f., above), because of the numerous mountains, low-lying plains, and deep-cut watercourses. Larger kingdoms had only a very limited duration. The inhabitants always found it convenient to break up again into smaller groups.

The O T calls the pre-Israelitic inhabitants of the mountains partly Canaanites (so J), partly Amorites (so E). Since, according to the Amarna letters, the Amorites were still located in the Lebanon region, it is fair to infer that after about 1400 B.C. they advanced southward both into the W Jordan as well as into the E. Jordan region, where they were found at the time of the Israelitic invasion. The name "Canaanite" is derived from the name of the land, and means the 'inhabitant of the land of Canaan.' Consequently, it has no ethnographical significance, although such is the impression produced by the orderly lists of the people of the land which the Israelites were said to have conquered or driven out. The formal list reckons six peoples (Ex 3 8, 17, etc.—eleven times in all), the secondary forms of the same list, seven (Jos 3 10), or ten (Gn 15 19-21), or only five or less (Ex 9 1, 13 5, 23 8). We see in this list not the traces of an old tradition, but rather the work of the learned historian. We do not know when these Semitic peoples came into Pal. It was probably a gradual process of immigration, which took place during the period from 2800 to 1600 B.C.

The advance of the Israelitic tribes against Canaan was prepared for and made more easy through a series of historical events. The Egyptian control continued to weaken after 1250, until finally it was only nominal. The native princes carried on wars and marauding expeditions against one another. The Hittite kingdom broke up about 1200 into a number of smaller dominions. After 1400 the Chabiri, whose name is probably to be identified with that of the Hebrews, made their appearance in the W. Jordan land, partly as soldiers in the service of the native princes, partly because they were seeking in a cultivated land better circumstances than the desert afforded them. They were not only the predecessors of the Israelitic tribes, but served to weaken the unity and resistance power of the native population.

The possession of the W. Jordan land by the tribes which later were united under the name "people of Israel" did not take place by means of one great victorious campaign, as is represented in the Book of Joshua, but gradually (see JOSHUA, BOOK OF). From the South there was an open way of entrance into the land (cf. § 6 f., above), which was made use of by the powerful clans of Caleb and Othniel, or the Kenizzites, which took possession of the cities Hebron, Debir, or Kiriath-sepher, Kiriath-sanna (mod. eḍ-Ḍaharīye, Jg 1 12-15; Jos 15 13-19), and thereby became masters of the most southern portion of the mountain-land. For the Calebite cities cf. I Ch 2 42-49; I S 30 26-31; also ch. 25; and for "the South" (the Negeb), cf. I S 30 14, 27 10. All the tribes, or clans, of this region remained independent up to the times of David. Probably at intervals they were compelled to pay tribute to the Philistines. Even at a much later period they still formed a special group in Judah (Jos 15 13). They occupied themselves mainly with the breeding of sheep and goats (I S 25 2).

The Israelitic (in the narrow sense) tribes entered the W. Jordan land from the E. by means of the fords of the Jordan (cf. § 12, above). The invasion took place in successive stages, two of which we can distinguish with some certainty. Simeon, Levi, and Judah, according to Gn ch. 34, made an advance on the territory near Shechem, where, in the later history, we find only the tribe of Joseph. But Levi and Simeon were defeated and scattered (Gn 49 5-7). Judah was then forced toward the southern mountain-land, where it united itself with the Canaanite clan of Tamar near Timnah (mod. Tibne), about 8 m. W of Bethlehem, and at Adullam (Gn ch. 38). Some remnants of Simeon were found later in the neighborhood of Beer-sheba (Jos 19 2-8; I Ch 4 28-33).

The most important step in the conquest was taken by the Rachel tribe Joseph. It crossed the Jordan near Gilgal (Tell Jeljūl), captured Jericho (Erīḥā), Ai (probably Tell el-Ḥajar), and Bethel (Bētīn; Jos chs. 2–8; Jg 1 22-26). The cities of Gibeon, Chephirah, Beeroth (which probably lay to the W of Gibeon and is not to be identified with el-Bīre, near Bethel), and Kiriath-jearim (which probably corresponds to the mod. Ḳarjet el-'Ined) procured freedom and independence by means of a formal treaty with Israel (Jos ch. 9; II S 4 2 f., 21 2). By means of the victory at Beth-horon (Bēṯ'ūr), between Gibeon and the Plain of Aijalon (cf. § 7, above), the tribe of Joseph became master of important parts of the crest of the range in the S. and of its western slopes. Its sacred symbol, the holy Ark, was placed in Shiloh (Seilūn, I S chs. 1–3). From Mt. Ephraim, in the original sense of the term, they spread to the S. and SW into the forest-covered heights, which they cleared of wood and brought under cultivation (Jos 17 14-18; cf. § 7, above). In consequence of the wide extension of the territory belonging to the tribe, a division took place. The clans which inherited the more southern portion, that had as neighbors the Jebusites of Jerusalem, received the name Benjamin. The middle clans were known as the people of Ephraim, or simply Ephraim, while the Northern clans at first were known as Machir (Jg 5 14), later as Manasseh.

In the Plain of Esdraelon (cf. § 9, above) the power of the Canaanites was broken through the victory which the Israelite tribes won at Taanach (Jg ch. 5). The leader of the Canaanites was King Sisera of Harosheth, which has been identified with the small village el-Ḥārithīye. This victory strengthened the position of the Israelite tribes near the Plain of Esdraelon, namely, Issachar, Zebulun, and Machir; although the well-known Canaanite cities Bethshan, Ibleam, Taanach, Megiddo, and Dor (on the seacoast) remained independent for some time after (Jg 1 27; Jos 17 11-13). Regarding the settlement of the Northern tribes Issachar and Zebulun, as well as the formation of the mixed tribes Naphtali and Asher, we know nothing. Of great importance was the victory over King Jabin of Hazor (cf. the mod. Jebel- and Merj el-Ḥaḍīre) near the springs S. of Mērōm (Jg ch. 4; Jos 11 1-15). The genuine Israelite population of that country remained somewhat small. Consequently, it received the designation gᵉlīl ha-gōyīm, 'district of the nations' (Is 9 1; I K 9 11; II K 15 29). A portion of the tribe of Dan which did not succeed in locating on the western slope of the highland gained possession of the city of Laish, near the middle source of the Jordan, which then received the name Dan (cf. Tell el-Ḳāḍī, § 12, above). The neighboring places Abel-beth-maachah (mod. Abil el-Ḳamḥ) and Ijon (cf. Merj 'Ayūn, § 10), in the course of time identified themselves with this tribe.

30. Union of the Tribes into One People.

The place where the Israelite occupation first became most securely established was doubtless the territory N. and S. of Shechem. Here we find the beginnings of an Israelite dominion something after the form of a tribal kingdom founded by Gideon, or Jerubbaal, whose home, Ophrah, must have been situated between Shechem and the Plain of Esdraelon, although it remains still unidentified. Through his sudden and victorious attack on the Midianites at the spring of Harod (probably the mod. 'Ain Jālūd, SE. of Zer'īn), he drove back these invaders into the E. Jordan land. His son Abimelech, who finally united Shechem with Israel, lost his life in the siege of the Canaanite city Thebez (the mod. Ṭūbās), on the road from Shechem to Bethshan. It was the foreign control of the Philistines that first united the Israelite tribes more closely. Their attempt to take possession of the interior, lying back of their own coast-plain, brought the Philistines into conflict with the Israelite tribes somewhere near the mod. Wādy Ḳana or the Wādy dēr Ballūṭ. The places Aphek and Eben-ezer (I S 4 1 f.) can no longer be identified. After repeated victories, about 1100 B.C. the people of the middle highland region, and somewhat later the territory of Judah, were compelled to pay tribute. In this extremity, Samuel succeeded in inspiring the distinguished Benjamite Saul to make the attempt to unify the Israelite tribes in a common war against their despotic masters. The home of Samuel is given as Ramah, or Ramathaim, in the land of Zuph, on Mount Ephraim (I S 1 1), which in the Onomasticon (ed. De Lagarde, 225 f. 96, 288.146) is identified with Ῥεμφίς (the mod. Rentīs), NE. of Lydda. After his fortunate deliverance of the city of Jabesh, probably near the mod. Wādy Yabīs, E. of the Jordan, Saul was proclaimed king by his army at Gilgal (I S ch. 11). From Gibeah (Jeba') on the S. side of Wādy es-Suwēnīṭ, Jonathan passed over and surprised the camp of the Philistines at Michmash (Makhmās), on the N. side of the same ravine, and Saul completed the victory by pursuing the Philistines down through the Wādy Selmān as far as Aijalon (I S ch. 13 f.).

Saul's kingdom became the magnet which drew to itself the remaining Israelite tribes to the S., N., and E. His campaign against the Amalekites (I S ch. 15) shows that even in the territory of the Calebites people began to place their hope in him. With David, the son of Jesse of Bethlehem in Judah, the Judæan clans appear for the first time in close relationship to the Israelite kingdom. In the E. Saul warred successfully with the Moabites, Ammonites, and Aramæans (I S 14 47 f.; read 'Arām instead of 'Edhōm). But his defeat at the foot of Mt. Gilboa (mod. Jebel Fuḳū'a, § 8, above) rendered all his previous successes against the Philistines of no account. The latter now took possession of the cities of the Plain of Esdraelon, and therewith the control of the trade-route as far as Tabor (§ 10, above).

The work of Saul, which had apparently been in vain, was brought to a successful issue by David. The Kingdom of Judah which he founded at Hebron marked the beginning of a new stage in the history of the tribe of Judah, which had been pursuing its own way undisturbed upon its isolated mountains throughout the previous 200 years. David brought into union with this tribe a territory three or four times as large as its original possession, and gradually extended it to the SE. as far as the territory of the Edomites, to the S. as far as Kadesh in the Negeb (cf. § 6, above), and to the SW. as far as the territory of the Philistines. This whole region became known as Judah (e.g., Jos 15 1), but it included tribes which up to that time had been sharply distinguished from Judah, such as the Kenizzites, Kenites, and Jerahmeelites. Therewith David laid the foundation for the rivalry between Judah and Israel, which took the place of the old rivalry between Leah and Rachel, although his real purpose was to unite the tribes about his own person. He attained his end through the death of Ishbosheth at Mahanaim (perhaps el-Mahne), E. of the Jordan, and through the capture of the Jebusite stronghold Zion, together with his decisive victories over the Philistines. The general character of the mountain-land, its narrow valleys and numberless hiding-places, made it possible for David to take the offensive against the Philistines, who had once more advanced into the highlands. Of the numerous conflicts (cf. II S 21 15-22, 23 9-17) only two are recounted with any exactness, namely, that at Baal-perazim and at Gibeon (II S 5 17-25). The first-mentioned place must be sought for in the upper Wādy eṣ-Ṣarār not far from the Valley of Rephaim (§ 7, above). The second is the well-known el-Jīb.

This union of the Israelite tribes lasted about two generations. The same general course of events was taking place throughout the whole land. Israel absorbed the Canaanite clans, which had not been destroyed and could not be extinguished, and gave them equal rights with her own people. So it happened with the Jebusites in Jerusalem (II S 24 16 ff.; Zec 9 7), likewise with the Aramæans in the

E. Jordan land, as we learn from the case of Barzillai (II S 17 27, 19 31 ff.). In Solomon's time there still remained some independent Canaanites in Israel (I K 9 20 f.). In this period we should probably place the return on the part of certain clans of the tribe of Manasseh to the E. Jordan region, where Machir settled in Gilead (§ 13, above); Jair occupied the so-called "villages" of Jair, more exactly 'encampments' of Jair, and Nobah occupied the city of Kenath (Nu 32 39, 41 f.). The 'encampments' of Jair (which were nomadic) should not be confused with the thirty cities of Jair mentioned in Jg 10 4—which should be located, in view of the mention of Kamon, mod. Kamm and Kumēm (Jg 10 5), W. of Irbid in N. Gilead—but are to be placed probably E. of this place toward the desert. The city Kenath is probably the mod. Kerak in the Nukra, the ancient Bashan (§ 13, above). The Aramæan districts Geshur, Maachah, N. of the Yarmūk, remained independent, although the city of Golan in their vicinity seems to have belonged to Israel (Jos 13 13; Dt 4 43). The Israelite territory—not identical with the kingdom of David—was usually designated by the brief formula "Israel from Dan to Beer-sheba" (II S 24 2). The account of the census of Israel and Judah which Joab undertook for David (II S 24 1-8) mentions the most important points on the border: Aroer on the Arnon (mod. 'Arā'ir, on the Wādy el-Mōjib); the territory of Gad, which is here the most southern part of the Israelite territory E. of the Jordan; the region of the city Jazer (mod. Khirbet Ṣār on the Wādy Ṣīr); the region of Gilead, which is here the northern part of the Israelite E. Jordan territory; then the territory of Naphtali, W. of the Jordan, with its city Kadesh (mod. Kedes above Lake Hūle); the city of Dan (mod. Tell el-Ḳāḍī); the city of Ijon (cf. the mod. Merj 'Ayūn, § 10, above); then to the W. the boundary toward the territory of Sidon and Tyre; and finally, in a southerly direction, the cities of the Hivites and Canaanites as far as the Negeb of Judah to Beer-sheba. The boundary-line toward the W is presupposed as well known. The Davidic kingdom included but one small portion of the Mediterranean coast, namely, that from Carmel (cf. I K 18 30) to the city of Dor (Jos 17 11; Jg 1 27 f.). In other places the territory of Israel ended with the western slope of the mountain-land, and the Shephelah was divided between Israel and the Philistines. These limits of the kingdom remained practically unchanged during the reign of Solomon.

31. The Boundary Between the Kingdoms of Israel and Judah.

The disruption of the kingdom brought about no change in the boundary between the Israelite territory and that belonging to other peoples, but it drew a new one between the two kingdoms which was not identical with the old tribal boundary. The Southern Kingdom included the whole tribe of Judah, with all its dependents, which we have already noted (§ 30, above), and in addition, the southern part of the tribe of Benjamin, not the whole tribe as was the view in later times (cf. I K 11 32, 36, 12 17, with 12 21, 23=II Ch 11 1, 3). The portion of the tribe of Benjamin which was reckoned to the Kingdom of Judah did not always remain the same. King Abijah of Judah is said to have defeated Jeroboam I at Mt. Zemaraim, probably in the neighborhood of Bethel, and then united the district including Bethel, Jeshanah (mod. 'Ain Sīnjā, 3½ m. N. of Bethel), and Ephron (cf. mod. eṭ-Ṭaijibe, 4½ m. N. of Bethel), with Judah (II Ch 13 3-20). He had some agreement with the Aramæans of Damascus, to the disadvantage of Israel (I K 15 19). But King Baasha came to such an understanding with the Aramæans that he was able undisturbed by them to push back the Judæans as far as the neighborhood of Jerusalem and to fortify Ramah (mod. Er-rām, 5 m. N. of Jerusalem), as a frontier fortress on the main thoroughfare upon the crest of the highland. King Asa of Judah, son of Abijah, felt himself too weak to put an end to this oppressive situation. Only after he had hired Ben-hadad I of Damascus for a large sum to again attack Israel was he able to dismantle Ramah. He then built up and fortified Gibeah (mod. Dscheba') and also Mizpah (mod. Nebi Samwīl) as frontier fortresses of his kingdom (I K 15 16-23). This boundary-line continued unchanged until the 7th cent. From the crest of the highland it ran eastward, probably through the precipitous Wādy es-Suwēnīṭ, while to the W it touched upon the territory of the city of Aijalon, which had been fortified by Rehoboam (II Ch 11 10), probably not including Beth-horon. In the second half of the 7th cent. the boundary-line was again pushed northward. Such passages as Is 10 28, II K 23 4, 15 can be understood only on the supposition that the boundary of the Judæan kingdom was near Aiath or Bethel. Such a change seems possible only in the time when the authority of the Assyrian kingdom on its frontiers had weakened; that is, after 645 B.C. It is this boundary-line that the author of Jos 18 12 f. has in mind when he places the northern limit of the tribe of Benjamin at Bethel, and to this same time belong the expressions which speak of the house of David as ruling over two tribes, namely, over Judah and Benjamin (I K 12 21, 23; II Ch 11 1, 3, 34 32). It is true that after 722 there was no such thing as a boundary between the kingdoms of Judah and Israel, but between the Kingdom of Judah and the Assyrian provinces to the N. These same observations hold true for the extension of the dominion of King Josiah as far as the Plain of Esdraelon, which is to be inferred from II K 23 19 f., 29 ff.

32. The Tribal Boundaries in Jos chs. 13-19.

The description of the tribal boundaries which we find in Jos chs. 13–19 gives rise to many discussions of Israel's pre-exilic period. The multitude of details which here come in view can not be discussed in this place. Only some general observations concerning the age, the value, and practical use of these notices can be offered. These notices belong to different times and different documentary sources, from JE to PC, and have been worked over to a great extent, in some cases supplemented, in others abbreviated. The material which they contain is pre-exilic, and the authors down to the last redactor were conscious that they were dealing with pre-exilic conditions. But the traditional materials which they brought together were neither contemporaneous nor similar in character. The redactors also have here and there united theoretical considerations along with the material which they found at hand concerning the boundaries of Israel or of the individual tribes. The most instructive as well as most detailed notices are those concerning the territory of Judah and Benjamin, as they are also most complete. The northern limit of Judah (Jos 15 5-11; cf. the S. boundary of Benjamin, Jos 18 15-19) can be understood only as the boundary of the tribe of Judah in the pre-exilic time. The southern limit, on the other hand (Jos 15 1-4), is not the boundary of the tribe, but of the Kingdom of Judah, to which the inhabitants of the Negeb were frequently compelled to pay tribute. The tribe of Judah extended southward only as far as the neighborhood of Beth-zur, where the territory of the Calebites began (cf. § 29, above), which after David's time belonged actually to the Kingdom of Judah. Therefore, the notices here brought together vary greatly in character. The localities Zorah and Eshtaol are reckoned to the tribe of Dan in Jos 19 41, but in 15 33 to Judah, although, according to Jg 13 2f. and 18 11, they are closely connected with the history of the Danites. The same thing is found in connection with Ir-shemesh; that is, Beth-shemesh (Jos 15 10; II K 14 11, 13; II Ch 28 18) and Aijalon (Jg 1 35; II Ch 11 10, 28 18). Each statement represented correctly the conditions of the time to which it originally belonged, but it is clear that they come severally from different periods. The W. boundary of Judah in Jos 15 11f. is the Mediterranean (cf. Dt 34 2, 11 24); consequently, the well-known Philistine cities of Ekron, Ashdod, and Gaza are listed as belonging to Judah (Jos 15 45-47). The writer knew nothing of the fact that under Alexander Jannæus (104–78 B.C.) and Herod the Great a small strip of the coast belonged to the Jewish kingdom. He probably based his statements on the fact that David had conquered the Philistines and reduced them to subjection, and consequently counted all their territory as belonging to the Kingdom of Judah; that is, he claimed it for Judah. Here the author did not deal in facts, as we might expect from the whole context, but represented the case according to his theory of what ought to have taken place (cf. Am 9 12). The same peculiarities are found in the notices of the boundary of the tribe of Benjamin (Jos 18 11-20). The northern limit is determined with reference to the conditions that held after the dissolution of the Northern Kingdom (cf. § 31, above). The assignment of the city of Jerusalem to Benjamin is correct only in so far as it did not belong to Judah, but in fact still less did it actually belong to Benjamin. Here also apparently theoretical considerations influenced the writer. When we test these most exact statements of the tribal boundaries we see that they have been brought together through learned and painstaking efforts indeed, although from our point of view in a very unscientific way, since materials varying greatly in character have been used indiscriminately. We by no means get from them those holy inviolable bounds and limits which were supposed to have been set by Joshua in the olden time, and which sharply divided the territory of one tribe from that of another. It would be only a false appreciation of these notices to assign them any high historical value. Besides, we are unable, even with the help of the good modern maps which we now possess, to draw these boundary-lines according to the points noted. We find, for example, for the northern boundary of Judah (Jos 15 5 ff.) twelve localities which can be identified are given, yet it is clear that a boundary-line drawn according to these places would rest only upon supposition. Further, the northern limit of the tribe of Dan coincides with the western part of the southern limit of the tribe of Ephraim. For this we have the points (Jos 16 3) lower Beth-horon, Gezer, and the sea, but how could any one draw a boundary-line on the basis of such information? For most of the other tribes we have fewer notices than for Judah and Benjamin. The tribal boundaries of Dan and Simeon are missing altogether. The text of the notices touching Asher and Zebulon is very corrupt, and the majority of the places mentioned are unknown. The notices regarding the boundaries of Issachar, Gad, Reuben, and Naphtali are very incomplete, probably abbreviated. The dividing-line between Issachar, Manasseh, and Ephraim is not definite, and the same was the case regarding Reuben and Gad; so that if any one should, in spite of all these difficulties, represent the territory of the tribes of Israel upon a map, he sets forth things that were never actual historical conditions, but only creations of the imagination.

33. The Jewish Territory About Jerusalem After the Exile.

From Neh ch. 3 we learn what the territory was which the families of Judah and Benjamin inhabited after the Exile, and which was at one time administered by that remarkable governor Nehemiah. It included six larger towns or communities: Jerusalem, Jericho, Tekoah, Zanoah (mod. Tell Zānū'a), Gibeon, and Mizpah, and nine administrative divisions: the double districts of Jerusalem, Beth-zur, and Keilah (probably Kh. Kīlā near Zarea), together with the single districts Beth-haccherem (mod. 'Ain Kārim), Mizpah, and the Plain of the Jordan. The list is not entirely complete, although it includes most of the Jewish territory of the year 445 B.C. It is in a measure confirmed by the catalogue of Neh ch. 7 (=Ezr ch. 2), which originally was a list of the families and communities that, about 430, identified themselves with the religious community founded by Nehemiah and Ezra. Its territory was, as a whole, somewhat smaller than that indicated in Neh ch. 3, since all the families dwelling in the neighborhood of Jerusalem did not at first identify themselves with the covenant community. To the W it extended somewhat further, as we find mention of the localities Lod (Lydda), Hadid (Ḥadīthe), and Ono (Kafr 'Ānā). Probably, these places lay outside of the territory occupied exclusively by the Jews, which is intended by the statements in Neh ch. 3. This difference, however, soon passed away through the growing power of the Jewish Church-state. We discover this from the notices in I and II Mac. Here the limits of Jewish territory—that is, of the Jewish Church-state—are, in the S., Beth-zur (I Mac 4 29, 61), in the N., Beth-horon (I Mac 3 16), and in the W., Emmaus, i.e., 'Amwās (I Mac 3 40, 42). Corresponding to such boundaries we have the fortifications which Bacchides, c. 160 B.C., erected "in Judæa": Jericho in the E., Beth-zur in the S., Emmaus and Gazara (Gezer) in the W., and Bethhoron and Bethel in the N. (I Mac 9 50 ff.). The remaining three places, Himnath, Pharathon, and Tephon, can not be identified.

This small region was not inhabited throughout its territory exclusively by genuine Judæans or Benjamites. During the Exile, certainly before the time of Nehemiah, the Edomites had pushed northward into the territory of the Calebites (cf. § 29, above), and had driven the latter, at least in part, from their possessions. The Calebites moved northward into the region of Ephrath, as we actually learn from I Ch 2 18 f., 50-55, where in the district depopulated by Nebuchadrezzar they found suitable homes. Kiriath-jearim, Bethlehem, Tekoah, Zorah, Eshtaol, Netopha (between Bethlehem and Anathoth), and other places are given in I Ch 2 24, 50 ff. as Calebite. When these identified themselves with the Jewish Church-state, the distinction between Caleb and Judah completely disappeared. The territory occupied by the Edomites was later known under the Greek name Idumæa, Hebron remaining the central city. The hate existing between the Jews and the Idumæans led to open hostilities as early as the time of Judas Maccabæus (I Mac 4 61, 5 65).

34. Judæa.

Under the term Ἰούδα, or Ἰουδαία, in I Mac, the territory described in § 33, above, as belonging to the Jewish Church-state is meant, but with the growing power of the Maccabees the name took on a wider sense. Jonathan obtained (147 B.C.) the city of Ekron with its surrounding territory, and in 145 from Demetrius II three districts touching on the Jewish territory in the N. and W., which previously had belonged to Samaria (I Mac 11 28, 34; cf. § 35, below), so that now altogether four new Jewish districts were counted (I Mac 11 57). The three districts ceded by Demetrius II were named from their chief cities, Aphærima, Lydda, and Ramathaim. Aphærima can be compared with the large village Ἐφραείμ, which, according to Onom. ed. De Lagarde, 254, 118; 257, 121, was 20 Rom. m. N. of Jerusalem, consequently in the region of Sinjil and el-Lubbān. Lydda corresponds to the O T Lod (§ 33, above), and Ramathaim (Arimathæa, Mk 15 43) is the mod. Rentis 7½ m. N. of Lydda, which in Onom. 225, 96; 288, 146 is called Ρεμφίς, Remphis. After Beth-zur on the S. boundary had been captured from the Seleucids (I Mac 11 66), Joppa was taken possession of and Judaized about 142 B.C. (I Mac 12 33, 13 11), likewise Gazara, or Gezer (I Mac 13 43 ff.). The three districts just mentioned remained even in later times politically united to Jerusalem, since the majority of their inhabitants were Jews. According to these facts, the boundaries of Judæa, over against Samaria, were determined after the beginning of the last century B.C. For the extent of Judæa in later times, the list of toparchies, or administration districts, which Josephus gives (BJ, III, 3 5) is instructive, namely: (1) Jerusalem, (2) Gophna (Jifnā, NW. of Bethel), (3) Akrabata ('Akrabe, N. of Shiloh), (4) Thamna (Tibne, N. of Beth-horon), (5) Lydda, (6) Ammaus ('Amwās), (7) Bethletepha (Bēt-nettīf), (8) Engaddai (Engedi), (9) Herodium (Jebel el-Furēdīs), (10) Jericho (er-Riha). To these as (11) Idumæa (§ 33, above), S. of Beth-zur, is to be added, which was conquered and Judaized by John Hyrcanus (135–105 B.C.), and is not seldom mentioned by itself along with Judæa (e.g., Mk 3 7 f.). With the foregoing agree the boundaries which are found, partly in Josephus, and partly in the Talmud. In Ant. XIV, 3 4, Korea (Ḳarāwā, in the lower Wādy Fār'a) is given as the most northern city of Judah, and in BJ, III, 3 5, Annath Borkaios is named as the outpost against Samaria, with which we may compare Khirbet Berkīt, 2 m. NE. of el-Lubbān (cf. Ad. Neubauer, La Géographie du Talmud, 57, and Onom. 214). Further to the W the Talmud (cf. Neubauer, p. 86) mentions Antipatris (Ḳal'at Rās el-'Ain, N. of Lydda), which was built by Herod the Great as the boundary in that direction. Accordingly, the northern limit seems to have followed the modern Wādy dēr Ballūṭ. The boundary toward the W varied. The Jewish population was in the majority, but the land was not old Jewish territory. For Joppa and Samaria, cf. Jos. BJ, III, 3 5; for Cæsarea, cf. Ac 12 19, 21 10. Ekron and Ashdod were controlled by the Hasmoneans, Gaza also by Herod. On the other hand, Ashkelon was never under the control of the Jews. The term "Judæa" was also used in a popular sense to mean a larger extent of territory, the ground of which usage is to be found in the conquests of the Maccabees. The meaning of the term varied at different times. It was used for the kingdom of the Maccabees under Alexander Jannæus (Jos. Ant. XIV, 5 2), for the territory of the high priest Hyrcanus (Ant. XIV, 11 2), for the kingdom of Herod (XVI, 2 1), for the territory ruled over by the Roman procurators (XVIII, 1 1; Lk 3 1), for the Roman province of Judæa (BJ, VII, 6 1), and for the portion of Syria inhabited by Jews (Ac 1 8, 2 9). It is therefore not surprising that Josephus occasionally uses "Judæa" in the sense of the old Canaan (Ant. I, 6 2, 7 2).

35. Samaria.

In spite of the fact that the last remnant of the Kingdom of Israel was inhabited by a mixed population with a mixed religion (II K 17 24 ff.), the haughty attitude toward Judah remained the same as in the earlier time, especially as the territory of the latter continually grew larger (cf. § 33, above, and Neh 3 33-37). Beth-horon was the home of the powerful Sanballat, who gave Nehemiah so much trouble. It was the Maccabees who brought about a change in the external conditions, since the gaining of the three territories Apherima, Lydda, and Ramathaim, 145 B.C., advanced the territory of Judah a considerable distance northward (cf. § 34, above). In 128 B.C. John Hyrcanus conquered Shechem together with the whole of Samaria, and united it to the Judæan kingdom. Pompey, on the other hand, freed the city of Samaria and the territory belonging to it between Judæa (§ 34, above) and the Plain of Esdraelon from the dominion of the Jews, and allowed it to manage its own internal affairs (63 B.C.); nevertheless it had to pay tribute to the province of Syria and furnish its contingent of soldiers to the governor of the same. Scythopolis, as Bethshan was now called, was united with the Decapolis (§ 38, above), while Carmel (cf. § 8, above) had probably belonged to the city of Tyre since the fall of the Kingdom of Israel (BJ, III, 3 1 and I, 2 7). Somewhere between these two points, according to Josephus (BJ, III, 3 4), lay the northern boundary of Samaria, namely, near the village of Ginnai (mod. Jīnīn), on the edge of the Plain of Esdraelon. The southern boundary has already been described in § 34, above. To the E. the Jordan Valley was the limit, and on the W indefinitely the foothills of the highland. The city of Samaria attained to new prosperity through Herod, who rebuilt it (27 B.C.) and named it Sebaste. In 72 A.D. the old Shechem was replaced by Flavia Neapolis (mod. Nābulus), founded by Vespasian. On the coast, in 22 B.C., Herod the Great founded the famous seaport Cæsarea Palestina, or ad Mare, which was later the headquarters of the Roman procurator of Judæa.

36. Galilee.

After 734 B.C., the old Gālīl (§ 29, above) was altogether under the dominion of foreigners. From I Ch 30 10 f. it may be inferred that about 300 B.C. a number of families in Galilee felt themselves to be in some relationship to Jerusalem, but their position among the heathen was not secure. Consequently, about 165 B.C. Simon the Maccabee ordered them to remove with their possessions to Judæa (I Mac 5 14-23). Through the victories of Aristobulus I (104–103 B.C.) the whole population was compelled to accept Judaism, a population that consisted of remnants of Canaanites and Israelites, with additions of Aramæans, Ituræans (from the Lebanons), and Greeks. It was due to this fact that the Galileans were somewhat despised by the Judæans (Jn 1 46, 7 52). Nevertheless, Josephus praises their bravery and love of freedom, which showed itself just before and after the beginning of the Christian era in their frequent revolutions, partly in favor of the fallen Maccabee house, and partly against the Romans. The boundaries of the territory Galilee (Γαλιλαία, the Gr. form of the Heb. gᵉlīlāh or gālīl) we learn in general through Josephus (BJ, III, 3 1 ff.). They began N. of Scythopolis and the Plain of Esdraelon, extended eastward as far as the Jordan and to the Sea of Gennesaret, and, on the N., bordered on a district belonging to the old city Kadesh (mod. Ḳedes, in Jos. Kedasa, or Kydyssa), which belonged to Tyre (Ant. XIII, 5 6; BJ, II, 18 1; IV, 2 3). The western boundary can not be defined exactly. A distinction was made between Lower and Upper Galilee, the dividing-line being fixed by the Mishna as near Kephar-Ḥananja (mod. Kafr ʿAnān), by Jos. as at Bersabe (perhaps the same as Heptapegon, between Khān Minje and eṭ-Tābigha). Quite remarkably, a place like Gamala (Jos. BJ, II, 20 4; cf. Ac 5 37) was reckoned to Galilee, though it really belonged to Gaulanitis (Jōlān), E. of the Sea of Gennesaret. The region near the sources of the Jordan, Ulatha and Paneas (§ 12, above), were not added to the kingdom of Herod until 20 B.C., when he was presented with the tetrarchy of Zenodorus by Augustus. The capital of Galilee was Sepphoris (Sefūrije). Under Herod Antipas (4 B.C. to 39 A.D.) for a long time the capital was at Tiberias, a city founded by him (cf. § 10, above).

37. Peræa.

The name "Peræa" represents the Hebrew expression ʿebher ha-yardēn, meaning 'the E. Jordan land.' The connection of Peræa with Jerusalem came about in the same way as did that of Galilee (§ 36, above). At first, Judas Maccabæus removed the Jewish population living there to Jerusalem (I Mac 5 9-54), but fifty years later, John Hyrcanus (134–104 B.C.) began the conquest of the E. Jordan land, which was completed by Alexander Jannæus (102–76 B.C.). Philadelphia alone, the old Rabbath-Ammon, resisted him. Since the conquered people were compelled to accept the Jewish religion, it is not surprising if, from the time of Pompey (cf. § 38, below), we find mention of a Jewish territory Peræa E. of the Jordan. This territory, according to Jos. BJ. III, 3 3, was S. of the district of the city Pella, somewhere near the Wādy Yābis, and included, to the S., the district of the city Machærus (Kh. Mukaur). Its western boundary was the Jordan, while to the E. it extended as far as the territory of the Arabian Nabatæans, Heshbon, and the cities of Philadelphia and Gerasa. Its eastern boundary would have been represented by a line drawn a little E. of es-Salṭ. Its capital was Gedor (the Γαδαρά of Ptolemy, V, 15), of which name we have a trace in the mod. ʿAin Jādūr, S. of es-Salṭ. The rest of the E. Jordan land belonged to the territory of those cities which were united in the league of the Decapolis (q.v.).

38. The Roman Administration.

When Pompey organized the Roman province of Syria, 63 B.C., he left the specific Jewish region—that is, Judæa (with Idumæa), Galilee, and Peræa—under the control of the Maccabæan high priest Hyrcanus, who, however, was subject to the Roman governor of Syria. The non-Jewish cities on the coast and in the E. Jordan land were 'freed' from the dominion of the Jews. The latter formed themselves into the league of the Decapolis, which in the time of its greatest prosperity included Philadelphia on the S. and Damascus on the N., and for a long time formed an efficient bulwark for the well-populated and civilized E. Jordan region against the Bedawin, who were continually pressing in from the desert. In consequence of a revolt against the Romans, Gabinius, the Roman governor (57 B.C.), divided up the Jewish territory into five districts, Jerusalem, Jericho, Gazara, Amathus, and Sepphoris, exclusive of Idumæa, which remained in the control of the wily Antipater. The first three of these territories constituted Judæa proper. Amathus (Tell ʿAmate) was made the capital of Peræa, as Sepphoris was of Galilee. But in 55 B.C. Gabinius restored the old conditions, and in 47 B.C. Cæsar enlarged the territory of Hyrcanus by the addition of the Plain of Esdraelon and the seaport Joppa. Although after a long struggle the Maccabæan Antigonus with the help of the Parthians again became king of the Jews (40–37 B.C.), Herod the son of Antipater succeeded in having himself named by the Roman senate as king (40 B.C.), and having defeated Antigonus ruled from 37 to 4 B.C. He rendered the land a great service in that he subdued the Arabian Bedawin in the Trachonitis (el-Lejā), and brought this region, together with the adjacent districts Batanæa and Auranitis, to a state of settled, peaceful civilization (23 and 7 B.C.). He succeeded in adding Gaulanitis also, together with the district about the sources of the Jordan, to his kingdom. After his death, Augustus decided that Archelaus as ethnarch should have Idumæa, Judæa, and Samaria, that Antipas should have Galilee and Peræa, and Philip receive Batanæa (with Gaulanitis), Trachonitis, and Auranitis, the two latter with the title tetrarch. But as early as 6 B.C. the territory of Archelaus was united with the province of Syria, although under special administration of a procurator (6–41 A.D.). Philip, who built the city of Cæsarea Philippi near the old Paneion at the sources of the Jordan (§ 12, above), and Julias on the site of Bethsaida, ruled until 33–34 A.D. His territory was united with the province of Syria until 37, then was given to King Agrippa I, who, in 39–40, also received the territory of Antipas, and in 41, Judæa and Samaria. After his death (44 A.D.) the Emperor Claudius placed the whole region under procurators (44–65). For the suppression of the Jewish revolt (66–70) Nero appointed Flavius Vespasianus to the Jewish territory as a special province. It remained as the private property of the Emperor Vespasian after his son Titus had put down the revolt. The province of Judæa was administered from Cæsarea Palestina through imperial governors; that is, pretorian legates. After the suppression of the last revolt of the Jews (132–135 A.D.) by Hadrian, the province was named Syria Palestina, with a consular legate at its head. After the time of Septimius Severus (193–211 A.D.), the simple name "Palestine" was the usual designation (cf. § 1, above).

PAN: (1) ḥăbhittīm (I Ch 9 31), from ḥābhath, 'to broil' or 'roast,' is of uncertain meaning, though probably it indicates some sort of a baking-dish. (2) maḥăbhath (Lv 2 5, 6 21, 7 9; I Ch 23 29), from the same root as (1), must be some kind of a flat broiling- or baking-dish, but exactly what is intended is uncertain (cf. the same word in Ezk 4 3). (3) masrēth (II S 13 9); as the Jewish-Aramaic equivalent of this word means 'pan,' the same meaning is probably to be assigned to the Heb. word. On other terms rendered "pan" (kiyyōr, ṣīr, pārūr, and tsallaḥath) see FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 11, and Plate I of HOUSEHOLD UTENSILS, Fig. 4. E. E. N.

PANNAG, pan'nag (פַּנַּג, pannagh): An otherwise unknown word, which AV gives as a place, RV as some kind of confection (Ezk 27 17). Cornill and others emend to dhōnagh, 'wax' (of bees), which goes well with "honey" that follows. C. S. T.

PAPHOS, pē'fŏs (Πάφος): A town on the promontory of Zephyrium near the SW. end of the island of Cyprus, founded by the Phœnicians under Cinyras. Old Paphos lay near the sea with its harbor at the mouth of the Bocarus. New Paphos lay 10 m. inland in a fertile plain. P. was famous for the impure worship of Astarte (Aphrodite), who sprang from the sea here (hence the Paphian Aphrodite), where she was worshiped in the shape of a conical meteoric stone (baetylus, ξόανον); an oracle was connected with her famous, wealthy temple, whose priest exercised spiritual supremacy over Cyprus. P. was destroyed by an earthquake in 14 B.C.; when rebuilt, it was named Augusta in honor of Augustus, but this name failed to persist. In imperial times it was the residence of the proconsul of Cyprus. Many ruins of it remain. J. R. S. S.

PARABLE: A short account of something which might occur, but has not necessarily occurred, in nature or life, designed to convey some moral or spiritual lesson. The essence of the parable (Heb. māshāl, Gr. παραβολή, from παρά βάλλειν, 'to set side by side')is the idea of comparison. It aims to make use of the underlying analogies or resemblances between the natural and spiritual spheres. The Biblical usage of the term "parable," however, is not exact. In particular, in the O T māshāl stands for a wide variety of figurative forms of expression. Occasionally, the nearest English equivalent term would be 'argument,' used in a very general sense (Job 27 1, 29 1). Again, the word means a poetic oracle (Nu 23 7, 18; Hab 2 6) or an obscure and enigmatic utterance, perhaps because couched in symbolic terms (Ezk 20 49). In the N T παραβολή is applied to certain proverbial or metaphorical expressions which are not in the form of a narrative, e.g., "If the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch" (cf. also Mt 15 14, 16; Lk 4 23, 6 39). In the Fourth Gospel "parable" is used to render παροιμία (10 6), which is more strictly 'proverb' (so RVmg.). But the post-Biblical and modern usage of the term has tended to narrow its meaning and, in general, to limit it to similitudes cast into narrative form. Simpler figurative speech is now included in the category of proverb or of simple metaphor; and for associated and similar figures it makes use of such terms as fable, myth, and allegory. Parable is thus to be distinguished from myth, which is also in the form of fictitious narrative capable of conveying moral and spiritual instruction, and is found in two forms. The first of these results from the unconscious clustering of imagined events about imaginary persons in the course of the formation of folk-lore. When folk-lore contains a kernel of historical fact, it becomes legend; when it embodies some truth of natural religion, it is called myth. Or, a myth may also be an artificially constructed story. In either case it embodies and expresses truth, not as a matter of practical life, but of speculative thought. In this, its first form, it lacks the element of exact parallelism between the narrative and the truth conveyed through it. In its second form (cf. Plato, Gorg. 523a; Phæd. 61a), while it approaches most nearly to the form of the Biblical parable, it is not limited to the expression of spiritual or moral lessons; it is concerned with intellectual truth oftener than with ethical principles. The fable differs from the parable, first, in not aiming to represent action possible in nature. It draws its characters from the lower brute creation and even from the inanimate world. It represents these as possessing and using faculties of mind and heart peculiar to man alone. Foxes and wolves, eagles and tortoises, trees and flowers pots and pans, converse with one another like human beings. But a more important difference between fable and parable is that the former is associated with instruction of a type lower than the spiritual. At the highest, its object is the cultivation of mere worldly wisdom or prudence. Quite often a fable is designed for no other end than the entertainment or amusement of the reader, while a parable is always meant to teach some truth of the spiritual or eternal order. Finally, parable differs from allegory in that the latter is more elaborate. It involves the possibility of being lengthened out indefinitely. It parallelizes the developments and sinuosities of an inner or ideal transaction by corresponding terms in the figure. The former is characterized by brevity and simplicity. Figure and idea touch each other at one principal point. In form, also, parable and allegory differ as simile and metaphor (cf. "The kingdom of heaven is like unto," etc., Mt 13 24, 31 33, etc., with "I am the true vine," Jn 15 1 or "I am the door," Jn ch. 10).

2. Parables in the O T.

Of parables in the strictest sense, the O T contains only two. The first of these is the story through which the prophet Nathan awakened in the consciousness of David a sense of his guilt in the matter of Bath-sheba (II S 21 1 ff.), and the second, the similitude of the vineyard used by Isaiah (5 1 ff.) to arouse loyalty to Jehovah on the part of Israel. Other stories, such as that of the trees assembled to elect a king (Jg 9 8) and of the thistle and cedar (II K 14 9), are more strictly fables. Still others, such as Ezekiel's account of the two eagles and the vine (17 2 ff.) and of the caldron (24 3 ff.), are allegories. The small number of parabolic narratives to be found in the O T must not, however, be taken as an indication of indifference toward this literary form as suitable for moral instruction. The number is only apparently small. In reality, similitudes, which, though not explicitly couched in the terms of fictitious narrative, suggest and furnish the materials for such narrative, are abundant.

3. Rabbinical Use of Parables.

The parable has been a favorite method of teaching with the sages of Oriental countries in general. Especially did eminent rabbis (Gamaliel, Hillel) before and in the time of Jesus Christ use it freely. Some of the productions of these men possess much beauty and point. One, for instance, aims to impress on the mind the Divine origin and value of the Law in the following story: A certain king had an only daughter. Another young king asked and obtained her in marriage. As he was about to return to his own country with his bride, the father said to him: "She whom I have given to thee is my only daughter. I can not bear to part from her; yet I can not say unto thee Take her not, for she is thy wife. But show me this kindness; wherever thou goest prepare me a chamber that I may dwell with you, for I can not bear to be separated from my daughter." Thus where the Law is, God is. (Weber, Jüd. Theol. 1897², p. 17.) But, as a general thing, the parables of rabbinical literature are artificial, unnatural, and fantastic (cf. Trench, Notes on Parables).

4. The Parables of Jesus.

Jesus used the parable form so often and with such effect as to raise it to preeminence among literary vehicles of truth, and, at the same time, in a certain sense to identify it with His own personality as a teacher, though it is not true to say, as Steinmeyer does, that it is a form peculiar to Jesus. In all probability, the evangelic records do not contain all the parables which He formulated. As to those which they do bring down to us, their exact number will vary according as one adopts a broader or a narrower definition of the term "parable." Some limit the number to twenty-seven, while others make out as many as fifty-nine. It is enough to say that these numbers, far apart as they are, still convey an idea of the relative frequency of this mode of instruction in the teaching of Jesus. In remarkable contrast to this is the fact that the Epistles of the N T contain nothing resembling the parables. This is also true of the apocryphal gospels. The Fourth Gospel stands midway between the Synoptics and the Epistles in this particular. While it records no parables in the strict sense of the word, it does contain figurative teaching of Jesus falling under the general name of allegory (Jn 10 7 ff., 15 1 ff.). Within the smaller group constituted by the Synoptics the distribution of parables is again closely connected with the main characteristics peculiar to the separate documents. Mark, whose obvious aim is to tell of the works of Jesus, contains the smallest number, giving only one not paralleled in the other two Synoptics. Luke, who aims to be full and complete, gives the largest number. Mt stands between these two, with a collection fairly representative of all Jesus' parables. One striking characteristic of Jesus' handling of parables is His use of them in pairs. The similitude of the Mustard-seed and that of the Leaven (Mt 13 33; Lk 13 20) convey essentially the same teaching. This is true also of the parables of the Hidden Treasure, and the Pearl of Great Price (Mt 13 31 f.; Mk 4 30; Mt 13 44 f.), and of those of the Talents and Pounds. In one case, three parables appear to contain the same general lesson: the Lost Coin, the Lost Sheep, and the Lost Son (Lk ch. 15). The design of this repetition was evidently to present more clearly and forcibly truth already once expressed by showing it from another point of view. But both the grouping and the verbal form in which the parables are now extant have been to some degree influenced by the medium of the personalities through which they have been transmitted, i.e., the consciousness of the evangelists. In respect to the literary form, according to Jülicher, a strong tendency to develop the parables into allegories is to be discerned in the Synoptic records (Gleichnissreden, I, pp. 183–202). It is, however, quite possible to exaggerate this feature of the records.

5. Interpretation of Parables.

The object of parabolic teaching was undoubtedly to set forth clearly and impressively the inner realities of the kingdom of God. Yet in the very nature of things, to many minds unprepared for this type of teaching they incidentally proved a source of mystification and apparent concealment of the meaning of the teacher. With the lapse of time and the change of conditions and forms of thought, and more especially of forms of expression, the tendency to misconstrue and misinterpret the parables grew. In modern times this tendency has often assumed the proportions of complete allegorization. The interpreters of the Tübingen school, for instance, found in the parables allegories of the contests between the Judaizing and Pauline parties in the Apostolic Church. In more recent days, a group of writers including such men as Tolstoy (Teaching of Jesus), Kirchbach (Was lehrte Jesus?[3] 1903), and Kalthoff (Das Christus Problem, 1902) read the parables as allegories of social and industrial conditions and movements. Such allegorizing is based in some instances upon accidental resemblances and suggestions, as when in the Lost Coin (Lk 15 8) one sees a symbol of the lost soul, because just as the coin bears the image of a king, the soul bears the image of God. In other instances, allegorizing is based on the use and interpretation of certain specific symbols in Scripture, upon the assumption that such interpretation of them gives them the stamp of authority. As, for instance, because in Mt 21 33, the leaders of Israel are portrayed as vine-dressers, the vine-dresser in Lk 13 6-9 (the parable of the Fruitless Fig-tree) must be taken as meaning a leader of Israel; but as the interpretation obviously does not fit the character of the person, the allegorist is compelled to explain that in this case the vine-dresser represents the leaders of Israel "as they were not." Again, in some instances, allegorizing is nothing more than the introduction of the theological and philosophical presuppositions of the interpreter. This was the case with the Tübingen exegetes, who found in the four kinds of ground in the Parable of the Sower the four parties or sects of the early Christian Church. In all cases this type of interpretation violates fundamental principles, and vitiates the teaching of Jesus. A parable from its nature presents a single thought in a figurative form. The thought may be simple as well as single, and in such a case, with the discovery and exposition of this thought the interpretation is complete. All else in the form of the figure must be regarded as background or drapery. But the thought may also be complex (e.g., that in the Parable of the Sower), and then the subordinate features may, by their coincident resemblances in the parabolic figure, throw auxiliary light upon it. Naturally, this principle leaves it to be determined what in each parable is the main thought and whether it admits of or demands auxiliary illustration.

PARACLETE, par'a-clît. See Holy Spirit, § 2.

PARADISE. See Eschatology, § 31, and Eden.

PARAH, pê'rā (הַפָּרָה, ha-pārāh), 'the cow': A city of Benjamin (Jos 18 23). Map III, F 5. E. E. N.

PARAN, pê'ran (פָּארָן, pā'rān): 1. A wilderness between Midian and Egypt (I K 11 18), and defined more narrowly as including Kadesh (Nu 20 1), and, by inference, also the wilderness of Zin and beyond to the S. (Nu 27 14; Dt 32 51); but still more narrowly as exclusive of Zin, which lies to the N. (Nu 13 21 and 33 36 LXX.). It is the modern et Tih, a table-land abounding in limestone formation. It served as the refuge of Ishmael when expelled from the camp of Abraham (Gn 21 21). It was one of the stations of the wilderness journey (Nu 10 12, 12 16 [P]). From it the spies were sent out, and thither they returned to make their report (Nu 13 2, 26). 2. A mountain, named with Sinai, Seir, and Teman (Dt 33 2; Hab 3 3). But as these passages are poetical, the intention to name an exact spot is doubtful. It may be Jebel Makra. 3. El-Paran, the 'terebinth of Paran' (Gn 14 6), a landmark near Kadesh, but possibly the same as Elath (q.v.). A. C. Z.

PARBAR, pār'bar (פַּרְבָּר, pārbār): The Hebraized form of a Persian word, meaning 'summer-house' or 'colonnade.' It is the designation of a building connected with Solomon's Temple on the W., where six Levites were stationed as guards, four at the causeway and two inside the Parbar (I Ch 26 18). The word is used in its original Persian form parwārīm of one of the courts of the Temple (II K 23 11, "precincts" RV, "suburbs" AV). J. A. K.

PARCHED CORN. See Food and Food Utensils, § 1.

PARCHMENT: The rendering of the Gr. μεμβράνας in II Ti 4 13. It probably denotes books made of the material just coming into use, and therefore reserved for more important writings. See also Books and Writing, § 3 and Pergamum (end). A. C. Z.

PARDON. See Forgiveness.

PARLOR. See House, § 6.

PARMASHTA, pär-mash'tȧ (פַּרְמַשְׁתָּא, parmashtā'), Persian for 'chief': One of the sons of Haman (Est 9 9). E. E. N.

PARMENAS, pär'mę-nas (Παρμενᾶς): One of the "seven" chosen to administer the charities of the Jerusalem Church (Ac 6 5). Nothing further is known of him. See CHURCH, § 3. E. E. N.

PARNACH, pär'nac (פַּרְנָךְ, parnākh): A "prince" of Zebulun (Nu 34 25). E. E. N.

PAROSH, pê'rȯsh (פַּרְעֹשׁ, par'ōsh), 'flea': The ancestral head of a great post-exilic family of the same name (Ezr 2 3, 8 3 [Pharosh AV], 10 25; Neh 3 25, 7 8, 10 14). E. E. N.

PAROUSIA, par-ū'shi-ȧ or -si-ȧ. See ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 34 ff.

PARSHANDATHA, pär-shan'dȧ-thȧ or pär"shan-dê'thȧ (פַּרְשַׁנְדָּתָא, parshandāthā'), a Persian word, 'given by prayer' (?): One of the sons of Haman (Est 9 7). E. E. N.

PARTHIANS, pär'thi-ȧnz (Πάρθοι, Ac 2 9): Men of Jewish descent who made their permanent home in Parthia and were found, like many others of the Dispersion, at Jerusalem, probably as pilgrims celebrating the festival. Parthians, in a strict sense, are nowhere mentioned in the Bible. Parthia was a mountainous land to the S. of the Caspian Sea, bounded by Hyrcania on the N., Ariana on the E., Media on the W., and Carmania on the S. In its earliest known history this territory was a part of Persia, constituting, according to Herodotus (III, 93), a portion of the 16th satrapy under Darius. It remained under Persian control as late as the conquest of Persia by Alexander the Great. When the land passed into the hands of the Seleucids, the Parthians revolted under Arsaces and became an independent state (c. 250 B.C.). But once independent and under the lead of the Arsacids, Parthia rapidly grew into an empire extending to the Euphrates and the Indus. The Parthian power proved one of the most difficult for the Romans to deal with, and, in fact, was never subjugated, though desperate struggles in the effort to do so were made under Crassus and Trajan. It finally succumbed to internecine strife, and the accession of the Persian dynasty of the Sassanids in 226 A.D. put an end to it. The Parthians made a destructive invasion of Judæa in 39 A.D. A. C. Z.

PARTITION, MIDDLE WALL OF: An expression used by Paul (Eph 2 14) in a passage in which he asserts the abolition of all distinction between Jew and Gentile. It is probable that he had in mind the barrier (sōrēg) in Herod's Temple that separated the outer court of the Gentiles from the inner courts accessible to Jews alone (Jos. Ant. XV, 2; BJ, V, 5). See TEMPLE, § 28. S. D.

PARTRIDGE (qōrē', 'caller'): A bird common in Palestine, but regarded as insignificant in contrast with larger game (I S 26 20). In Jer 17 11 its alleged habit of stealing a nest and hatching young not of its own serves as the basis of a figurative usage. But as the partridge does not do this, the prophet is evidently using a current notion as the ground of his simile. See also PALESTINE, § 25. A. C. Z.

PARUAH, pȧ-rū'ȧ or pär'u-ȧ (פָּרוּחַ, pārūaḥ): The father of Solomon's officer Jehoshaphat (I K 4 17). E. E. N.

PARVAIM, pär-vê'im or pär'vȧ-im (פַּרְוַיִם, parwāyim): Probably the designation of a region where gold was mined (II Ch 3 6). Two possible identifications, one in southern, the other in central Arabia have been proposed. E. E. N.

PASACH, pê'sac (פָּסַךְ, pāsakh): The head of a family of Asher (I Ch 7 33). E. E. N.

PAS-DAMMIM, pas"-dam'mim. See EPHES-DAMMIM.

PASEAH, pȧ-sî'ȧ (פָּסֵחַ, pāsēaḥ), 'limping': 1. The head of a Judahite family (I Ch 4 12, or here a place-name?). 2. The ancestral head of a family of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 49; Neh 7 51, Phaseah AV, Neh 3 6). E. E. N.

PASHHUR, pash'hūr, PASHUR (פַּשְׁחוּר, pashḥūr): 1. The son of Malchijah. With Zephaniah, the priest, he was sent by King Zedekiah (c. 588) to Jeremiah to inquire concerning the outcome of Nebuchadrezzar's attack on Jerusalem (Jer 21 1 f.). Later, he was one of those (Jer 38 1 f.) who were responsible for putting Jeremiah in the miry dungeon (I Ch 9 12; Neh 11 12). 2. The son of Immer, and chief overseer in the Temple under Jehoiachin. He smote Jeremiah and had him put in the stocks, from which he freed him the next day. Jeremiah gave him the name Magor-Missabib (q.v.), and prophesied that he would go into exile to Babylon (Jer 20 1 ff.). As Zephaniah, son of Maaseiah, evidently was overseer of the Temple under Zedekiah, Pashhur probably was taken to Babylon with Jehoiakim (597 B.C.). 3. A priestly family which returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 38; Neh 7 41). Six of the family had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 22), and a representative of the family sealed the covenant (Neh 10 3 [4]). 4. The father of Gedaliah (Jer 38 1), perhaps the same as 2 above. C. S. T.

PASSAGE (ma'ăbhar, ma'bārāh), 'pass, 'ford': This term is found in the AV of Jg 12 5, 6; I S 13 23, 14 4; Is 10 29; Jer 22 20, 51 32; but the same Heb. word is rendered "fords" in Jos 2 7; Jg 3 28; Is 16 2. The RV more accurately renders by "fords" in Jg 12 5, and Jer 51 32 mg. (but "passages" in the text); also by "pass" ("passes") in I S 13 23, 14 4; Is 10 29, and "Abarim" in Jer 22 20. (Cf. ABARIM.) A. C. Z.

PASSENGER: A word found in Pr 9 15; Ezk 39 11, 14, 15 AV in the obsolete sense of 'one who is passing by' or 'through' a place. The RV has the more modern "they [them] that pass by [through]." A. C. Z.

PASSION: (1) In Ac 1 3, "after his passion" is literally 'after He suffered,' μετὰ τὸ παθεῖν αὐτόν. (2) The expression "like passions" (Ac 14 15; Ja 5 17) is the rendering of the compound adj. ὁμοιοπαθής, 'of like feeling,' and means, in these two instances, 'of like nature,' 'with the same natural limitations.' E. E. N.

PASSOVER. See FASTS AND FEASTS, § 7.

PASS THROUGH FIRE, CAUSE TO. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 27.

PASTOR: The original terms rōēh, ποιμήν, 'shepherd,' rendered by "pastor" in Jer 2 8, 3 15, etc., and in Eph 4 11 AV. are in these instances used neither in their literal sense nor in the modern ecclesiastical sense of the Eng. word, but as the equivalent of 'ruler.' In Jer 2 8 the RV renders by "ruler," elsewhere by "shepherd." See also CHURCH LIFE, § 8.

PASTORAL EPISTLES. See TIMOTHY, EPISTLES TO, and TITUS, EPISTLE TO.

PATARA, pat'a-ra (Πάταρα): A seaport of Lycia E. of the mouth of the Xanthus. It was one of the twenty-three Lycian republics which formed a confederacy of seventy cities, at whose head stood the Lyciarch; the six chief cities (Xanthus, Patara, Pinara, Olympus, Myra, Tlos) had two votes each. P. was the seat of the worship, and a famous oracle, of Apollo Patareus. It was enlarged and embellished by Ptolemæus Philadelphus, who renamed it Arsinoë (this name did not persist). There remain of it considerable ruins in the form of walls, temples, theaters, an aqueduct, baths (built by Vespasian), sarcophagi, and a triumphal arch. The ancient harbor is now a swamp. J. R. S. S.

PATER NOSTER. See LORD'S PRAYER.

PATH, PATHWAY: These words render the following original terms: (1) 'ōraḥ, 'path,' 'customary road' (Job 19 8; Is 2 3, etc.). (2) mᵉsillāh, 'highway' (Is 59 7; Jl 2 8). (3) ma'gāl, ma'gālāh, 'wheel-road' (Ps 17 5, 23 3; Pr 2 9, etc.). (4) mish'ōl, a pass 'hemmed in' on each side, or made by hollowing (Nu 22 24). (5) nāthībh, nᵉthībhāh, a 'raised road,' 'highway'; in the literal sense (Job 18 10), and figuratively for the course of life (Job 19 8; Ps 119 105; Pr 1 15, etc.). (6) shᵉbhīl, shᵉbhūl, a 'way that stretches out' (Ps 77 20; Jer 18 15). (7) τρίβος, a 'path made by attrition' (Mk 1 3, and ‖s). (8) τροχιά, a 'circuit,' 'wheel,' i.e., a road that returns upon itself (He 12 13).
A. C. Z.

PATHROS, path'ros, PATHRUSIM, path-rū'sim. See EGYPT, § 1, and ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

PATIENCE. See GOD, § 2.

PATMOS, pat'mos (Πάτμος): A volcanic island of the Sporades group, now nearly treeless. It is characterized by an indented coast and has a safe harbor. By the Romans it was made a place of exile for the lower class of criminals. John, the author of Rev, was banished thither by Domitian 94 A.D. According to tradition, he lived there at hard labor for eighteen months, had his revelations (95 A.D.) in the "cave of the Apocalypse," now connected with the monastery of St. John, which was founded in 1088 A.D. by the monk Christodulus, on the authority of a bull (still extant) of the emperor Alexius Comnenus. The embalmed body of John is still shown. J. R. S. S.

PATRIARCHS: As the etymology implies, a patriarch (πατριάρχης) is one who rules a clan or tribe by paternal right. The word is used several times in the LXX. (e.g., I Ch 24 31; "heads of the fathers' houses" RV); but does not occur in the English O T. In the N T the title "patriarch" is applied to Abraham (He 7 4), David (Ac 2 29), and the sons of Jacob (Ac 7 8 f.). Specifically, the word has come to indicate one of the early progenitors of the human race, or, more narrowly, of the tribes of Israel. The Biblical patriarchs thus fall into three groups: (1) The antediluvians, (2) the names in the genealogical list from Shem to Terah, (3) Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. For these last, see articles under the respective titles; only the first two groups will be considered in this article.

There are two lists of the antediluvian patriarchs. The earlier narrative (Gn 4 16-24, J) traces the descent of Lamech from Cain through four generations, and frequently couples some interesting event with the name mentioned. The second genealogy (Gn 5 3-31, P) makes Seth the ancestor of Lamech, inserts this author's customary chronological data, and adds two more names, so that there are in all ten generations from Adam to Noah. The difference in the spelling of the two lists is not so great as appears in the English translation. From Shem to Terah (Gn ch. 11, P) only nine names appear in the Heb. text; but the LXX., followed by Lk 3 36, inserts "Cainan" between "Arpachshad" and "Shelah," thus making ten generations here also. The different versions vary widely as to the longevity of the patriarchs. Thus from the Flood to Abraham was 290 years according to the present Heb. text, but is given by the LXX. as 1,070 years! This gives some idea of the extent to which the figures were manipulated by the ancient authorities, usually in the interest of some ideal chronological symmetry. (See CHRONOLOGY OF THE O T.) But according to all the accounts, the length of life ascribed is incredibly high.

It is difficult to determine just what historic facts underlie the various genealogies of Genesis. The ten antediluvian patriarchs, with their enormous ages, may have some connection with the ten dynasties which, according to Berossus, ruled Babylonia for 432,000 years before the Flood. The descendants of Noah (Gn ch. 10 f.) are apparently personifications of homonymous tribes or localities, e.g., Canaan, Zidon, Ophir, Elam. (See GENEALOGY.) Even in the later chapters of Genesis we are often in doubt as to whether the narratives describe the actions of individuals or of tribes. (See LOT.) We may safely say, however, that there is a strong presumption against the historic personality of any of the patriarchs before Abraham. Nevertheless, the Biblical writers may have believed that these names belonged to actual individuals. The inspired wisdom and restraint of the Scriptural account are shown in the representation of these typical ancestors of Israel as mere men, and not as wonder-working demigods, which is in striking contrast with the primitive hero legends of other races, as well as with the later rabbinical traditions concerning these same patriarchs.

PATRIMONY. See Family and Family Law, § 8.

PATROBAS, pat'ro-bas or -bas (Πατρόβας): A member of the early Roman Church (Ro 16 14), otherwise unknown. E. E. N.

PATTERN: This term renders the following Heb. and Gr. words: (1) tabhnīth, 'model' (Ex 25 9, 40; Jos 22 28, etc.). (2) tokhnīth, 'measure,' or 'standard,' of the ideal temple (Ezk 43 10; cf. 28 12 RVmg.). (3) mar'eh, 'appearance,' used of Moses' vision of the Tabernacle (Nu 8 4). (4) ὑποτύπωσις, an 'outline,' which serves as a model (I Ti 1 16 AV; "ensample" RV; II Ti 1 13, "form" AV). (5) τύπος, 'model' (Tit 2 7 AV; He 8 5). (6) ὑπόδειγματα, 'copies' (He 9 23 AV). J. M. T.

PAU, pê'u (פָּעוּ, pā'ū): A city of Edom (Gn 36 39; Pai in I Ch 1 50). The LXX. reads "Peor." The site is doubtful. E. E. N.

I. Paul's Life Up to His Conversion.

Paul, Παῦλος (originally Saul, Σαῦλος or Σαούλ = Heb. שָׁאוּל, shā'ūl), was born in Tarsus, a Cilician city of note, intellectually as well as politically (Ac 21 39, 22 3). Against this express statement the story of Jerome—De Viris illustribus, 5—which makes Gischala of Galilee his birthplace can not count. Tarsus had a strong colony of patriotic Jews, who sent reenforcements to Jerusalem during its last siege, and among whom Paul was brought up. Whatever influence the Greek environment had on him must have been mainly unconscious. It was to Jewish influences he gave up his mind. Not only his father but remoter ancestors were Pharisees (Ac 23 6), and he became a devoted Pharisee himself. Yet though Aramaic was his mother tongue (Ac 9 4, 21 40) —from which it has been inferred that his parents had not been long in the Dispersion—and though he knew the Hebrew O T, he usually quotes the LXX., and is to be regarded rather as a Greek than a Hebrew Rabbi. He was by birth a Roman citizen (Ac 22 28), and Ramsay has the merit of showing how the imperial idea influenced his mind and imagination, and even his policy as an evangelist. Attempts to trace in Paul other Greek influences which might have reached him in Tarsus—e.g., that of the Stoic philosophy, which had there its native seat, or of the Greek mysteries—are quite inconclusive (cf. Clemen, Paulus, 1904, vol. ii, p. 65). When Paul says himself (Gal 1 15) that God set him apart from birth, it means that all the influences about him from the beginning—Jewish, Greek, Roman—contributed, apart from any consciousness or intention on his part, to fit him for the work of his life. There was a predestination in them which made him a "chosen vessel" (σκεῦος ἐκλογῆς, Ac 9 15), but which he only came to see later.

1. Birth and Early Training.

Of Paul's family relations little is known. Later, he had a married sister in Jerusalem whose son was old enough to act in a delicate situation (Ac 23 16 f.). He himself seems never to have married. The gift for celibacy was part of his endowment for the homeless Apostolic life. As Appeals to Rome were costly, it has been inferred that in his later days he must have fallen heir to some family property. He must have had a strong physique to be able to survive what we read in II Co 11 23-29, but his presence was not imposing (Ac 14 12). He mentions one distressing and repulsive illness (Gal 4 13), the one apparently from which he suffered chronically or intermittently, and which he elsewhere describes as "a thorn in the flesh," "a messenger of Satan," who buffeted him to keep him humble amid the extraordinary revelations he had had. Of the various guesses at this (ophthalmia, Farrar; malarial fever, Ramsay; crampe de prédicateur, Godet; and epilepsy), there is most to be said for the last, or for some form of hysteria. At Tarsus Paul learned the trade of σκηνοποιός (Ac 18 3), which was connected with the local manufacture of cilicium (goatshair cloth), but it is not certain what modern word gives the best suggestion of the kind of work he did—weaver, sailmaker, saddler, or what. Its value to him as an Apostle was that it enabled him to make the gospel "without charge," ἀδάπανον (I Co 9 18), and to maintain his character for disinterestedness (I Th 2 9; II Th 3 8; I Co 9 12; II Co 12 14; Ac 20 34). He worked at his trade in Thessalonica, Corinth, and Ephesus.

From Tarsus Paul went to Jerusalem to be educated as a Rabbi in the school of Gamaliel (Ac 22 3). He became a 'zealot' for God, or for his ancestral traditions (Gal 1 14). Many strains of interest united here: national, for devotion to the Law meant devotion to Israel; intellectual, for a great Rabbi was to the Jews what a great philosopher was to the Greeks (Jn 3 10); personal, for in his zeal for the Law Paul was conscious that he had rivals whom he had to surpass, if he was to secure his own future (Gal 1 14 and Ph 3 7); and, finally, religious. Paul was a profoundly serious and pious man: he hungered and thirsted after righteousness, and he sought it devotedly along this line. To be righteous meant to keep the Law, and he strove with all his strength to keep it. One of the most important questions to be considered in the study of Paul's life is, What kind of experience did he have, spiritually, during this period? To this the Epp. make various references. In Ph 3 6 he says that he was, "as touching the righteousness which is in the law, found blameless," κατὰ δικαιοσύνην τὴν ἐν νόμῳ γενόμενος ἄμεμπτος, which must mean that no one could censure him from the Pharisaic point of view. (In the same sense, cf. Ac 23 1.) In Gal 1 14 it is implied that so long as he was in this Pharisaic life he had a complacent consciousness of some kind: he was not only getting on, but getting on better than others. It is not certain how far we can use Ro 7 7 to answer our question (cf. HDB, III, 79). What we have here is rather ideal than literal autobiography. Still, it can hardly be doubted that experience reaching back into the Pharisaic days underlies this passage, and that Paul, with all his sincerity, had misgivings as to whether the way he was walking really led to righteousness (see ROMANS, § 2).

3. First Contact with Christianity.

We do not know when he came to Jerusalem. He never saw Jesus in the days of His flesh. Apparently he came into contact with the new movement in some connection with Stephen. The Cilicians (Ac 6 9) had or frequented a particular synagogue in Jerusalem and were Stephen's opponents. Hence Paul probably encountered Christianity first in the form in which it threatened Judaism; Stephen had recalled the words of Jesus which threatened the destruction of the Temple and, therefore, to a great extent the superseding of the Law (Ac 6 14). But apart from definite dogmatic differences, a man so deeply in earnest with his own religion as Paul would soon feel that in the new society there was an attitude of the soul to God which was not his attitude, and which, if it were justifiable, made his religion vain. Two ideals and experiences of religion confronted each other in the Pharisee and the Christian, and this ardent Pharisee was conscious at once that in Christianity he encountered the enemy. It was not a Sadducean police regulation, in the interest of the public order, which he assisted to enforce; it was a genuine religious persecution of which he became a leading agent. He often refers to this. Sometimes he speaks of the severity of the persecution (Ac 22 4, 19 f.), sometimes of the good conscience with which he acted (Ac 26 9); sometimes he expresses deep contrition (Gal 1 13; I Co 15 9; cf. I Ti 1 13, where remorse is lightened by the reflection that he had acted "ignorantly in unbelief," ἀγνοῶν . ἐν ἀπιστίᾳ). These references by Paul himself are of interest in that they agree with the representation in Ac 9 1, that up to the moment of his conversion Paul was persecuting with a good conscience. The "kicking against the goad" (Ac 26 14) does not mean that he was stifling nascent Christian convictions. He was to the last moment of his prechristian life in the tragic situation described by Jesus; he thought that his persecution of the disciples was service rendered to God (Jn 16 2).

II. PAUL'S CONVERSION.

Paul's conversion is in its issues the greatest event of early Christian history. As such, it is three times told in Ac (chs. 9, 22, and 26), and there are incidental allusions to it in Gal 1 12; I Co 9 1; II Co 4 6; Ph 3 12; I Ti 1 13. It raises three main questions:

(1) What were its antecedents, in the sense of events and experiences leading up to it? In the line of what has been said above, some would deny that there were any: only thus, it is argued, can the supernatural character of Paul's conversion be maintained. But the supernatural is not maintained by being made blankly unintelligible, and if a supernatural event—say the manifestation of Jesus—is to have one result and not another, it must be made to a mind in one condition and not another—that is, to a mind prepared for it. Paul's state of mind had no power to produce the manifestation, but it made it possible for him to understand and appreciate it. As influences contributing to such a state of mind reference has been made to the death of Stephen, to the conduct of Christians under persecution, to ideas suggested in the course of controversy with Christians (e.g., the idea with which the Christians, basing on Is ch. 53, countered Paul's efforts to make them blaspheme—the idea, namely, that Jesus, instead of being accursed of God, as Dt 21 23 teaches, had in the love of God become curse for us), and, in particular, to the spiritual experience of Paul under the Law, as read in Ro 7 7 ff. This experience was the "goad" (Ac 26 14), which, though like a stupid or frantic animal he did not know it, was driving him into the arms of Jesus (cf. Findlay in HDB, III, 702 n.).

4. Influences Preparatory to Conversion.

(2) What was it that took place on the way to Damascus? The answer Paul himself gives us is that the Lord 'appeared to him' (I Co 15 8), or that 'he saw the Lord' (9 1).

5. Character of the Event.

In I Co ch. 15 he explains his agreement with the Twelve on the fundamental facts of Christianity, the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus. As an Apostle he is a qualified witness of the resurrection, but resurrection is relative to burial; there is no such thing as the resurrection of the spirit. What Paul believed he saw—and what he believed the Twelve saw—was Christ in what he calls "the body of his glory" (Ph 3 21). That this had a relation to the body which had been laid in the grave is certain, but it had been changed as "we shall be changed" (I Co 15 51). It is useless to ask how such a body can be seen; it can not be seen at all unless Jesus (as the Fourth Gospel puts it, 21 1) 'manifests himself'; but assuming that He can manifest Himself, the question whether Paul's seeing of the Risen Savior was objective or subjective falls to the ground. It was both. It was subjective in that it was accessible to Paul only, and not to all who were physically in the same situation as he, but it was objective in that it was no hallucination, but a real self-manifestation of the glorified Jesus. All the accounts of Paul's conversion in Ac represent Jesus as not only appearing to the persecutor, but speaking to him; and though in ch. 9 and ch. 22 a message is given through Ananias which in ch. 26 is put into the lips of Jesus Himself, yet all three narratives agree with Paul himself in Gal 1 16 in connecting with his conversion his vocation to preach the gospel to all men.

(3) This anticipates our third question: To what extent was Paul's gospel immediately given or involved in this experience? There was something which he called "my gospel" (Ro 2 16, 16 25; II Ti 2 8); not Christianity simply, but, in a nature so strong with an experience so distinct, Pauline Christianity. What part of this peculiar phenomenon can be traced to this hour? The following points seem tolerably certain: (a) This experience fixed Paul's Christology. Christ to him is predominantly the Risen One, the Lord of Glory. It is not the incarnation which rules his thoughts, as in the Fourth Gospel, but the resurrection. His Christ is one in whom all carnal limitations disappear (II Co 5 16), one who shares the Father's throne, and has been declared Son of God in power, in virtue of the resurrection from the dead (Ro 1 4). In the splendor in which He appeared to Paul He is the "image" (εἰκών, II Co 4 4; Col 1 15) of God; it is the "glory of God" which shines in the face of Jesus Christ (II Co 4 4-6). (b) It fixed his eschatology. Paul saw the Lord, and the world in which the Lord lived was henceforth for him the real world. Immortality and glory were not indeterminate conceptions for Paul, half real or less. There was nothing so real to him as the Lord and His glory. But the Lord of glory was the Son of God, the firstborn among many brethren, and Paul's whole hope was to be conformed to the image of God's Son (Ro 8 29). It is a mistake to interpret this only ethically; the image includes all Paul saw at his conversion; the ethical and the incorruptible are blended in it in the Divine. The whole of Paul's Christianity can be put into the eschatological proposition, "We shall bear the image of the heavenly" (I Co 15 49), if we understand "image" in the full Pauline sense (II Co 4 4-6). (c) It fixed his soteriology, perhaps not in all the dogmatic or controversial or apologetic forms he afterward gave it in Gal or Ro, but in substance and effect. He knew from this time on with absolute certainty that salvation is of the Lord. It begins on God's side and with a gracious act of God in Christ which man has done nothing to merit. Paul was going madly on the wrong road when he obtained mercy (I Ti 1 13), was apprehended or arrested (Ph 3 12), turned, and put right.

6. Relation to Paul's Theology.

Define this experience by relation to God, and it takes the form of a doctrine of Divine sovereign grace—God out of His pure mercy saves whom He will. This is the fundamental doctrine of redemption as a doctrine of God, and all the gospel is in it. Define this same experience by relation to man, and it takes the negative form of a doctrine excluding all human rights or titles to salvation. God did not appear to Paul in Christ because of what he had done or was doing. It was not his devotion to the Law which was rewarded with salvation. All he had ever done, or tried to do, faded into nothingness, or only rose to impeach him; salvation was in Christ alone and in surrender to Him, not in anything Paul could do apart from Him, or antecedent to Him. This again is the fundamental doctrine of redemption as a doctrine of man, and all the gospel is in it—righteousness by faith alone, apart from works of law. Paul knew now that nothing statutory contributes anything to salvation; it is all in Christ, crucified and exalted, and in the free response which Christ evokes in the heart. (d) Finally, it fixed his vocation as Apostle of the Gentiles. (See 2, above.) This does not depend on the fact that the Christ who appeared to Paul was not the Jewish national Messiah, but the heavenly Messiah, who was to have rule over all (cf. Brückner, Paul. Christologie, p. 29); it depends on Paul's instinctive perception that he was being saved by Christ not as a Jew and a Pharisee, but as a man and a sinner. Absolute grace has in it the promise of universality; in the relation of absolute debt to God, all distinctions of men disappear.

III. Paul's Apostolic Life.

We have two accounts in the NT of what immediately followed Paul's conversion (Gal 1 16 ff.; Ac 9 19 ff.). We may assume that his intercourse with Ananias (Ac 9 9-18) meant something for him, and that he either knew beforehand, or received from him, the tradition of the Christian fundamentals to which he refers in I Co 15 3. Paul there represents himself as a link in the chain of tradition (cf. 11 23, παρέδωκα . ὃ καὶ παρέλαβον), but in Gal ch. 1 he insists that he owed to men neither his gospel nor his apostleship. From Damascus he went to Arabia (the Haurân? or Sinai?), but apparently not for any length of time. The three years of Gal 1 18, mentioned after his return to Damascus, where he preached as a Christian (Ac 9 20) and made disciples of his own (ver. 25), seem to have been spent more in that city than in Arabia. His escape from Damascus at the risk of his life is referred to in Ac 9 23 ff.; II Co 11 32. He went up to Jerusalem, to make acquaintance with the great man of the Church (Gal 1 18), and stayed with him a fortnight. No doubt from him he would hear much of Jesus. Otherwise, we should infer from his own account in Gal that the visit was one of much privacy The narrative in Ac 9 26 ff. gives a different complexion to this visit, and seems to imply more (ver. 28 f.) than can easily be put into a fortnight, but both accounts end consistently. In Ac 9 30 Paul is sent via Cæsarea to Tarsus; in Gal 1 21 he comes into the regions of Syria and Cilicia (the latter usually a kind of annex, politically, to the great province of Syria). Paul himself mentions these facts as proof that he did not owe his gospel or his Apostolic commission to the Twelve. How could he, if he had exercised a Christian ministry which God had blessed both before he had seen any of them and in entire independence of the fugitive contact he had later had with one of them?

7. Early Ministry.

This brings us to the obscure period of Paul's life, which, though the chronology is uncertain, was of considerable duration. Between his first visit to Jerusalem (Ac 9 26) and his second (Ac 11 30, 12 25), Lightfoot and Turner reckon eight years, Ramsay ten, Harnack eleven (?). (For a full examination of all the evidence, cf. Turner in HDB, art. Chronology See also Chronology of the N T, § 7.) What did he do all this time? In Gal 1 24 he says that the Christian churches in Judæa heard from time to time that their former persecutor was preaching the faith he once attacked. No doubt the existence of churches in Cilicia, which numbered Gentiles among their members (Ac 15 23), was due in part to his work at this time. It was apparently toward the close of this period that Barnabas, who, according to Ac 9 27, had stood sponsor for Paul at Jerusalem, acted a second time as his good genius and brought him to Antioch. A great church had grown up there, which, though in its beginnings it may have been Jewish only (cf. Chase, Hulsean Lecture, 1901, pp. 81 ff.), now contained both Jewish and Gentile members; and Barnabas, who had thrown himself heartily into the work, felt that this was the place for Paul. He went to Tarsus to seek him out (Ac 11 25), and when he returned with Paul, they were for a whole year hospitably entertained by the church (συναχθῆναι, Ac 11 26, as in Mt 25 35; Dt 22 2; Jg 19 18; cf. Bartlet, Com. on Acts, 1902, ad loc.). It was this flourishing and generous church which, when a famine came soon afterward (44 or 45? A.D.), sent help to the poor saints of the mother church at Jerusalem by the hands of Barnabas and Paul (Ac 11 30, 12 25). For discussions of this journey and its relation to that described in Gal 2 1 see Commentaries of Lightfoot, and Sieffert (Meyer series) and, opposed to them, Ramsay in his Church in the Roman Empire and his St. Paul the Traveler.

9. Missionary Journeys.

With the return of Paul and Barnabas to Antioch we enter on that part of the Apostle's career on which we have the fullest information. In the church of Antioch there was organized the first distinctive mission. The story of it is told in Ac chs. 13 and 14.

There is a formal propriety in laying out the life of Paul from this point according to the program in Ac. In harmony with this we have (1) the first missionary journey, through Cyprus and certain cities in Pisidia and Lycaonia, in Ac 13 1–14 28; (2) the second, which, traversing part of the same ground in reverse order, carried the Apostle eventually to Philippi, Thessalonica, and Corinth, and thence once more to Antioch via Jerusalem (if this is implied in 'having gone up and saluted the church,' Ac 18 22), in Ac 15 40–18 22; (3) the third, which, after passing from Antioch through the Galatian country and Phrygia and through the upper inland parts of Asia, led to a long sojourn in Ephesus. This may have been broken by visits to places within reach, and was terminated when Paul went via Troas to Macedonia, and thence to Corinth, returning once more by the route described in Ac chs. 20 and 21 to Jerusalem—all this in Ac 18 23–21 15. At the same time, there is much to be said for the view of von Dobschütz (Probleme des apostolischen Zeitalters, 1904, p. 58), that if we wish to have a really illuminating view of Paul's work it is better to distribute it into two areas than into three periods, in accordance with which scheme he worked first in the regions of Syria and Cilicia, his headquarters being Tarsus and Antioch. Here he had a colleague, perhaps at first something approaching a patron, in Barnabas, and was apparently on some kind of terms with the Jerusalem church. His later sphere of work was in the regions of the Ægean, his headquarters being Ephesus and Corinth. Here he had assistants, but no colleague in the sense in which Barnabas had been a colleague. He was absolutely his own master, and though he had the most intense desire to keep on terms with Jerusalem and maintain the unity of the body of Christ, he was jealous of his Apostolic independence and resented Jewish Christian intrusion into his churches. When his work in the Ægean regions was done, his mind turned to Spain (Ro 15 23). He would not build on another man's foundation (Ro 15 21; II Co 10 16), and evidently, as Zahn suggests, Egypt and Rome were already occupied.

It is impossible to enter into the details of a life so rich, but some features in each period of it must be noted. The churches of Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, founded during the first journey, are identified by many scholars—most vehemently of late by Ramsay—with the churches of Galatia to which the Epistle is addressed. It is a serious argument against this that Paul addresses the churches in question as if they owed their being solely to him (Gal 4 13-20), whereas Barnabas was at this time his colleague and not his inferior. He could hardly have been mentioned in the Epistle only to be censured for "dissimulation," ὑπόκρισις (2 13). (But see Acts, § 8, and Galatians, § 4.) However, whether they were or were not the churches of Galatia, it was in connection with them that the controversy broke out which was the subject of the Epistle to the Galatians. While he preached in Pisidia and Lycaonia—which were included in the Roman province of Galatia—Paul had been harassed by unbelieving Jews; after his return, his gospel was challenged by Jewish Christians, who found it not false, but imperfect. They said "it is needful to circumcise them" (the Gentile converts) "and to charge them to keep the law of Moses" (Ac 15 5). Paul had evidently preached the gospel implied in his conversion, that Christ crucified and exalted, and the soul's response to Him in faith, are the whole of Christianity; and to him it was as much treason to Christ to supplement this gospel as to supplant it. To condition the Christian standing of the Gentiles by anything statutory was to give it up altogether, and though Paul was quite willing to be a Jew to Jews (Ac 9 20), he would resist to the uttermost any suggestion that the Gentile must become a Jew in order to be in the full sense a Christian. This would not only mean that he himself had run in vain (εἰς κενόν, Gal 2 2), but that Christ had died for nothing (δωρεάν, ver. 21).

10. Controversy over Admission of Gentiles.

The provisional settlement of this question is recorded in Ac ch. 15; Gal ch. 2. It was entirely in Paul's favor. Nothing was added to his gospel; he was recognized as the Apostle of the Gentiles, whose ministry to them had been sealed by God as effectively as that of Peter to the Jews. There is no sufficient reason to question the genuineness of the 'apostolic decree' in Ac 15 23[1]. If the concessions required of the Gentile Christians had been required as conditions of salvation, Paul could not have accepted them; but as 'articles of peace,' concessions made in love to brethren whose 11. The Council Decree.

[1] Cf. Lightfoot on Gal, ad loc.; Chase, Hulsean Lecture, pp. 93 ff.; von Dobschütz, Probleme, p. 86, thinks the decree misplaced in Acts. Paul, he argues, clearly hears of it for the first time on a later visit to Jerusalem at 21 25; it was a measure adopted in the regions of Syria and Cilicia after he had left them for good, and was at work in the Asian-European field. (But see Acts, § 8.) For the non-canonical text and interpretation of the decree cf. Harnack, Die Apostelgeschichte, pp. 188 ff.

Jewish habits gave them a natural horror of certain things they are quite in the spirit of I Co chs. 8–10.

The decree, however, assuming its genuineness, did not settle everything. By the concessions it required from Gentiles it secured to an appreciable extent the peace of mixed congregations and the unity of the Church, but it said nothing about the relation to the Mosaic law of Christians who were born Jews. The Pharisees might still say it was religiously binding on such, and therefore, for example, on Paul; whereas the logic of Paul's gospel—as malignity enabled his enemies to see (Ac 21 21)—pointed unambiguously to the conclusion that the Law had now as little importance for the Jew as for the Gentile. It was in principle abolished by Christianity. Christ was the end of it to every believer (Ro 10 4). In this there were possibilities of future strife and bitterness which time did not fail to develop.

The second missionary journey, however, does not seem to have been much troubled by them.

12. The Galatia of Acts 16 6.

Paul, who had parted unhappily from Barnabas, seemingly over John Mark (Ac 15 37), perhaps for deeper reasons (though Gal 2 13 was yet to come. But see GALATIANS, § 3), had taken Silas for his companion, and at Lystra added Timothy as his assistant (Ac 16 3). He carried conciliation to the very verge of his principles when he circumcised Timothy. The text and meaning of Ac 16 6 are both in dispute; the writer agrees with those who hold that Paul now passed through the Phrygian and Galatic country after and because he was hindered by the Holy Spirit from going W. into Asia to Ephesus. This would be the occasion on which he first visited Galatia, and the Galatia now visited would be the part of Asia Minor ethnographically as well as politically entitled to the name. (But see ACTS, § 8; GALATIANS, § 4.) Sickness had delayed him, and the Galatians gave him and his message an enthusiastic welcome (Gal 4 13). He had delivered the Apostolic decrees to the churches he founded in common with Barnabas (Ac 16 4), but in this independent mission there is no mention of them, and this may be why they are not alluded to in the account given in Gal of the controversy at Jerusalem.

13. First European Work.

Still Divinely guided and controlled, the Apostle reaches the other side of the Ægean, and plants Christianity in the great provinces of Macedonia and Achaia. In the former, he had the churches he loved best (Thessalonica, Philippi); in the latter, his most successful, or at least his best-known foundation (Corinth).

It was from Corinth, during his stay of eighteen months, that he wrote the Epistles to the Thessalonians. In I Th 1 10 (monotheism and the second advent); I Co 2 2, 15 3; Gal 3 1 (Christ crucified, an atonement for sins), we see the substance of his preaching during this journey; in I Co 9 19-23 the principles on which he acted. In Thessalonica and Corinth he worked at his trade and burdened no one; but twice in Thessalonica he consented to accept help from his friends in Philippi (Ph 4 6). When Paul bade farewell to the brethren in Greece, he was accompanied by two new and devoted friends, Aquila and Prisca (Ac 18 2; Ro 16 3). The ship in which he sailed from Cenchreæ touched at Ephesus, and he had time to enter the synagogue and talk with the Jews, but, though he promised to return, he could not stay (Ac 18 19).

14. Further Asia Minor Work.

Of the visit to Jerusalem and to the church there which closed this journey, Luke tells nothing (Ac 18 22). Perhaps there was nothing pleasing to tell. Paul may have become aware now of the opposition which was being organized against his work by Jewish Christians, and which came out soon after at Antioch in the hostile pressure brought to bear upon Peter by "certain from James" (Gal 2 12). The "epistles of commendation" (II Co 3 1) may have already been given to the men whom in the course of his third journey we find in Galatia preaching another gospel (Gal 1 6), in Corinth assailing his apostleship, and claiming on "carnal" grounds a relation to Christ which he could not claim (I Co ch. 9; II Co chs. 3, 10, 11 22), and, worst of all, preaching "another Jesus" whom Paul did not preach—i.e., a Jesus in the sense of Jewish nationalism and its hopes (II Co 11 4), not "the Son of God who was preached among you by us," as he writes to the Corinthians (II Co 1 19), "by me and Silvanus and Timothy." The atmosphere in which all this was organized can not have been pleasant for Paul, and very likely his stay was short. At Antioch he lingered longer, making his way via the Galatic country and Phrygia to Ephesus. During this second visit to Galatia (implied in τὸ πρότερον, Gal 4 13; the first is alluded to in Ac 16 6), he was able to warn the disciples (Gal 1 9) against the new gospel which was no gospel, but which was so soon to bewitch them. Ephesus was now for three years Paul's center: "All they that dwelt in [Roman] Asia heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Greeks" (Ac 19 10), partly by Paul's voice, partly through Pauline Christians like Epaphras (Col 1 7), who introduced the gospel to Colossæ, and possibly to places like Hierapolis and Laodicea (Col 2 1, 4 13; Rev ch. 2 f.), where the disciples had not seen Paul's face in the flesh.

15. Troubles in the Corinthian Church.

Into the complicated questions connected with Paul's relation to Corinth while at Ephesus it is impossible to enter here. We know that I Co was written from Ephesus, near the end of his stay (16 5-9); that he had written an earlier letter now lost (I Co 5 9); that he had paid a visit to Corinth (his second) in distressing circumstances (II Co 2 1, 12 14, 13 1); that he had written in connection with this another letter, probably lost (though some seek it in II Co 10 1–13 10. See CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE, § 11), "out of much affliction and anguish of heart, and with many tears" (II Co 2 4); and that what we call II Co, assuming its unity, was written from Macedonia, to which province he proceeded when he was expelled from Ephesus. The distressing circumstances referred to, which were connected with a personal injury of some kind, had been overcome by the letter written "out of much affliction," and are finally disposed of in II Co chs. 1–7; chs. 8 and 9 deal with the collection he is making for the poor at Jerusalem (Gal 2 10), and chs. 10–13, on this view, deal with the general condition of the Corinthian church—especially the opposition in it to Paul's apostleship and gospel, and the survivals in the community of pagan immorality (but see CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE, §§ 8–11). He followed his letter quickly, and in the three winter months which he spent in Corinth wrote the Epistle to the Romans, and in all probability that to the Galatians (but see GALATIANS, §§ 2, 5). All the Epistles of this period deal with the gospel as a doctrine of redemption. They argue, as against men who would introduce a statutory element into Christianity, that it is entirely an affair of grace and of inspiration; that the security in it for holiness is not any system of commands or prohibitions, but union with Christ, the sense of debt to Him, and the indwelling of His spirit; and that apostleship does not depend on historical relation to Jesus, which is in itself of no value, but on the revelation of the Risen Lord (Gal 1 16), the comprehension of the new covenant (II Co ch. 3), a life of devoted service and suffering (II Co chs. 6 and 11), and the Divine attestation of success in evangelic work (I Co 9 2; II Co 3 2 ff.).

16. Final Jerusalem Journey.

When Paul left Corinth in the spring for Jerusalem he was attended by delegates from most of his churches (Ac 20 4; II Co 8 19; I Co 16 3), in joint charge of "the collection" (I Co 16 1). He hoped this great proof of Gentile love would unite the churches and conciliate good-will at Jerusalem to himself and his gospel, but he was very anxious and uncertain (Ro 15 30 f.), and against all omens pressed on under some Divine compulsion (Ac 20 23, 21 4, 11-14). The event justified his fears. The N T tells nothing of the way in which the collection was accepted, but we see from Ac 21 20 that the Pharisaic party had entire ascendency in the church, and though Paul, to conciliate them, carried compliance to an extreme which it is hard to justify on his own principles (Ac 21 23-26), yet when he fell into the hands of his Jewish enemies, the church does not appear to have done anything to help him.

17. Voyage to Rome.

After appearing before the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem, and before Felix and Festus at Cæsarea, he was compelled to protest against injustice and delay (he had been a prisoner fully two years, Ac 24 27) by exercising his right as a Roman citizen to appeal to the emperor. The voyage to Rome is told by an eye-witness (Ac 27 1–28 16). Paul was probably handed over at its close to the princeps peregrinorum (officer in charge of the foreigners), in a kind of military custody. He rented a house in which for two years he carried on his work unimpeded. The Epistles of his imprisonment belong to this period, and Philippians, which was certainly written in Rome (Colossians [q.v.] and Philemon [q.v.] are by some referred to the Cæsarean imprisonment), throws some light on the situation. The gospel had adherents in the palace (Ph 4 22), but there were much dissension and ill feeling among Christians themselves, even among those engaged in evangelizing (1 15. See PHILIPPIANS, § 1). Loyal and disinterested men, with no by-ends in their Christian work, were rare (2 21). The Pharisaic-Christian propaganda against Paul's work was still going on, and the Apostle warns his beloved Philippians against it in one of his most passionate and scornful outbursts (3 2). (But see PHILIPPIANS, § 1.) The great characteristic of the prison Epistles, however, is their Christology. It is perhaps incorrect, in view of I Co 8 6, II Co 8 9, to speak of an advance or development in Paul's thought; everything is latent in these passages which is unfolded in Col 1 13 ff.; Ph 2 5 ff. But whereas in the controversial Epistles of the third journey (I and II Co, Gal, Ro) Christianity is presented as a doctrine of redemption having the Son of God indeed as its center (Ro 1 4; II Co 1 19), it is in the Epistles of the imprisonment presented more directly as a doctrine of Christ. If this needs to be supplemented, we may add—and of the Church as the body of Christ. Christ is in the forefront in Col, the body of Christ in Eph. The sum of both may be given in the words of Col 2 9: "In him dwelleth all the fulness of the godhead bodily, and in him ye are made full." Christ has absolute significance for the Apostle; all things have to be defined by relation to Him. God is revealed in Him alone; creation is constituted in Him alone; the Church is brought into being, and has its being, in Him alone. No one knows what God is, or the universe, or the Church, or redemption, apart from Him; but in Him the full and final meaning of all is disclosed. The Apostle, so to speak, takes the metaphysical responsibilities of his doctrine of redemption, and sets the example to believers of Christianizing all their ideas of God, man, and the universe. Christ is held up not only as a historical person, with whom the Twelve had associated—not only as a representative or a universal person, the second Adam—but unequivocally as an eternal and Divine person. The occasion for this, no doubt, lay in external circumstances; but the possibility of it and the impulse to it could only lie within, in the Christian experience of the Apostle himself (see COLOSSIANS, § 2, and EPHESIANS, § 4).

18. Release and Second Imprisonment.

The life of Paul can not be clearly traced beyond Ac 28 31. If the imprisonment at Rome here recorded ended in condemnation and his death, the author of Ac must have known, and it is difficult to say why he not only did not tell, but actually suggests (as ver. 30 f. do) the opposite. A favorable issue to his trial was also confidently expected by Paul himself; see Phm ver. 22; Ph 1 24 ff., 2 24, from which it appears that he meant after his long confinement to visit his churches in Macedonia and Asia. Further, the Pastoral Epistles, whether genuine or not, show that this view was prevalent in the early Church. They represent an Apostolic or organizing work of Paul for which Acts has no room; and it is more than difficult to dispose of the persons, places, and situations which they introduce, without admitting that Paul's appeal to Cæsar was successful; that he obtained his liberty and revisited many of the scenes of his former activity (Ephesus, Macedonia, Troas, Corinth, Miletus), besides breaking new ground (Crete, Nicopolis in Epirus). Whether he succeeded in his plan of advancing to Spain is not certain: the reference to "the limit of the West" (τὸ τέρμα τῆς δύσεως) in Clement of Rome is an argument that he did. If the combination thus suggested is correct, Paul was acquitted on his first trial before the Neronian persecution broke out in 64 A.D.; but as all tradition ascribes his martyrdom to Nero, he must have been rearrested, and have undergone the imprisonment referred to in the Pastorals, before that emperor died in 68. (See CHRONOLOGY OF THE N T, § 7.)

LITERATURE: The best short introduction to St. Paul's life and work is Sabatier's L'Apôtre Paul (Eng. transl. edited by Findlay, 1896); Lewin's Life and Epp. of St. Paul[3] (1875), Ramsay's St. Paul the Traveler (1896), and The Church in the Roman Empire (1893), do most to illustrate the outward conditions which affected Paul's work. Of Introductions to the Epistles Holtzmann's3 on the critical and Zahn's[3] (1906, Eng. transl. 1908) on the conservative side are unrivaled; but Jülicher's[6] (1906, Eng. transl. 1904) and Godet's (1893, Eng. transl. 1894) are infinitely more readable, and for most readers very serviceable. Of the numerous commentaries, the best in English are those by Lightfoot (Galatians[9] 1887, Colossians and Philemon 1879, Philippians[8] 1888, and Notes on Epp. of St. Paul, 1895); Gifford (1906); Sanday and Headlam on Romans (1895); Edwards on I Co (1885); and Findlay on I Co (1900). Paul's theology can be studied in Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity (1894); Stevens, N T Theology (1899); Somerville, St. Paul's Conception of Christ (1897); Pfleiderer's first book on the subject, Der Paulinismus[2] (1890, Eng. transl. of 1st ed., 1877), is better than any of his later ones. Holtzmann's Lehrbuch der neut. Theologie (1897) and Weizsäcker's Das apostolische Zeitalter[2] (1892, Eng. transl. 1894–95) are indispensable to students.

J. D.

PAULUS, pô'lŭs, SERGIUS (Σέργιος Παῦλος): The proconsul of Cyprus when Paul visited the island on his first missionary journey. In 22 B.C Cyprus became a senatorial province and was henceforth governed by a proconsul, or a propretor with title and rank of proconsul. Luke's accuracy (once doubted) in giving Sergius Paulus the title of proconsul in Ac 13 7 is vindicated not only by the above-named facts, but also by an inscription at Karavastasi (ancient Soli, on the N. coast of Cyprus), in which Paulus is mentioned as proconsul. Of the twenty known governors of Cyprus, Sergius Paulus (45 A.D.) is known solely from Luke and the inscription of Soli. J. R. S. S.

PAVEMENT: The terms martsepheth (II K 16 17) and ritspāh (II Ch 7 3; Est 1 6; Ezk 40 17 f., 42 3), both from rātsaph, 'to arrange in layers, or rows,' refer to stone carefully laid in order, probably in plaster. Such stonework constituted the border of the floor of the Temple court and of the banqueting hall of the Persian king. On the occurrence of the term in Jn 19 13, see JERUSALEM, § 44. E. E. N.

PAVILION: The rendering of ṣōkh, ṣukkāh, 'booth,' 'tabernacle,' or 'tent-like dwelling.' The word is used in the literal sense in Is 4 6, "tabernacle" AV; Nu 25 8, "tent" AV; I K 20 12, 16, "huts" RVmg., and also figuratively in poetry designating the mystery which surrounds the person of God (Ps 27 5, 31 20). A. C. Z.

PEACE: The two words translated "peace" in EV have a greater range of meaning than is at first apparent to the English reader.[1]

(1) The Heb. shĕlōm (primarily 'completeness,' 'soundness') comprehends (a) cessation from war (Jos 9 15; Ec 3 8); (b) friendship between individuals (Gn 26 29; Ps 28 3) or with God, especially in the covenant relations (Nu 25 12; Is 54 10); (c) tranquillity or contentment (Is 32 17 f.); and (d) in varying degrees of emphasis, almost everything which makes for safety, welfare, and happiness. "Peace" is thus the most comprehensive and highly prized gift of God, and is promised as the crowning blessing of the Messianic Age (e.g., in Is 9 6 f.; Mic 5 5). (2) These conceptions were all carried over into the N T εἰρήνη, which appropriated even greater breadth and depth of meaning, culminating specifically in that peace which is the gift of Christ (Jn 14 27, 16 33; Ro 5 1; Ph 4 7). This peculiarly Christian blessing may be defined as "the tranquil state of a soul assured of its salvation through Christ, and so fearing nothing from God, and content with its earthly lot, of whatever sort that is" (Thayer, Gr. Lex. of the N T). "Peace" is the favorite Biblical greeting (often, however, translated "well" in EV, e.g., Gn 29 6; II K 4 26), both oral (I S 1 17; II K 9 22; Lk 24 36) and written (Ezr 4 17; Dn 4 1; every N T Epistle except Ja and I Jn), and to this day is one of the most common words upon Semitic lips. See SALUTATION.

For the peace-offering (shĕlem), which may have been considered as solemnizing an alliance of peace, see SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 10. L. G. L.

PEACE-OFFERING. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 10.

PEACOCKS (תֻּכִּיִּים, tukkīyyīm): These fowls are mentioned as imported by Solomon in connection with his trade with S. Arabia and the East (I K 10 22; II Ch 9 21). Some modern scholars doubt the correctness of the reading. In Job 39 13 the Heb. rᵉnānīm means 'female ostriches' (cf. RV).

E. E. N.

PEARL (μαργαρίτης): A gem very much prized in N T times and used as an ornament (Mt 7 6, 13 45; I Ti 2 9; Rev 17 4, 21 21). Its use among the ancient Hebrews, however, is extremely doubtful. The word so translated in Job 28 18 AV (gābhīsh) occurs but this once in the O T, and its cognates in Assyr. and Eth. show that the RV "crystal" is more correct (cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex.). A. C. Z.

PECULIAR PEOPLE (TREASURE): A phrase in the AV which renders certain expressions that denote the conception of proprietorship in its most intense form. The Heb. term lying at the basis of them all (ṣᵉgullāh, 'possession') was evidently at first applied to treasure cherished and kept in reserve for oneself as a source of exceptional pleasure and value, possibly also held dear because it cost special effort in the acquisition (I Ch 29 3; Ec 2 8). Afterward, and as attached to the word "people," it signified God's special and exclusive relation to Israel ('am ṣᵉgullāth, 'people of possession'), and might be paraphrased: 'people jealously cherished and guarded as a treasure' (Dt 7 6, 14 2, 26 18). But even with the word "people" omitted, the term still designated Israel as J"'s own treasure (Ex 19 5; Ps 135 4, "peculiar treasure" AV). The thought is the same as in Dt 32 9, "J"'s portion is his people." In the N T the phrase is merely reproduced in citations from the O T (λαὸς περιούσιος, Tit 2 14:

[1] "To hold one's peace" is, of course, merely an idiomatic English rendering of Heb. and Gr. expressions meaning 'to be silent.' There is no reference to "peace" in the original.

λαὸς εἰς περιποίησιν, I P 2 9; cf. Eph 1 14), the difference in translation being due to the strongly idiomatic nature of the original Heb. The RV consistently carries through the accurate, though paraphrastic, rendering, "people for God's [my, his] own possession." A. C. Z.

PEDAHEL, ped'a-hel (פְּדָהְאֵל, pᵉdhāh'ēl), 'God has redeemed': A "prince" of Naphtali (Nu 34 28). E. E. N.

PEDAHZUR, pę-dā'zūr or ped'a-zūr (פְּדָהצוּר, pᵉdhāhtsūr), 'the Rock has redeemed': The father of Gamaliel, "chief" of Manasseh (Nu 1 10, 2 20, etc.). E. E. N.

PEDAIAH, pę-dê'yā (פְּדָיָה, pᵉdhāyāh, פְּדָיָהוּ, pᵉdhāyāhū, in I Ch 27 20), 'J" hath ransomed': 1. The great-grandfather of King Jehoiakim (II K 23 36). 2. The third son (I Ch 3 18) of King Jehoiachin (Jeconiah), and probably born in Babylon, as his father was under nineteen when taken into exile (II K 24 8 f.). According to I Ch 3 19, he was the father of Zerubbabel, who elsewhere is called son of Shealtiel, brother of P. 3. The father of Joel, ruler under David of Manasseh, W of the Jordan (I Ch 27 20). 4. A son of Parosh, and a helper in repairing the wall (Neh 3 25). 5. One who stood at the left of Ezra when he read the Law (Neh 8 4). 6. A Levite, appointed by Nehemiah on his second visit to Jerusalem, as one of the treasurers in charge of receiving and distributing the tithes (Neh 13 13). 7. A Benjamite, the ancestor, in the third generation, of Sallu, a post-exilic inhabitant of Jerusalem (Neh 11 7; cf. I Ch 9 7). C. S. T.

PEEL: This term is the AV translation of mārat, 'to pull out, or off [feathers, or hair].' In Is 18 2, 7, in a description of the Ethiopians, we read, "a nation scattered and peeled" (AV), "tall and smooth" (RV), "dragged away and peeled" (RVmg.). "Smooth" or "polished" would seem to be the best rendering, and in keeping with the primary meaning of the Heb. For "peeled" (Ezk 29 18 AV) ARV has "worn" (by the chafing of burdens). In Gn 30 37, 38, "peeled" RV is the correct translation of pātsal (instead of the archaic "pilled" of AV). C. S. T.

PEEP. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 4.

PEKAH, pî'kā (פֶּקַח, peqaḥ): The son of Remaliah, and king of Israel (736–733 B.C.). Under Pekahiah, son of Menahem, P. was general-in-chief of the armies of Israel. He did not, however, share his master's disposition to trust in Assyria. Pekahiah, on his side, was by inheritance and choice a pro-Assyrian. Accordingly P., growing impatient, broke into the palace of Samaria with a band of 150 Gileadites, slew Pekahiah, and took the reins of government into his own hands. He then assisted in organizing an anti-Assyrian league, with Rezin of Damascus and the kings of Arvad, Gaza, Ashkelon, Moab, Ammon, Edom, and the Arabian queen Shamsie. Judah declined to join the alliance, and a special coalition was formed between Rezin and Pekah with the object of attacking Jerusalem, dethroning Ahaz, and placing Tabeel in his stead (Is 7 6). The war which ensued, commonly called the Syro-Ephraimitish war, lasted only a few months. Jerusalem was attacked by a large army; Edom took occasion to seize upon Elath on the Red Sea, and general havoc was wrought throughout Judah. The numbers (120,000 slain and 200,000 captives taken by the allies) given by the Chronicler are incredibly large. But evidently Ahaz was driven to extremities. Contrary to the advice of the prophet Isaiah, he appealed for help to Tiglath-pileser III. Upon the arrival of the Assyrians the allies hastily abandoned the siege of Jerusalem and found themselves compelled to protect their own territories. Tiglath-pileser III carried on a campaign of devastation in the Northern Kingdom, subjugated the territory as far as the Sea of Gennesaret and deported the leading citizens of the country (II K 15 29). P.'s policy was thus proved to be a failure. His opponents seized the opportunity of forming a conspiracy by which he was deposed and slain, and Hoshea, the leader of the pro-Assyrian faction, was elevated to the throne. A. C. Z.

PEKAHIAH, pek''a-hai'ā (פְּקַחְיָה, peqaḥyāh), 'J" opens': The son of Menahem, King of Israel (II K 15 22-26; 737–736 B.C.). His father had declared himself in favor of political friendship with the great Assyrian Empire. Pekahiah seems to have been unable to maintain this pro-Assyrian policy. In less than two years from his accession he fell a victim to a political and military conspiracy. The troubles of the times are pictured in the prophecies of Hosea. A. C. Z.

PEKOD, pî'kod (פְּקוֹד, pᵉqōdh): A Chaldean people in the Babylonian army (Ezk 23 23; cf. Jer 50 21), the Puḳûdu of the Assyr. inscriptions, a tribe in SE. Babylonia, adjoining Elam. Some find in Jer 50 21 (cf. mg. "visitation") a symbolic name for "Babylon." C. S. T.

PELAIAH, pę-lê'yā or pel''a-ai'ā (פְּלָאְיָה, pᵉlā'yāh, and פְּלָיָה, pᵉlāyāh), 'God has done a wonder': 1. A descendant of David (I Ch 3 24). 2. One of Ezra's assistants (Neh 8 7). 3. A prominent Levite (Neh 10 10). E. E. N.

PELALIAH, pel''a-lai'ā (פְּלַלְיָה, pᵉlalyāh), 'J" judges': A priest (Neh 11 12). E. E. N.

PELATIAH, pel''a-tai'ā (פְּלַטְיָה, pᵉlaṭyāh [also pᵉlaṭyāhū]), 'J" delivers': 1. A Simeonite leader (I Ch 4 42). 2. A prince of Judah, in Jerusalem, seen in a vision by Ezekiel in Babylonia as guilty of death (Ezk 11 1 ff.). The death of P., which followed immediately, was also, apparently, made known to the prophet in his vision (11 13), though, as in many other places in Ezekiel, it is difficult to distinguish between the symbolic and the actual. 3. A grandson of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 21). 4. The name of a post-exilic family (Neh 10 22). E. E. N.

PELEG, pî'leg. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.

PELET, pî'let (פֶּלֶט, peleṭ): 1. A Calebite clan (I Ch 2 47). 2. A Benjamite who attached himself to David (I Ch 12 3). E. E. N.

PELETH, pî'leth (פֶּלֶת, peleth): 1. The name of a family of Reuben (Nu 16 1), perhaps the same as Pallu (q.v.). 2. A descendant of Jerahmeel (I Ch 2 33). E. E. N.

PELETHITE, pel'ę-thait or pi'leth-ait. See CHERETHITES AND PELETHITES.

PELICAN. See PALESTINE, § 26.

PELONITE, pel'o-nait (פְּלֹנִי, pelōnī): The designation of two individuals in I Ch 11 27, 27 10, and 11 36. But the text should be corrected according to the ‖s in II S ch. 23—in the first instance to "Paltite" (II S 23 36), in the second, to "Gilonite" (II S 23 34). E. E. N.

PEN. See BOOKS AND WRITING, § 4.

PENCE. See MONEY, § 6.

PENCIL (עֶרֶד, seredh, "line" AV): An instrument used for marking on wood, preparatory to carving (only Is 44 13). Some would translate "red chalk" (cf. RVmg.), others "stylus." C. S. T.

PENDANT. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II, § 2.

PENIEL, pę-nai'el. See PENUEL.

PENINNAH, pę-nin'ā (פְּנִנָּה, peninnāh): One of the wives of Elkanah (I S 1 2, 4). E. E. N.

PENKNIFE: The term renders the Heb. ṭa'ar ṣōphēr, 'the knife of the scribe,' i.e., the small knife used in making and keeping in order reed pens (Jer 36 23). See also BOOKS AND WRITING, § 4. E. E. N.

PENNY, PENNYWORTH. See MONEY, § 6.

PEN OF THE WRITER: An expression found in Jg 5 14 AV. The passage is well rendered by Moore (Int. Crit. Com., Judges), "those who carry the muster-master's staff." E. E. N.

PENTATEUCH, pen'ta-tiūc. See HEXATEUCH, § 1.

PENTECOST, pen'tę-cost (πεντηκοστή, scil. ἡμέρα), 'the fiftieth [day]': This term is used in II Mac 12 32; To 2 1; Philo, De Septen., § 21, for the second of the great annual feasts (q.v.) of the Hebrews, which fell fifty days after the beginning of the harvest (Lv 23 15, 16). In the later literature it is sometimes designated by the Aramaic name 'atsarto, 'closing' (cf. Jos. Ant. III, 10 6).

1. In the O T.

In Ex 23 16 (E) the second of the annual feasts is called the "feast of the harvest," which is more specifically described as "the first-fruits of thy labors, which thou sowest in the field." In Ex 34 22 (J) it is called the "feast of weeks," where the time is more definitely specified as the beginning of the wheat harvest. In Dt 16 9 the latter term is explained as derived from the length of the interval (seven weeks) between the beginning and end of the harvest, i.e., the wheat harvest. It followed the Feast of Unleavened Bread, which marked the beginning of the harvest. No regulations are given in the legislation of Dt for the observance of the feast. It simply emphasizes the joyfulness which is to characterize its observance, the free-will character of its offerings, and its nature as a tribute to J". On the other hand, in the Holiness Code (Lv 23 15 f.) the time of the feast is set at 'fifty days after the morrow of the Sabbath following the presentation of the first-fruits' (vs. 15-16a), and specific sacrifices are prescribed (vs. 16b-20). The day is to be observed with a convocation, and no servile work is to be done (ver. 21). The Priestly Code (P) (Nu 28 26 f.) does not specify the date of the feast, this being naturally determined by the date of the Passover, which falls on the 15th of Nisan. In addition to the offerings prescribed in the Holiness Code, the regular offerings of the Passover Feast are required (vs. 26-31; cf. Nu 28 19 f.). The briefer and less specific prescriptions for this feast in the Priestly Code as compared with those for the Passover and Tabernacles indicate that, at the time of the compilation of this legislation, it was of relatively less importance than the other feasts, while its purely agricultural character in all the codes and the absence of any attempt to connect it with events in the national history (as, e.g., in the case of the Passover, Ex ch. 12; Dt 16 3) indicate that it originated after the settlement of the Hebrew tribes, being borrowed probably from the Canaanites.

2. In Philo, Josephus, and Later Jewish Literature.

Later references to the feast in Philo and Josephus show little change in its character. Philo (De Sec., § 30; cf. De Septen., § 21) simply interprets allegorically the O T regulations, emphasizing especially their Sabbatical character. Josephus mentions ministrations in the Temple by the priests at night (BJ, VI, 5 3), and a sacrificial meal participated in by the priests alone (Ant. II, 10 6). At a later period, however (cf. Talmudic tractate Pesach 68b), it was celebrated as the feast of the giving of the Law because of the general coincidence of its date with that of the promulgation of the Sinaitic law (Ex 19 1 ff.). This is strikingly brought out in the Book of Jubilees, where a number of Divine revelations are said to have been given on the day of the Feast of Pentecost (1 1, 6 1, 14 1, 15 1).

3. In the Early Church.

Paul's desire to be at Jerusalem at P (I Co 16 8; Ac 20 16) indicates that on the occasion of this feast Jerusalem was visited by Jews from abroad (cf. Jos. Ant. XIV, 13 4; XVII. 10 2). This may account in part for the choice of this time for the first great Apostolic proclamation of the Gospel (Ac 2 14). Moreover, the close association of the outpouring of the Spirit with the day of Pentecost in Ac 2 1 (especially according to the text of D) is in line with the tendency already noted (§ 2, above) to change the feast from one of thanksgiving to a memorial of Divine revelation. This association is even more strongly brought out in early Christian literature (cf. especially Augustine, Epis. 54 ad Jan.).

It is to be observed that in early Christian custom the celebration of P. occupied the whole period between Easter and the outpouring of the Spirit (cf. Tert. De Bapt., 19; Orig. Contra Celsum, 8. 22; Const. Apos., 5, 20), not being limited to one day until the Council of Elvira in 305. See also FASTS AND FEASTS, § 7.

LITERATURE: Nowack, Heb. Arch., pp. 138 ff.; articles on Pentecost by Benzinger in EB and by Eisenstein in JE. For the date of its Christian observance consult Wieseler, Chron. d. Apos. Zeitalter, p. 16 f. J. M. T.

PENUEL, pę-nū'el, or PENIEL, pę-nai'el (פְּנוּאֵל, pᵉnū'ēl, and פְּנִיאֵל, pᵉnī'ēl), 'the face of God': I. The name of the place near which Jacob crossed the river Jabbok (Gn 32 30 f.) after his "wrestling" with the angel. The Heb. tradition sought thus to explain the name, but it may have been originally due to the face-like contour of some mount or cliff. It is mentioned later as a fortified place (Jg 8 8-17), and still later as "built," i.e., strengthened by Jeroboam I (I K 12 25). Site unknown. II. The name of two individuals. 1. The "father" of Gedor (I Ch 4 4). 2. A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 25). E. E. N.

PEOPLE: Of the various Heb. terms rendered "people," the one most distinctive and used in the vast majority (about 95 per cent.) of instances is 'am, from a root (II, עם in Ges.-Buhl) meaning 'to build together,' and thus primarily a body of people bound together by some bond, probably used in the first place of a tribe or clan in which the bond was kinship. It is used of a people as a political entity, while gōy, 'nation,' emphasized the racial distinctions. Israel was an 'am, and, particularly, the "people" of J″ Naturally, the word is often used in a general sense. In late O T times the expression 'am hā'ārets, "the people of the land," was used technically for the non-Jewish element in the land (Ezr 4 4, 10 2, etc.). In post-Biblical Judaism this expression came to mean the ignorant (Jews) in contrast to the learned. In the N T, the two main words are λαός, the equivalent of the O T 'am and used in much the same way (Mt 1 21; Mk 11 32, etc.), and ὄχλος, 'crowd' or 'multitude,' but often used in a less specific sense for people in general (Mt 7 28, etc.). E. E. N.

PEOPLE OF THE EAST. See East, East Country, Children of the East.

PEOR, pî'ęr (הַפְּעוֹר, ha-pᵉ'ōr), 'the Peor': A mountain of Moab, overlooking Jeshimon (q.v.) (Nu 23 28). According to Buhl, Geog. Pal., p. 123, it lay to the N. of Nebo, but this identification is uncertain. It was probably the seat of the worship of Baal-peor (q.v.), which is meant by "Peor" in Nu 25 18, 31 16; Jos 22 17. E. E. N.

PERÆA, pę-rî'a (Περαία): The name given by Josephus to the portion of Palestine E. of the Jordan. In the O T this is called 'ēbher ha-yardēn, 'the other side of the Jordan' (Gn 50 10 f.; Nu 22 1, etc.) and in the N T (where the word "Peræa" does not occur) πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου, "beyond the Jordan" (Mt 4 15, 19 1, etc.). In the time of Christ Peræa with Galilee was under the dominion of Herod Antipas. See Palestine, §§ 13 and 37. E. E. N.

PERAZIM, per'a-zim (פְּרָצִים, pᵉrātsīm), 'breaches': A mountain referred to in Is 28 21 as the scene of some well-known event, probably that of II S 5 20. See Baal-perazim. E. E. N.

PERDITION. See Eschatology, § 49.

PERES. See Mene, Mene, etc.

PERESH, pî'resh (פֶּרֶשׁ, peresh): A son of Machir (I Ch 7 16). E. E. N.

PEREZ, pî'rez (פֶּרֶץ, perets), 'a breach': Pharez AV in O T, except in I Ch 27 3 and Neh 11 4, 6; Phares in N T Mt 1 3; Lk 3 33: One of the twin sons of Judah and Tamar (Gn 38 29). The tribe of Judah was, accordingly, subdivided into the two branches of Perezites and Zerathites (Pharzites and Zarhites, Nu 26 20 AV). The Perezite branch was again subdivided into Hezronite, from Hezron, and the Hamulites, from Hamul. David was a Perezite, which fact gave the clan the preeminence after his days (Ru 4 13). It was also further glorified by Jashobeam, a general under David (I Ch 27 3). The name of Perez naturally occurs in the genealogy of Christ. A. C. Z.

PEREZ-UZZAH, -uz'ā (פֶּרֶץ עֻזָּה, perets 'uzzāh), 'the breach of Uzzah': The name given to the place where Uzzah was smitten for touching the Ark (II S 6 8; I Ch 13 11). E. E. N.
